HERACLITUS, being sick, examined his physician concerning the cause of his sickness; but finding that he was ignorant thereof, he would take none of his physic, saying, "If he be not able to show me the cause, he is less able to take away the cause of my disease." Thus, there are many sores and sicknesses in a commonwealth, nulle nocendi artes (a thousand ways of cheating); the generality of men is (as Ovid said of Autolycus) "furtum ingeniosus ad omne (witty in all kind of wickedness);" nay, mundus in maligno positus (the world is set upon mischief). And such is the subtlety, too, of offenders, that Tertullus's trim tale for the Jews goes current, till the Apostle comes after it and unstarcheth it. How easy is a fair glove drawn upon a foul hand?—a bad cause smoothed over with goodly pretences? So cunning, so wary, and so wise are the many, that (as Cæsar said of the Scythians) "difficilius invenire quàm interficere (it is harder to find them than to soil them);" like the fish sepia, or cuttle-fish, they can hide themselves in their own mud, cover themselves close in their own devices. The magistrate, then, that physician of the body politic, had need to be wise and learned; to get and keep that ὄψ ἀδιαβλήτων (one ear open for the defendant); to be a man of great experience, industry, and judgment; to catch all such with the hooks of justice who are crafty and slippery to avoid them, and by this means take away the causes of corruption.

MDCCXCI.—Men to be careful how they make oath, in judicature or otherwise.

Plutarch, in Vita.

It is said of Alexander the Great, that being about to destroy Lampsacum, an eminent port-town in Bithynia, Anaximenes the philosopher, and his former master, being a native of the place, came to meet him, and to entreat him in the behalf thereof; which, being foreseen by Alexander, he swore that he would not do that which Anaximenes should ask him; whereupon Anaximenes told him, "That which I desire is, that thou wouldst destroy Lampsacum." Now, Alexander being so taken by his word, for the reverence of his oath, did not destroy the place. Most noble was it in this great man to keep his oath, and necessary is it for all inferiors to keep theirs; for an oath is not a slight business, although it be despised, because men are accustomed thereunto—namely, being the testimony of God concerning things doubtful; and therefore, to cite God as the witness to a lie must needs be a foul wickedness and horrible impiety.

Phil., De Decalogo.

"Tantum perjurii vita."—OVID, Amor. i.

MDCCXCII.—Tedious length of law-suits condemned.

It is said of Hippocrates, the famous physician, that he was never seen to be in choler with any man; and that he had many scholars, yet permitted none to practise before they had taken an oath, at the altar of Apollo, to abbreviate the cure of all diseases to the utmost of their power—a good precedent for physicians then, and a good pattern for lawyers now, to dispatch their client's cause with expedition, not to spin out time in the suit, donec evacuata marsupia, till all their money is gone. In the Jewish commonwealth, judgment-seats were placed in the gates of the cities, intimating quick dispatch, that causes should not depend so long as to become aged and gray-headed in courts, lest they force the poor client to say unto his lawyer, as Balaam's ass did to his master, "Am I not thine ass, which thou hast ridden upon since thy first time till this present day?"

Soranus, in Vit.

Garcey, ut antea.

Ruth. iv. 2.

Numb. xxii. 30.

MDCCXCIII.—Cruelty of the wicked, no prejudice to the godly.

It is reported of Constantine, that being spoken to by many to punish some who had thrown stones at his image, saying that with the stones they had bruised all his face, he, wiping his face with his hand, and smiling with his countenance, gave them this answer: "Ego verò vulnus nusquam in fronte factum video," &c. (I do not feel any hurt about me, or any wound made in my face; but my head is sound, and all my body likewise). Plainly, so it is with them that keep the commandments of God: all the evil which the devil or any wicked man can work or do against them, it is but like an evil done to their pictures—they feel it not; for how should they feel evil, to whom all things work together for their good? It is true, they may know sorrow, but not so to know it as to take care for it; they may find the dealings of wicked men to be evil, but they shall not much feel the evil of them; nay, they shall receive much good for the evil that they suffer; for, as it is an exercise of their patience, so shall it be the increase of their glory.

Baronii Annales,
Anno Christi 324.

Eccles. viii. 5.

"Est ipsis injuria passis utilis interdum."
—OVID, in
Ep.

MDCCXCIV.—Goodness, not greatness, that holdeth out to the last.

WHEN a wealthy merchant bragged to Lycon, a wise philosopher, of the multitude of his great ships and furniture for sea, being able to trade into all parts, the wise man made this answer: "I esteem not that to be felicity which hangs upon ropes and cables." Thus, when a man is at the last cast, it is piety and the true fear of God—not plenty and prosperity, which are transitory—that shall stand a man in stead. The smoke of a great man's sacrifice smells never the sweeter before God because he is clothed in silk or, like the bird of paradise, adorned with plumes and fine feathers. No; it is the inside that God regards: He looks on man's obedience, requires his service, loves his thankfulness, respects his holiness, and will reward his faithfulness.

D. Laertius.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1626.

"Non amo illam fortunam rudentibus aptam."

MDCCXCV.—How it comes to pass that Death is more generally excused than accused.

It was a fable amongst the ancients in former times, that God appointing to everything its office and function, He gave order unto Death to take away the lives of men; but Death refused the employment, and gave this reason: because he should be by every one accused; they would all be ready to say that he had killed them. "No," says God, "they shall all be forward to excuse thee." "Nay, then," says Death, "let me alone to undertake the service." Hence it comes to pass that of such a one we say he died because he was an old man; of another, because he was intemperate in his diet; of a third, because he was careless of his health; a fourth might have been a living man, had he not gone such a journey by land, or such a voyage to sea: so that, with one thing or other, Death, that prince of terrors, though he have his name in Latin Mors, à mordendo, yet he is more generally excused by all men than accused by any.

Cartari, Imagines de Gli Dei d'Antichi.

MDCCXCVI.—A minister to keep close to his text.

Carey's Serm.,
Norfolk, 1613.

Job vi. 25.

Act xxvii. 14.

THE poet was witty who made this fiction: A client, having feed his lawyer to plead for the recovery of his two hogs, his counsellor tells him it should be his first motion, and so steps to the bar, and there makes a long oration so far from the matter, that the poor client, thinking he had been upon another business, pulls him by the sleeve, saying, "Domine, jam age de porcis (Sir, now plead for my hogs)." This is a great fault in lawyers, that many times, in their pleadings, they are so far from the matter, that neither judge nor jury can well tell what to make of it. But the like may be said of some bold ignaroës, such as, in the pulpit, after they have repeated the text, shake hands with it, and so part, never coming at it again. In ventum verba proferunt (Their discourse is like wind). And yet the people are much taken with these Euroclydons—men of more tongue than judgment. "Oh," says one, "he is a very ready man; he was never out!" and that is true, for he was never in. "Oh," says another, "he never looked on his book!" and that is as true; his tutor—if he had one—could never get him to look upon any. It were, therefore, to be wished that, as the lawyer was advised to come to the point, so he to keep close to his text.

MDCCXCVII.—Kings, princes, protectors, &c., subject to Death, as well as the lowest of the people.

Quint. Curtius.

"Mors sceptris il-lignibus aequat."

Eccles. viii. 8.

It is written of Alexander, that, having heard of Paradise, and that it was upon the earth, he was very eager in seeking of it out; and to that end, coming into the east part of the earth, an old man, meeting with some of his soldiers, bade them to tell Alexander that he sought Paradise in vain, for the way to Paradise was the way of humility, which he did not take. "But," saith he, "take this stone, and carry it to Alexander, and tell him that from this stone he shall tell what he is." Now, the stone was a precious stone, and of such a quality, that whatsoever thing was weighed with it, that was still the heavier, only, if it were covered with dust, then it was as light as straw. The meaning of the thing did easily appear, as showing Alexander and all others in power like unto him, that though in their lives they outweigh others by greatness of their authority, yet that in death all their greatness signifies as much as comes to nothing, and then they weigh as light as any other. They may forbid things by the laws of their nations, but they cannot banish Death by any law they can make; they may dispatch away their ambassadors to treat with men, but not with Death; they may send out their military forces to withstand their enemies, but they cannot resist Death.

MDCCXCVIII.—Magistrates to be impartial in justice.

In Operum, tom. ii.

"Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos."—VIRG.

SELEUCUS, that impartial law-giver of the Locrians, made a law against adulterers, that whosoever should be found guilty thereof, exocularetur—they are the words of Reverend Bede—should have his eyes put out. It so happened that his son proved the first offender; sentence was pronounced, execution ready to be done; whereupon the people "submissis precibus rogabant, &c. (earnestly entreated the judge, his father, that he would pardon the fact);" who, upon serious deliberation, put out one of his own eyes and one of his son's, and so showed himself "pium patrem et severum judicem (a godly father and an upright judge together)." Thus it is that magistrates, like the earth, should be immovable, though the winds should blow at once from all the points of the compass; not to favour friends, nor fear the frowns of enemies, but proceed impartially, according to the merits of the cause that is before them.

Leech's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

Prov. xviii. 5.

MDCCXCIX.—The greatness of kings, princes, protectors, &c., no protection from death.

THERE is a relation of Alexander the Great, that, as he went on conquering the world, coming near some wise men, he called them unto him, and upon asking them some questions, he found them to be wise men indeed. He bade them to ask some gifts of him, and they should have them; whereupon one of the philosophers said, "We desire of thee certain immortality:" at which Alexander, laughing, said, "I accounted you to be wise men, but now I perceive you to be ignorant. I cannot give that unto myself; how can I, then, give it unto you?" "Are you mortal, then?" say they unto him. "I am," said he. "Then," replied they, "why dost thou disturb the whole world, seeking the dominion of it, as if thou wert immortal?" Thus it is that the greatness of kings, princes, and rulers of the earth may do great things at home and abroad, may protect others from dangers imminent, but cannot give themselves a supersedeas from death approaching. They are said to be like tumbling seas, whose boiling, swelling, overflowing waves bring terror and trouble to all that are near them; but God hath said unto them, "Hither shall ye come, and no further; here shall your proud waves be stayed; here, in the midst of your march, be it never so fierce, shall the wheels of your chariots be knocked off; and here, in the ruff of all your greatness, shall death arrest you."

Plutarch, Apoph.

"Rigidum jus est, et inevitabile mor-tis."—OVID, *ad
Liviæ*.

MDCCC.—Marriage not to be made for money only.

THERE was a rich man in Athens who had a daughter to marry, and he asked counsel of Themistocles how to bestow her, telling him that there was a very honest man that made suit unto her, but he was poor, and there was a rich man who did also desire her, but he was not honest. Themistocles answered, that if he were to choose, he would prefer moneyless men before masterless money; intimating thereby, that marriage is not to be contracted for money only: yet the question is now, with what money, not with what honesty, the party (whom they seek) is endowed—whether they be rich or whether they be godly; what lands they have on earth, not what inheritance they have in heaven. It is dos, not Deus; all is good enough, if there be goods enough: it is money that makes the match. But let such know, that as their money wasteth, so their love weareth; neither is there any love or friendship constant but that which is grounded on constant causes—such as virtue and godliness, which will hold out to the last.

A Marriage Serm., per Anon., 1632.

"Virum potius pecunia indigentem,"
&c.

MDCCCI.—The day of the last judgment a terrible day.

THERE is a story of two soldiers, that, coming to the valley of Jehoshaphat, in Judea, and one saying to the other, "Here, in this place, shall be the general judgment, wherefore I will now take up my place where I will then sit," and so, lifting up a stone, he sat down upon it, as taking possession beforehand; but, being sat, and looking up to heaven, such a quaking and trembling fell upon him, that, falling to the earth, he remembered the day of judgment with horror and amazement ever after. And, to say truth, so fearful and terrible Holcot, in Lib. Sap.

"Dies iræ, dies illa,"
&c.—MANILIUS.

Matt. xxiv. 29.
Serm. in Fera, 6, Parascu.

shall be the appearance of that day, that our Saviour, in some sort describing the same, saith, that then the powers of heaven shall be shaken. "De angelis hoc dicit," saith St Augustine—"Christ here speaketh of the angels), that trembling and great fear shall surprise them:" so that, if those glorious spirits shall tremble at the horror of that day, who, being guilty of no sin, shall not then be judged, how shall poor mortals stand amazed, especially the wicked, whose judgment and condemnation shall then be pronounced!

MDCCCII.—The benefit of history.

Plutarchi Præfat.
ad Vitam.

"Historiæ utilitas est magna felicitatem participat," &c.
Diodor. Sicul., de Fabulis Gentis,
lib. i.

Crompton's Serm., 1632.

LUCIUS LUCULLUS, being appointed captain-general over the Roman forces against Mithridates, had not great experience or knowledge in war, but only what he had gotten by reading history, yet proved a discreet and valiant commander, and vanquished at that time two of the greatest princes in the East. Thus it is that history is, and may be, the director of meanest men in any of their actions, how others have behaved themselves upon several occasions, and what hath followed thereupon. It is a trusty councillor of state, by whose advice and direction a commonweal may be framed, governed, reformed, and preserved; an army may be ordered, enemies vanquished, and victory obtained: in it, as in a glass, we see and behold God's providence guiding and ruling the world and men's actions, which arrive often at unexpected events, and even sometimes reach unto such ends as are quite contrary to the actor's intentions: it is a punisher of vice, presenting aged folly, green and fresh, to posterity: not suffering sin to die, much less to be buried in oblivion: it is also a rewarder of virtue, reserving worthy deeds for imitation. A good work, though it die in doing, is a reward to itself; yet, that some dull natures might be stirred up the more, and all benefited by seeing gracious steps before them, this only is exempted, by a firm decree, from the stroke of death, to live in history.

MDCCCIII.—Men usually judging others to be like themselves.

Jeruim, in Eccles. viii.
Ezod. xxxii. 17.

Aristotle, Polit.,
lib. iii., cap. 6.

August., in Pr.
cxviii., conc. 12.

It is said of Moses and Joshua, that when they were coming down from the mountain and heard a noise in the camp, Joshua said there was a noise of war, but Moses said, "The noise of them that sing do I hear." Here was now great difference of these two great men's judgments: but the reason was, that Joshua, being a martial man, therefore judgeth the noise to be a noise of war; but Moses, being a man of peace, judgeth the noise to be a noise of peace—each of them judging according to their several dispositions. Hence is that of the philosopher, "Qualis quisque est, tales existimat alios (Such as every one is, the same he thinketh others to be)," measuring of other men's actions by his own bushel: the lascivious man thinketh others to be lascivious; the covetous person thinks others to be covetous; the fool thinks every man to be as arrant a wise man as himself; hoc proclivius suspicatur in alio, &c. (every man readily suspects that of another which he findeth in himself).

MDCCCIV.—Neglect of the soul reproved.

Euripides.

Forsyth's Serm.,
Lond., 1617.

THERE is a story of one Pambo, that on a time, looking out at a window and perceiving a woman to spend a great deal of time in trimming herself, fell a-weeping; and being demanded the cause, answered, "Have not I a great cause to weep, to see yonder poor, creeping worm consume so long time in decking and adorning her poor earthly carcase to the sight of man, and I spend so small time in preparing my soul for God?" But, were this man alive now, he would do nothing else but lament and take on to see how people of all sorts, from the highest to the lowest, are taken up with high thoughts of their bodies, little thinking of their souls; men and women trifling out whole days inter pectinem et speculum, in finifying of their fantastical physiognomies, and not bestowing one hour in smoothing and rectifying of their most precious souls.

"O anima Christi. ana, evigila," &c. —AUG., de Doct. Christi.

MDCCCV.—To compassionate others' miseries.

THERE is mention made of some mountains, called Montes Lactarei (the Milky Mountains), on which the beasts that feed do give such nourishing milk, that men's bodies (though much consumed away) do thereby not only receive strength and health, but fatness also, whereas the beasts themselves are exceeding lean; so that, after a wonderful manner, the beasts do not profit by that grass by which the bodies of men come on and prosper: they go up and down near the thickets of the mountains meagre and thin, and, as it were, sustaining the condition of those who are healed by them. Like to these beasts should charity make every one of us, that, as we comfort the poor with the milk that we give them, the relief that we afford them, and that when we bestow our alms it should be cum sympathia et lacrymis (with tears and sympathy of grief), as having a fellow-feeling with them, and bearing part of their distressed burthen, so that, as passion wringeth tears from them, compassion should do the like from us.

Cassiodori Var. Lect.

"Si doles, condoleo," &c. —BERN., de Consolat., 12^e.

Catena Græ. Pat., in Eccles. xi. 8.

MDCCCVI.—Folly to repent the choice of a wife, marriage being once past.

WHEN Cæsar was to pass the Rubicon against Pompey, he left the land with this resolution: that a man could be undone but once. As it is in the government of a commonweal or in the ordering of an army, non licet in bello bis peccare (a commander can err but once)—which is a miserable happiness—overthrow and ruin following so close, he cannot have leisure to be twice faulty: so oftentimes it falls out in the choice of a wife. Men have not leave to change often; once blessed or cursed, must be for ever so—for better or worse during life. What is tied by the tongue cannot be untied by the hands; it will be good, therefore, for men to look before they leap—to be very wary in the point of wiving; for if they marry they know not whom, they may, for aught any man knows, mend their choice they know not when.

Lucret.

Crompton's Scrut. 1632.

MDCCCVII.—Charity attended by the certainty of reward.

WHEN Alexander set forward upon his great exploits, before he went from Macedonia, he divided amongst his captains and friends all that he had; for which, when one of his friends reproved him, saying that he was prodigal, because he had reserved nothing for himself, the answer which Alexander gave was this: that he had reserved much unto himself, namely, hope of the monarchy of the world, which, by the valour and help of those his captains and nobles, he hoped to obtain. And thus, surely, he that giveth to the poor may seem to be prodigal, yet, in respect of the hope that he hath of profit, he is frugal-wise; neither is his hope such as Alexander's was, which depended on the uncertainty of war, but such as is grounded upon the certainty of God's Word.

Plutarch, in Vita.

"In charitate pauper est dives, sine charitate," &c. —AUG., de Laude Charitat. Prov. xix. 17.

MDCCCVIII.—Ministers to be careful in reproving sinners.

It is written of Domitian, the emperor, that, a boy holding for a mark afar off his hand, spread abroad, with the fingers severed, he shot his arrows so artificially, that every arrow did hit on the empty spaces betwixt the fingers, and that not any one finger received Sueton., in Vita.

"Adsit regula pec-catís, quæ penas eroget æquas."—
HORAT.
Greg., de Cura
Past., cap. 10.

damage thereby. Such must be the care of every faithful minister of God's Word, how he shooteth his arrows, how he placeth his words—especially in the matter of reproving sin, so that the empty spaces thereof, and which, by sin, are made empty of all goodness, may be hit and wounded; but that he leave the hand and fingers—that is, the mind and desire of working and doing well—not wronged nor impaired. Whilst he fisheth for men's souls, he must have a great care how he baits his hook. Too harsh an increpation, like an axe that flies from the handle, may kill a saint when it should only cut down the sinner. Reproof being irksome to human nature, a violent and fierce manner in the using of it will much hinder the good success that should come thereby.

MDCCCIX.—Uncertainty of worldly things.

Paul. Diaconus, de
Reb. Rom., lib. xvii.

It is written of Sesostris, a king of Egypt, that he had his coach drawn by four kings whom he had lately overcome in battle, and one day, perceiving one of them to look often back, demanded the reason why he did so, who returned answer: "I do behold and observe that part of the wheel which was lowest becomes by-and-by the highest, and the highest, lowest. Cogito de mutatione fortunæ, &c. (I note the instability of things in this world, &c.)" And most true it is that the world is uncertain—now up, now down, and the things thereof now here, anon there; so that nothing is stable under the sun—honours, preferments, riches, strength, beauty, parts—all momentary and uncertain, subject to alteration. Nay, life itself, like to the waters in the river, quæ velut à fontis sui origine (rising from the fountain to the height), falls into the mare mortuum of death, and never returneth again.

"Fallax est hic mundus, finis dubius," &c.—PET.
BLESSENS.

Greg., Moral., lib.
xxxiii., cap. 7.

MDCCCX.—Christian watchfulness enjoined.

Numb. iv.

Sibb's Serm., Lond., 1630.

"Ut teipsum serves non expergisceris?"
—HORAT.

WHEN the holy things belonging to the sanctuary were to be removed, God commandeth Aaron and his sons that there should be a special care had to cover them all over, lest, in the journey, dust should any way soil them. In like manner, such as are the children of God, and vessels of mercy belonging to His sanctuary, must walk circumspectly, and it must be their great care, while they are in the way of this life, that they be covered close with a diligent watchfulness; otherwise the dust of sin, or the pollution of some uncleanness, will easily fasten unto them, and braid even the best of their performances.

MDCCCXI.—How the vanity of worldly things may be easily discerned.

Forsyth's Serm.,
Lond., 1617.

"Quod sine miserabili gemitu dicendum non est," &c.
—BERN., super Cant.

A MAN that walketh in a great mist, or some thick fog, cannot perceive whence it cometh nor whither it goeth; but if he go up to the top of some high hill or mountain next adjoining, he shall soon discern that it is nothing but a vapour, arising from the crannies and entrails of the earth, thickening in the clouds, and vanishing in the air. And thus it is that so long as the earthly minds of covetous, worldly men are overshadowed with the darkness of ignorance, and thickened with a greedy desire of worldly things, they cannot see, perceive, nor understand the things that are of God, nor the vanity and frailty of the creature; but if they would take a turn or two on the top of Mount Sion, and be lifted up in their minds with holy meditation, they would soon perceive that all things of this life are sublunary, and proceed from the bowels of the earth, and that all the glory of the world must pass away and come to nothing.

MDCCCXII.—Occasion of sin to be avoided.

In the time of the Law, the Nazarite was not only commanded to abstain from wine and strong drink, but he also might not eat grapes, whether moist or dry, nor anything that was made of the vine-tree, from the kernels to the very husk. Strange that such small things as these, in which there could be no appearance of danger, should be forbidden! Yet not so strange as true, lest, by the contentment of these, they might be drawn to the desire of wine, and so be carried on to sin. Thus, the remote occasion was forbidden, to show how careful every one should be to avoid the least occasion of sin. Hence is that prayer of David: "Remove from me the way of lying!" by the way, meaning the occasion of sin. And heathen Seneca could say, "Quantum possumus à lubrico recedamus, &c. (As much as we can, let us keep ourselves from slippery places, for even on dry ground it is not very strongly that we stand)."

Numb. vi. 3, 4.
Attorsol, in locum.
Ps. cxix. 29.
Ep. ad Lucillum.

MDCCCXIII.—Christ the best shelter in times of affliction.

AVICEN writeth, that in the country of Chaldea there are many rivers, and that the hart, being almost hunted down, makes to the river-side, and, being not able to pass, goeth to the first man he seeth, brays and weeps to him for relief, and so is taken: which let every Christian man learn to follow this example, that, seeing himself beset with innumerable enemies, wearied with the burthen of sin, and, as it were, overwhelmed with a deluge of sorrow and distress, he should turn to the Man Jesus, who is able and willing to deliver him from all dangers, imminent and incumbent—who is the only shelter in time of trouble and affliction.

Lib. viii.
"Passio tua, Domine Jesu, ultimum est refugium."—BERN., in Cant.

MDCCCXIV.—A rich man pleading poverty condemned.

ALEXANDER V., pope of Rome, said of himself, that when he was a bishop, he was rich; when a cardinal, poor; and when a pope, a very beggar. And, plainly, so it is in these strait-laced times of ours with too many wretched rich men, who, the richer they are, the more wretched they are—as their store is enlarged, their charity is contracted: such as, having a male in their flock, sacrifice to the Lord a corrupt thing; such as ride on horses with golden chains, lie on beds of ivory, eat of the fattest, and clothe with the softest; yet when they come to the matter of charity, to the relief of the poor; pauperrimis redduntur pauperiores (they plead poverty and make themselves more poor than the poorest).

Jerzlin's Exposit. on Eccles. vii.
Mal. i. 14.
Prov. xiii. 7.
"Magnas inter opes inopis."—HORAT.

MDCCCXV.—Magistrates to be active examples of good unto others.

It is said in the praise of Moses, that he was a mighty man both in word and deed—not mighty in word only, as many governors are, to command strongly, but mighty also in deed, to do it accordingly. As Tully reports of Julius Cæsar, that he was never heard saying to his soldiers, "Ite illuc (Go ye thither)!" as if they should go into service, and he to stay behind in the tent; but "Venite huc (Come ye hither)!" let us give the onset and adventure our lives together,—a great encouragement for the soldier to follow when he sees his captain march before! Thus it is, that if the magistrate will persuade the people to anything, he must show the experience of it first in himself; or if he would command the people anything, he must do it first upon and by himself: otherwise, if he exact one thing and do another, it will be said that he is like a waterman, who rows one way and looks another.

Acts vii. 22.
Serm. before Prince Charles at St. James's, 1622.
"Quicumque primum corpus subegerit," &c.—AMBROS., super illud Psalmi.
"Anima mea in manibus," &c.

MDCCCXVI.—Sin, the destruction of any people or nation whatsoever.

Plautus, ex Persia.

SERAGASTIO, a servant (in one of Plautus's comedies), asking another, "Ut munitum tibi visum est oppidum (How doth the town seem to be fortified)?" the answer given was this: "Si incolæ bene sint morati, pulchrè munitum arbitror (If the inhabitants be well governed and good, I think it to be well fortified);" and then, reckoning up many vices, he concludeth, "Hæc nisi inde aberunt, &c. (Unless these be absent, a hundred walls are but little enough for the preservation of it)." And, to say truth, such is the destructive nature of sin, that it will level the walls of the best and most polite governments whatsoever; so that it is no more the walls and bulwarks, the secret counsels, the subtle contrivements, the valour of the soldiery, or the greatness of commanders, will be guard sufficient to a nation or people, unless sin—that is, reigning, beloved sin—be first removed.

MDCCCXVII.—Magistrates not to be guilty of that which they do forbid in others.

Plutarch.

Serm. before Prince
Charles at St.
James's, 1629.

"Turpe est
doctori," &c.—

ALEXANDER, the great conqueror, took one Dyonides, a pirate upon the sea, and asked him, "Quid sibi videretur, ut mare infestum faceret?" (What he meant in that manner to trouble the sea.) The pirate answered him boldly and truly, "Yea, what do you rather mean to trouble the world? But because I rob and steal in a small cock-boat, which you do in a great and royal navy, I go for a pirate, and you for an emperor." And when it is thus with the magistrates in a nation or commonweal, when they punish that sin in others whereof themselves are notoriously guilty, though no man dare speak, yet every man will mutter; and Socrates will laugh, because he sees magnum latrones ducentes parvos ad suspendium (the great thieves leading the little ones to the gallows).

MDCCCXVIII.—Not to be disquieted at the prosperity of the wicked.

Enarrat. in Ps. xcii.

Job xxi. 7.

Mal. iii. 15.

Ps. xcii. 5.

Ps. xxxvii. 1.

It is St. Augustine's instance of one, that considering himself to be cast into prison, and there to be careful to do the works of righteousness, whilst he that laid him there lay wallowing in the abundance of outward pleasures and delights, though he lived in all kind of excess in sin, the consideration whereof caused him to vent such or the like expressions, "Deus! quare tibi servio?" &c. (O God, why do I serve Thee? why do I obey Thy voice? I think the wicked please Thee, and that Thou lovest those that work iniquity)." Such a spirit as this hath from time to time possessed the best of the sons of men; but David came off well when he said, "O Lord, how great are Thy works! and Thy thoughts are very deep!" Deep indeed! so deep, that no human plummet can fathom such a bottom, as that the wicked should flourish and the godly suffer tribulation. Yet, by way of direction, let us not suffer ourselves to be seduced with the felicity of the wicked, not to be taken with the flower of the grass, not gaze so much upon them who are happy for a time and (it may be) eternally miserable.

MDCCCXIX.—The greatness of motherly affection to an only son.

Price's Serm.,
1619.

1 Sam. ii. 19.

SAMUEL was not in his mother's keeping, but in the custody of the high priest—much better, sure, than in his mother's. Yet see how motherly affection works; for, though he wanted neither meat nor clothes, yet, lest too much wind should blow upon him, she makes and brings him every year a little coat, and she goes up every year to Shiloh to offer sacrifice; yea, and withal, to sacrifice a little to her eyes—that is, to see Samuel too. For if the son be but a little missing, as out of sight, Sisera's mother looks and looks out at a window, and "Why tarry the wheels of his chariot, and why is his chariot so long a-coming?" If he be sick, then the Shunammite sets him upon her knee; but if the son be dead and gone, then a voice is heard in Ramah, Rachel weeping for her children, and will not be comforted. So dear and tender is an only son in the sight of his mother. Men are said to abound in reason, but women in affection: such as, flaming out like fire, cannot be concealed—out it must, like Solomon's mother's, "What my son, and what the son of my womb, and what O son of my desires!"—as if she had said, "O thou my son, whom once I bare in my womb, and whom I ever bear in my heart, born of my body by course of nature, but still unborn by strength of love!" The father saith, "Son, thou art ever with me!" but the mother saith, "Son, thou art ever within me!" Such and so great is the power of motherly love and affection.

Judges v. 28.

2 Kings iv. 20.

Jer. xxxi. 15.

Luke xv. 31.

MDCCCXX.—To have a perfect knowledge of God impossible.

WE read in the Prophet Isaiah of the seraphim standing about the throne of the Lord, and that each of them had six wings; that with twain the seraph covered the face of God, with twain His feet, and with twain he did fly, intimating (as one well noteth on the place) that with twain they covered His face, the face of God, not their own face; with two wings they covered His feet, not their own feet. They covered His face, His beginning being unknown; they covered His feet, His end being incomprehensible; only the middle to be seen—the things which are—whereby there may be some glimmering knowledge made out what God is. Thus, as the wise man hath it, "That which is afar off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out?" Who can find out what God is? The knowledge of Him, à priori, is so far off, that he whose arm is able to break even a bow of steel is not able to reach it; so far off, that he who is able to make his nest with the eagle is not able to fly unto it; and so exceeding deep, that he who could follow the leviathan could not fathom it; that he who could set out the centre of the earth is not able to find it out. And who, then, is able to reach it? In a word, so far off, and so deep too, that the depth saith, "It is not in me!" and the sea saith, "It is not with me!" Deep to men and angels, as exceeding the capacity of both; inasmuch that St. Augustine, making out the question what God is, gives this answer, "Certe, hic est de quo et quum dicitur, non potest dici, &c." (Surely, such a One is He, Who, when He is spoken of, cannot be spoken of; Who, when He is considered, cannot be considered of; Who, when He is compared to anything, cannot be compared; and when He is defined, groweth greater by defining of Him)."

Origines' Exposit. in Isaiam vi. 2.

Eccles. vii. 24.

"Deus res quamdam est capto et venatu difficilis," &c.—CLEM. ALEX., Strom., lib. ii. Augustin., De Fide, contra Arianum, cap. vi.

MDCCCXXI.—Parents to be careful in the instruction of their children.

THOUGH Solomon was dear and tender in the eyes of his parents, yet they did not cocker (pamper) him up, but taught him what he should do and what he should not do; God knew that Abraham would teach his children; Alexander's father provides Aristotle to be his tutor; and Theodosius finds out Arsenius to be his son's schoolmaster. Thus it is that good and careful parents have from time to time been careful to have their children well instructed, ever whetting the law upon their hearts, and seasoning their tender years with religious principles. Oh, but there is a love in too many parents, a doting love, which teacheth nothing; and there is a government in parents which looseneth all the reins, and suffereth to riot and excess; and there is a pity in parents, a foolish pity, which pardoneth all and punisheth nothing, till God come with the sword of His judgment, as He did to the sons of Eli, and kill where the parents leave uncorrected. A strange love, to kill their children with too much kindness! But good, careful parents truly love their children; and, to prove that love, they teach them, as thinking them much better unborn than untaught.

Prov. xxxi. 1.

Gen. xviii. 19.

Serm. at Court, per Ignotum, 1619.

"Parentes qui recte liberos suos instruunt," &c.—LAERT., in Vita Aristot.

MDCCCXXII.—Fervency in prayer, the prevalency thereof.

De Visitat. Inferorum, lib. ii.

James v. 16.

"Nullum Deo tale est sacrificium quam zelus," &c.—
GREG., Homil. in Exod.

It is observed of St. Augustine, that, coming as a visitant to the house of a sick man, he saw the room full of friends and kindred, who were all silent, yet all weeping—the wise sobbing, the children sighing, the kinsfolk lamenting: all mourning. The good father suddenly uttered this short ejaculatory prayer, "Domine, quas preces exaudis, si non has (Lord, what prayers dost Thou hear, if not these)?" And, certainly, it is the fervent, effectual prayer that availeth much. It is zeal that puts the heart into a good temper, and apts it for motion, which cannot be without a heat—it feathers the wings of prayer, and makes it fly swift into heaven. Well may prayer be the weapon with which we fight and struggle with God; but zeal is that which sets an edge upon devotion, and makes it prevalent: hence are those usual phrases of crying, wrestling, and striving with God, all which argue a holy importunity and sacred violence unto heaven.

MDCCCXXIII.—How Christ is said to be the end of the ceremonial law.

Mark iv. 26—28.

Gerhardus, in Leit. Com. de Leg.
John xii. 24.

Gal. v. 12.

Eph. ii. 15.

Col. ii. 14.

THE earth bringeth forth fruit of itself, but first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. So did the blade or herb spring out of the law of nature; the ear, or culm, in the law written; but we have in the Gospel the pure grain, or full corn, which is Christ Jesus. Therefore, as the stalk or ear are of necessary use till the corn be ripe, but, the corn being ripe, we no longer use the chaff with it: so, till Christ was exhibited in the flesh, which lay hidden in the blade and spike of the law, the ceremonies had their use; but since that, by His death and passion, this pure wheat is threshed and winnowed, and by His ascension laid up in the garner of heaven—they are of no further use. The Jews were taught by those shadows that the body should come, and we know by the same shadows that the body is come; the arrow moveth whilst it flies at the mark, but, having hit the mark, resteth in it: so the law, which did level and shoot at Christ with so many movable signs and sacraments, doth (as one may say) cease from her motion of practising them any more, having attained to her full end in Christ Jesus.

MDCCCXXIV.—Carnal, unregenerate men unserviceable both in Church and state.

Torshell's Serm. of Humiliat.

(* This was written in the time of the Commonwealth.)

"Plerumque minima possunt, qui plurima jactant."— THRYVERUS.

It is the fashion of some vainglorious, braggadocio courtiers, that, when they go down into the country, they do nothing but talk of what friends they have in court, what power they have with the Lord Protector,* the Council of State, the Lords Commissioners, &c., filling their mouths with the names of greatness and eminency; whereas, indeed, they have neither command, nor the least of power to do any good, where they most pretend it. Such are all carnal, unregenerate men: let their pretences be never so specious, and their discourses never so heavenly, they have no interest with God, no encouragement to appear before Him, no knowledge or acquaintance in the court of heaven, and therefore no confidence to be helpful or serviceable to the place or commonweal wherein they live.

MDCCCXXV.—The knowledge of God, through faith in Christ, the way to true happiness.

Aurigii Speculum Nauticum.

THERE is a dangerous harbour in our seas (as mariners say) at whose mouth is the Goodwin, out of which the pilot cannot make forth but he must strike upon the sands, unless he so steer his ship that he bring two steeples, which stand at a distance, so even in his sight, that they may seem to be but one. And, doubtless, we cannot come to true happiness without the knowledge of God through faith in Christ. We shall sink into endless error, unless we believe God the Father and God the Son to be the same in substance, the same true and living God, who is our only Pilot to guide us in this way and teach us all things: if all things, then this truth, the ground of truth, the knowledge of the Father and the Son Christ Jesus blessed for ever.

Rom. viii. 4.

John xiv. 26.

MDCCCXXVI.—God a jealous God of His honour.

WHEN the Empress of Constantinople had let slip some words of contempt against the valiant Narses, that she would make him spin amongst her maidens, it so enraged the injured captain, that he protested, in his anger, he would weave such a web as all their power should never be able to undo; and thereupon, in a deep revenge, brought the Lombards into Italy. Thus, if the generous, of all other injuries, can least bear disgraces, can it possibly be imagined but that, if we speak contemptibly of God's power, if undervaluingly of His wisdom, if complainingly of His provisions, if murmuringly of His providence, or if impatiently of His corrections, but that we do all things that we can to disgrace Him, and that He will be highly provoked for the same.

Cedreni Annales,

Gregor., de Impp. Rom., lib. vi.

"Quis enim læsos impunè putaret esse Deos?"—Luc. iii.

MDCCCXXVII.—Christ freely discovering Himself to all that truly seek Him.

WHEN Ennius sought his friend at his house, and asked his servant where his master was, the master said to his servant, "Tell him, I am not at home;" which speech Ennius overheard, but took the answer from the servant. Next day, the same man comes to Ennius's house, and asked his servant where his master was; Ennius spake aloud, "Tell him, I am not at home." "What," says he, "will you deny yourself with your own tongue?" "Why not?" said Ennius. "I believed when but your man told me you were not at home, and will you not believe me who say so myself?" Thus the ministers and servants of Jesus Christ should show Christ to all that diligently seek Him; but if there be any such as that servant, who denied his master's presence when he knew where he was (as some, who, for belief in God, bring men to Romanam Ecclesiam Catholicam—the Roman Catholic Church, for faith in Jesus Christ, to Papa non potest errare—the Pope cannot err), yet Christ is like Ennius, He cannot deny Himself. He showed Himself to those wicked, traitorous Jews that sought His life, and surely He will make a gracious discovery of Himself to those that truly seek Him.

Gyrard., Syntagm.

Torshell, Of Humiliation.

John xviii. 8.

MDCCCXXVIII.—Sin to be looked on, as it is fierce and cruel.

It is usual with us to conceive of a lion or a bear or a dragon as, indeed, they are, fearful and terrible beasts; but if we should see them painted on a wall, they would not in the least dismay us, though the painter should use and bestow the best of his art and the utmost of his skill in the laying of his colours to make them look most fierce. And why? Because we know they are but painted. And thus it is that the most of men look upon sin as a dead thing, only painted out by the oratory of witty preachers, and therefore they are nothing at all troubled; but if they should chance to meet a living bear or lion in some open place, gaping and ready to devour, it would amaze them. Just such is sin, of a murdering, destroying nature: let all men labour to see the life of it, the danger of it, the fierce, gaping mouth of it, and then it will make them to run for safety by repentance.

Torshell's Serm. before the King's Children at St. James's, 1647.

"Multi evidenter peccant, quia turpitudinem peccati perspectam non habent."—THRYVERUS, in Apophthegm.

MDCCCXXIX.—The Book of Scripture to be preserved above all other books.

Connyer's Serm.,
Lond., 1635.

"Sint Scripturæ divine semper in manibus," &c.—
CHRYSOST., in Pr.
xcv.

FRANCIS I., king of France, questioned Budeus (a good scholar of his time), that if all the volumes in the world were doomed to the fire, what one would he have. His answer was, "Plutarch's Works; because they had the impression of all sciences." And Thomas Aquinas chose rather to have St. Chrysostom on St. Matthew's Gospel than the huge city of Paris. Here, now, was a couple of scholars' choice; but if the like query were put to a sincere, downright Christian, his reply would be, "Epistolam Creatoris ad Creaturas (The Epistle of the Creator to the Creature);" i. e., the Book of Holy Writ. Not Lipsius de Constantia, nor Seneca de Tranquillitate Animi, nor Boethius de Consolatione Animæ, would he make choice of, but the Holy Scriptures, knowing very well that in them he shall find the way to everlasting life.

MDCCCXXX.—Sin and the sinner very hardly parted.

2 Sam. iii. 15.

Stiles's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

"Vitia quæ ama-mus malum excusare quam excutere."—SEN., Ep.
xcvii.

OBSERVABLE is the story of Phaltiel: David had married Michal, Saul injuriously gave her to another. When David came to the crown and was able to speak a word of command, he sends for his wife Michal; her husband dares not but obey, brings her on her journey, and then, not without great reluctancy of spirit, takes his leave of her. But what? Was Phaltiel weary of his wife, that he now forsakes her? No, he was enforced; and though she were gone, he cast many a sad thought after her, and never leaves looking till he sees her as far as Bahurim, weeping and bemoaning her absence. Thus, carnal and unregenerate men, though, for fear or some other reasons, they shake hands with their sins, yet they have many a longing heart after them: they part, and yet they are loth to part asunder. Hence it is that, as the merchant throws away his goods in a storm, because he cannot keep them, so they, in the times of sickness and distress, when the sea grows high and the tempest rageth, when they begin to apprehend what death is and what hell is, and know, unless the vessel be lighted, they cannot be safe, then they are hard at work, heave overboard their usury, their drunkenness, their swearing, and such like stuff, not out of hatred to them, but love to themselves; for if they could but continue in their sins and be saved when they have done, they would never part with them at all.

MDCCCXXXI.—How it is, and why, God loves us.

Gyraldus, de Diis Gentium.

Verse 12.

THE Ethnics feign that their gods and goddesses, for some lovely good, loved certain trees: Jupiter, the oak, for durance; Neptune, the cedar, for stature; Apollo, the laurel, for greenness; Venus, the poplar, for whiteness; Pallas, the vine, for fruitfulness. But what should move the God of all gods to love us poor wildings in this fool's paradise here below? Trees, indeed, but such as St. Jude mentions, corrupt, fruitless, twice dead, and plucked up by the roots. St. Bernard resolves it in three words, "Amat quia amat (He loves us because He loves us)." The root of love to us lieth in Himself, and, by His communicative goodness, the fruit is ours.

MDCCCXXXII.—Natural persuasions, the invalidity of them in the point of true believing.

Collings's Lessons, v.

A ROMAN wrote to Tully to inform him in something concerning the immortality of the soul; Tully wrote back again unto him, "Evolue librum Platonis, et nihil amplius est quod desideres (Read," saith he, "but Plato upon the same subject, and you will desire no more)."

The Roman returned him answer, "Evolvi, iterum atque evolvi, &c. (I have read it over," saith he, "again and again, but I know not whence it is. When I read it, I assent unto it; but I have no sooner laid the book out of my hand, but I begin to doubt again whether the soul be immortal or no)." So it is with all persuasion from natural principles: as to that extent of doctrine it would persuade us of, the persuasion that ariseth from them is faint and very weak. It is true that nature hath principles to persuade the soul by, to some kind of assent, as that there is a God, and He must be worshipped. "Look upon me," saith Nature; "I have not a spire of grass but tells thee there is a God. See the variety, greatness, beauty of my work: read a great God in a great whale or elephant; a beauteous God in a glorious flower; a wise God in my choice of works; behold a God in the order thou hast seen in me; see Him in my law, written in thy heart." From these and such like things Nature bequeaths a kind of faith to the soul, and learns it credere Deum (to believe that there is a God); but this is far from credere in Deum (faith in the point of true believing).

"Præsentemque refert quælibet herba Deum."

Rom. ii. 15.

MDCCCXXXIII.—Christ's humanity asserted.

As Alexander the Great, however the popular sort deified him, yet, having got a clap with an arrow, said, "Ye style me Jupiter's son, as if immortal; sed hoc vulnus clamat me esse hominem (this blood that issues from the wound proves me, in the issue, a man. This is αἷμα, τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (the blood of man, not of God);" and smelling the stench of his own flesh, asked his flatterers if the gods yield such a scent. So it may be said of Jesus Christ our Saviour. Though myriads of angels and saints acclaim He is a God—ergo, immortal—and a crew of heretics disclaim Him to be a Man—as the Manichees, denying the truth of His humanity; the Marcionites, averring that He had a fantastical body; Apelles, who conceived that He had a sidereal substance—yet the streams of blood following the arrow of death that struck Him make it good that He was perfect Man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting.

Plutarch, in Vita

Præteoli, Elenchus Hæret.

In Symbolo Athanasii.

MDCCCXXXIV.—Sinners crucifying the Lord of Life daily.

THERE is a story of one Clodoveus, a king of France, that when he was converted from Paganism to Christianity, while Rhemigius, the bishop, was reading in the Gospel concerning the passion of our Saviour, and the abuses He suffered from Judas and the rest of the Jews, he broke out into these words: "Oh, that I had been but there with my Frenchmen! I would have cut all their throats!" in the meantime not considering that, by his daily sins, he did as much as they had done. And thus it is that most of men—all sinful men—condemn the crucifiers of Christ for their cruelty, but never look into themselves, who, by their daily sins, make Him to bleed again afresh. The proud man plait a crown of thorns upon His sacred head, the swearer nails His hands and feet, the scorner spits upon Him, and the drunkard gives Him gall and vinegar to drink. Our hypocrisy was the kiss that betrayed Him; the sins of our bodies were and are the tormentors of His body; and the sins of our souls were they that made His soul heavy to death, that caused the withdrawals of His Father's love from Him, and made Him, in the heaviness of His panged (tortured) soul, to cry out, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?"

Causin, en la Court Sainte, Hincmarus, in Vita Rhemigii.

"Agnosce homo quoniam gravia sunt vulnera," &c.—BERNARD, Serm. iii., in Nat. Dom.

Matt. xxvii. 46.

MDCCCXXXV.—To bless God for the revelation of Himself in the Scripture.

It is recorded of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, that, although he had then gleaned up two hundred thousand volumes, he sent Demetrius, the keeper of his library, to the Jews, to have a copy of their Law. The book was sent, and seventy learned men along with it, Eusebii Hist., lib. v., cap. 8.

Irenæus.

Connyer's Sermon,
Lond., 1635.

that they might translate the same into Greek. Ptolemy sets them to work, puts them into several cells or chambers, that they might not converse together. After some time and large expense, every one returned his papers, not varying in the least from the truth of the original. Such was the love that Ptolemy had to the Law of God at that time, that he spared no cost or pains till he had it—being called the Septuagint at this day. But how are we, then, bound to bless God that we need not send so far or spend much to have the Book of the Law and the Gospel too—the whole Scriptures—not only in our houses, but in God's house, where they are read and orthodoxly expounded!—that it is but opening the casement, and light flows in upon us!—so that if the height of our thankfulness to God and the best of our desires be not thereto to know and to do, we are not worthy the name of Christians.

MDCCCXXXVI.—Ranters, swearers, &c., their conversion, not confusion, to be endeavoured.

Heret. Fab. Comp.,
lib. iv.

THEODORET maketh mention of the ancient Donatists, that they were so ambitious of martyrdom—as they accounted it—that many of them, meeting with a young gentleman, requested of him that he would be pleased to kill them. He, to confute their folly, condescended to their desire, on condition that first they would be contented to be all fast bound; which being done accordingly, he took such order that they were all soundly whipped, but saved their lives. Thus, when we hear such as they call ranters, &c., wish that God would damn, sink, or confound them, hope that God will be more merciful than to take them at their words and grant their desires, and, withal, heartily desire that He would be pleased sharply to scourge them and soundly to lash them with the frights and terrors of a wounded conscience, the pain whereof would be so grievous unto them, that they would, without all doubt, revoke their wishes, as having little list (inclination) and less delight to taste of hell hereafter.

Fuller's Wounded Conscience.

MDCCCXXXVII.—Christ the true Light.

Plantavit., Florileg.
Rabbinicum.

Joel ii. 30.

Wigmore's Sermon,
1633.

THE rabbins have a conceit concerning Noah, that whilst the window of the ark was shut he made use of some resplendent stone, by whose rays the objects of sight presented themselves to the organ of the eye, being, as it were, the light of some lamp or candle unto them. However the conjecture may be curious, yet true it is that Christ is that stone which, albeit the builders refused, is now become the head of the corner—a bright, shining stone, at whose presence the moon is darkened and the stars withdraw their light. He is that lux illuminans, at whose approach the light of the moon becomes as the light of the sun; lux innata (that true light, that true light of life); not lux modii, but lux mundi (that light of the world), in whom there is not so much as the least shadow of darkness.

MDCCCXXXVIII.—Small buddings of grace in the soul an argument of greater growth.

Fuller's *Cure of a
Wounded Conscience*.

WHEN we behold primroses and violets fairly to flourish, we conclude the dead of the winter is past, though as yet no roses or July-flowers do appear, which long after lie hid in their leaves or lurk in their roots, but in due time will discover themselves. Thus, if some small buddings of grace do but appear in the soul, it is an argument of far greater growth; if some signs be but above ground in sight, others are underground in the heart, and though the former started first, the other will follow in order; it being plain that such a man is passed from death unto life by this hopeful and happy spring of some signs in the heart.

MDCCCXXXIX.—Magistrates, rulers, &c., the great comfort of good ones.

THE people of Rome were very jocund when they had made Galba their emperor; but he had not been long in, till they began to change their note; for they found, by woeful experience, that they had met with a careless and cruel governor. A sad thing when it is, either with magistrates or ministers, as Pope Urban wrote to a prelate in his time, very scoffingly, "Monacho fervido, abbati calido, episcopo verò tepido, et archiepiscopo frigido" (Still the higher in means, the worse in manners)." But there is then good hope when men in power and authority can say "Non nobis, sed populo" (that they aim at the public good); and happy is that people, that place, that commonwealth, whose rulers think no time too long, no pains too great, nor no patience too much, whereby they may glorify God and seek the public good in the appointed places of their dignity.

Corn. Nepos, in Vita Galbae.
Suetonius.

Gray's Sermon,
Newcastle, 1636.

MDCCCXL.—Godly company, the benefit thereof.

It is observable of many houses in the city of London, that they have so weak walls, and are of so slender and slight building, that, were they set alone in the fields, probably they would not stand one hour, which now, ranged into streets, receive support in themselves and mutually return it to others. Such is the danger of solitariness, and the great benefit of association with good and godly company; such as want skill or boldness to begin or set a psalm may competently follow tune in consort with others; and such are the blessed fruits of good society, that a man may not only be reserved from much mischief, but also be strengthened and confirmed in many godly exercises, which he could not perform of himself alone.

Fuller's Cure of a Wounded Conscience.

"Omnium societas nulla præstantior est, nulla firmitior," &c.—SEREN., Ep. xi.

MDCCCXLI.—The excellency of Sunday, or Lord's-day, above other days.

WHAT the fire is amongst the elements, the eagle among the fowls, the whale among the fishes, the lion amongst the beasts, gold among the other metals, and wheat amongst other grain, the same is the Lord's-day above other days of the week, differing as much from the rest as doth that wax to which a king's great seal is put from ordinary wax, or that silver upon which the king's arms and image are stamped from silver unrefined, or in bullion; it is a day, the most holy festival in relation to the initiation of the world and man's regeneration, the queen and princess of days, a royal day, a day that shines amongst other days as doth the dominical letter, clad in scarlet, among the other letters in the calendar; or, as the sun imparts light to all the other stars, so doth this day, bearing the name of Sunday, afford both light and life to all other days of the week.

Hackwill's Serm.
(Oxon, 1642..)

Athanas., in Ep. de Orthod.

Ignat., Ep. ad Rôgnethi.

MDCCCXLII.—Men to be as well industrious in their callings as zealous in their devotions.

THE inhabitants of the bishopric of Durham pleaded a privilege that King Edward I. had no power, although on necessary occasion, to press them to go out of their country, because (forsooth) they termed themselves holy-work folk—only to be used in defending the holy shrine of St. Cuthbert. Thus it is that many in the world are much mistaken, thinking that if they be but once entered into the trade of godliness, they may cancel all indentures of service and have a full dispensation to be idle in their callings; whereas the best way to make the service of God comfortable within their own souls is to take pains without in their lawful vocations, there being ever some secret good accruing to such who are diligent therein.

Camdeni Britan. in Durham.

"In qua quisque educantur est arte, in hac se exercent."

MDCCCXLIII.—Variety of gifts in the ordinance of preaching.

Tillinghaast's Serm., 1642.

¹ Quot capitum vivant totidem studio-rum millia."—HOB-
BART., Serm., lib. ii.

Matt. xxv. 15.

It is a received aphorism amongst physicians, that the constitutions of all men's bodies are of a mixed nature—hot, dry, cold, and moist; and yet the wisdom of God hath so diversely tempered these, that scarce in the world are two men to be found in every point of like temper: the face of a man is not above a span over, yet, let ten thousand men be together, and their countenances shall all differ. So in the Church, as to the variety of gifts in the matter of preaching. Let divers men take one and the same text, yet scarce two of a hundred (though all soundly and to the point) are to be found that have in all things the like gift, either for matter or utterance: some having five talents, some but two, some but one; some have a more excellent gift of conference, some of prayer, some of exhortation, some in opening of a text, some in application, &c.; every one (though not all alike) some one way or other profitable unto God's people, to help onward the building up of the body of the Lord Jesus, in the edification of those that are committed to their charge.

MDCCCXLIV.—To be more strict in the holy observation of the Sabbath than heretofore; and why so.

Fuller's *Cure of a
Wounded Conscience.*

SOME Popish people make a superstitious almanac of the Sunday by the fairness or foulness thereof, guessing of the weather all the week after according to that old monkish rhyme:—

"If it rains on Sunday before mass,
It will rain all week more or less."

However, it may be boldly affirmed, that from our well or ill spending of the Lord's-day, a probable conjecture may be made how the following week will be employed; yea, it is to be conceived that we are bound (as matters now stand in England) to a stricter observance of the Lord's-day than ever before. That a time was due to God's service, no Christian in this nation ever did deny; that the same was weekly dispersed into the Lord's-day, holy-days, Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, some have earnestly maintained. Seeing, therefore, all the last are generally neglected, the former must be more strictly observed, it being otherwise impious that our devotion, having a narrower channel, should also carry a narrower stream along with it.

MDCCCXLV.—God's gracious return of His people's prayers in the time of their distress.

Sleidani Comment.

It is said of Martin Luther, that, perceiving the cause of the Gospel to be brought into a great strait, he flies unto God, lays hold on Him by faith, and offers violence to Him by prayer, never leaving to wrestle with Him till he received comfort from Him; at length, rising up cheerfully from his devotion, comes out of his closet triumphantly to his fellow-labourers, saying, "Vicinus, vicinus (We have overcome, we have overcome)!" At which time, it is observed, that there came out a proclamation from Charles V., that none should be further molested for the profession of the Gospel. Thus, there is not any age but affordeth examples of God's gracious assistance in the conscionable use of prayer. When great things are to be effected—when crying sins have awakened His justice, and broken the phial of His anger upon the heads of a people or nation, so that drops of blood hang hovering in the air, like clouds of vengeance ready to break down upon them—when the dark and misty fogs of wickedness have been gathered from sundry places, threatening some great tempest of thunder and lightning, a black and fatal day near at hand—then hath the wind of His people's devotions, together with the swift gale of sighs and tears, by God's special assistance, so cleared the air, that they have not fallen upon them.

Westfield's Serm.,
Lond., 1619.

"Et Dominum mundi Rectere vota valent."—MART., Epigr., lib. viii.

MDCCCXLVI.—Patiently to wait on God's good will and pleasure.

PRODIGIOUS was the patience of Elijah's servant, in obedience to his master's command. He went several times to the sea (it were too tedious to tell what was not troublesome for him to do, to be seven several times sent down steep Carmel with danger, and up it again with difficulty), and all to bring news of nothing, till his last journey, which made recompense for all the rest with the tidings of a cloud arising. Thus, we must not be disheartened, as though comfort would not come at all, because it comes not all at once, but patiently attends God's pleasure: the mercies of God are not styled the swift, but the sure mercies of David. And the same prophet saith, "The glory of the Lord shall be thy reward." This we know comes up last, to secure and make good all the rest; for where grace leads the front, glory at last will be in the rear; and the thirsty soul, long parched with drought for want of comfort, though late, yet at last shall be plentifully refreshed with the dew of consolation.

1 Kings xviii. 43

Fuller's Cure of a Wounded Conscience.

Isa. lv. 3.

Isa. lviii. 8.

"Nube solet pulsa candidus ire diem."—OVID, Trist.

MDCCCXLVII.—Magistrates to stand up in the cause of God against all opposition.

WHEN Theodosius the Great set forth a law among the Egyptians against their sacrificing to the river Nile, it so fell out that the river that year did not rise to the usual height in overflowing the land. The poor heathen (knowing no better) ascribed it to their not sacrificing, and blamed the imperial act. The governor, fearing an insurrection, timely informs the emperor, but withal hinting, that it had been well if he could but have connived at the time; but the emperor answered resolutely like himself, that it was better to remain faithful to the Lord than to prefer the overflowing of Nilus, and the expectation thereof, to piety and religion; yea, he would rather that it should never flow again. Here was a law seasonably declared, and an heroic resolution thereupon, not upon any pretence whatsoever to repeal that law which was conformable to God's Word. With the like courage ought all magistrates to maintain and stand up for warrantable laws, to bear up for God's honour in defence of that which is good in God's sight, and by no means be induced to sin against God, either under hope of gain or fear of approaching danger, or to let those good, ancient, and fundamental laws to sink whereby religion and the commonwealth have been upheld.

Yong's Serm., Westm., 1644.

"Sudandum est iis qui magistratum gerunt," &c.—CIC., pro Sextio.

MDCCCXLVIII.—Men to pray for others as well as themselves.

WHEN David had prayed, "O my God, I trust in Thee; let me not be ashamed!" in the next verse, as if conspired to himself that his prayers were too restrictive, narrow, and niggardly, he enlargeth the bounds thereof, and builds them on a broader bottom, "Yea, let none that wait on Thee be ashamed." Thus it is that charity in the midst of our religious devotions must have rehoboth (room enough to expatiate in). Our petitions must not be pent or confined to our own private good, but extended to the benefit of all God's servants, in what condition soever.

Ps. xxv. 2.

Fuller's Cure of a Wounded Conscience.

Gen. x. 11.

MDCCCXLIX.—Not to converse with heretics, seducers, &c.

Eusebii Hist., lib.
iv., cap. 14.

Iren., lib. iii.,
cap. 3.

Strong's Sermon,
1646.

MARCION, the heretic, meeting with Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, desired of him that he might know him. The good man made answer, "As for thee, I know thee to be the first-born of the devil." The like we may read of St. John, who, coming to a bath, found Cerinthus there, but presently went out again, saying that it was impossible such a place should stand where such an heretic remained. Thus, the saints of old, according to that of 2 John 10, received not such into their houses, or bade them God speed. And so should we not favour such as are deceivers and false teachers, nor, out of love to the error, or an affectation of novelty, countenance or converse with them; but, in testimony of our zeal for God and constancy in the truth, reject them, avoid them, that they be not encouraged in their sin, nor we partakers thereof, as abettors of their evil deeds.

MDCCCL.—Prayer for others in the same condition with ourselves prevalent with God.

Fuller's Cure of a Wounded Conscience.

BEGGARS, when they crave an alms, constantly use one main motive—that the person of whom they beg may be preserved from that misery whereof they themselves have had woeful experience. If they be blind, they cry, "Master, God bless your eyesight!" if lame, "God bless your limbs!" if undone by casual burning, "God bless you and yours from fire!" Tu quoque fac simile (Let every good Christian do the like), and reason good; for Christ, though His person be now glorified in heaven, yet He is still subject, by sympathy with His saints on earth, to hunger, nakedness, imprisonment, banishment, and a wounded conscience, and so may stand in need of feeding, clothing, visiting, comforting, and curing. So that when we pray to Christ for any favour, it is a good plea to urge, edge, and enforce our requests withal, "Lord, grant us such or such a grace; and never mayest Thou, Lord, in Thy mystical members, be perplexed, vexed, or tormented with such or such an extremity, further than may make out for Thy glory and their everlasting good!"

MDCCCLI.—Ministers to be (as they are called) spiritual men.

Ps. civ. 4.

Fenner's Christ's
Alarm, 1646.

"Casta placent superis purâ cum veste venite."—
TIBUL., ii. 1.

Hos. ix. 7.

It is said of the angels that they are spirits, spiritual creatures; their communion spiritual, their food spiritual, their delights spiritual, their affections and minds spiritual. Thus it is that the minister, though he be a body as well as his people, yet he should be a spiritual man in an especial manner: he should have animam separatam, a soul separated and sequestered from bodily things, taken up with spiritual affairs, holding forth the fruits of the Spirit; his sermons should not only be moral, but spiritual; his carriage spiritual; his discourse spiritual. If otherwise, his own phrases will rise up in judgment against him. Ministers are called the spirituality, as though the people were carnal in comparison of them; whereas the truth is, many are spiritual mad men, being nothing less than what they profess to be, spiritual men in a mockery, such as profane ones call a spiritual pig—that is, the poorest of all the ten—such a one as hath no substance in it; so no substance, no goodness, no holiness at all in them, whereas they should exceed all others.

MDCCCLII.—Fatherly counsel hath been and ought to be prevalent with children.

Lib. de Republicâ.

ARISTOTLE, that great philosopher, tells us of Archilocus, who, being desirous to give some prevalent counsel and effectual advice to Lycambes, whose father was dead, did, while he was writing his admonitions, by an elegant prosopopœia, bring in his father, and, as it were, so put the pen into his father's hand, that Lycambes might receive those instructions from one who, by his very relation, was much more probable to prevail than himself. The like passage is also in Cicero, that prince of oratory and eloquence, as the former was of philosophy: that he, being to read a lecture of modesty and temperance to his friend Clodia, raised up her father, Appius Caius, from the grave, and in his name delivered his directions to the daughter: both of these, in this practice of theirs, intimating thus much to all succeeding ages, that it is neither the philosopher's wisdom, be it never so deep, nor the orator's eloquence, be it never so winning, is so effectual in the hearts of children as the voice of fatherly counsel, being—as it ought to be—more persuasive and powerful than any other argument or rhetoric whatsoever.

Ad Atticum, lib. xii.

"Pater, adsum; impera quid vis," &c.
—PLAUT., Trin.

MDCCCLIII.—Ministers to be earnestly zealous in preaching God's Word.

It is a pretty story of Demosthenes, when one told him that he was beaten and abused by such a man; it seems he told it very dreamingly and coldly, showing no affection at all. "Why," saith Demosthenes, "hath he beaten thee? I do not believe it." "No?" saith the man; and so grew into a very great passion. "I am sure thus and thus he did to me; and do not you call this beating?" "Nay," saith Demosthenes, "now I believe that he hath beaten thee indeed, now thou speakest as if it were true what thou saidst." So, when a minister preacheth unto people in a dreaming manner, standing in a pulpit as though he were saying of his lesson, though the things he saith be never so weighty, yet the people will not believe him; but when he is earnestly zealous in God's message, when he preacheth as one having authority, then it is that the people's hearts may be said to burn within them.

Combesii Enchirid.

Apophth. Philosoph.

"Rectitudinis zelo contra vitia hominum accendendus est."—GREG., in Eszech., Hom. v.

Luke xxiv. 32.

MDCCCLIV.—How far self-safety may be consulted.

THERE is an apologue of an ass, which a certain silly king did love so dearly, that he had a great mind to have her to speak. They told him it was a thing impossible and against nature; but he, being impatient, and not enduring to have his desire crossed, slew them, because they told him the truth. At last, trying about what others could do, one who was made wise by their example, being required to do it, he undertook it, but, withal, he showed him the greatness of the charge and difficulty of the work. The king, being eager to have it done, told him he should have what allowance he pleased, and bade him spare for no charges, and that, besides, he would reward him liberally. The physician also told him that it would be a long cure, and could not be done in a day; ten years were the fewest that could be allotted to perfect a work of that nature. So they agreed, and the physician began to fall to work about his ass. His friends, hearing of it, came to him, and asked him what he meant to take in hand a thing so utterly impossible. He smiled, and said unto them, "I thought you had been wiser than to ask me such a question. If I had," says he, "refused to have taken it in hand, he had put me to death presently. Now I have gained ten years' time, and before that be expired, who can tell what may happen? The king may die, the ass may die, or I myself may die; and if any of these happen, I am in freedom and safety." Thus, in the midst of temporal dangers, whether imminent or incumbent, self-safety may and ought to be consulted. If a man be persecuted in one city, he may lawfully fly into another, but with this proviso, that if the cause of God and religion be therein concerned, then farewell life and liberty and all! for in such a case he that layeth down his life shall preserve it—he that loseth all shall find all.

Hume's Hist. of Douglas and Angus.

"Malè sapit qui sibi non sapit."

Matt. x. 23.

Matt. x. 39.

MDCCCLV.—The world not to be trusted unto.

Lee's Serm. 1645.

THERE is a facetious story of a copyholder, dwelling on the sea-side near Plymouth, who, perceiving that divers of his neighbours trading to sea came home gallant and rich, and lived in a plentiful manner, would by all means to sea too. He puts off his stock, makes money of all that he had, and leaves his wife and children with friends. His trading was into Spain, the freight returned was in figs. A great flaw of wind comes—the ship was in danger—she must be lightened—overboard go the figs ! The poor man cries out, “ Oh, there goes my oxen, my sheep, and all that I have in the world ! ” Home he comes, poor ; his neighbours pity his folly ; one lends him an ox, another a horse. After some few years, he picks up his crumbs again, and, being at plough on a very fair day, cries “ Ho ! ” to his boy that did drive, and, standing still, looks on the sea, and, seeing it very calm, said, “ A wannion on you ! How is't you look so smooth now ? You long for more figs, do you ? Your fair looks shall never deceive me again, I warrant you. Drive on, boy ! ” Thus, the world is like unto the sea, very uncertain ; there is no trusting to it—like that sea mentioned in the Revelation, a glassy and crystalline sea, brittle as glass ; ubi splendet, frangitur (where it is most shining and resplendent, there it soonest cracks and breaks asunder), gulling with its transparency, ebbing and flowing according to the influence of its lunary mistress, one while lifting up to heaven upon her billows, and anon sinking down her favourites, as it were, to hell.

“ Mari justè comparatur hic mundus,” &c.—CASSIODOR., super Ps. xliv.
Rev. iv. 6.

Ps. cvii. 27.

MDCCCLVI.—Wherein the true valour of a captain or soldier in war consisteth.

Sir Walter Raleigh's
Hist. of the World.

IT was the saying of Scipio, that warlike African, who, being reproached by a certain man that he was not so forward a fighter as he could have wished, that his mother had borne him to be a commander, not a fighter—intimating that a captain's chief place was to command all, and to choose fit times, places, and means for fighting. Not that he should account it his honour to fight upon the request of his enemy, but as he found most expedient and convenient for himself, in wisdom choosing the form, the field, the time, the place, and all for the advantage of his army, giving not the least foot of advance to his enemy whereof he could possibly hinder him. And thus it is that many—though otherwise high-spirited enough—do err in a false opinion of their own valour, and thereby lose both themselves and their honours ; so that, whilst they affect to be called gallant fighters, do prove indeed to be but foolish commanders and ill captains, not getting that honour and valour which they so eagerly seek, but the blame of temerity and rashness, which they should mostly avoid.

“ Fortissimus ille est, qui promptus metuenda pati, si cominus instent, et differre potest.”—LUCAN., lib. vii.

MDCCCLVII.—Ministers to be active and vigorous in the reproof of sin.

Fenner's Christ's Alarm, 1646.

SUPPOSE a town to be all on fire, should we not count the man ridiculous that should come and tell us a cold story, saying, “ Sirs, let me tell you a thing : there is a great fire in the town, and I verily think it may burn all the town, and you should do well to go and quench it.” This man tells us so, indeed, but should not we think him a fool for telling us such a thing in such a cold and careless manner ? Nature itself teacheth another course in such a case : “ Fire, fire ! Help, oh, help, for the Lord's sake ! Water, water, in all haste ! Alas, alas ! we are undone ! Quickly, quickly run for ladders—run for buckets—run for wet cloths ! Ah, you lazy villain ! Run apace for iron hooks ! ” and the like. So it is in the matter of preaching. What weighty things doth the Word contain !—truths that should make the very bowels of the minister to yearn, and pour out his affections in the pulpit, to rouse up the people's thoughts, and awaken them from the sleep of sin and security wherein they have a long time snored; otherwise, when they hear of matters of life and death—eternal life, salvation, and damnation—they sit like blocks on their seats, as though it were no matter of concernment.

“ Unumquodque Christianum zelus domûs Dei comedat, prohibe quas potes,” &c.—AUG., Tract. xx., in Joan.

MDCCCLVIII.—Not to be hasty in the matter of revenge.

It is reported of James IV., king of Scotland, that, being much offended with the Earl Crawford, he vowed to pull down his house from the top to the bottom; but the earl, by his timely submission, took off the edge of the king's anger against him; insomuch that the king (that he might in some sort be as big as his word) went up to the top of his house, and, without doing any more harm at all, threw down a little stone which was closed in the fabric, which is to this day kept as a monument of the king's favour to that family. And thus it were to be wished that men, in the height and heat of their passion, would throw themselves down at the footstool of Him to whom vengeance belongeth, not to be hasty in matters of revenge, and upon every slight occasion, or the least punctilio of honour, to be ready to sheathe their swords in the bowels of one another. Thus to do is saucily to seat themselves upon God's throne, and, as much as in them lieth, to wrest the sword out of His hands. But let all such know, that the less any man strives for himself the more God is his champion; and He that said, "I seek not my own glory," adds, "But there is One that seeks it and judgeth." God taketh his part ever that fights not for himself.

David Hume's
Hist. of Douglas and Angus.

Preston's Serm.,
Lond., 1626.

"Noli imitari malum virorum, sed justitie relinque vindictam."— PHOBYLIDES.

John viii. 50.

MDCCCLIX.—More converts made by preaching than by reading.

A MAN may be converted by reading, as Luther said he was: it is the confession of Luther, that the reading of John Huss's works was the main cause of his conversion: and St. Augustine's "Tolle, lege"—taking up of the book, and reading that of the apostle, "Not in chambering and wantonness"—was, by God's especial favour, a means to draw him out of that puddle of sin wherein he had a long time wallowed. Thus, there is a blessing for readers. And there may a fish or two hang on the net, being let down on a heap; but that is a chance. It is not the net lapped up together that bringeth in the draught, but haled out at length and spread all abroad that closeth in the fish. So it is the spreading of the Word, the stretching of it out upon every soul present by the work of the ministry, that is the way to catch many; so that the reason of such ill success in many ministers is not spreading the net, not dilating upon the matter in hand, whereby their preaching seems to be little better than reading.

Clark's Marroto of Eccles. Hist.
In Lib. Confession.

Rom. xiii. 13.

Rev. i. 3.

"Lectio lecta juvat, sed pre-dicata plus ad pietatis affectum movet."—PHIL.
DIEZ, Sum. Præd.

DCCCLX.—Magistrates, rulers, &c., of all men, to be resolved in the cause of God and their country.

JAMES III., king of Scotland, waiving the wholesome advice of his nobility, betook himself to the counsels of some few unworthy men, insomuch that all things were out of order; so that the nobility fell upon consultations for the good of their king and country. Archibald, earl of Angus, contrives the way how the wicked counsellors might be fetched off from the king. All approve it; only the Lord Grey, perceiving the forwardness of the people, told them the fable of the rats and mice, who, consulting in a public meeting how they might be secured from the surprisal of their public enemy, the cat, found out (as they thought) a very good way for their safety, which was to hang a bell about every cat's neck, that so they might have warning of their approach and shift for themselves. But when it was put to the question, who should undertake to tie the bell about the cat's neck, they were all at a

Buchan's Historia Scotica.

"Rex est qui metuit nihil, quem non lancea militis." &c.—
SEN., Tragæd. II

stand—not one durst undertake to do it. The Earl of Angus suddenly smelt out his meaning and what application was to be made upon the matter, and thereupon made answer, “I will bell the cat, and what your lordships shall conclude fit to be done shall not want for execution!” which fell out accordingly. And thus it is that resolution in the cause of God and the country becomes all men, especially Christian men—such as are in places of power and authority—that, when their religion and liberties lie at the stake, they would not stand, “Shall I? shall I?” but bell the cat, stare in the face of any opposition whatsoever, and boldly seize upon the enemies of their peace and safety.

Jones's Serm.,
London, 1647.

MDCCCLXI.—The minister's calling to be owned from God.

Judges xviii. 1.

WHEN the Danites asked the Levite in Mount Ephraim who brought him thither, and what he made in that place, he made no other answer but that Micah had hired him, and dealt well with him, &c.: he knew well enough that he put himself there, sought for the place himself—it was maintenance that brought him thither; his own conscience told him he was an hireling; he came not in by the door, but at the window; he could not say that the Lord brought him thither. And thus it is that no man can be said to enter into the ministry in a right way but by God. He must have his letters of orders from Him, his institution and induction from Him; he must not intrude into God's heritage; it must not be gain that makes him take up a living, not advantage that makes him chop and change: he that doth so never went to Christ for approbation. And whereas it is said of the apostles that the rulers and elders perceived that they had been with Jesus, no man, by his life, or doctrine, can perceive that such a person had been with Jesus, that ever he had any allowance from Him, and yet he will be crowding into the ministry.

*A Cautel for Archippus; a
 Serm.*, 1618.

“Grandis dignitas est sacerdotum,” &c.—HIERON.,
in Ezek., lib. ii.

Acts iv. 13.

MDCCCLXII.—Good and bad kings and princes, &c.; their difference.

Wilson's Life of King James.

WE see all the motions of superior bodies, in what excellent order and perfection they move; and if some exhalations start up amongst them, from gross and putrid matter, whose course is not yet known, what horrid trepidations bring they with them! And what prodigious calamities are they the forerunners of! Yet they hold not that station long, but blaze a little there and then extinguish. And all that can be said of them is, that we know not for what mischievous intents these meteors did appear; whereas the other celestial bodies beget no wonder, are no prodigies, but keep a constant course in their own spheres, and are not contaminated with things below them, yet they retain a powerful influence over them. So kings and princes always shine in glory, and noble souls when they loathe to soil themselves in sordid things; but when they grovel here for trash and trumpery, and trade away that gallant stock of love housed in their people's hearts for some false coin, minted by passion, mutable affection, or misled reason, they do degrade themselves so far, that the only difference betwixt a king and a mean man is, that the one by his trade cozens a few, the other a great many, but himself most.

“*Regnandi causa
 regum fere omnium mos est, ut neque pietate neque verecundia promoveantur.*”—PAUL.
Joivrus, lib. iii.

MDCCCLXIII.—Ministers not to be verbal, but real, in their expressions.

Fennel's Christ's Alarm.

THE Lacedemonian in Plutarch said, when he heard how sweetly the nightingale sang, “Oh, that I had this bird! Surely it is a rare dish!” and after a while, when he had taken it and eat it, and found but a little picking meat, he concluded with that proverbial saying, “Vox es, et pralerea nihil (Now I see thou art mere voice, and nothing else)!” And such are they that go up into the pulpit with stentorian voices, that have big words, but small matter, so that the people may be said to hear a sound, but know not what it means; whereas a faithful minister of Jesus Christ is not verbal, but real in his expressions—such as John the Baptist, who was more than a voice, a burning and a shining light; there was life and heat in his ministry;—so that a man may be said to preach much, yet preach little. But it were far better to make less use of his lungs, and more of his heart, which will at the last prove to be a great comfort to his own soul and advantageous to those that hear him.

"Oportet ut prædicatores sint fortes in præceptis, compatiens infirmis, in exhortationibus blandi," &c.—
—GREG., in Job, Mor. 30.

MDCCCLXIV.—Not to take notice of every angry word that is spoken against us.

It is reported of Titus Vespasian, that when any one spake ill of him, he was wont to say that he was above false reports; and if they were true, he had more reason to be angry with himself than the relator. And the good Emperor Theodosius commanded no man should be punished that spake against him: "for what was spoken slightly," said he, "was to be laughed at; what spitefully, to be pardoned; what angerly, to be pitied; and if truly, he would thank him for it." Oh that there were but such a frame of spirit in this carping age of ours, wherein men, like tinder, are ready to take fire upon the least spark that falls, to quarrel sometimes on the most inoffensive word that can be spoken; whereas the best way is to be silent. Sile et funestam dedisti plagam (Say nothing, and you pay a talking man to the purpose). Thus it was that Hezekiah would not answer Rabshakeh, nor Jeremiah Hananiah, nor our blessed Saviour His railing adversaries. He reviled not His revilers; He threatened not His opponents.

Suetonius, in Vite.

Eusebius.

"Iratus nihil nisi crimina loquitur." —SEN., in Thyeste.

Chrysostom., super Matth. v.

Jer. xxviii. 11.
Matt. xxvi. 62.
1 Pet. ii. 23.

MDCCCLXV.—The excellency of a good memory.

It was the saying of an eminent scholar, that an excellent memory was needful for three sorts of men:—First, for tradesmen; for they, having many businesses to do, many reckonings to make up, many irons in the fire, had need of a good memory. Secondly, great talkers; for they, being full of words, had need to have a good storehouse in their heads to feed their tongues. Thirdly, for liars; for they, telling many untruths, had need of a good memory, to be able to remember what untruths they have told, lest afterwards they be taken in their lying, contradicting themselves. All this is true; but as to the excellency of a good memory, indeed, the principal of all is, that it is a great blessing of God, in ordine ad spiritualia (in order unto spiritual things); the more we have of it, the more advantage we have unto our eternal good; as to know that ever which we knew once, to bring our knowledge into action upon all occasions, to have God before our eyes. It is like a Mercurial finger to put a man into his way when he is once out—a great help to belief and sound knowledge. Many and excellent are the benefits and privileges of such a memory.

Charron, de la Sagesse.

Fenner's Sermon, Camb., 1637.

"Omnis disciplina memoria constat; frustra quædoce-mur si quicquid audimus," &c.—
—QUINTIL., lib. xl.

MDCCCLXVI.—Some one sinful quality predominant more than other in the heart of man.

As in a ground that lieth untilled, amongst the great variety of weeds there is usually some master weed, one amongst the rest that is rifer and ranker than all the rest; and as it is in the body of man, that although, in some degree or other, more or less, there be a mixture of all the four elements, not any of them wholly wanting, yet there is some one of them predominant, that gives the denomination—in regard whereof some are said to be of a sanguine, some of a phlegmatic, some of a choleric, and some of a melancholic constitution: so it is also in the souls of men. Though there be a general mixture and Gataker's Apology against Lilly, Astrologer.

¹⁸ Trahit sua quemque libido.

medley of all evil and corrupt qualities, yet is there some one usually that is paramount, more powerful and prevalent, that swayeth and showeth forth itself more eminently and more evidently than any other of them do; and from this, therefore, more frequently and apparently discovering itself, is the denomination wont to be given, whereby some are styled ambitious, some lascivious, some envious, some malicious, some haughty, some hasty, and the like.

MDCCCLXVII.—The general badness of memory in good things.

Gouge's Sermon,
Lond., 1636.

"Memoria hominis admodum labilis est, ut agrè reperias duos quique semel audi-erunt," &c. — ERASM., in Apophthegm.

Ps. cvi. 13.

As it is with a sieve or bolter, the good corn and fine flour go through, but the light chaff and coarse bran remain behind; or as a strainer, that the sweet liquor is strained out by, but the dregs are left behind; or as a grate, that lets the pure water run away, but if there be any straws, sticks, mud, or filth, that it holds: thus it is with most men's memories. By nature they are but, as it were, pertusa dolia, mere river tubs, especially in good things very treacherous, so that the vain conceits of men are apt to be held in, when divine instructions and gracious promises run through: trifles and toys and worldly things they are apt to remember, tenacious enough; but for spiritual things, they leak out—like Israel, they soon forget them.

MDCCCLXVIII.—Sin, the remainders thereof even in the best of God's children.

Methodius, de Re-surrect. apud Epi-phan. Heret., sec.
xxviii., cap. lxiiv.

"Nullus sanctus et justus caret pec-cato," &c. — AUG.,
de Eccles. Dogmat.

As in a piece of ground, even after the best and most accurate tillage, some seeds and roots of those noisome weeds wherewith it was formerly much pestered will still remain, and will be springing up, be it never so sedulously, never so assiduously managed: so, after the gracious work of regeneration, there will be a smatch (tincture) of all sin in some degree or other. Hence it is that Methodius, an ancient bishop of the Church, compares the inbred corruption of man's heart to a wild fig-tree, growing upon the wall of some goodly temple or stately palace, whereof, albeit the main trunk be broken off and the stump of the root be plucked up, yet the fibrous strings of it, piercing into the joints of the stone-work, will not utterly be extracted, but will be ever and anon shooting and sprouting out, until the whole frame of the building be dissolved and the stone-work thereof be disjointed and pulled in pieces.

MDCCCLXIX.—Four sorts of men undertaking the work of the ministry.

Savoy.

Cataker's Apology against Lilly's Lies.

"Sartores, sutores, oino-polae, pharma-copolae, idque genus hominum," &c.
"Plus vellus quam gregem spectantes."
—SIM. DE CASSIA, in Evangel.

MARCUS ANTONIUS DE DOMINIS, that shuffling archbishop of Spalato, then dean of Windsor, and furnished with a fair mastership besides, would needs put on for a good fat parsonage, in the gift of the dean and chapter of that church. Dr. Thomas White (the same that founded Sion College, London), being one of the prebends, opposed the motion, hinting to the greedy bishop the unevenness of his desires, by telling him that there were four sorts of men that undertook the work of the ministry, "Quorum pascere quidam nec volunt nec valent, quidam valent sed non volunt, quidam volunt sed non valent, quidam et valent et volunt (Some that neither would nor could discharge it, some that could but would not, some that would but could not, some that both would and could)." And thus it is that some are to be found in the midst of us who, such is their ignorance, that they neither will nor can divide the Word aright—such as, leaping from the shopboard, leave sewing of garments to make a rent in the Church; or, if by chance they looked upon the university, they think themselves as sufficiently inspired with the gift of prophecy as he did with the gift of poetry that dreamt upon the top of Parnassus: others there are (such is their unworthiness) that can but will not—that are able, but slothful in the work of the Lord, and look more after the fleece than the flock committed to their charge ; some also (such is their unhappiness) that would but cannot, as hindered by some natural imperfection in the want of utterance, weakness of memory, or the like ; some others, again (such is their glory), that both can and will deliver the whole truth of God, preach in season and out of season, to the great comfort of themselves and those that hear them.

"Vita sonantes et ardentis."—GREG., Moral.

MDCCCLXX.—How the heart of man may be kept up steady in troublous times.

To make a ship ride steady in the midst of a tempestuous sea, four things are required—first, she must be well built—strongly, well timbered, not weak, artificially well moulded, not tender-sided ; secondly, she must be down-ballasted with some sad and ponderous lading ; thirdly, low-masted (and low-built may be added too), for high-carved and tant-masted ships will fetch way in a stress ; fourthly, sure anchored, by which means, though moved, she may be said to live and keep her station. Thus the heart of man, if ever we think to have it steady and fixed in the midst of troublesome times, if ever we labour for stable and composed spirits, that, whatever hurricane storms or raging tempests come down upon the world, upon the Church, upon the places where we live, or upon ourselves, we may be able to ride it out, we must be built upon a sure foundation, and that is Jesus Christ—well timbered with sanctifying graces, down-ballasted with sound judgment and true Christian direction, low-masted, to be humble and lowly, not heady and high-minded ; and lastly, sure anchored, having a sound, solid, and substantial faith—faith, not fancy—hope, not like that of the hypocrite, which shall be cut off.

Brinsley's Serm.,
Yarmouth, 1647.

"Rebus angustis animosus atque fortis appare."—HORAT., li., Carm. 10.

1 Cor. iii. 17.

"Quod super furore damentum Christi edificatur." &c.—AMBROS., de Cain et Abel.
Job viii. 13, 14.

MDCCCLXXI.—To keep close to the Word of God, especially in times of trouble.

It is reported by Mr. Fox of one Gregory Crow, a seaman, that, being wrecked at sea, and having cast all overboard, he kept his New Testament about his neck, and so, floating upon his broken mast, was, after four days, discovered by some passengers, taken off all frozen, numbened, and, as it were, sodden by the continual washings of the water, but, which was most observable, he kept his book close to him. Thus, if ever we intend to keep our heads above water in the sea of this troublesome world, we must be sure to keep close to the Word of God, and not to suffer it to depart from us—let money, wares, ship, and all go ere we forego that. So, likewise, in all our doubtful cases, whether vows, oaths, marriages, dealing with men, intercourse with God, or any difficulty whatsoever, go to the law and to the testimony for resolution, being glad that God hath found out a way to cast the wavering scale and to direct our conversation.

Acts and Mon.,
1556.

"Recurrendum est ad solas divinas Scripturas."—P. DE ALLIACO.

Rogers's Practical Catechism.
Isa. viii. 20.

MDCCCLXXII.—Faith a sure anchor-hold in time of distress.

AN anchor being let fall, it passeth through the water and violently maketh its way through all the waves and billows, never staying till it come at the bottom, where, taking hold of the ground that lieth out of sight, thus by a secret and hidden force staying the ship, so as though it be moved, yet it is not removed, but still keepeth her station. Of such use is faith to the soul of man. When it is in a stress, tossed with the waves and billows of temptations and trials, threatening to swallow it up, faith breaks through all, never resting till it come at God Himself, who is invisible, and taking hold upon Him by a secret force it stayeth Calvini Com. in Heb. vi. 19.

"Ut anchora jacta de navi, haud permittit eam circumferri, licet venti commoveant, &c. Sic et fides."—CHRYSOST., in Heb. viii. 21.

Heb. vi. 19.

the soul, and keepeth it from being driven upon the rocks or sands of desperation. An anchor it is, and a sure anchor, that ἀσφαλὴς καὶ βεβηα, that sheet anchor which the soul must trust to, which it may ride and live by in whatsoever stress can come down upon it.

MDCCCLXXIII.—The exceeding love of God to mankind admirable.

It is reported of a certain merchant in London, that he made much of a poor cobbler that dwelt near him, and did as good as maintain him, though he were a Papist in the matter of his religion, yet this unthankful fellow went about to betray him to death; but the merchant, having escaped his hands, merely out of love to his soul, used all means to be friends with him again, and invited him to his house. All this would not do; his heart was so embittered, that he would shun the way of him and not so much as look at him. It fell out so at length, that he met him in such a narrow lane, that he could not baulk him, but must needs talk with him. The good merchant takes him to him, tells him he was glad he had met with him, and wondered that he was grown so strange. "What!" said he, "do you think me your enemy? If I were, could I not crush you with a word speaking? Alas! I am not offended with you, if you be not with me, and, for all your treachery against me, will forgive and forget it." These kind words were no sooner spoken, but the cobbler melted into tears, and, falling down upon his knees, confessed his villany, and, repenting of it, told him: "This love of yours shall bind me to you for ever, to serve you in all that I may or possibly can." This Popish cobbler is the heart of every child of Adam; this royal merchant is the great God of heaven; this narrow lane is the strait of conscience, beset with sins and curses; this kind behaviour is the tender of grace. Let us not, then, be worse to our poor souls than the cobbler was to his, but break our hearts by repentance and sorrow for our sins, that ever we should offend so good a God, so gracious and loving a Master, and, with Saul to David, say, "Where shall a man find such love as to spare his enemy when he had him in his hand, and to be content to cut off only a lap of his garment, to correct him here in this world with some temporary judgment, when he might have cut his throat and cast him into hell torments for evermore."

Rogers's Practical Catechism.

"O æterna veritas, et vera charitas, et chara æternitas! tu es Deus meus ad te suspiro die ac nocte."—AUG., Confess., lib. vii.

MDCCCLXXIV.—God raising up instruments for the deliverance of His people.

Rhemigius Altissiodorus, in locum.

Isidor. Clarius, in locum.

Joshua vi. 20.

"Fata viam inveniunt."

1 Cor. x. 13.

MEMORABLE is that vision of Zechariah: "I lifted up mine eyes," said the prophet, "and saw, and beheld four horns!" (Chap. i., verse 18.) "And the Lord showed me four carpenters." (Verse 20.) Now, what were these four horns—what but the enemies of the Church? (Verse 19.) Horns, so called for their power, and said to be four, in reference to the four parts of the world—east, west, north, and south—from all which they came. And what are the carpenters? Why, instruments raised up by God to break and batter those horns—to oppose, to overthrow that adverse power (verse 21); and they are said to be four, to import an equality of strength and power. Thus, when God hath a work to do—be it to beat down Babylon or build up Jerusalem—He can raise up carpenters, instruments that shall be sufficient for the work. Though never so mean, yet they shall effect great work. Trumpets of rams' horns, if they do but blow, down go the walls of Jericho, with a vengeance! Nay, though instruments fail, yet the promise shall not fail; though the carpenters should not strike one stroke, yet God hath ways to take off the horns of His enemies; though His people should be destitute of all human protection, yet He will find out a way to deliver and secure them. No temptation, no cross, no trouble, so far seize upon them, but He will find a way to escape, that they may be able to bear it.

MDCCCLXXV.—All endeavours to be sanctified by prayer.

THERE was a certain husbandman who always sowed good seed, but never could have any good corn : at last a neighbour came unto him, and reasoned what should be the cause he sowed so good seed and reaped so bad corn. "Why, truly," said he; "I give the land her due—good tillage, good seed, and all things that be fit." "Why, then," replied the other, "it may be you do not steep your seed." "No, truly," said he; "nor ever did I hear that seed should be steeped." "Yes, surely," said the other; "and I will tell you how : it must be steeped in prayer." When the party heard this, he thanked him for his good counsel, put it home to his conscience, reformed his fault, and had as good corn as any other man whatsoever. Thus it is that, if ever we look to have a good improvement of our labours, and to have a blessing upon what we undertake, we must have recourse unto God by prayer ; otherwise we may trade and traffic, fight and war, and get nothing—nay, let us get ever so much, it is all in vain, because we ask not aright.

Smith's Esses Deus.

"Egredientes hospitio, armet oratio ; regredientibus de platea," &c.—HIER., in Ep.

James iv. 2.

MDCCCLXXVI.—Universal obedience unto God enjoined.

AN instrument, if only one string be out of tune, although the rest be well set, yet that one keeps such a jarring and harsh sound, that the lesson played thereon will relish as unmusically, in a skilful ear, as if all the strings were out of tune. And thus, if a man should abstain from swearing and drunkenness, yet if he were given to lust, or if from those three, and yet addicted to covetousness, it comes all to one reckoning. Let every man, therefore, look into his bosom sin, observing diligently that one jarring string, and never leave screwing and winding of it up till it be brought into right tune ; and if that cannot be effected, break it, pluck it out : for God will have a complete harmonious consent, a resolution for universal obedience—otherwise, no acceptance.

Cheshire's Serm., Lond., 1641.

James ii. 10.

Matt. v. 29.

MDCCCLXXVII.—To be more careful for the body than the soul reprobable.

THE Jews have a story of a woman that took two children to nurse—the one, a very mean, deformed, crooked, blind, and not likely to live long ; the other, as goodly a child as may be—beautiful, well-favoured, and likely to be long-lived. Now, this foolish woman, bestowing all her care and diligence, pains and attendance, upon the worst child, never so much as minding the best, must needs be ignorant and very foolish in so bad a choice, and of so great neglect. Thus it is that the most of men are herein to be reprov'd, who, having taken two children to nurse, their bodies and their souls, and well knowing that the soul is infinitely far better than the body, more beautiful and of longer continuance, yet, like the foolish nurse, they bestow all their care, labour, and pains for the worst—they make provision for the flesh, pamper up the body, which must, ere long, lie down in the dust, and starve the soul, which doth and must live for ever.

Plantavit, Florileg. Rabbinum.

"Si magnæ mercedis est à morte eripere carnem, quantum morituram ; quanti est meriti, à morte animam liberare !" &c.—GREG., Hom. xxvi.

MDCCCLXXVIII.—The great danger of repentance put off till old age.

HE cannot be otherwise looked on than as a very unwise man, that having made a burthen of sticks, and finding it too heavy for his shoulders, should lay it aside, and go and cut down more and add unto it ; and him little better than a madman that, having a great journey to go and a great burthen to carry, and having choice of many lusty horses, should let them all pass empty away, and lay his carriage upon a poor, feeble jade, that could scarce bear himself ; and him, also, none of the wisest that shall neglect to pass over

Alphons. ab Avendano, Com. in Matt.

Merchantii Hort. Paif.

"Sera nimis vita
est crastina," &c.

"Tolle moras no-cult differre,"—
LUCAN.

the ford in the morning, when the water is low, and think to go over it at night, when the banks are full. Yet such are all they that put off repentance till old age—that think to serve Satan and their youthful lusts with full dishes, and reserve a few abject scraps of old age for God's table. But let such seriously consider whether it will be easier for them now to repent and amend in the time of their youth, than hereafter in old age; now in health, than hereafter in sickness; now when the burthen of their sins is lesser, than hereafter when it shall be greater—in a word, now whilst grace is near, or when it shall stand at a further distance. In the midst of delay the account is increased, the debt augmented, the enemy more strong, themselves more feeble, and all the difficulties of conversion daily more and more multiplied upon them, having a day more to repent of and a day less to repent in.

MDCCCLXXIX.—The danger of sleeping out sermons.

Angier's Help to Better Hearts, &c.

"Cave, serve Dei
ne sit somnus tuus non reparatio, sed spiritus extinctio," —GREG., Mor.

A CERTAIN maid went to church, with a purpose to sleep from day to day, as she confessed afterwards, thinking she could sleep more sweetly there than anywhere. It so pleased God that one night she fell into a dream, and imagined herself to be walking. Two ways were presented unto her: in the one way was a great fire—that way she would not go; the other way she took—it led her by the church. She awaked, with this application of her dream: that she had been wont to sleep much at church, and if she did not amend that fault, she must expect no other but hell-fire. This dream, thus applied, made her leave sleeping and fall to hearing, and from hearing to believing and repenting. Thus it is that hell is made for sermon-sleepers, torment being the just recompense of sinful ease, that they who sleep when they should awake must make account to awake with pain when they would be at rest.

MDCCCLXXX.—Real thanksgiving to be made unto God for benefits received.

Cheshire's Serm.,
Lond., 1641.

Chap. i.

"Quando bene sibi est, laudat misericordiam Dei, quan-
do male justitiam,
&c.

Ps. xxxiii. 3.

THE covetous husbandman, when he sees a plentiful harvest towards, or the merchant a good return in trading, will perhaps afford a "God be thanked!" but it comes off so poorly, with such a squint-eyed relation to their profit, that a man may easily perceive, had not all things happened aright, He should have had little thanks at their hands, as if they were no more bound to give God praise than He to give them present benefit. But it was otherwise with holy Job: he did not only sacrifice for his children his health and wealth whilst he enjoyed them, but when they were taken away from him. And herein a good man imitates the bells, that ring as pleasantly at a funeral as at a wedding. When it goes well with him, he praiseth the mercy of God; when ill with him, he magnifies His justice: he is thankful in all conditions—not slightly, as the manner of the world is, but cheerfully and with a good courage.

MDCCCLXXXI.—Plots and contrivances of the wicked turning to the good of God's people.

Lib. iii., de Nat.
Deorum.

Gen. xlv. 3.

Colling's Lectures, v.

TULLY maketh mention of one Phereus Jason, whom his enemy running through with a sword, intending to kill him, by chance opened an imposthume in his body, which the physicians could not by any means cure. Such was that confederacy of Joseph's brethren: they sell him into Egypt, thought all cock-sure; but God so ordered it, that the wickedness of their consultation was the stirrup whereby he mounted into greater exaltation. Thus it is that all the plots and contrivances of wicked men shall turn to the good of God's people; the vexations, troubles, sorrows, or any affliction whatsoever, wherewith the sons of Belial are wont and do usually exercise the children of God, are but as so many spurs and goads in their sides, to drive them forward to their Heavenly Father. And though, by His permissive providence, it hath and doth often so fall out that they have a very large commission to touch their bodies, their goods, and their good names—nay, their very lives—yet all shall be for the good of their precious and immortal souls.

"Dolor hic tibi proderit olim."—
OVID, Amer. iii.

MDCCCLXXXII.—The sad effects of not giving unto God His due glory.

It was the frequent affirmation of the late heroic and victorious King of Sweden, that he feared the people's ascribing too much of that glory to him which was due to God would remove him before the work was finished. And, for aught as any man knows, it was a speech too prophetic. Thus it is that there is not any way speedier to bring judgments upon rulers and nations than when the due honour shall be taken from God and ascribed to men, who are but secondary, subordinate instruments to convey them. It is the only way to forfeit all favours, when we ascribe too much to the second causes and too little to the first—by looking more to them for safety, than to Him from Whom all deliverance cometh.

Hall's Serm., Lond., 1642.

"De omni bono apparenti, à nobis referantur soli Deo laudes."—BERN., in Cant.

MDCCCLXXXIII.—Invocation of saints and angels condemned.

ERASMUS, amongst others of his pleasant conceits, reporteth a story of one at sea, where (as their manner is) every man in a wreck flieth to his saint, as it were a tutelar god. "There was one," saith he, "amongst the rest, when he saw the present and imminent danger, and that there was no time of delay, in the midst of his distraction, thought with himself thus: 'If I should pray to Saint Nicholas, it is uncertain whether he hear me, and it may be he is busy in hearing and dispatching somebody else; or if not so, yet it may be he cannot have so speedy access to mediate for me as my present necessity requires. I will therefore take the safest and the surest course, and go directly to God Himself by Christ Jesus, according to that of the Psalmist: "O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come."'" And, without all doubt, it is a manifest derogation and robbing of God, even of His peculiar right, Who is the sole hearer of His people's prayers, when solemn addresses are made unto saints and angels by way of invocation, there being no warrant in all the Scriptures for the same, as Eckius and other pontificians do confess. Nay, more, that it is the safer and better way to call upon God only in the name of Jesus Christ, as another of them, out of a work ascribed to S. Augustine, concludes the question thus: "Tutius et jucundius loquor ad meum Jesum, &c." (More safely and more sweetly do I speak in prayer to my Jesus than to any of the angels or saints departed)."

In Colloqu.

Phillips's Serm., 1625.

"Non vacat exiguis rebus adesse Jovi."

Ps. lxxv. 2

Chemnitz, Exam.
amen., p. 3.

Augustin., de Utilitat. Inform.

MDCCCLXXXIV.—Curious inquisitors into God's secrets deservedly punished.

It is recorded of one Sir William Champney, in the reign of King Henry III., that, living in Tower Street, London, he was the first man that ever builded a turret on the top of his house, that he might the better overlook all his neighbours; but it so happened that, not long after, he was struck blind, so that he who would see more than others saw just nothing at all. A sad judgment! And thus it is just with God, when men of towering, high thoughts must needs be prying into those arcana Dei (the hidden secrets of God), that they should be struck blind on the place, and come tumbling down in the midst of their so curious inquiry. At the ascension of Christ, it is said that He was taken up in a cloud; being entered into His presence chamber, a curtain, as it were, was drawn to hinder his

Stow's Survey of London.

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond., 1653.

"Quæ Deus occultasse voluit non sunt scrutanda."— PROVER.

disciples gazing and our further peeping; yet, for all that, a man may be pius pulsator, though not temerarius scrutator—he may modestly knock at the counsel-door of God's secrets, but, if he enter further, he may assure himself to be more bold than welcome.

MDCCCLXXXV.—God's comfortable appearance to His people in the hour of death.

S. Clark, in Vita.

MASTER DERING, a little before his death, being raised up in his bed and seeing the sunshine, was desired to speak his mind. He said, "There is but one sun that giveth light to the whole world, but one righteousness, one communion of saints. As concerning death, I see such joy of spirit, that if I should have pardon of life on the one side and sentence of death on the other, I had rather choose a thousand times to die than to live." And another, one Mr. John Holland, lying at the point of death, said, "What brightness do I see!" and being told it was the sunshine—"No," saith he; "my Saviour shines. Now farewell, world; welcome, heaven! The Day-star from on high hath visited me. Preach at my funeral, God dealeth comfortably and familiarly with man. I feel His mercy, I see His majesty—whether in the body or out of the body I cannot tell—God He knoweth; but I see things that are unutterable!" Thus it is that the people of God have the comfortable appearance of Himself at the time of their dissolution; the door of heaven standing then, as it were, ajar, they are ravished with the very glimpse of those things that are at God's right hand. Whether they look up to God whom they have offended, or downward upon hell which they have deserved, backward upon sins committed, forwards upon judgments to be feared, the Spirit helpeth their infirmities, Christ intercedeth for them, and God standeth by with the arms of His mercy ready open to receive them.

"Pretiosa sane sanctorum mors est, tanquam vitæ janua, et perfectæ securitatis ingressus."—BERN., in Cant.

MDCCCLXXXVI.—A good man denominated from the goodness of his heart.

Vetterus, in Ps. li.

It is one of Aristotle's axioms, that the goodness or badness of anything is denominated from its principle: hence it is that we call that a good tree that hath a good root, that a good house that hath a good foundation, that good money that is made of good metal, that good cloth that is made of good wool; but a good man is not so called because he hath good hands, a good head, good words, a good voice, and all the lineaments of his body similar and composed, as it were, in a geometrical symmetry, but because he hath a good heart, good affections, good principles of grace, whereby all the faculties, both of body and soul, are always in a posture of readiness to offer themselves a living and acceptable sacrifice unto God Almighty.

"Laonicius quoties bonum quendam virum commendare voluit divinus hic vir, ajuvit."— PLATO, in Men.

MDCCCLXXXVII.—Faith and repentance to be daily renewed and increased.

As the natural life of man doth consist upon that which by the physicians is called humor radicalis and calor naturalis (natural heat and radical moisture)—for, indeed, all life is sustained by motion, and motion is between contrarieties—so, in the life spiritual, there must be of necessity two contrary qualities: repentance, continually to put off our own unrighteousness, and faith, to put on Christ's—the one to work upon the other, so to preserve life by motion—not to sit down with those anabaptistical and fanatic spirits that limit a certain time for sorrow and repentance; for the best of us all are but leaking vessels, and we must ply the pump daily for fear of drowning. As long as there is excess of evil and defect of good within us, repentance must be renewed and faith increased daily, death only being the end and complement of our repentance and mortification, even as our resurrection shall be the period and ultimate of our faith and vivification.

Case's Serm. of Repent., 1616.

"Nemo potest esse tam prudens et circumspectus, ut aliquando non labatur, ergo referat pedem."— &c.—LACTANT.

MDCCCLXXXVIII.—To be much more careful of the soul than body.

It was provided in the Old Law, that the weight of the sanctuary should be double to the ordinary weight, and that the shekel of the sanctuary should be worth as much again as that of the commonwealth, which was valued at fifteenpence—and all this to hint out unto us that God must have double weight in matters that appertain unto Him in the salvation of our souls: double care, double diligence—that is, twice as much care of our souls as of our bodies, begging oftener for spiritual than temporal things. Hence it is that there is in the Lord's Prayer but one petition for earthly things and two for heavenly, linked as it were together; but one for daily bread, and two for pardon of sins and graces to fight against them.

Exod. xxx. 13.

Rogers's Practical Catechism.

Menochius, de Rep.
Heb., lib. vii.,
cap. 11.

MDCCCLXXXIX.—The crown of perseverance.

ST. CHRYSOSTOM makes mention of the women of Corinth, who had a custom to set up lights or tapers, at the birth of every child, with proper names, and look what name the taper bore which lasted longest in the burning: they transferred that name to the child. But the Lord doth put up a perpetual burning lamp to be as a monument for all those that shall persevere in well doing to the end. It is not enough to begin in the spirit and end in the flesh; it is not for him that runneth, but for him that runneth so—that runneth to the end, that persevereth—that the crown is reserved; it is he that shall eat of the hidden manna, he that shall have the white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.

Homil. in 1 Cor. iv.

Price's Serm.,
Lond., 1617.

"Non pugnandi, sed vincendi corona."—
AUGUSTIN.
Rev. ii. 17

MDCCCXC.—How to discover our thoughts in preparation to prayer.

IN the Levitical law, things that crept upon all four, were forbidden, yet, if they had feet to leap withal, they were judged to be clean. Even so, howsoever some of our thoughts are taken up about the things of this world, our trades and business, yet, if we have legs to leap up with, that we can raise up our hearts to God and better things, when we come to pray and prostrate ourselves before Him, it is not to be condemned, they may pass for clean well enough; but if they always creep on the ground, if never raised higher than the earth, if no good thoughts of God, if no looking up to better things, then, without doubt, they are unclean—not legally unclean, as the beasts were, but really unclean, in the sight of God and His holy angels.

Lev. xl. 7.

Du Moulin, *de
l'Amour de Dieu*.

"Ibi maxime oportet observare peccatum ubi nasci solet. Vid. in cogitationibus," &c.—HERON., in
Ep. ad Demet.

MDCCCXCI.—Wherein the true knowledge of Christ consisteth.

MARY, when she went in quest of her Saviour, stopped not at the empty monument (sepulchre), but searches and follows Him so far, that she discovered Him under the disguise of a gardener, and then, casting herself at His feet, takes possession of Him with this acclamation, "Rabboni!" which is in effect as much as Thomas's congratulation, "My Lord and my God!" Thus it is that true knowledge doth not always hunt objects at the view, nor doth it stop at the numerous effects wrought by the Creator; it is not a shallow or superficial knowledge that God is, in a general consideration, the cause of all things, a Creator at large, but in a nearer, "My God, my Creator." So that religion and faith are but airy, empty sounds, if a man possess nothing of them beyond the words—the fruit of either consists in their application. It is true that Christ is the Saviour of the world—so much I know; but this is an useless truth to me if my knowledge reach no further; unless my faith entitle me to Him, and, by appropriating His work, be able to call Him "My Lord, my God, my Redeemer," &c.

King's Serm. at Court, 1626.

John xx. 28.

"Hæc tota est
scientia hominis, scire quod ipse nilul est per se, et quicquid ex Deo est, et propter
Deum est."—
AUG., in Pt. lxx.

MDCCCXCII.—*To beware how we come into the debt of sin.*Smith's Exer. Dev.

"Stultus est debitor qui gaudens pecunias accipit, et tempus quo reddere debeat non attendit."—
GREG., in Moral.

A WARY, discreet traveller, when he comes to his inn, calls for no more than he means to pay for; though he see a great deal of good cheer before him in the house, yet he considers how far his purse will reach: otherwise, if he call in for all he sees, and never take any thought of the reckoning, he shall not only run into a great deal of disgrace, but of danger also. So fareth it with most men, in taking up more than they are able to pay for. But let every good man, howsoever he sees a number of goodly things in this world, which may allure him and set his desire on fire, causing expense both of time and money, be careful how he comes into debt, especially the debt of sin, the worst of all other; for though, by death, he may be out of the usurer's hands, yet death cannot free him from the debts of sin, neither can he escape out of the hands of a just and all-knowing God.

MDCCCXCIII.—Infant-baptism asserted.

Polit., lib. viii.

King's Serm., at Court, 1626.
Mark x. 14.

"Si pro eo qui respondere potest, alius respondeat,
non tantum valet;
ex qua regula illud evangelii dictum est; ætatem habet ipse pro se loquatur."—AUG., de
Baptism.

ARISTOTLE was so precise in admitting scholars to his moral lectures, that he would first have them past their wardship, as thinking that their green capacities would not be mellow enough for his Ethics till thirty at least. But Christ, our Master, was of another mind: His "Sinite parvulos, &c. (Suffer little ones to come unto Me, and forbid them not)," encouraged parents and supervisors of children to enrol them in His bands, His Church, before they were masters of so much tongue as to name Christ, well knowing that, though their narrow apprehensions could not reach the high mysteries of faith, yet, in a few years, their understandings, being elevated with their statures, would grow up to them, and the accession of a little time digest those precepts which their infancy drew in into the constant habit of a good life, not bowing themselves into any crooked postures of error, nor forgetting that straight form into which their first education brought them.

MDCCCXCIV.—Grace to be communicated.

Novarin Tractat.
Theologic., tom. ii.

"Omne bonum sui diffusivum."

Matt. xxvi. 7.

If a man had a thousand tuns of wine stored up in a cellar, which he had no use of, but should be kept up close, what were any man the better for it? But if he would make a large cistern, and turn out a conduit cock into the street, that every one that passed might be refreshed, then would they commend his bounty, and be very thankful unto him. So, when it hath pleased God of His goodness to afford us the graces of His Holy Spirit, and we should keep them to ourselves, not being profitable to any in the communication of them, it would be matter of rebuke and reproach until we let the cock run, until we tell others what God hath done for our souls: for grace, like oil, is of a diffusive nature—like Mary's box of ointment which she brought unto Christ, that filled all the house with the sweet scent thereof; so that God smells the savour, and others receive good thereby.

MDCCCXCV.—To be patient under afflictions, because they will have an end.

Web., Com., in 2
Ep. Pet.

"Dabit Deus his quoque finem."—
VIRGIL.

As an apprentice holds out in hard labour and (it may be) bad usage for seven years together or more, and in all that time is serviceable to his master without any murmuring or repining, because he sees that the time wears away and that his bondage will not last always, but he shall be set at large and made a freeman in the conclusion: thus should every one that groaneth under the burthen of any cross or affliction whatsoever bridle his affections, possess his soul in patience, and cease from all murmuring and repining whatsoever, considering well with himself, that the rod of the wicked shall not always rest upon the lot of the righteous; that weeping may abide at evening, but joy cometh in the morning; and that troubles will have an end, and not continue for ever.

Ps. cxxxv. 3, and
xxx. 5.

MDCCCXCVI.—Every man to find out the impediments of repentance in himself.

THEY who have water running home in conduit-pipes to their houses, as soon as they find a want of that which their neighbours have in abundance, by-and-by they search into the causes, run to the conduit-head, or take up the pipes to see where they be stopped, or what is the defect, that so they may be supplied accordingly. Even so must every man do, when he finds that the grace of repentance flows into other men's hearts and hath no recourse or access into his soul: he must by-and-by sit down and search himself what the cause should be, where the remora (obstacle) is, that stays the course, where the rub lies which stoppeth the grace of repentance in him, seeing they that live (it may be) in the same house, sit at the same table, lie in the same bed, they can be penitent for their sins, sorry that they have offended God, and so complain in bitterness of soul for their sins; but he that had the same means, the same occasions, more sins to be humbled for, more time to repent, and more motives to draw him to the duty, is not yet moved with the same, nor any way affected with the sense of sin: this must needs be matter of high concernment to look about him.

Rogers's *Practical
Catechism.*

"In tribunal mentis tue ascende contra te, et reum te con-stituisti ante te,"
&c.—AUG., de Utilit. Agend. Penitent.

MDCCCXCVII.—Murmuring at God's doings; the prejudice thereof.

IT is reported of Cæsar, that, having prepared a great feast for his nobles and friends of all degrees, it so falling out that the day was extreme foul, that nothing could be done to the honour of the meeting with comfort, he was much displeased and so far enraged at present, that he willed all them that had bows to shoot up their arrows at Jupiter (then their chief god), as in defiance of him for that rainy weather, which, when they accordingly did, the arrows fell short of heaven, and full upon their own heads, so that many of them were very sorely wounded. Even so do our muttering and murmuring words, either for this or that which God sendeth: they hurt not Him at all, but return upon our own pates, and wound both deeply and dangerously.

Seneca.

"Discat non murmurare qui mala patitur," &c.—
ISTID., de Sum-
Bene, lib. iii.

MDCCCXCVIII.—Gospel-invitation to comfort.

A PARTY of the Syrian host, as they were foraging about, lighted upon a little Hebrew maid; they brought her to Naaman, their commander-in-chief; he bestows her upon his wife; the girl, perceiving that he was infected with leprosy, said unto her mistress, "Would to God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria; he would soon deliver him of his leprosy." Such is the voice of the Gospel to every unrepentant sinner: "O that you would come unto Christ, seek after Him by a lively faith and repentance for your sins; He would deliver you from the threatenings of the law, and release you of those impossible conditions which you are there bound unto. He hath conquered death and hell for your sakes, paid the ransom for your sins, and in the end, by His redemption, will bring you to life everlasting."

Scalabon., Moralia in Passionem Christi.

2 Kings v. 3.

Rom. i. 16.

2 Cor. iii. 2.

Col. i. 14.

MDCCCXCIX.—The moderate use of worldly things.

PLINY maketh mention of cranes, that, being about to fly over the seas, they take up stones in their feet and sand in their throat, to poise them against the wind, and as they

Nat. Hist., lib. xi.
cap. 23.

"Quanto felicior hic qui, nil cuperet quam qui totum sibi posceret orbem,"—
JUVENAL.

come near the land, by little and little cast them down; so lightening themselves, that the desired shore seeth the last stone not taken away, but let fall. Thus it is that good men use the world as if they used it not: they take up the cares of riches as a viaticum to serve them in this life; they know that enough is useful, too much a burthen; and therefore, as they come nearer and nearer to their desired rest, they more and more disburthen themselves, and cast off everything that hindereth in their way thither.

MDCCCC.—The work of the Law preceding the work of the Gospel.

De Trugillo,
Theaur. Con-
donat.

"Duleia non meruit qui non gustavit amara."

If a man have a corrupt and dangerous sore in his flesh—if he will be cured, or prevent the danger of a gangrene—he must prepare himself both for trouble, pain, and many other inconveniences: as, first, the lancing of it, then the cutting and squeezing out the filthy and corrupt matter, then corrosives to eat out the proud flesh, and, lastly (if need be), searing and cauterizing, before any healing plaster be applied. Even so, in the spiritual healing of our sins, the work of the Law must precede the work of the Gospel: first, that of the Law, to humble us; then that of the Gospel, to comfort us. Before there be any obtaining of pardon, any comfort in the hope of redemption, the Law must take us in hand—search our frailty, lance our sins, squeeze out the corruption of our natures, make us cry and roar again with the smart of our wounds. And then it is that the gentle cataplasms of the Gospel may be applied, and the comforts of remission ministered unto us from the Physician and Surgeon of our souls, Christ Jesus.

MDCCCCI.—Divisions in Church and state to be prevented.

Price's Sermon, at St.
James's, before
Prince Henry, 1608.

"Et scissa gaudens vadit discordia pallens."—VIRG.,
Æneid, viii.

TACITUS, in the life of Agricola, his father-in-law, describing the figure, form, fashion, complexion, chivalry, and resolution of the Britons in that time, observeth this also, that they were then drawn into petty partialities and factions; and the greatest help the Romans had adversus validissimas gentes, as he calls our warlike nation, was, that they had no common council, they did not consult together, but each city fought against their neighbours—"Et ita dum singuli pugnant, universi vincuntur" (Whilst one by one fighteth, all are subdued)"—they are his own words. And it is much to be feared that the Romans are again entering our land; they expect an advantageous success by our home-bred factions and divisions; so that the Pope may well be said never to have had hopes of a greater harvest in England: for how can it otherwise be? How shall the Church of Christ, the body of Christ, the household of faith, the kingdom of heaven upon earth, stand, if there be so many cizars and concisors, cutters and carvers of her members.

MDCCCCII.—Sorrow for sin must be in particulars.

Guadalupens,
Com. in Roseam.

"Nemo dicat occulte; poenitentiam ago apud
Deum, novit Deus qui me agnovit,"
&c.—AUG., de
Cura Mili.

PHYSICIANS meeting with diseased bodies, when they find a general distemperature (indisposition), they labour by all the art they can to draw the humour to another place, and then they break it, and bring out all the corruption that way;—all which is done for the better ease of the patient. Even so must all of us do when we have a general and confused sorrow for our sins: labour as much as may be to draw them into particulars, as to say, "In this and in this, at such and such a time, on such an occasion, and in such a place, I have sinned against my God;" for it is not enough for a man to be sorrowful in the general because he is a sinner, but he must draw himself out into particulars, in what manner and with what sins he hath displeased God; otherwise, dotus latet in generalibus (he may deceive his own soul).

MDCCCCIII.—Perseverance in goodness enjoined.

It is said of Hannibal, that, notwithstanding the rough rocks and craggy cliffs of the Alps, he proceeded onward in his design for Italy with this resolution, "Viam inveniam aut faciam (I will either find or make a way. That is the terminus ad quem, and thither I will go)." Thus it is that God, being Alpha and Omega, He will have His servants to run from α to ω , from the beginning to the end, in the constant possession of the faith. They that were marked to be preserved in Jerusalem were distinguished by the character π , which is the last of all the Hebrew letters, teaching them that they must run their race even to the last, that their profession must be sacramentum militare; or like to that in the covenant of marriage, "till death us do part;" with the spouse in the Canticles, not to leave their hold; with Mary Magdalene, to stand, wait, and stay at the sepulchre; and with the woman of Canaan, to cry and continue in crying. And why? Because that, as they have heaped sin upon sin, and drawn the threads thereof so big, so long, till they made them cords of vanity, and after wreathed those cords till they became cart-ropes of iniquity; so that now, being called unto sanctification (there being always in Christianity $\tau\acute{o}$ $\lambda\omicron\upsilon\pi\acute{o}\nu$, a further-more), they should increase more and more from faith to faith, from virtue to virtue, crying out with St. Paul, "Nondum apprehendi (I have not yet attained," &c.).

Sir W. Raleigh's
Hist. of the World.

Menech., Com. in Ezech. ix. 4.

Cant. iii. 4.

John xx. 11.

Matt. xv. 22.

Isa. v. 18.

"Perseverandum
est et assiduo studio robur addendum,"
&c.

Phil. iii. 12.

MDCCCCIV.—Sorrow for sin must be proportionable.

He that falleth into the midst of a deep river must labour and take more pains to get out than he that fell in but at the brink thereof: the one must swim hard for it, whereas the other, catching hold upon the bank or something else growing thereupon, more easily draweth himself out. Thus, if we fall into great sins, it will and must cost us more sorrow and tears than if we fell into lesser. Manasseh's sin was great, and his sorrow was proportionable; Peter's sin was great, and his sorrow was suitable. So must ours be: if our sins be many and great, our sorrow must be so much the greater; if but few and little, our sorrow may be the less, and we sooner attain the peace of conscience.

Marcel. de Pisc., Engyl. Theolog.

2 Chron. xxxiii. 12.

Matt. xxvi. 75.

MDCCCCV.—Non-proficiency in the ways of God and religion condemned.

SIR THOMAS MORE makes mention of a drowsy, devoted monk in his time, who, in his quotidian devotions, was wont to say, the first day, "Gloria Patri;" the second, "et Filio;" the third, "et Spiritui sancto;" and in the end it was "sicut in principio," doubling over his orisons: not much unlike to the ignorant countryman, that, yawning out his thoughts unto God, unbuttons his doublet with "Our Father, which art in heaven," and steps into his bed with "I believe in God the Father Almighty," never labouring to understand what the one or the other meaneth. This is to be like the sun in Joshua's time, that stood still; or rather the sun in Hezekiah's time, that went backward; or Fabia, in Quintilian, who, for thirty years together, would not confess that she was one year older. But God cannot abide such halting in His service, any such delaying in religion, any such loitering in profession, any such limits in Christian profession; He cannot but distaste any snail-like withdrawing, any piece-like recoiling, any hypocritical feigning, any wearisome fainting, any dial-like staying, any pool-like standing, any Ephraimite starting, any foolish virgin neglecting, or any drowsy apostle sleeping.

Price's Serm., ut
antea.

"Non progredi est
regredi."

MDCCCCVI.—To be patient at the time of death; and why so.

It is well known that when a gaoler knocks off a prisoner's bolts, fetters, and irons, that the constant wearing them hath put him to a great deal less pain than the knocking of them off doth at the present ; yet, though every blow go to the very heart of him, he never murmurs at it, but is quiet and well contented, because he knows that the pain will be compensated by the ease that he shall afterwards enjoy. Thus it is that all men here in this world lie fettered and gyved with the bolts and irons of mortality and sin, in which case it may be, when God comes to knock off those irons by death, that they feel more pain and extremity than before ; yet, because this brings to ease and everlasting rest, let them be patient in this the time of their dissolution.

Rogers's Practicel
Catechism.

“Mors ultima
pena est, nec metuenda viris.”—
LUCAN.
Rev. xiv. 13.
Isa. lvii. 2.

MDCCCCVII.—How it is that wicked men are said to be none of God's children.

As in nature, when children are neither in outward feature of the body nor inward quality of the mind like to their parents, who begat and brought them forth, we say that such children degenerate and grow out of kind ; neither can they be outwardly judged to belong to their parents, by reason of that great dissimilitude and unlikeness of manners : even so, when we see men in the world walking in by-paths of their own, and no way like to their heavenly Father in holiness and righteousness, no way resembling Him who hath begot them in Christ, in doing of good, we may (and that justly) say of such, that they degenerate and grow out of kind, that they do not patrizare (tread in their Father's steps), going about always doing of good, after the example of Jesus Christ their elder Brother.

Recks's Trism.,
Lond., 1624.

“Inde tu miraris si patrisset filius!”— PLAUT., in Pseud.
dili.

MDCCCCVIII.—Things unlawful not to be asked of God in prayer.

It is written of Vitellius, the emperor, that one of his friends, being denied a petition that was not reasonable, waxed angry and said unto him, “What avails me thy friendship, seeing I cannot obtain that which I crave ?” Whereunto the emperor replied, “And what is thy friendship to me, if for thee I must do that which is unlawful ?” Now, if such equity hath been found in man, what shall we think of our God ? With what face dare we seek that from God which is not lawful to be given ? Hence it is that many times we ask and get not, because we ask amiss and not for the right end ; whereas, did we ask in faith, we should be sure to have that thing which we desire or a better.

Nepos, in Vita Vitellii.

“Despicuntur orationes iaves, plenæ rerum corporali-um.” &c.—FROSP.
James iv. 2.

MDCCCCIX.—God alone more powerful than all the enemies of the world.

ANTIGONUS, king of Syria, being ready to give battle near the Isle of Andreos, sent out a squadron to watch the motions of his enemies and to descry their strength ; return was made that they had more ships, and better manned than he was. “How ?” says Antigonos ; “that cannot be ; quam multis meipsum opponis (for how many dost thou reckon me) ?” intimating that the dignity of a general weighed down many others, especially when poised with valour and experience. And where is valour, where is experience, to be found, if not in God ? He is the Lord of Hosts ; with Him alone is strength and power to deliver Israel out of all her troubles. He may do it, He can do it, He will do it ; He is wise in heart and mighty in strength ; besides Him there is no Saviour, no Deliverer ; He is a shield to the righteous, strength to the weak, a refuge to the oppressed ; He is instar omnium (all in all), and who is like unto Him in all the world ?

Ptolemaich, in Pelopid.

Stiles's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

John ix. 7.
Isa. xliii. 11.
Ps. v. 12, xxii. 12,
and xcix.

MDCCCCX.—Charity to be well ordered.

MOSES, being commanded of God to make a holy anointing oil, was to take a certain quantity of some principal spices, such as myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia, then to compound them after the art of the apothecary. And thus it is that the oil of our charity must be rightly ordered; every Christian almsgiver must be a kind of spiritual apothecary: first, his alms must be like myrrh, which distils from the tree without cutting or the least incision, so his charity to be free without the least compulsion; secondly, cinnamon, hot in taste and hot in operation, so his alms, neither stone-cold, as Nabal, nor lukewarm, as Laodicea, but hot—as it was said of Dorcas, that she was full of good works; thirdly, cassia, as sweet as the former, but growing low, the emblem of humility, so giving, but not vain-gloriously; lastly, calamus, an odoriferous powder, but of a fragile reed, so giving, but acknowledging his weakness, thinking it no way meritorious—for “periculosa domus eorum qui meritis sperant,” saith St. Bernard (“dangerous is the state of that house which thinks to win heaven by keeping house,” &c.).

Exod. xxx. 23.

Reeks' Serm.,
Lond., 1619.

“Charitas ad cuncta virtutum facia dilatatur,” &c.,— GREG., In Cura Pastoral.

MDCCCCXI.—Times of trouble and danger distinguishing true professors from false ones.

THE Samaritans, as long as the Jewish religion flourished and was in honour, caused a temple to be built on a high mountain, named Gerizim, that therein they might not be inferior to the Jews. They boasted themselves to be of the progeny of Joseph, and worshippers of God also with them; but when they perceived that the Jews were cruelly afflicted by Antiochus Epiphanes for the worshipping of God, then, fearing lest they should be also handled in like manner, they changed their coat and their note too, affirming that they were not Israelites, but Sidonians, and had built their temple not unto God, but Jupiter. Thus it is that times of trouble and danger easily distinguish the counterfeit and true professor. Trouble is a kind of Christian touch-stone, a lapis lydius, that will try what metal men are made of, whether they be gold or dross, whether they be real or carnal professors, sincere Christians, or rotten-hearted hypocrites.

Joseph., Hist., lib.
xiii.

Sigou., de Repub.
Héb.

“Ignis aurum probat; adversitas verum fortior,”—
LIPSE., in Ep.

MDCCCCXII.—The hardness of a rich man's conversion.

IT is observed amongst anglers, that pickerils are not easily nor often taken; a man may take a hundred pinks or minims before he catch a pickeril: for he preyeth so sore at his pleasure upon the lesser fry, that he seldom or never hath any stomach to bite at the bait. And so fareth it with the rich men of this world: their stomachs are so cloyed and surfeited with the things of this life, that when the doctrine of salvation is preached, they have no appetite unto it; tell them of selling all that they have and giving it to the poor, then, with the young man in the Gospel, they cry out, “Durus est hic sermo, &c. (This is a very hard saying; who can bear it)?” and it is as hard for such to enter into the kingdom of heaven, whilst the poor run away with the Gospel.

Holbrook's Serm.,
Lond., 1609.

“Argentum diviti-bus caro et sanguis est,”—EURIPID.

John vi. 60.

MDCCCCXIII.—A small plot of ground sufficient for the greatest landed man at the time of death.

SOCRATES carried Alcibiades, as he was bragging of his lands and great possessions, to a map of the whole world, and bade him demonstrate where his land lay; he could not by any means espy it, for Athens itself was but a small thing to the world, where his lands at that time were. Thus many there are that bear themselves very high upon their lands and Combe's Apophth.

Sophrast., lib. i.

"Recipit populus urna citatos."
SEN., Herc. Fur.
King's Fun. Sermon.

livings—so much in one place, so much in another, such a lordship in this shire, and such a manor in that; but St. Basil tells them truly where their land lies, and what may be said to be really theirs: "Nonne telluris tres tantum cubiti te expectant (So much measure of ground, to the length and breadth of their bodies, as may serve to bury them in, or so many handfuls of dust as their bodies go into after their consumption; that is terra sua, terra mea, and terra vestra—their land, and my land, and thy land)." And more than this no man can absolutely claim.

MDCCCCXIV.—Riches very dangerous in the getting of them.

Aloys Novarini Sicut, Expositio.

SUPPOSE a tree whose leaves and boughs were clogged and hung with honey, unto which a hungry man coming falls a-licking one bough and leaf after another until he is carried so high from one to another, through the greediness of his hunger, that he slips and slides and cannot stay himself, but down he comes and breaks a leg or an arm, and it is well if he escape with his life. So dangerous is it to climb up the tree of riches: for, most commonly, men lay hold so upon one hundred after another, one thousand after another, per fas et nefas (no matter how or which way they do it), though they endanger themselves sore, even to the loss of their precious and immortal souls to all eternity.

"Quocunque mo-do rem."

MDCCCCXV.—A great blessing of God to be gently used in the matter of conversion.

Fuller's *Cure of a
Wounded Conscience.*

In some corporations the sons of freemen, bred under their fathers in the same profession, may set up and exercise their father's trade without ever being bound apprentices thereunto; and whereas others endure seven years' hardship, at the least, before they can be free—they run over that time easily, and are incorporated by their father's copy: thus it is that they who never were notoriously profane, such whose parents have been citizens of the New Jerusalem and have been bred in the mystery of godliness, are oftentimes entered into religion and become children of grace without any spirit of bondage seizing upon them; and though otherwhiles they taste of legal frights and fears, yet God so preventeth them with His blessings of goodness, that they smart not so deeply as other men—a great benefit and rare blessing to that soul where God, in His goodness, is pleased to bestow it.

Gal. iv. 26.

Eph. ii. 19.

Ps. xxi. 3.

MDCCCCXVI.—Perfection of grace to be endeavoured.

Ezek. xlvii. 4.

Vinc. de la Nuza's Tract, Evangel.
Mark iv. 28.

"Nemo perfectus, qui perfectio esse non appetit."
BERNARD,
Phil. iii. 13.

Hugger's Serm.,
Lond., 1615.

Matt. v. 48.

As the waters spoken of in Ezekiel grew up by degrees—first to the ancles, then to the loins, and lastly to the head; or as that gradual wheat our Saviour spoke of—first there was the blade, then came the stalk, after that the full corn, but lastly came the harvest: even so, like that water, we must grow higher and higher till we come to our head, Christ Jesus; and like that corn ripen and ripen until the end of the world, when God shall come to winnow us. We must resolve, endeavour, contend, and strive for perfection, as for a prize, though there may be many hindrances, as worldly allurements, the devil's temptations, and our own sinful provocations, ever adding one grace unto another till we are in some sort secundum hujus vitæ modum (according to the capacity of our human nature) perfect men in Christ Jesus.

MDCCCCXVII.—The pain of a wounded conscience greatedened by the folly of the patient.

Fuller's Cure of a Wounded Conscience.

SHEEP are observed to fly without cause, scared (as some say) with the sound of their own feet; their feet knock (make a sharp noise) because they fly; and they, poor silly creatures, fly because their feet knock. An emblem of God's children under the pains of a wounded conscience, self-fearing; self-frighted; for as it is that the pain of a wounded conscience, amongst other reasons thereof assigned (as from the heaviness of the hand that makes the wound, an angry God; from the sharpness of the sword wherewith the wound is made, the Word of God; from the tenderness of the part itself which is wounded, the conscience), becomes intolerable, so, from the folly of the patients themselves, who, being stung, have not the wisdom to look up to the brazen serpent, but torment themselves with their own activity. Hear they but their own voice, they think it to be that which hath so often sworn, lied, talked vainly, wantonly, wickedly, their own voice being a terror to themselves; see they their own eyes in a glass, they presently apprehend these are they which shot forth so many envious, covetous, amorous glances, their own eyes being a terror to themselves; and, as it was threatened to Pashur, themselves become a terror to themselves.

"Sonus excitat omnis s. spensum."
—VIRGIL.
Jer. xx. 6.

MDCCCCXVIII.—No true content to be found in the things of this world.

THERE is an old apologue of a bird-catcher, who, having taken a nightingale, the poor bird pleaded for herself as well as she could, and seeing divers go to the pot before her, said, "Alas! I am not worth the killing; I have little or no flesh on my back, therefore you may well let me go!" "No," says the fowler, "one bird in hand is worth two in the bush." The bird replies that her notes were more worth than her corpse, and that she would chant him out three songs, for which he should fare the better all the days of his life, if he kept them, than if he killed her. The bargain was made and the bird let fly. The songs were these:—

Whaley's Serm.,
Lond., 1615.

1. "Strive not beyond thy strength."
2. "Grieve not too much for the loss of that which cannot be recovered."
3. "Believe not that which is incredible."

Now, whilst the wise bird-catcher was conning these lessons, the bird, flying over his head, told him that he had lost a great treasure, for she had within her head a precious stone as big as an ostrich-egg. At this news the birder began to ply the nightingale with fair words, and told her that if she would come again to his hand he would spare the meat out of his own belly to feed her. Then answered the bird, "Now I see thou art a fool indeed, that canst make no good use of my counsel—for, first, thou labourest for me, whom thou canst not reach; secondly, thou grievest for that which is irrecoverable; and, thirdly, thou believest that which no wise man will, that I have a pearl in my head as big as an ostrich-egg, whereas all my whole body is not so big." Thus, surely, there are many of these fowlers, or rather fools, in the world, such as dote in their reposals, setting up their rest in the things of this world where it is not to be found, and, in the meantime, neglect to seek where it is; for the world hath no more sufficiency to man's desire than the nightingale had the true pearl within her to give him content—all the advantages of outward things being to man's desire but as sharp sauce to the appetite, which doth not satisfy hunger, but provoke the stomach to hunger after more.

Contr. Zuingeri
Theat. Hum. Vitæ

"Fallax est hic
mundus, finis dur-bius, exitus horribilis." &c.—PET.
BLESENS.

MDCCCCXIX.—A good man tedious to bad company.

WHEN a hunted deer runs for safeguard amongst the rest of the herd, they will not admit him into their company, but beat him off with their horns, out of principles of self-preservation, for fear the hounds in pursuit of him fall on them also. In like manner, when a knot of bad good-fellows perceive one of their society become a new man, they will be shut (free) of him as soon as possibly they can, preferring his room and declining his company, lest his goodness prove infectious. He shall no longer be welcome in their society than he is able to sing his part in their jovial concert, do as they do, and then he is a boon-companion,

Fuller's *Cure of a
Wounded Conscience*.

"Loripes rectus de ridetis Æthiops album."—JUVE-NAL.

MDCCCCXX.—Pride, the vanity and sinfulness thereof.

Middleton's
Heavenly Progress.

"Omni vitio deterior est superbia," Ecc.—ISTID., de Sum.
Rosa, lib. iii.

It is well-known that rotten wood and glowworms make a glorious show in the night, and seem to be some excellent things; but when the day appears, they show what they are indeed—poor, despicable, and base creatures. Such is the vanity and sinfulness of all haughty, proud, high-minded persons, who, though now shining in the darkness of this world, through the greatness of their power, place, and height of their honour, when the Sun of Righteousness shall appear and manifest the secrets of all hearts, then they will be seen in their own proper colours, and appear to be but rotten stuff and stinking sepulchres; for to have nothing derogates nothing from the worth of true grace, but to have power without piety, greatness without goodness, is a scorn to him that confers it and a sin to him that receives it, but both shameful and sinful to him that waxeth proud by it.

MDCCCCXXI.—Greatness of the torture of a wounded conscience.

Fuller's *Cure of a
Wounded Conscience.*

"Nihil est miserius quara animus ho-minis læsus."— PLAUT.

Prov. xviii. 14.

As long as Adam did fast in Paradise, he stood fast, but having once eaten the forbidden fruit, he tarried a while there, but took no contentment therein: the sun did shine as bright, the rivers ran as clear as ever they did, birds sang as sweetly, beasts played as pleasantly, flowers smelt as fragrant, herbs grew as fresh, fruits flourished as fair—no punctilio of pleasure was either altered or abated; the objects were the same, but Adam's eyes were otherwise: his nakedness stood in his light—a thorn of guiltiness grew in his heart before any thistles sprang out of the ground, which made him not to seek for the fairest fruits to fill his hunger, but the biggest leaves to cover his nakedness. Such is the torture of a wounded conscience, that it is able to unparadise Paradise; and the burthen thereof so importable, that it is able to quail the courage and crush the shoulders of the hugest Hercules, of the mightiest man, upon the face of the earth. Who can bear it?

MDCCCCXXII.—The proud man's memento.

Combesil Apph-thegm. Imperat., 6th c.

Jahellicus, in Hist.

"Nihilum ne crede colori."—VIRG.,
Æ. 6g.

ALEXANDER, having compassed and conquered a great part of the world, came into an island of the Brachmans, a people that used no habit but beast skins, no houses but caves, no meat but such as nature produced; and demanding the reason of this their strange kind of life, they answered, "We know that we shall die—whether this day or to-morrow we know not—and, therefore, why should we take care for power to rule, honour to be esteemed, or riches to live in pleasure?" With which answer he was so affected, that he bade them ask what they would and he would give it them. They presently demanded not to die; to which he replying that he could not give that, for he himself must die—"Why, then," said they, "art thou so foolish to live in such pride, seeing thou knowest thou shalt die?" Thus, if rude, barbarous people, only by the meditation of death, could so easily condemn all the thoughts of power and honour, is it not more than time that such as profess themselves to be Christians, who, having so many noble restraints and retracts to beat down the pride of power and honour, should now cease to fall in love with their own shadows, not to dote upon greatness and popular applause, which will last no longer than the giver pleaseth, not to look big or be proud upon the access of any preferment whatsoever?

MDCCCCXXIII.—Patiently to wait God's time for deliverance.

Fuller's *Cure of a
Wounded Conscience.*

CONSIDERABLE are the causes why a broken leg is incurable in a horse and easily curable in a man: the horse is incapable of counsel to submit himself to the farrier, and, therefore, in case his leg be set, he flings, he flounces, and flies out, unjointing it again by his mis-employed mettle, counting all binding to be but shackles and fetters unto him; whereas a man willingly resigneth himself to be ordered by the surgeon, preferring rather to be a prisoner for some days than a cripple all his life. Thus, it were heartily to be wished that men would not be like the horse or mule, which have no understanding, but let patience have its perfect work in them, so that when they are, as it were, overwhelmed in a deluge of distress, finding no way to get out, they would tarry God's time, and though deliverance come not in an instant, yea, though to wait be irksome at the present, in due time they shall certainly receive comfort.

"Omnis avara et gravia patitur lucras."

Ps. xcxi. 6.

"Deus hic est prodest."—OVID.

MDCCCCXXIV.—Pride a main engine of the devil.

As when a city or a castle is besieged, amongst other stratagems and devices, men are used to undermine the foundation and blow it up with gunpowder, that being, as they think, the surest way to gain it: so the devil, laying his battery to the fort of man's soul, undermines it, and puts the gunpowder of pride into it, knowing that, as he himself was blown up, so will that precious fortress be easily scaled if that powder once take fire in it. And as those that fish with nets in standing rivers, where they pitch down their net, do blunder (move without direction) and trouble the water, that the fish may not see the net, and then with poles beat and dash the streams above, to drive the fish into the net: so Satan, setting the net of disobedience, mudds and troubles the heart of man by pride, and so beats him down the stream of his own affections till he have caught him in his deadly net of destruction.

Middleton's
Heavenly Progress.

"Superbia diaboli est instrumentum."
&c.—CASSIOD., in
Ps. xviii.

MDCCCCXXV.—Nature cannot work out peace of conscience.

THERE are a sort of foolish country people that think Nature will work out all distemperatures, and they need no physic; some of them are confuted by their graves, others, of more strength and healthier constitutions, possibly recover their former vigour; but their diseases make a truce only, not a peace, with their bodies: the latent cause remains and watcheth its advantage of the next heat or cold the body takes, or the next intemperate season that comes. And thus many deal with their souls, never regarding when their spirits are troubled to heal up the wound with the balm of Gilead, but go on in their worldly, natural way, and at last their troubled spirits are quiet again, so they get their peace, of course; but all this while the hidden cause of their trouble watcheth the next advantage, their souls fester within, and on a sudden they are ready to despair and to lay violent hands on themselves.

Collinge's Letters, v.

"Latet anguis in herba."

MDCCCCXXVI.—Men to set a high value upon their souls.

WHEN Praxiteles, a cunning painter, had promised unto Phryne one of the choicest pieces in his shop, she, not knowing which was the best, began to think upon some plot whereby to make him to discover his judgment which of them was the piece indeed, and suborned one of his servants to tell his master (being then in the market, selling his pictures) that his house was on fire and a great part of it burnt down to the ground. Praxiteles, hearing this, presently demanded of his servant if the "Satyr and Cupid" were safe, whereby Phryne, standing by, discovered which was the best picture in the shop. And shall a silly painter set so high an esteem upon a poor, base picture, the slubbered (imperfect) work of his own hands, and shall not we much more value the soul, that is of an immortal being, the most precious piece that ever God made, the perfect pattern and image of Himself. Let riches, honour, and all go, if nothing but this escape the fire, it is sufficient.

Plutarch, Moral,
lib. iv.

Pausanias, in Attic.

"Anima cura tuam ipsius in quantum potes."—ME-NANDER.

MDCCCCXXVII.—Peace of conscience not wrought out by merry company or drinking.

Collings's
Lenten, &c.

Matt. xxiii. 15.

2 Kings ix. 31.

SOME there are that, if they be in an ague or the like distemperature, will drink hot waters or good store of sack to prevent their cold fit and out-burn nature; but, alas! all the good that comes of it is only that they fall into a burning fever and, perhaps, consume their dust into ashes. So there are such profane wretches that, if their conscience alarms them, if their spirit troubles them, or if crosses multiply upon them, think there is no other way to wind out of the devil's fingers but by throwing themselves into his arms, making themselves twice more the children of the devil than they were before; they must needs to the tavern or to the ale-house, seek out some boon companions; drink away their sorrow; but had Zimri peace that slew his master? Damning a soul cannot, surely, be the way to save it.

MDCCCCXXVIII.—The vast difference betwixt pride and humility.

Rodius, Cont. in Ephet.

"Impar congressus Achilli."—VIRGIL.

Lam. iii. 29.

SPECTACLES that are of an ancient sight, if the young go about to use them, they show all things less than they are; but unto old men they present all things greater than they are. Such is the difference betwixt pride and humility, that pride is like the old man's spectacles, and makes things bigger than, indeed, they are; but humility, like the spectacles worn by young men, causeth every thing to seem less than it is. A proud man thinks no man better than himself, an humble man none worse: the one lifteth up himself on high, the other layeth his mouth in the dust.

MDCCCCXXIX.—Much learning to be found in a small compass of expressions.

Cuffe's Difference of Ages.

"Litra sementem facit et sententia messem."

THE learned Heraclite, no less elegant than enigmatical, amongst other his quaint speeches, hath this saying of special remembrance and observation: "That the greedy metal-mongers, in their too, too eager search for the world's wealth, after long toil and trouble, find parvum in magno (a little pure substance in a great deal of unprofitable earth)." But it fareth otherwise in the inquisition and pursuit after learning, for there a well-grounded scholar shall find, with a little abstractive speculation, magnum in parvo (much matter in few words); every short golden sentence and particle thereof containing incredible store of most pure substance; every short aphorism, every axiom, every maxim—nay, almost every contracted line—comprehending matter sufficient to fill whole volumes.

MDCCCCXXX.—The true nature of humility.

Bonavent., in Legenda S. Francis.

Marul., lib. ii.

"Recta facere, et inutilem se reputare, apud paucos inven-
tur."—BERN.

RUFFINUS, the companion of St. Francis, having a revelation that a crown of glory was laid up for that holy man, told him one day that it would very much rejoice him if he would let him understand what he thought of himself. To whom St. Francis gave this answer: "I esteem myself the greatest sinner of any in the world, and that I serve God less than any other man." "How can that be," said Ruffinus, "seeing some are thieves, some murderers, some adulterers, and many most profane and wicked wretches—such as are in the very gall of bitterness, such as never think of God or goodness—and thou art not only free from these, but withal a man of much sanctity and holiness?" But he, replying, said, "Out of doubt, if God had been so merciful to them as He hath been to me, they would have showed themselves more thankful than I have been; and, besides, if God had forsaken me, I should have committed far greater sins than they have done." Here was a good man, though a Papist—a rare pattern of humility—so far imitable as being a man arrived at a most excellent degree of self-denial coming from an inward and high knowledge of God and himself, so that all the virtues that he hath, and all the good works that he doth, though never so worthy and deserving, yet they seem unto himself little or none at all. And such is the nature of every man that is truly humble. He admires everything in another, whilst the same or better in himself he thinks not unworthily contemned; his eyes are full of his own wants and others' perfections. No man sets so low a value of his worth as himself; not out of ignorance or carelessness, but of a voluntary and meek dejectedness. Well may it be said of him that he is a lowly valley sweetly planted and well watered; the proud man's earth, whereon he trampleth, but secretly full of wealthy mines; more worth than he that walks over them; a rich stone set in lead; and, lastly, a true temple of God built with a low roof.

Hall's Character of Virtues and Vices.

MDCCCCXXXI.—Impossible to arrive at a full perfection of learning in this life.

It was well said of Sigismund, the emperor, to a doctor of law whom, for an excellent stratagem against the enemy, he had knighted not long before. When, at an assembly of peers and counsellors, the doctor doubted whether side he might with greater credit join unto, to his own of the togati or the other of the militia: "Is it doubtful," said the emperor, "whether learning or military experience is more honourable? I can in one day make a thousand good soldiers; but I am not able in a thousand years to make one tolerable doctor." Implying that the whole course of a man's life was not time sufficient to arrive at a full perfection of learning. We may read of them that have sailed about the world in three years, but as yet never heard of any who, in the whole course of their life, how laboriously soever passed over, were able to compass the whole circle of the liberal sciences. There was one called sometimes, in regard of the excellency of his parts, a walking library; another was said to dispute de omni scibili—mere hyperboles—for Socrates, on his death-bed, confessed he had many things to learn; nor shall any man after him come to the requisite perfection of learning.

Rerum German.
Script. Inogniti.

Sylvius, lib. iv.,
Com. in Reb. Gestis.

Aïfouli.
Drake.
Cavendish.

Aïstotle.
Abuelardus.

"Ars longa, vita brevis."

MDCCCCXXXII.—The excellency of humility.

It is storied of Homer, the prince of poets, that all the cities of Greece contended to have the honour of his nativity, every one affirming that he was born there, as thinking themselves sufficiently honoured if a man in philosophy so learned, in poesy so singular, should be born amongst them. Thus it may be said of humility: all the virtues—as temperance, fortitude, prudence, &c.—contend for the right of it, and think themselves much graced if they may get it but to be theirs, so excellent an ornament they account it—excellent indeed; so that a writer, defining other virtues, was so amazed at the consideration of it, that he was fain to call it "donum sine nomine"—in some sort like unto God, who wants a definition, and cannot be expressed what He is. The wisest of philosophers never knew or understood it, and therefore, amongst all the ancient Latins, it wanted a name; and amongst the Greeks they could not express it as we do, but called it ταπεινωσις (the abjection or lowliness of the mind).

Pet. Crinitus, de
Poet. Græc.

"O sancta venerabilisque humi-litas."—AUG.

Middleton's
David's Key.

MDCCCCXXXIII.—Christ voluntarily engaging Himself to take away the sins of the world.

Look but upon a poor man, that lying under an arrest for debt more than he is any way able to compass by way of satisfaction, so that there is no way but one—either pay or

Alphons. ab Avendano, Com. in
Matt. ix.

to prison—what though his friends be never so rich, never so potent, the creditor cannot charge one farthing of the debt upon them; there is no justice for it; but if this poor man hath some able friend that will so far undertake for him that the debt shall be paid at a certain time and place appointed, the prisoner is released, the engagement is entered in the creditor's book, and from that day forth he looks upon the surety, not so much as once minding the poor debtor at all. Thus it is that a writ of vengeance was issued out of the court of heaven; mankind was ready to be arrested and thrown into an everlasting prison, from whence he should never have been released till he had paid the utmost farthing, which he was never able to do with all the friends and means that he could make; yet such was the happiness, that Jesus Christ, seeing some of His elected friends that His Father had given Him having their names in the writ, steps in and says, "Father, these are My friends; surely they are My people, children that will not lie (so He was their Saviour); I will pay the debt; charge it upon my account; it shall be paid in the fullness of time." The Father accepts the tender, desires no better security than that of His beloved Son, in whom He is well pleased.

Col. ii. 14.

Isa. lxiii. 8.

Gal. iv. 4.

Matt. xiii. 17.

Mark i. 11.

MDCCCCXXXIV.—The virtue of humility.

Vincent, Speculum Morale.

"O medicinam omnibus consulen-tem, omnia tumen-tia comprimētem," &c.—AUG.,
de Verb. Dom.

As the amethyst is said to repress drunkenness and breed sobriety, the jasper to expel dreams, the sapphire to heal tumours and swellings, the onyx to make men valiant: thus it is that, as several stones and minerals have proper and peculiar virtues in themselves, the grace of humility is that panacea—that catholicon of the soul—that cures all diseases whatsoever: it beats down the drunken fumes of windy conceits, puts away the earnestness of desire after transitory things, which are nothing else, indeed, but dreams and shadows; it cures the risings of heat and passion, and makes a man valiant to fight against those three arch enemies of mankind—the world, the flesh, and the devil.

MDCCCCXXXV.—God only able to work man to will and to do.

Collings's
Lessons, &c.

A GREAT emperor buyeth a woman that is a slave, whom he intends to marry, and will so do whether she will or no; yet he will woo her, and, if possible, marry her will as well as her person; yet, whether she will or no, he will and may marry her, for she is purchase: she is his wife in his determination before he hath married her. This is a simile that, at the first view, may seem to hold out much of God's ability in the working of man to will and do, yet, being put into the balance, will be found light; for, though this emperor hath power to force the woman's body to the action, yet he hath no power to force her will to be willing to the action. The will is always independent, sui juris, but God hath power not only to marry the soul, which He hath bought from being a slave to the devil, but to make it ready and willing to marry Him.

MDCCCCXXXVI.—Pride in riches, honours, preferments, &c.; the vanity thereof.

Scalaboril Moralis in Patimam Christi.

*Disting. honores,
&c., quibus exhibiti, in eorum commodum ruinar. — GREG.,
Moral. vii.

A BLADDER being puffed up with a little wind, if but two or three beans or peas be put into it, they make a mighty sound and rattling, insomuch that a good-mettled horse, which not otherwise afraid to enter the troops of ten thousand armed men, will be so scared with the strangeness of the noise, that the rider shall be scarce able to sit him; yet, if this bladder be but pricked with a pin, it comes instantly to nought. A true resemblance of such whom God enricheth with His blessings, casting into their bosoms some beans and peas of extraordinary gifts and graces of authority, honour, wisdom, and the like, with which they make such a rattling that even valiant hearts are daunted with the sound thereof, and they themselves, drawing in the wind of popular applause, begin to swell as big as any bladder with presumption of their own merits; but if their prince's displeasure do but breathe on them, or some fever or distemper seize upon them, this great wind is abated, their souls are galled with impatience, and they sing their part with those wretched ones, "What hath pride profited us, or what hath the pomp of riches brought us?"

Wisd. v. 2.

MDCCCCXXXVII.—Security the cause of all calamity.

It was well observed, that it was necessary for Rome that Cato should be born as well as Scipio; the reason was, "Alter cum hostibus, alter cum vitiis bellum gessit (The one kept war with their enemies, the other with their vices; so that, being alarmed on both sides, they were ever in a posture of defence)." Thus it is that, what with the sword of the Spirit drawn against the exorbitance of the time, and that of the militia to defend the frontiers, the people rouse up themselves and become vigorous, well considering that no man is sooner overthrown than he that feareth nothing; and most usually it so falleth out that security is the main cause of all calamity.

Seneca, in Ep.
Vel Pat. Hist.
Rom.

"Nemo securus esse debet in vita ista,"—AUG.

MDCCCCXXXVIII.—Riches, honours, &c.; the different use that is made of them.

It is said of the seeds of henbane, that they kill all birds saving sparrows, and to them they are nourishing food. The reason given is this: their veins are so narrow that the fumes thereof cannot pass to the heart and surprise it so soon as it doth other creatures. Such is the condition, property, quality, and use of riches, honours, preferments, or any other outward thing whatsoever: they do nothing at all to hurt the godly, such as know how to make a right use of them; but to the wicked, such as know no other heaven upon earth but the bare enjoyment of them, they are but as so many snares and temptations to entrap them—so that what is one man's meat becomes the other's poison. And why so? Because the godly have certain private veins of knowledge and goodness whereby that deadly fume of henbane—the love of the world—cannot pass to the heart. Let honours mount ever so high, riches increase ever so much, they look above them, they set not their heart upon them, but take up that of the wise man, "Omnia bonis in bonum (All things to the good are turned to good)."

Artemidorus, de Medicina, Cereali-alibus.

Holdsworth's
Serm., 1632.

Wisd. iii. 9.

MDCCCCXXXIX.—The sovereign virtue of humility.

PHYSICIANS and naturalists do say that there is nothing of the mulberry-tree but is medicinal and useful in some sort or other—the fruit, the root, the bark, the leaf and all. Such is the sovereign virtue of humility, that every part of it, as well the root of affections and the bark of conversation as the leaves of words and the fruit of works, heals some diseases or other of the drooping, sin-sick soul. Hence is it that the great Physician of our souls (as if they could never be at rest or quiet otherwise) prescribes us this recipe against all spiritual qualms and agonies, "Learn of Me, that I am lowly and meek, and you shall find rest to your souls."

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. xvi., cap. 26.
Isidor, Dioscorides

Matt. xl. 19

MDCCCCXL.—The love of riches very dangerous.

A TREE, when it is half cut through, deceives the elephant when he leans unto it. Mandragora, if duly taken, is good physic, but if immoderately, it casts into a dead sleep, congeals the spirits, and deadens the natural faculty. And as one said of parliaments in England, that they are very good purges to evacuate the ill humours of the body politic, but Plinius, in Hist.

Nat.

Sir Francis Bacon.

Middleton's
Heavenly Progress,

very bad diet drink to live upon—weakening the vigorous spirits thereof and making it liable to much inconvenience—such is the immoderate love of riches and the things of this life: they deceive all that lean unto them, there is no safety in living upon them, no rest in the acquiring of them. They cast their favourites and all such as dote upon them into strange dreams, their reason and understanding being stupefied, their devotion and goodness congealed, and, in fine, their bodies and souls in great jeopardy to be everlastingly damned.

MCCCCXLI.—Worldly honours and greatness; their vanity to be considered.

Wolfgang. Lazius,
de Rebus Rom.

"Disce in hoc mundo suprà mundum esse,"
&c.—AMBROS., in
Lib. de Virg.

Staughton's Serm.,
Lond., 1635.

THE Romans, to express the vanity of worldly honour and greatness, painted Honour, in the temple of Apollo, as representing the form of a man, with a rose in his right hand, a lily in his left, above him a solsequy or marigold, and under him wormwood, with this inscription, "Levate (Consider),"—by all this declaring that man in this world flourisheth as a rose in delights and riches, but at night—that is, in the time of death or adversity—he is dried up, rejected, and set at nought as a dried rose, which all the day long is carried in the hand with contentment, but, being once withered, is cast away on the dunghill; the lily, excelling Solomon in its glorious clothing, but, the leaves falling, it becomes sordid, aptly denoting the favour of man whilst in worldly honour, but, once clouded by misfortune, made of no account; the marigold, opening and shutting with the sun, showing that when the sun of prosperity shines he sees all things delectable, but, the sun setting, death or adversity approaching, then appears nothing but darkness and horror of the grave; the wormwood signifying that all the delights in this world are sweet in the execution, but bitter in the retribution—no better than a bitter potion and the very gall of dragons; lastly, the word "Levate" is very necessary: lift up your heads and consider, ye that are proud of your honours and greatness, ye are but roses that will wither, lilies that will lose their beauty, marigolds that open and shut with the sun, and your portion, without repentance, will be but wormwood and bitterness.

MDCCCCXLII.—The heart of a worldly-minded man never satisfied.

Phil. Nepos, in Vita Plutarch.

Hugo, de Anima,
lib. i.

Leech's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

ALEXANDER, on a time, having many philosophers with him at a banquet, would needs have it put to the question, what was the greatest thing in the world. Some of them said the hill Olympus, some the sun, some the earth, some one thing and some another; but one of them said that surely the heart of man must needs be the greatest, because that in a moment it passed through the whole world—heaven, earth, sea and all. And such is the heart of every worldly-minded man, though, in the substance of it, such a bit as will hardly give a kite a breakfast, yet of that extent as to the desires thereof, totus non sufficit orbit (the whole world is not able to satisfy it). If an earthly-minded man should gain unto himself the whole world, and, being placed in the middle of it, so that, if possible, he might at once view his purchase, he would, Alexander-like, ask whether there were any more worlds, any more land, any more wealth, that he might grasp that into his hands also.

MDCCCCXLIII.—Pride in apparel condemned.

Sir John Heyward,
*Three Norman
Kings*,

Adams's Serm., 1635.

OUR chronicles record it of William Rufus, one of the three Norman kings, who, in his time, was held for one sumptuous in his apparel, that when his chamberlain had brought him a pair of new breeches to put on, and he demanding what they cost, it was answered eight shillings. The king, being offended, bade him begone like a beggar, and bring him a pair of a mark price. Now, it is much to be feared that histories for the time to come shall have little or no cause at all to commend our sober moderation in this kind, but rather complain of the most intolerable and damned (hateful) excess that ever reigned amongst Christians—such being the vanity thereof, that sexes can hardly be distinguished; and when one sees men and women in their bravery, they may safely conclude many of them to be in the midst of their wealth, the basest of them wearing more in gold and silver lace, or a set of points, than would in times past have bought one of our ancient kings a suit of apparel.

“Impudicus quisque ut videatur magnificus, entagiti vestiri pretiosioribus.” &c.—JUSTIN.

MDCCCCXLIV.—Careless, worldly hearers of God's Word to be reproved.

It is said by the naturalists—how true, let them look to it—that a vessel being made of the ivy-tree, if water and wine be poured into it together, the wine will leak out and leave the water behind it. Such are all careless, worldly hearers of God's Word: they hold a true resemblance with this wood for receiving into them the wine of Gospel dispensations, which should inebriate them with the love of God and goodness, and also taking in the water of worldly apprehensions; they leave out all the wine, forget all the good, so that nothing remains behind but the puddled water of vanity, pride, ambition, luxury, and such other pests of the soul, which, without the mercy of God upon true repentance, will endanger it to all eternity.

Plin., Hist. Nat., lib. xvi., cap. 35. Ben. Victor., Em. pyrica.

MDCCCCXLV.—Pride and ambition; the folly thereof.

It is reported of a certain philosopher, who, dying, demised a great sum of money to him that should be found most foolish, and left another philosopher his executor. It fell out so, that travelling many countries to find out a man exceeding all others in folly, that he came to Rome, where a consul, abusing his place, was adjudged to death, and another immediately chosen, who joyfully took it upon him; to this man the philosopher delivered the sum of money, telling him that he was the most foolish man in the world, who, seeing the miserable end of his predecessor, yet was nothing daunted therewith, but joyfully took upon him the succession of his office. Oh, how foolish, then, are most men of this world, that live and see the miserable wreck that pride and ambition have made everywhere!—in heaven, in paradise, and through the whole world and every part thereof (especially that of the court of great ones, where but few prosper, and those that prosper perish), yet dare adventure with joy and contentment to hoist out their sails, and run themselves upon such dangerous rocks—ruin and destruction.

Greg. de la Nuza, Tract. Evang.

Conr. Zuingerus, in Theat. Hum. Vita, lib. xvi.

Shute's Serm., Lond., 1638.

“Aulæ culmen lubricum.”

MDCCCCXLVI.—Men, by nature, looking more after their bodies than their souls.

SOCRATES, one day meeting Xenophon, the son of Coryllus, in a certain angioport or haven-street, and seeing him a youth of great hopes, stayed him with his staff and asked him this question, where was the place where several merchandises and commodities were to be sold; to whom Xenophon readily replied, in such a place he might be furnished with all sorts. Then Socrates demanded of him another question, where was the place where men were to be made good: to this his answer was, that he could not tell. “Then,” saith Socrates to him, “follow me, that thou mayest learn it.” And so, from that time, he began to be Socrates's scholar. Now, as it was with Xenophon at that time, so it is now with most part of Christians: they know readily and are very well versed in all the ways of worldly trade and commerce, as having special care to be ignorant of nothing that belongs to profit or pleasure; but if the demand be made concerning the pearl of price, the rich merchandise of the soul, the graces of God's Holy Spirit, and where and how one may purchase them, they answer with Xenophon, they cannot tell. And why? Because they never made it their work to inquire after things of that nature.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

Stiles's Serm., Lond., 1639.

MDCCCCXLVII.—Magistrates, ministers, &c.; *their rule to walk by.*Joh. Apostol., Paravie.De Trugillo, Thesaur. Concional.

THE seamen have a proverb, or rather a riddle, "Mare ab imbecillibus victum, fortiora vincit" (That the sea is overcome of things weak, but the strongest are overcome of the sea)," which is thus to be understood: that those sabulous (sandy), dirty, and fenny places about the sea are, by aggregation and access of mire, sand, and other things falling into them, continually enlarged, and so the sea about such places is contracted, restrained, and, as it were, overcome; but the rocky, strong, and hard places are by the sea strongly assaulted, and by little and little so battered and eaten out, that it gets much ground there, and overcomes that stony-hearted opposition. A good rule for magistrates, ministers, and men in power to walk by, to be gentle and loving, and of a yielding disposition to the humble, virtuous, and religious persons, and suffer such to be overcome by them; but to the stubborn, stiff-necked, and proud, rebellious spirits to extend the waves and billows of their justice and power to break down their oppositions, and bring under their aspiring thoughts; but with this proviso, that their sins may be hated, not their persons, and that to be done, too, not with a desire of revenge, but of healing and curing their infirmities.

MDCCCCXLVIII.—Graces of the Spirit to be made the soul's furniture.

Neyes, in Flm.

De Mediavilla,
Progressus Celestis.

ALEXANDER having conquered Darius, there was a box brought unto him from the king's cabin, curiously wrought with gold and pearl; and asking of them (who were not ignorant of the Persians' profusedness and vanity) what use there was of so precious a vessel, it was answered, that the king used therein to keep his ointments, which, as soon as he understood, he gave order forthwith that it should be the keeper of a more precious jewel, meaning the Iliads of Homer, and he no more called μυρο-θήκιον, but Ὁμηρο-θήκιον (not the box of ointments, but the box of Homer). Now, how much rather should every Christian make his most precious soul (which hath for a long time been no better than a cage full of unclean birds, the keeper of vice and all kinds of vanity) a temple fit for the Holy Ghost to dwell in, a vessel and preserver of the graces of God's Holy Spirit!

MDCCCCXLIX.—Discretion, *the guide of all religious actions.*Cassian., Collat. I., cap. 2.Bern., Serm. in Cant. xlix."Discretio virtutibus modum imponit, sine qua," &c.—
PET. RAVIS, in Serm.

Gortan., in Rom. xii.

Augustin., Hæret.,
viii.

THERE is a story how divers ancient fathers came to St. Anthony, inquiring of him what virtue did by a direct line lead to perfection, that so a man might shun the snares of Satan. He bade every one of them speak his opinion: one said, "Watching and sobriety;" another said, "Fasting and discipline;" a third said, "Humble prayer;" a fourth said, "Poverty and obedience;" and another, "Piety and works of mercy:" but when every one had spoken his mind, his answer was, that all these were excellent graces indeed, but discretion was the chief of them all. And so, without all doubt, it is, being the very auriga virtutum (the guide of all virtuous and religious actions), the moderator and orderer of all the affections; for whatsoever is done with it, is virtue; and what without it, is vice. An ounce of discretion is said to be worth a pound of learning; as zeal without knowledge is blind, so knowledge without discretion is lame: like a sword in a madman's hand, able to do much, apt to do nothing. "Tolle hanc et virtus vitium erit (He that will fast must fast with discretion; he must so mortify that he do not kill his flesh)." He that gives alms to the poor must do it with discretion, "omni petenti, non omnia petenti (to every one that doth ask, but not everything that he doth ask);" so likewise pray with discretion, observing place and time—place, lest he be reputed a hypocrite; time, lest he be accounted a heretic. And thus it is that discretion is to be made the guide of all religious performances.

MDCCCCL.—Humility exalted.

THE naturalists do observe that the Egyptian fig-tree, being put into the water, presently sinks to the bottom ; but, being well soaked with moisture, contrary to the nature of all other wood, buoys itself up to the top of the water. So we may say of humble-minded men : they keep the lowest place and degree in everything ; but when, in such places, they are soaked with the waters of grace and devotion, with the waters of tears and compunction of heart, with the waters of pity and compassion of other men's miseries, then do they (after death especially) swim up to that incomparable height of glory which God hath assured to the poor in spirit.

Plin., Hist. Nat.,
lib. xiii., cap. 7.
Theophrastus.
Dioscorides.

Job xxii.

MDCCCCLI.—No worldly thing must hinder the service of God.

It was a good saying out of a wicked man's mouth, when Balak put hard upon Balaam to curse the people of God—"No," says he, "I cannot do it. If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold I cannot do it—I cannot go beyond the commandment of God to do either good or bad of my own mind ; but what the Lord saith that will I speak." And thus it is that, when a man is put upon any sinful design, such as shall not be agreeable to the Word of God nor suit with the dictates of his own conscience, let him desist with that resolution of Joseph, "How can I do this great wickedness and so sin against God?" Avoid Satan, away with riches, honours, preferments, &c., if they once appear to disengage me from the service of my God. If not only a house full of gold and silver, but all the kingdoms of the world, were to be at my dispose, I would forego them all, forsake them all, that I might stick close unto the service of so good a master as God is.

Venning's Sermon,
Lond., 1654.

Numb. xxiv 13.

MDCCCCLII.—Every man is to make himself sure of heaven and heavenly things.

It is related of a man, that being upon the point of drowning in a great river, he looked up and saw the rainbow in the clouds, and considering that God had set it there as a sign of His covenant, never more to drown the world by water, makes this sad conclusion to himself : "But what if He save the whole world from a deluge of waters and suffer me to be drowned here in this river, I shall be never the better for that. When I am once gone, all the world is gone with me." Thus it is in the matter of heaven and heavenly things as in the point of calling and election, whereas it is said that many are called but few chosen ; so that if a man cannot make out unto himself that he is none of the many so-called and one of the few that shall be certainly saved, he must needs be but in a sad condition. What is the blood of Christ, though in itself sufficient to save ten thousand worlds, if it be not efficient in the application thereof unto his soul ? He shall be never the better for it. What if the Gospel come to him in word only and not in power, not in the Holy Ghost and full assurance ? It would do him little good. What are promises, if he be not heir of them ? What are mercies, if he be no sharer in them ? What is heaven, if he have no evidence for it ? And what is Christ (though all in all in Himself, yet nothing—nay, the further occasion of damnation to him), if He be not in him ?

Alard, Aemstel, Redami Select,
Similitud.

Matt. xx, 16.

John iii. 19.

MDCCCCLIII.—The deaths of faithful magistrates, ministers, &c., to be lamented.

It is reported in the life of St. Ambrose, that when he heard of the death of any holy minister of Christ, he would weep bitterly. The like may be read of Philo, the learned Jew, that when he came to any town or village and heard of the death of any good man

In Vita, per Paulum.

Lib. de Vita Moris.

Calanby's Preface to Abi's Sermon, 1654.

there dwelling, he would mourn exceedingly, because of the great loss that that place and the whole Church of Christ had received thereby. How much more cause have we, then, of this nation to lament our sad condition, who have in a few years lost so many reverend, learned, and godly ministers, magistrates, and others. Needs must we languish when the breath of our nostrils is expired; needs must the Church be in a tottering state when her props and supporters are taken away; and such a one is every good magistrate in his place, every painful preacher in his parochial charge, every child of God in the precinct where He dwells. And if the taking away of any of these be not matter of sorrow, I know not what is.

MDCCCCLIV.—Antinomian madness.

Apolodor., de Origine Deorum,
lib. iii.

It is said of Lycurgus, that being cast into a frenzy by Dionysius, in that distemper thinking to have cut down a vine, with the same hatchet slew his own son. So the antinomist, being possessed with a spiritual frenzy, which he calls zeal, when he lifts up his hatchet to cut off some errors, which like luxuriant branches have sprung up about the law, cuts down at unawares the very law itself, both root and branch, making the observation of it arbitrary in respect of salvation, or, as a parenthesis in a sentence, where the sense may be perfect without it; for under colour of advancing God's free grace in man's salvation and affecting Christian liberty, they abrogate the whole moral law, as if it were worthy of no better entertainment among Christians than Jehoiakim gave to Jeremiah's prophecies, when he cut the roll in pieces and threw it into the fire to be consumed.

In the Preface to Winton on Com-mandt.

Jer. xxvi. 23.

MDCCCCLV.—The devil's policy to root out learning.

Sozomen, lib. v.,
cap. 5.

Theodoret, lib. iii.,
cap. 7.

Waterhouse's
Apology for Learning.

It is said of Julian the Apostate, that he might the better root out the name of Christianity, he did disgrace the orthodox bishops, cast an odium upon the honour and office of priesthood, make away Church maintenance and Church privileges, forbade Christian schools and places of learning for instruction of their youth, permitted not the Christians to meet together, not to have any benefit of law, any share in government, or any degree of dignity, and all this, that he might the better advance his own wicked designs. Thus the devil, by such and the like artifices, projecteth the dishonours of learning and learned men, that so, in the dark of ignorance and decay of arts, he may form and complete the model of his own diabolical kingdom, that, having put out the eye of good instruction, he may seduce the poor silly people as captives at his will.

MDCCCCLVI.—The excellency of a good name.

Epist. cxxxv., ad
Julianum.

Prov. xxii. 1.

Phil. 18.

Eccles. vii. 1.

Westfield's Sermon,
Lond., 1541.

Cant. i. 3.

THERE is mention made by St. Basil (τέχνη τις περιστερῶν θηρευτικῇ) of a certain art of drawing of pigeons to their dove-houses in those countries, by anointing the wings of one of them with a sweet ointment, and it being sent abroad doth, by the fragrantcy of that ointment (as it were decoy), invite and allure others to that house where itself is a domestic. Thus, as a good name is bonum utile, a second patrimony, and bonum honestum, one of the requisites that makes up a complete Christian, so it is bonum jucundum, better than a precious ointment, than an ointment poured forth, drawing all good men after the savour thereof, so that a preacher well-reported of shall not want hearers, a physician of good report shall not want patients, the lawyer that hath a good report shall not want clients, nor the schoolmaster, scholars; nor the tradesman, customers; nor the poor man, friends—such is the attractive faculty of a good name.

MDCCCCLVII.—Wicked children a great grief to their parents.

ST. AUGUSTINE reports of his mother Monica, that as often as her children did sin against God, so often she did, as it were, travail in birth of them again; every evil report she heard did, as it were, cause a new throe; nay, it is verily thought the pains and pangs of childbirth are not so tedious to the mother as those after-pains that are caused by the lewd conversation of their ungracious children; for those pains, though they be sharp, they are soon over, and there is some comfort in the midst of them, that a child is coming into the world. But when a good Eunice, a careful mother, shall do her best endeavour to train up her children in the fear of God, acquainting them with the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make them wise to salvation, and yet at last shall find all her labour lost, her hopes frustrate, her children carried away with lewd and vicious company into all manner of loose conversation, this must needs bring her gray head with sorrow to the grave.

In Lib. Confess.

2 Tim. i. v.

"Curas parium liberi magnum malum si quid humanitas eis acciderat," MDCCCCLVIII.—God's omniscience.

PLERIUS, in his Hieroglyphics, wittily resembles God by the picture of an eye standing upon the top of a staff—the staff being an emblem of His power and sceptre, wherewith He governs, and the eye as an express of His all-searching knowledge, whereby He dives and pierceth into the secrets of all hearts. Thus it is that no man can entertain a sinful thought, though slumbering upon his bed, nor effect a wicked purpose, though bolted in his lodging, when the windows are closed and the curtains drawn, but ad luna lumina visus erit (the eye of heaven sees it), knows it, and writes it down in the book of accounts—yea, and at the last day will summon and warn that soul to a reckoning for it.

Cyrillo et Eucherio, lib. xxxiii.

"Totus oculus est Deus," &c.

Virgil, Eclog. vi.

MDCCCCLIX.—The lawful use of human learning in sermons.

QUEEN ELIZABETH, of ever-blessed memory, having heard Dr. Thomas Dove, bishop of Peterborough, preach before her at her manor of Richmond (he being a most eloquent and facetious scholar), said that she thought verily the Holy Ghost was descended again in this Dove. And surely, whatsoever others may think of human learning, as rhetorical figures and tropes, and other artificial ornaments of speech, taken from profane authors, to be but paintings, fitter for wanton strumpets than habits for chaste matrons, more becoming the stage than the pulpit, yet let such know that Judith did attire her head as well as Jezebel, and that, seeing now the extraordinary gifts of tongues and miracles are ceased, and that knowledge is not infusa, but acquisita, eloquence may serve as a handmaid, and tropes and figures as jewels and ornaments to adorn the chaste matron Divinity.

Sir John Harrington, View of the Church of England.

"Scientia naturalis theologie ancilla," —THO., p. i., q. i.

MDCCCCLX.—God the only Searcher of the secrets of the heart.

ARAM, king of Syria, by the advice of his council, secretly layeth an ambuscade for the host of Israel, but God revealed the whole plot to Elisha the Prophet, and he to the king of Israel, whereby they all escaped—there being not a word spoken in their enemy's bed-chamber, not a thought or intimation of a thought, but God discloseth it for their good. And thus, though the heart of man be seated in a darksome closet, walled round about with flesh, swaddled up and covered with the richest hangings of Nature's wardrobe, so charily attended, so shrouded with veils, that, though he bear it in his bosom, feed it with his own goods, study to delight and please it though it be his own, yet if he would give a world for the sight of it, he could not have it. Yet, neither is the heart so close imprisoned but God

2 Kings vi.

Sutton's Second Summons for England.

1 Kings vii. 39.

1 Chron. xxviii. 9.
Ps. cxxxix.
Heb. iv. 13.

beholds it, nor a thought so privily conceived but He descries it, nor a spark of lust so softly blown and kindled but He discerns it, nor the smallest seed of ungodliness so warily covered but He reveals it.

MDCCCCLXI.—The devil's cunning to deceive.

Erasm. Adagia.

Aristoph., in Equit.

1 Sam. xxviii. 14.

Gen. iii.

It was anciently said of Eucrates (a crafty companion, that would do anything for advantage), "Vias novit quibus effugiat Eucrates (Eucrates has more tricks than one; there's no trap will easily catch him)."¹ So may we say of that subtle serpent, the devil (whose agent every godless man is), that mille habet nocendi artes (he hath a thousand ways to deceive): he can either fingere personam, as when he appeared in Samuel's mantle; or sumere personam, when he gave that fatal rout to all mankind; so it may make for his hellish improvement, he can transform himself into any shape whatsoever—nay, he knoweth how to be an angel of light, to deceive (if it were possible) the very elect.

MDCCCCLXII.—Men seeking after high preferment not fit to be entertained therein.

Plutarch, Apophthegm.

"Nec abnuendum, si dat imperium
Deus; nec appeten-dum."—SEN., in Thyeste.

Luke xiv. 10.

SCIPIO, being made general of the Roman army, was to name as his questor, or treasurer for the wars, whom he thought fit, it being a place in those days, as it is now in these, of great importance. One that looked upon himself to have a special interest in Scipio's favour becomes an earnest suitor for it, but, by the delay, mistrusting he should be answered in the negative, importuned him one day for an answer. "Think not unkindness in me," said Scipio, "that I delay you thus, for I have been as earnest with a friend of mine to take it, and cannot as yet prevail with him;" intimating hereby that high preferments, offices of charge and conscience, are fittest for such as shun them modestly, rather than such as seek them greedily. And, without all doubt, he that hunteth after any place or dignity, whether in Church or commonweal, that doth omnem movere lapidem (leave no stone unmoved), no means unattempted, no friend unsolicited, doth but declare himself as one biased to his own, not the public interest, and so a man unfitting; whereas he that lies dormant till preferment awaken him, that humbly carrieth an inferior condition till he hear the governor's voice, "Friend, sit up higher," is the only man fit to be entrusted.

MDCCCCLXIII.—Prayer and endeavour to be joined together.

Gyradius, de Dilect. Syn., x.

Porphyrii Quest. Homer.

W. Day Winton.

THE Pagans, in their fabulous legend, have a story of Hercules (whom, for his strength, they accounted a god): how a carter, forsooth, had overthrown his cart and sat in the way crying, "Help, Hercules! O Hercules, help me!" At last Hercules, or one in his likeness, came to him, and laid on him with a good cudgel, saying, "Ah, thou silly, lazy fellow, callest thou to me for help and dost nothing thyself? Arise, and set to thy shoulder and heave thy part; then pray to me for help, and I will do the rest." Thus, in the matter of prayer unto God, we must do somewhat on our parts; it is not, as we say, lying in a ditch and crying out, "God help us!" that will bring us out. Shall a scholar pray to God to make him learned and never go to his book? Shall a husbandman pray for a good harvest and throw his plough into the hedge? "No, no," as a reverend bishop said once in a sermon before Queen Elizabeth; "it is not a praying to God, but a tempting of God, to beg His blessing without doing our endeavour also."

MDCCCCLXIV.—Men to be ready to die for Christ.

It is reported of an able minister (now with God), that, riding with an intimate friend by Tyburn (which he had not known, or not observed before), demanded what that was; and answer being made, "This is Tyburn, where many malefactors have lost their lives," he stopped his horse, and uttered these words with great affection, "Oh, what a shame is it that so many thousands should die here for the satisfaction of their lusts, and so few be found willing to lay down their lives for Christ! Why should not we, in a good cause, and upon a good call, be ready to be hanged for Jesus Christ? It would be everlasting honour, and it is a thousand times better to die for Christ—to be hanged, to be burned—than to die in our beds." And most true it is, that it were every way more glorious to die for Christ than to live without Him. Such was the Christian temper of the blessed apostle, that he was not only willing to be bound, but to die for the Lord Jesus. And after him, those primitive Christians, how ambitious were they of martyrdom in the cause of Christ! And of late, in the times of that Marian persecution, how many cheerfully and willingly laid down their lives, mounting, Elijah-like, to heaven in fiery chariots! And so must every good Christian be ready to do, to die for Christ—willingly to endure the cross, and not to shrink back for any torment whatsoever.

J. Whitaker.

Ash's Sermon, at his Funeral, 1654.

Acts xxi. 13.

Fox's Martyrol.

MDCCCCLXV.—The generality of men not enduring to hear of death.

DOCTOR RUDD, then bishop of St. David's, preaching before Queen Elizabeth, A.D. 1596, on Ps. xc. 12, "O teach us to number our days," &c., fell upon some sacred and mystical numbers—as three for the Trinity, three times three for the heavenly hierarchy, seven for the Sabbath, and, at last, upon seven times nine for the grand climacterical year; but the queen, perceiving whitherto it tended, began to be much troubled in her mind, which the bishop discovering, betook himself to treat of some more plausible numbers—as of the number 666, to prove the pope to be antichrist, and of the fatal number of 88, blessing God for hers and the kingdom's deliverance, not doubting but that she would pass her climacterical year also. Sermon being ended, the queen, as the manner was, opened the window, but she was so far from giving him thanks, that she said plainly he should have kept his arithmetic for himself, and so went away for the time discontented, though upon second thought she was pacified. And thus is that the generality of men and women cannot endure to hear of death, or to entertain any thoughts of their latter end. You shall have them cry out upon the miseries of this wretched life, and yet when death appears—be it but in the bare apprehension thereof—they do as little children, who all the day complain, but when the medicine is brought them are nothing sick at all; or as they who all the week run up and down the house with pain of their teeth, and, seeing the barber (the practice of surgery was formerly joined to that of barber) come to pull them out, feel no more torment.

Sir John Harrington, View of the Church of England.

Morney, Of Life and Death.

"Nemo tam imperitus est, ut nesciat sibi quandoque moriendum."—SEN., Ep. lxxviii.

MDCCCCLXVI.—Wit; how to make a right use thereof.

IN the Levitical law there are directions for the usage of a captive taken to wife: "When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the Lord thy God hath delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive, and seest amongst the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldest have her to thy wife; then thou shalt bring her home to thy house; and she shall shave her head, and pare her nails; and she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thine house, and bewail her father and mother a full month; and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife." Thus, by way of allusion, this captive woman is wit as yet unsanctified, wit without wisdom, wit (as they say) whither wilt thou? When speeches are witty, whilst the behaviour is wicked—when deeds are incongruities, whilst words are apophthegms—what must then be done? Shave the hair, pare the nails, take off the abuse of wit, pare off such evils as usually are concomitant—1. Blasphemy, as in jesting with the sacred Scriptures; 2. Lasciviousness, as in wanton discourses; 3. Insolence, as in trampling on men of weaker parts; 4. Contention, as in making policy to eat out piety. This being done, wit is become wisdom; then marry her and use her as thy own.

Deut. xxi. 10-13.

Bishop Hall's Contemplat. Solom. and Queen of Sheba.

MDCCCCLXVII.—Ignorant reformers, whether in Church or state, reprov'd.

Gauden's Apology for Minist. in Preface.

HE must needs be looked on as an unskilful chemist who cannot refine from dross without consuming what is precious; and that man is a pitiful empiric who cannot purge without casting into bloody fluxes. And such an one is every ignorant, inexperienced reformer—whether it be in Church or commonweal—who knows not how to shave his father's beard without cutting his throat, nor pare his nails without cropping off his hand; that cannot distinguish between the use and abuse of things, nor moderate the ancient discipline of the Church, nor regulate the wholesome laws of the nation, except he strike at the root and branch of the one and dig up the fundamentals of the other.

MDCCCCLXVIII.—The devil and a griping usurer compared together.

Ambros., de Tobia, tom. iv., cap. 4.

ONE of the ancients thought that there was no fitter creature to compare the devil himself to than the griping usurer; for, as the usurer doth make sure to himself and get into bonds the patrimony and inheritance, and so sometimes the very life of the borrower, for a little money, which he lends to satisfy his need for the present, so the devil, for a little fleshly or worldly content, which he lends a man for a moment, gets the very soul of that man into bondage, and makes the poor sinner make over unto his use and service the whole patrimony of the powers of his most precious soul.

MDCCCCLXIX.—Drinking; the excess thereof reprov'd.

Hieron. Zanch., in locum.

Hos. vii. 5.

Rodolph. Goclen.,
de Luxa, p. 97.

IT was the complaint of the prophet Hosea, in his time, that the princes upon their king's-day—that is, upon a solemn day of mirth and festivity celebrated for the king—did make him sick with bottles of wine. But if the same prophet were now alive, he would complain that both high and low, men and women, old and young, do not only upon some festival day, but upon every usual day—yea, upon the King of Heaven's day, the blessed Sabbath-day—make both themselves and others drunk with bottles of wine and other strong drinks, abusing those good creatures of God so prodigally, so prodigiously, as if they were born to no other end but thus to abuse themselves and the good blessings together, and as if there were no other heaven or happiness but the pouring of strong drinks into their bodies.

MDCCCCLXX.—The great danger of relying upon foreign aid and assistance.

Barlow's Sermon, at St. Paul's on the next Sunday after the discovery of the Gunpowder Treason,
1605.

THERE is a fable how that the horse, being too weak for the stag, required the help of a man, which was easily granted; who, getting upon the horse's back, put the stag to flight; but, after that, "non equitem dorso, non frantum depulit ore (he could never quit his back of the rider, nor his mouth from the bridle-bit)." So it is with the helps of all worldly potestates—mere beneficia viscata: just like the poor bird that, having escaped the snare, percheth upon the tree for refuge, and there she finds bird-lime to entangle her, from whence she cannot fly but with the loss of her feathers, if not of her members. And thus it is with the helps of states and nations. Ask their help in time of distress, they will grant it, but, withal, either they exact a tribute, which exhausteth the treasury, or impose conditions which infringe the liberty, or require a future aid, which weakeneth the power, or betray upon advantage, which redoubles the misery, or upbraid the benefit, which exulcerates (wounds) the mind; so that it is matter of danger to make any reliance upon such aid and assistance.

"Ibi fas, ubi maxima merces."
—LUCAN.

MDCCCCLXXI.—The Christian's growth in grace enjoined.

THE eagle's emblem is sublimius (to fly higher), even to behold the sun in its splendour; the sun's emblem is celerius (swifter), as a giant refreshed to run his course; the wheat in the Gospel hath this emblem, perfectius (riper), first the blade, then the ear, then full corn; Ezekiel's emblem is profundius (deeper), first to the ancles, then to the knees, then to the thighs; Christ's emblem was superius (sit up higher); Charles I. had for his emblem, ulterius (go on further); the woman with child hath this emblem, plenius (fuller, until she bring forth): and so ought every Christian that is not heavy, dull, and sluggish, to mount loftier with the eagle, to run swifter with the sun, to wax riper with the wheat, to wade deeper with Ezekiel, to sit up higher with the guest, to pass on further with the emperor, to wax fuller with the woman, to be still growing in grace till they come to the height of perfection in Christ Jesus.

Price's Serm. before
Prince Henry at 41.
Yam's, 1609.
Ps. xix. 5.
Mark iv. 28.
Ezek. xlvii. 4.
Luke xiv. 10.

"Haud est virile terga fortunæ dare."
—SEN., Trag. vi.

MDCCCCLXXII.—God's blessing upon the means doth all.

As in a course of physic, a diseased man is prescribed to boil certain medicinable herbs in running water, and then to drink a quantity of that water, and so is cured of his disease; and yet we know that it is not the water, but the decoction or infusion, which cureth the patient: so it is not the bread that nourisheth, nor the abundance of outward things which enricheth or contenteth, but the infusion of God's blessing, which is the staff of life, without which a man may starve for hunger with bread in his mouth, suffer the extremity of cold with good clothes on his back, and die like the children of Israel with the flesh of quails in his mouth.

Swale's Serm. at Court, 1621.

MDCCCCLXXIII.—Other men's sins the good man's sorrow.

It is said of Marcellus, a valiant Roman, that when as, after a long and tedious siege, he entered by composition into the great and rich city of Syracuse, the tears trickled down his cheeks to see so famous a place, and such a multitude of inhabitants brought into captivity. This was much to be done by an heathen, and many of the dear servants of God have not been without example in the like kind; nay, Christ Jesus Himself wept for the security of Jerusalem. And whose bowels that hath in him any spark of grace, any drachm of goodness, would not yearn within him? Whose heart would not melt to see whole swarms and millions of people trooping to hell, led as so many bondslaves by the prince of darkness, and not bemoan it? Surely there can be no religion where there is not such compassion.

Plutarch.

Cic., Orat. in Verrem.
1 Sam. xv. 35.
Ezek. ix. 2, 3, 4.
Jer. xlii. 17.
2 Pet. ii. 8.
Acts xvii. 16.
"Pia est tristitia vitiis alienis tribu-lari, non implicari."
—AUG., in Epist.

MDCCCCLXXIV.—Husband and wife each other's crown.

In older times, the Pagans worshipped all the powers of their deities in two images—the one whereof was the image of a man, called Adra, perched aloft; the other of a woman, called Adergidis, seated below. From the image of the man issued sunbeams, after the fashion of a crown, meeting in the head of the woman; and from the image of the woman Macrobius, Saturnal.

lib. i.

Eph. v.
1 Pet. 3.

streamed up goodly rays, in the form also of a crown, collected on the head of the man : all this to hint out unto us how the wife (as civilians speak) shineth in the beams of her husband, and the husband is made glorious in the reflected beams from his wife, both being, as it were, crowns of glory one unto the other.

MDCCCCLXXV.—The Church's distress and comfort.

Vitruvius, lib. i.,
cap. 6.

Brooks's Sermon,
London, 1587.

"Nube solet pulsa candidus ire dies."
—OVID.

It is said of Mitylene, a magnificent stately city near the borders of Phrygia, that it was rarely (finely) builded, but very badly situated—for when the south wind blew the inhabitants grew sick ; when the west wind, they did cough ; but when the north wind blew, they were all well. Thus the Church militant is rarely (finely) builded, but badly situated, as it were, in the unhealthy marshes of Egypt. One while the south wind blows, and it is sick—that is, when heresies spring up with the Gospel, as in the first five hundred years after Christ ; another while the Church cougheth and labours for life under the strength of some violent disease, as in those ten bloody persecutions next following Christ's ascension ; add hereunto the sad distress that she is in at this very time, rent and torn in pieces with sects and schisms, and groaning under the burthen of an insupportable toleration thereof : but the Church's comfort is, that God, the great Physician, will, in His good time, turn about the wind into another corner, that it may be healed.

MDCCCCLXXVI.—Sin in its original easy to be found.

In Latin, Aconi.

Ovid, Met.

Crashaw, Parable of Poison.

1 John iii. 8.

THERE is in Italy, or some part of the Apennine Hills, not far from the hole Avernus, an herb called Aconitum, one of the mortallest poisons in the world, and withal so deadly, that the poets held it too bad to be natural, and would have it to come from some supernatural cause or curse, which, not being within their compass to apprehend, they therefore feigned, that when Hercules drew Cerberus out of hell, where the filthy froth and foam fell out of the ugly jaws of his troubled mouth, there grew that deadly herb, the poisonous aconite. Thus do they, poor heathens, make a great deal of do to devise a beginning for the most earthly poisons ; but for sin, the spiritual poison of man's soul, we need not go to fancies and fables to find the original matter of it ; for the Holy Ghost tells us directly, that whosoever committeth sin is of the devil.

MDCCCCLXXVII.—The commands of God to be obeyed, not questioned.

Charron, Trois Veritez.

"Imperare principis est, et sub-ditorum obtemperare."

Matt. viii. 9.

It was judiciously said by a wise man of later days, that if he were enjoined by his superiors to put forth to sea in a ship which had neither mast nor tackling, nor any other furniture, he would do it ; and being asked what wisdom there were in so doing, answered, "The wisdom must be in him that hath power to command, not in him who is bound to obey." Thus it is that men, having an express commandment in God's Word to do thus and thus, must not gainsay and overthrow all with their own worldly wisdom and fleshly reason. Obedience must be no disputant, no framer of excuses. If the captain command the soldier a piece of service, must he tell him why ? Is it not enough for the centurion to say to his servant, "Do this, and he doth it" ? Must the subject obey his prince in nothing, but when he is of his council ? But if with men it were so, yet with God it may not so be, of whom it is sufficient for us but to know that we are commanded to obey whatsoever His will and pleasure is.

MDCCCCLXXVIII.—Tyrants, infidels, &c., forced to acknowledge the providence of God.

JULIAN, that wicked apostate, though as politic to obscure as malicious to oppose the truth of Jesus Christ, was yet, in the end, constrained to shut up his tyranny with a "Vicisti, Galilæe (Thou hast overcome, O Galilean)!" In like sort we read of Mahomet II., the first emperor of the Turks, that, at the siege of Scodra, against the Christians, in the defence of so small a city against his mighty army, finding God his enemy, he blasphemously asked, by way of scorn, whether God had not enough to do in heaven, that He should interpose Himself in his affairs on earth. And thus the most cruel of tyrants, the most irreligious heathen, through the thick clouds of ignorance, have often espied the glimpse of God's dreadful lightning, and as oft quaked at His thunder; they have felt His finger in their wounds, and acknowledged His strength in their weakness—yea, such is the power of the Almighty God to expose their own wicked actions as a table of their confession, and extort an acknowledgment of His victory out of their blasphemy: for he that will not deny a God must, of necessity, grant a Providence; and whosoever he be that knows himself, and sifts into his own will and actions, must needs acknowledge a supernatural power, which determines them to good or evil.

Eusebii Hist.

Knoles' Hist. of Turki.

Carpenter, Achiltophel.

"Nec vox hominis sonat ô Deus certe."

"Agitante calescimus illo."

MDCCCCLXXIX.—The wicked politician discovered.

PLINY, in his "Natural History," maketh mention of a certain beast of Scythia that is able to change itself into all variety of shapes and colours, yet, returning to his own form, expresseth the resemblance of an ass—a good emblem of a wicked politician, who, sitting, as it were, at the stern of state, and holding the helm in his hands, must of necessity vary himself a thousand ways to obey all winds and second all tides; but nature, which is the worst dissembler of guilty actions, will one time or another betray itself to discovery or, at least, plain dealing. Death will strip him naked and lay him open to shame, and leave him as a fool to men's contempt and God's vengeance.

Carpenter, ut antea.

MDCCCCLXXX.—Inconstancy in the ways of God reproved.

It is said of that humi repens, the grasshopper, that it hath wings, but they are such as cannot lift it up from the earth, or, if they do, it is but per saltum, not per volatum (they only serve them to hop, not to fly withal); no sooner up from the earth, but by-and-by down again. And such are all they whose devotion is soon hot, soon cold again: they could like it well if they might go to heaven per saltum, as it were at one jump, without any more ado; but per volatum (by flying), by a constant course of well-doing, that is too laborious for them—they cannot, they will not endure it.

Gerson, Meditat.
viii. ch. 11. 2. 11.
Don.

MDCCCCLXXXI.—The carnal professor described.

It is observed of the ostrich, a kind of bird-beast—half a bird of the air and half a beast of the earth—that he hath such a weighty body that he cannot raise up himself to fly aloft, yet flickereth (flapping the wings without flight) in such wise, and moveth so fast by the help of his wings, that he cannot be outgone by some of the swiftest of other creatures. And such are all carnal professors, all holy unholy worldlings, that will needs mingle heaven and earth together, that will seem to have their conversation in heaven when yet their affections weigh them down to the earth; so that, contrary to the apostle's rule, they will Deo militare et sæculo se implicare (be God's soldiers and the world's solicitors)—nay, contrary to our Saviour's rule, Deo et Mammonæ servire (divide their service betwixt God and Mammon).

Aquino, 1. 2da.,
q. 102, art. 6.

Calvin, in Job
xxxix. 16.

2 Tim. ii.

Matt. vi. 24.

MDCCCCLXXXII.—Certainty of the good man's reward from God.

Justinian.

DIONYSIUS, causing musicians to play before him, promised them a great reward; having played a long time, they expected their pay, but he told them they were paid already, since, as they pleased him with musical sounds, so he them with windy hopes of reward. But God deals not so with His servants: He feeds them not with vain hopes, but sure accomplishment of His gracious promises, there being a reward for the righteous, and He faithful that hath promised it, who saith, "Behold, I come quickly, and My reward is with Me."

Rev. XXI. 12.

MDCCCCLXXXIII.—God only to be served.

Theophrastus, in Hist.

WHEN the soldiers had chosen Valentinian to be their emperor, they were consulting how they might join a partner with him; to whom Valentinian replied, "It was in your power to give me the empire when I had it not; now I have it, it is not in your power to give me a partner." Thus, if God be our God, Mammon must be our slave; he that is the servant of God must be master of his money; if God be our King, He must be our King only—for the bed and the throne brook no rivals. God must be our God alone. "Æquum est Deos fingere, ac Deum negare (It is all one to choose new gods, and to deny the true God)." No; let heathens choose new gods and forsake the true God; but let every good Christian say, "Thou, O Father of mercy, and Lord of heaven and earth, be my God, and my only God for ever and ever!"

"Omniſque potestas impatiens conſortis."—PLUTARCH.

Augustin.

MDCCCCLXXXIV.—To be at God's will and disposal is the best condition.

Speculum Exemplum.

It is storied of a young virgin that, at a great prince's hands, had the choice of three vessels: one whereof was gold, richly wrought and set with precious stones, and on it was written, "Who chooseth me shall have what he deserveth;" the second was of silver, superscribed thus, "Who chooseth me shall have what nature desireth;" the third was of lead, whose motto was this, "Who chooseth me shall have what God hath disposed." The former pleased her eye well, but not her understanding—it offered what she deserved; she knew that was just nothing, therefore refused it. The second considered, offered what nature desires—she thought that could be for no solid good, for nature desires such things as please the carnal lust; this she also refused. The third had a coarse outside, but the sentence pleased her well—offering what God had disposed. So the faithful soul put herself upon God's ordinance, and chose that. The virgin is man's soul; the golden vessel is the world's riches, contentful enough to an avaricious eye. Too, too many choose this, but, being opened, it is full of dead men's bones and a fool's bauble, to set them down for very idiots who cleave to the present world, and at last have all their hopes rewarded with folly. The silver vessel is the lust of the flesh, those fond and vain delights which concupiscence so much hunts after—so saith the motto, it gives what nature desireth; this vessel, opened, is full of wild fire and an iron whip, intimating that God will scourge the lustful with the whip of judgments, as diseases of body, infamy of name, overthrow of estate, and vexation of conscience. The leaden vessel is, as the sense and sentence declares it, the blessing of God; the chooser of it shall have what God hath disposed for him—shall be contented with the providential penny that comes in daily; and in a blessed, happy condition is that soul that makes this election, for, opened, it is found to be full of gold and precious stones, every one more worth than a world, the immortal graces of God's Spirit. The virgin chose this, and she was married to the king's son: and so shall every soul that makes the like choice. No matter, though it seems lead without and glister not with outward vanities, it is rich within; the wealth thereof cannot be valued, though all the arithmetical accountants should make it their design to cast it up.

Leon. de Udinge,
Quadrages. Mal.Adams's Spirit, Garden.Paul de Wann,
Serm.

MDCCCCLXXXV.—Neglect in the hearing of God's Word dangerous.

HERODOTUS hath a merry tale of a piper, how he came to the water-side and piped to the fishes, but they would not dance; then he took his net and caught some of them, and, being thrown upon the land, they began to leap and skip up. "Nay," quoth the piper, "I offered you music before and you would none; now you shall dance without a pipe." Thus it is that most men commonly regard the songs of Sion, the preaching of God's Word, as some men do music heard late at midnight in the streets whilst they are in bed, perhaps they will step to the window and listen to it awhile, and presently to bed again—step from the couch of their lusts to church, hear the sermon, commend the preacher for a good man, and then to bed again, lulling themselves in their former security; but let such know, that if God have given them music and they will not dance, if God have afforded orthodox preachers and they will not hear, as Christ reproved the Jews, they shall mourn in sadness for their obstinate refusal of proffered mirth, and say, with heaviness of spirit, "There was a prophet amongst us."

In Polymnia,
lib. vi.

Brown's Serm. at Court, 1627.

"Nec retinent patulas, commissas fideliter aures."—
HORAT., in Arte
Poet.

MDCCCCLXXXVI.—How sins may be said to outlive the sinner.

It is said of a lawyer, that resolving not to be forgotten, he made his will so full of intricate quirks and quillies, that his executors (if for nothing else), for very vexation of law, might have cause to remember him. Thus, the incloser of commons sinneth after he is dead, even so long as the poor are deprived of that benefit. He that robbeth the Church of a due, and so leaves it to his heir, sins after he is dead, even so long as God is made to lose His right. The unjust decree of a partial judge may outlive him, even so long as the judged inheritance remains in a wrongful possession; but, à contrà, we say of a charitable good man, that he doth good after he is dead—his alms maintain many poor souls on earth when his soul is happy in heaven.

Adams's Generat. of Serpents.

"Vivit post funera virtus."

MDCCCCLXXXVII.—Heaven to be always in our thoughts.

It is reported of a reverend preacher, that sitting amongst other divines and hearing a sweet concert of music, as if his soul had been borne up to heaven, took occasion to think and say thus: "What music may we think there is in heaven!" Another, taking a serious view of the great pomp and state at court upon a collar-day, spake not without some admiration, "What shall we think of the glory in the courts of the King of Heaven?" And thus must we do: as we read the book of nature, be still translating it into the book of grace; as we plod on in the great volume of God's works, be sure to spell out the word of use, of instruction, of comfort to ourselves. The spiritualizing of earthly things is an excellent art; and that is a happy object and well observed that betters the soul in grace.

R. H.

Adams, Sinner's
Par. Bell.

"Quocunque tempore non cogitaveris Deum, puta illum diem amissum."

MDCCCCLXXXVIII.—A non-resident, slothful minister worthily (justly) discouraged.

THERE was a certain idle monk in Winchester, who, complaining to King Henry II. that the bishop had taken away three of their dishes and left them but ten, the king replied, that the bishop should do well to take away the ten and leave them the three. And it is just with all men, especially ministers of God's Word and Sacraments, that if they have crimen immane and nomen inane, that they should have mercedem tenuem (a slender recompense); if inertes, then justly inopes, especially cum valuerint, et non valuerint prædicare (when they are able and are not willing to preach), then let double honour, which is countenance and maintenance, be kept from them.

Math. Paris.

"Pensate fratres, quantæ damna-tionis est, sine la-bore mercedem la-boris," &c.—
HIERON.

MDCCCCLXXXIX.—*The true comfort of election*Adams, Happiness of Church.

A MAN may have his name set down in the chronicles, yet lost; wrought in durable marble, yet perish; set upon a monument equal to a colossus, yet be ignominious; inscribed on the hospital gates, yet go to hell; written in the front of his own house, yet another come to possess it. All these are but writings in the dust or upon the waters, where the characters perish so soon as they are made; they no more prove a man happy than the fool could prove Pontius Pilate, because his name was written in the creed. But the true comfort is this, when a man, by assurance, can conclude with his own soul, that his name is written in those eternal leaves of heaven, in the book of God's election, which shall never be wrapped up in the cloudy sheets of darkness, but remain legible to all eternity.

Luke x. 20.

MDCCCXC.—How to be assured of our election.

T. 4. 11. 12.

A SENATOR relating to his son the great honours decreed to a number of soldiers whose names were written in a book, the son was importunate to see that book. The father shows him the outside; it seemed so glorious that he desired him to open it—"No, by no means; it was sealed by the council." "Then," says the son, "tell me if my name be there." The father replied, "The names are secreted (concealed) to the senate." The son, studying how he might get some satisfaction, desired him to deliver the merits of those inscribed soldiers. The father relates to him their noble achievements and worthy acts of valour wherewith they had eternized their names. "Such are written," said he, "and none but such must be written in this book." The son, consulting with his own heart, knew that he had no such trophies to show, but had spent his time in courting ladies rather than encountering knights, that he was better for a dance than a march, that he knew no drum but the tabret, no courage but to be drunk. Hereupon he presently retired (withdrew) himself, repented, entered into a combat with his own affections, subdued them, became temperate, continent, valiant, virtuous. When the soldiers came to receive their wreaths, he steps in to challenge one for himself; being asked upon what title, he answered, "If honours be given to conquerors, I have gotten the noblest conquest of all." "Wherein?" "These have subdued strange foes, but I have conquered myself." Now, whosoever thou art that desirest to know whose names are written in heaven, who is elected to life eternal, it shall not be told thee this or that individual person, but generally, thus: men so qualified, faithful in Christ and to Christ, obedient to the truth and for the truth, that have subjected their own affections and resigned themselves to the guidance of the heavenly will. These men have made noble conquests, and shall have princely crowns. Find but in thyself this sanctimony (holiness), and thou art sure of thy election. In Rome the patres conscripti were distinguished by their robes, as the liveries of London, from the rest of the company: so thy name is enrolled in the legend of God's saints, if thy livery witness it that thy conversation is in heaven.

Zuingerus, in Theat. Hum. Vita.Adams, *ut antea.*Lud. Fenestral, de Magistr. Rom.

1 John iii. 16.

MDCCCXCI.—*No time to be misspent.*Zuingerus, Theat Hum. Vita.

THERE were three special faults whereof Cato professed himself to have seriously repented: one was passing by water when he might have gone by land; another was trusting a secret in a woman's bosom; but the main one was spending an hour unprofitably. But how many hours, not only on common days, but upon the Lord's-day, that concerns the business of our souls, have and do we still unprofitably lavish? Let us, then, embrace the counsel which Jerome gave to Rusticus: "Be ever doing, ut quando diabolus veniat, occupatum inveniat (that when the devil comes with his business, he may find us at our business)." It is the sitting bird that is so easily shot; so long as she is flying in the air the murdering piece is not levelled at her. And let us be going on in good employment, and then we shall not be so fair a mark for the devil to aim at.

MDCCCCXCII.—The happiness of good government.

It was a smart invention of him that, having placed the emperor and the pope reconciled on their majestic thrones, he brought in the several states and conditions of the world before them. First came a counsellor of state with this motto, "I advise you two;" then a courtier, "I flatter you three;" then a husbandman, "I feed you four;" then a merchant, "I cozen you five;" then a lawyer, "I rob you six;" then a soldier, "I fight for you seven;" then a physician, "I kill you eight;" lastly, a priest, "I absolve you nine." This was his satire; but happy is both that Church and commonweal where legal authority doth govern in truth and peace: the counsellor advise, the judge censure, the husbandman labour, the merchant traffic, the lawyer plead, the soldier bear arms, the divine preach—all bring forth the fruits of righteousness; so that they become an exemplary encouragement to their neighbours, children may be blessed after them, enemies convinced, aliens converted, Satan confounded, the Gospel adorned, and their souls eternally saved.

The Baron Figures; a Sermon, at St. Paul's Cross, 1623.

"Recta domus ubi vir imperat."—AUG., in Ep.

MDCCCCXCIII.—The laity abused by the Roman clergy in the matter of confession.

It is mentioned in a fable how the wolf, the fox, and the ass went to shrift together to do penance: the wolf confesseth himself to the fox, who easily absolveth him; the fox doth the like to the wolf, and receiveth the like favour; after this the ass comes to confession, and his fault was, that, being hungry, he had taken one straw from the sheaf of a pilgrim travelling to Rome, whereof he was heartily penitent; but that would not serve: the law was executed severely upon him—he was slain and devoured. By the wolf is meant the pope; by the fox, his cardinals, Jesuits, and priests. These quickly absolve one another, how heinous soever their offences are; but when the poor ass—that is, the Romish-riden laity—come to shrift, though his offence be not the weight and worth of a straw, yet on his back shall the rigour of the law be laid—he shall be sure to pay for all.

In Lib. Vocat. Penitent. Ashit.

"A chi manca un asino faccia metter la cella," &c.

MDCCCCXCIV.—The want of hospitality reprov'd.

A GREAT man of the new model had curiously engraven at the gate of his palace the image of Bounty or Hospitality. The needy traveller, with joy spying such a sight, makes his approach thither in hopeful expectation of succour; but still silence or an empty echo answers all his cries and knocks—for Hospitality may stand at the gate, but to be sure there is none in the house. Then comes another, who, having his hungry trust often abused, resolves to pluck down the image, with these words, "If there be neither meat nor drink in the house, what needs there a sign?" Thus, great portals in the country and coloured posts in the city (like so many mock beggars) promise relief, but they are often found but images—dumb and lame signs; for hospitality is not at home. You shall have divinity at their gates, but no humanity; wholesome counsel, but no wholesome food; much exhortation, little compassion; charging the weary traveller's ear, but in no wise overcharging his belly; they have Scripture against begging, but no bread against famishing; the bread of the sanctuary is common with them, but not the bread of the buttery. If the poor can be nourished with the philosophical supper of moral sentences, they shall be prodigally feasted; but if the Bread of Life will not content them, they may be packing.

Adams, on Ep. a Pet.

"Pores habent tritas ut pastorum case."—DIOC.

MDCCCCXCV.—Multiplicity of law-suits condemned.

It is related to the honour of Sir Thomas More, then lord chancellor of England, and the charitable constitution of those times wherein he lived (as a thing never seen either since or before), that he, having ended a cause then before him, did call for the next to be brought; but answer was returned him that there was never another cause behind, and so, with thanks unto God, the court was dismissed at that time; whereupon, in perpetuam rei memoriam, it was ordered that the proceedings of that day should be registered in the rolls of the chancery, as may be seen at this instant. What a charitable disposition! what a peaceable frame of spirit was upon the hearts of men in those darker times! and what a raging torrent of dissension is broke in upon us in days that are far more clear! Every man almost lives like a salamander in the fire of contention. Witness the multiplicity of law-suits, the swarms of lawyers, the shoals of clerks and registrars that are to be found in the midst of us; witness the crowds of clients dancing attendance upon the courts of justice in the several judicatures at Westminster and elsewhere; so that what the apostle said to the Corinthians, "Is there not a wise man amongst you? Why do ye go to law?" may very well be inverted upon us, "We are all mad, or else the lawyers would have less employment."

Stapleton, de Viribus Thomis, in Vita Mori.

"Ubi cauidici
multi, ibi lites multæ."—PLATO.

1 Cor. vi. 7.

MDCCCCXCVI.—The sin of sacrilege condemned.

AN Italian signior came with his servant to one of our Lady's images—no matter which, for they do not scan her of number; he threw in an angel of gold; the humble picture, in gratitude, made a courtesy to him. The servant, observing and wondering at her ladyship's plausible carriage, purposed with himself to give somewhat too, that he might have somewhat of her courtesy as well as his master. So he put into the basin sixpence, and, withal, takes out his master's angel; the image makes him loving courtesy, and seems to thank him kindly. Thus it is too, too common now-a-days to take away the clergy's angel and lay down sixpence in the stead thereof; to take away their just maintenance, and put them upon the people's benevolence—like those that steal a goose, and stick down a feather, or those that have undone many, then build a hospital for some few; so they, having made a sad purchase of Church lands, having taken away a talent of Church maintenance, return a mite of popular contribution.

Adams's Exposit.
on Ep. 2 Pet.

"Cum diis pug-nant sacrilegi."—
G. CURT., lib. vii.

MDCCCCXCVII.—Truth commended, falsehood condemned.

PYRRHUS and Ulysses, being sent to Lemnos to take from Philoctetes Hercules' arrows, the two legates advised by what means they might best wrest them out of his hands. Ulysses affirmed that it was best to do it by lying and deceit. "No," said Pyrrhus, "I like not that course, because I never used it, but always loved the truth, as my father and my ancestors have ever done." Whereupon Ulysses replied, that when he was a young man he was of his mind too; but now, being old, he had learnt, by long experience dearly bought, that the surest way and safest art in man's life is fallere et mentiri (to lie and cheat). Surely, many of this age are of Ulysses' mind—they speak one thing, intend another; they are all courtesy in promise, no honesty at all in performance. But true Israelites are of Pyrrhus's spirit—"Magna est veritas, et prævalebit (Great is the truth, and will prevail)," is the sweet poesy of their profession, both in themselves and those that relate unto them; and they resolve upon the doctrine of Christ Jesus their Master—that the truth shall make them free.

Sophocles, in Trag. Philoctetes.

"Tuta frequenque via," &c.

John viii. 32.

MDCCCCXCVIII.—Piety and policy not inconsistent.

FABLES are not without their useful morals. A boy was molested with a dog; the friar taught him to say a Gospel by heart, and warranted this to allay the dog's fury. The mastiff (alias maze-thief, in the original Saxon), spying the boy, flies at him; he begins, as it were, to conjure him with his Gospel; the dog, not capable of such Gospel doctrine, approacheth more violently; a neighbour, passing by, bids the boy take up a stone; he did so, and, throwing at the dog, escaped. The friar demands of the lad how he sped with his charm. "Sir," quoth he, "your Gospel was good, but a stone, with the Gospel, did the deed." And most true it is that prayers and tears are good weapons, but not the only weapons of the Church. It is not enough to bend the knee without stirring the hand. Shall war march against us with thunder? and shall we assemble ourselves in the temple, lie prostrate on the pavements, lift up our hands and eyes to heaven, and not our weapons against our enemies? Shall we beat the air with our voices, and not their bosoms with our swords?—only knock our own breasts, and not their pates? Sure, a religious conscience never taught a man to neglect his life, his liberty, his estate, his peace. Piety and policy are not opposites. He that taught us to be harmless as doves bade us also be wise as serpents.

Adams's Exposit. on
Ep. 2 Pet.

Ambros., Offic.,
lib. 1., cap. 27.

"Quam bene c.aveniant."

Matt. x. 16.

MDCCCCXCIX.—Progress in piety enjoined.

THE prophet Elijah, after he had travelled a day's journey in the wilderness, sat down and slept under a juniper-tree, and there God calls upon him, "Up, and eat;" and when He found him a second time, "Up, thou hast a journey to go;" and when he had travelled forty days, and was lodged in a cave, "What doest thou here, Elias? Go and return unto the wilderness by Damascus, and do thus and thus." So, whether we be entered in our way or have proceeded in it, whether we be babes in Christ or stronger men, whether carnal or spiritual, we must up and eat and strengthen ourselves, first with milk and then with stronger meat; we have still a greater journey to go: we must walk from grace to grace, from virtue to virtue, from knowledge to knowledge, and always think that we hear a voice that calleth us forward, and saith, "Thou hast yet a greater journey to go; what doest thou here, Elias? Why standest thou here, loitering all the day long?" There is no time of standing in this life; we must still forward, and take notice that every blessing of God bestowed upon us is a further calling on and a greater engagement to duty.

Lud. Granatens,
loc. cit.

"Non progredi est
regredi."

MM.—The service performed unto God must be personal.

THERE is an old tale, idle in itself, the use may be good:—A certain man, who would never go to church, when he heard the saints'-bell ring, would say to his wife, "Go thou to church, and pray for thee and me." One night he dreamt that both he and his wife were dead, and that they knocked together at heaven-gate for entrance; St. Peter (by the legend's leave) is porter, and suffered the wife to enter in, but kept the husband out, answering him, "Illa intravit pro se et te, &c. (She is gone in both for herself and thee: as thy wife went to church for herself and thee, so she is gone to heaven for herself and thee)." The moral instructs every one to have a personality of faith and a propriety of devotion, not to have their faith pinned upon another's sleeve, not to think to go to heaven upon another's score, but that himself serving God, himself may be blessed of God both here and hereafter.

Speculum Exemplarum.

MMI.—Saving faith the only faith.

As a cunning lapidary that shows the buyer an orient pearl, and, having a little fed his eye with that, outpleaseth him with a sapphire, yet outvalues that with some ruby or chrysolite, wherewith ravished, he doth lastly amaze him with a sparkling diamond, transcending them all; or as drapers show divers colours, yet, at last, for a masterpiece, exceed all with a rich piece of well-dyed scarlet: so there are divers graces and virtues like to jewels, but the most precious of all is faith. And there are divers degrees and sorts of faith, as divers coloured cloths; but the saving faith is arrayed in the scarlet robe, hath dipped

De Rampegolis,
Fig. Bibl.

"Tot sunt fides quot in cythara."

Rev. vii. 14.

and dyed herself in the blood of Jesus, yet she is white, pure white, as the snow of Lebanon. The faith that believes God's Word to be true is a good faith, but not illa fides (that saving faith); the faith that believes many men shall be saved is vera fides, non illa fides (a true faith, but not the faith); only that faith which believes a man's own soul redeemed, justified, saved by the merits of Christ Jesus, and that not without works answerable thereunto, is the only faith, and the queen of all other graces.

Chrysost., in Symb. Apost.

MMII.—Covetousness in the clergy condemned.

De Wann, Serm. de Tempore.

THERE is a fable of a widow who, being thick-sighted, sent to a certain physician to cure her; he promiseth it to her, and she to him a sum of money for satisfaction. The physician comes and applieth medicines, which, being bound over her eyes, still, as he departs, he carries away with him some of her best goods, so continuing her pains and his labour till he had robbed the house of her best substance. At last he demanded of her, being now cured, his pay agreed upon; she, looking about her house and missing her goods, told him that he had not cured her, for, whereas before she could see some good furniture in her house, now she could perceive none at all—she was erst thick-sighted, now purblind. And are there not such spiritual physicians to be found amongst us, such as, with long or (at least) tedious prayers, prey upon the poor, and devour their houses? The purse is still the white they level at; miserable men, that look to their own good more than the Church's; serving God with their parts, themselves in their hearts; working like those builders in the ark, rather for present gain than future safety; but, as they desire rather nostra quam nos, so they preserve rather sua quam se—loving, like Demas, the world; losing, like Judas, their own souls.

Hieron., in Homil.

"Sine labore mercedem laboris percipientes," &c.

MMIII.—Riches; how to be used.

Pintus, in Dan.

Look but upon a fly coming to a platter full of sweet and pleasant honey: if she thrust not herself altogether into it, but only touch and taste it with her mouth, and take no more than is necessary and needful, she may safely take wing and fly to another place; but if she wallow and tumble in the honey, then is she limed and taken in it, and whilst she is not able to fly away, she doth there lose her life. Thus, if a man take only so much of his riches as may sustain and honestly maintain his estate, bestowing the rest well and in a Christian manner, then they cannot hold him back or bar him from the kingdom of heaven; but if covetousness shall bewitch him, and prick him to scrape and rake together more and more, then he shall never be satisfied, but fall into many snares and temptations.

"Divitiis utare tuis," &c.—MORI Epigram.

MMIV.—The incorrigible sinner's desperate condition.

Aldrovand., de Quadruped.

It is written of the elephant, that (as if guilty of his own deformity, and therefore not abiding to view his snout in a clear spring) he seeks about for muddy and troubled waters to drink in. Thus the incorrigible sinner, that hates to be reformed: because he knows his wound is deep, he will not suffer the surgeon (surgeon) to search them, willing rather to kill his soul than disquiet it. He refuseth to look into the glass of the Law, or to come to the clear springs of the Gospel, or any perspective that may present his evil conscience to his eyes, but seeks rather to muddy and polluted channels—such as misty taverns, cloudy ale houses, vapouring tobacco shops, societies of sin, and all this to drown the thoughts of former iniquities with floods of new. And if he be enforced to any such reflection, he spurns and tramples that admonition, as apes break the glass that shows their deformity. He runs himself prodigally into so many arrears of debt that he cannot endure to hear of a reckoning; and thus, despairing to pay the old score, he recks not into what new and desperate courses he precipitates himself.

"Qui male agit, odit lucem."

MMV.—Wisdom ; how to be regulated.

As God appointed the Jews a measure how much manna they might gather, so St. Paul appointed the Romans a measure how much wisdom they might gather—"Let every man understand according to sobriety." The Jewish measure of manna was as much as an omer would hold ; what they gathered over turned into worms and putrefaction. So the wisdom which men gather beyond sobriety doth no good, but puff them up and corrupt them, and put them upon strains of Machiavellian policy. Wisdom not well regulated is like a dangerous knife in the hands of a madman ; and, to speak truth, there is nothing so much to be feared as knowledge accompanied with injustice and armed with power. Meat indigested, for want of exercise, will rumble in the stomach ; and knowledge, not ballasted with sobriety, will elevate the brain. Serpentine wisdom and dove-like innocence must go hand-in-hand together, or else we shall drown in our own knowledge, like a candle that is quenched in its own tallow.

Weems's Exercit.
Exod. xvi.
1 Cor. x.

"Plerique accepta scientia literarum," &c.—CHRYSTOST., de Sum. Bono, lib. iii.

Matt. x. 16.

MMVI.—Affectation of novelty, in the way of religion, reproved.

THERE is mention made of two men that, meeting at a tavern, fell a-tossing about their religion as merrily as their cups, and much drunken discourse there was about their profession. One protested himself of Dr. Martin's religion ; the other swore he was of Dr. Luther's religion—whereas Martin and Luther were but one man. Thus, some are for this preacher, some for that ; such doctrine as is begot in thunder, full of faction and innovation ; if it smell not of novelty, it shall not concern them ; they regard not heaven so much, whence it comes, as who brings it—such a man or no man ; otherwise, be the doctrine never so wholesome, they spew it out again, as if their conscience were as nice and delicate as that ground of Cologne, where some of St. Ursula's eleven thousand virgins were buried, which will cast up again in the night any that have been interred there in the day, except of that company, though it were a child newly baptized.

Manlii La. Com.

"Fidem ex personis, non personarum ex fide existimantes."

Cas. Baronii Annal.

MMVII.—Not to be over-careful for the place of our burial.

THAT of Monica, the mother of St. Augustine, is worthy of remembrance. She had with great care provided her a sepulchre near unto her husband, who died at Tagasta, in Africa, and was there buried, proposing to lie by him ; but the Lord so disposed that she left her life at Ostia, in Italy, and, being ready to depart, she said unto her son, "Ponite hoc corpus ubicunque, nihil vos ejus cura conturbet (Bury my body where you think good ; take no great care for it) ;" and being asked if it grieved her not to leave her body so far off from her own city, she gave this answer, "Nihil longè est à Deo ; neque timendum est ne ille agnoscat in fine sæculi unde me resuscitet (No place is nearer to God than other ; neither am I to fear lest the Lord should not as well raise me up in this place as in my own city)." Thus, let none be troubled with the thoughts of their burial-place. What though the distance be great betwixt them and them to whom they are more especially related, and without great charge and expense they cannot be buried near together, all places are alike unto God : He can raise them up as well out of country clay as out of finer city dust, and bring them and all their kindred and acquaintance together in a comfortable resurrection.

Spondanus, de Re Sepulchrali.

Aug., Confes., lib. ix., cap. 7.

"Ubiqumque sepellamur ; Dominus est terra et plenitudo,"—CHRYSTOST.

MMVIII.—The Christian's claim to heaven ; what it is.

OUR common law distinguisheth between two manner of freeholds—a freehold in deed, when a man hath made his entry upon lands, and is thereof really seized ; a freehold in law, when a man hath right to possession, but hath not yet made his actual entry. So the kingdom of heaven is ours, not in re, but in spe; ours tenore juris, though not yet jure tenoris; ours in the inheritance of the possession, though not in the possession of the inheritance—habemus jus ad rem, nondum in re (we are heirs to it, though now we be but wards). Our minority bids and binds us to be servants, but when we come to full years—a perfect growth in godliness—then we shall have a plenary possession.

Littleton de Tenures.

Ca. iv. 1.

MMIX.—How the devil makes use of the world to destroy man.

Morrison's Travels.

"Facilis descensus Averni."

IT is reported of the Irish that they dig deep trenches in the ground and pave the surface over with green turf, that their suspectless enemies may think it firm ground, and so fall in to their utter ruin. Thus, the devil makes this world his fatal vault, which he strews over with pleasures and delights; the way seems smooth, but is slippery: his intention is mischievous, ut lapsu graviore ruant, that man may have the surer and the sooner fall. Then doth he laugh to see a knot of gallants lie all along on their backs that have run headlong at pride, a corporation of citizens that have run at riches, a rabble of drunkards that ran apace to the tavern, a crew of cheaters that posted as fast to the gallows—all of them sinking to the bottomless pit of destruction.

MMX.—Not to repine at a great charge of children.

De Utino's Serm., Quadragesim.

Ps. cxiv. 15.

THERE is a story of a certain worldly, distrustful, rich woman, that, being at a poor woman's labour, the child being new-born and nothing to be had for the comfort of it, "See," said she, without any pity or compassion, "here is the mouth, but where is the meat?" Not long after it so fell out that the same woman, drawing near her time, was delivered of a dead child, which being well observed by another woman that was then present at her labour, "See," said she, "here is meat enough, but where is the mouth?" Let none therefore grudge or repine at their issue, be it never so numerous, nor grumble at the greatness of their charge: God never sent a mouth, but He sent meat for that mouth—He can as well feed many as few; make the poor man's penny go as far as the rich man's pound. He is the great housekeeper, that giveth every living thing meat in due season; and if so, then those little ones that bear His image are by no means excluded.

MMXI.—The least of sin to be resisted.

Roffensi's Parable
to King Henry VIII.

Adams's Serm. of the Contagion of Sin.

"Turpius ejicitur,"
&c.

THE trees of the forest held a solemn parliament, wherein they consulted of the innumerable wrongs which the axe had done them; they therefore made an act that no tree should hereafter lend the axe an helve, on pain of being cut down. The axe travels up and down the forest, begs wood of the cedar, oak, ash, elm, even of the poplar; not one would lend him a chip. At last he desired so much as would serve him to cut down the briers and bushes, alleging that such shrubs as they did but suck away the juice of the ground and hinder the growth and obscure the glory of the fair and goodly trees. Hereon they were all content to afford him so much; he pretends a thorough reformation, but behold a sad deformation; for when he had got his helve, down went cedar, oak, ash, elm, and all that did but stand in his way. Such are the subtle reaches of sins and sinful men. Give but a little advantage on their fair promises to remove the troubles of the body, and they will cut down the soul also. Therefore obsta principiis, crush the cockatrice in the egg, refuse all iniquity at the first, in what extenuation of quantity or colour of quality soever it be offered; for if Satan cannot get leave for his whole army of lusts, yet he will beg hard for his weak ones—his little ones—sins of weakness and infirmity, which, if once admitted, will soon unbolt the doors of the heart, let in all the rest of their company, and so make a surprisal of the soul and endanger it to all eternity.

MMXII.—Not to admit of delays in religious performances.

EXCELLENT is that comparison of St. Ambrose: "If," saith he, "I should offer thee gold, thou wouldst not say, 'I will come to-morrow and fetch it,' but thou wilt be sure to take it out of hand; yet redemptio animæ promittitur, nemo festinat (the redemption of our precious souls, more worth than thousands of gold and silver, is daily offered, and no man hasteneth to lay hold thereon)." How true may this speech of the father be returned upon the cunctators, such as procrastinate in the matters of religion. For earthly things, no man will take time till to-morrow, but is very hot in the pursuit, never resting till he have one way or other compassed them; yet for spiritual things, such as accompany salvation, most men's states are weak, and, like men ready to break, are taking order for two, three, four, six months' time, and so as far from making satisfaction as ever.

Con. in Lucam, lib. vii.

"Tolle moras, semper nocuit
differre."—SE-NECA.

MMXIII.—Humility appeaseth the wrath of God incensed.

It is recorded of an English king, Edward I., that being exceeding angry with a servant of his in the sport of hawking, he threatened him sharply. The gentleman answered, that it was well there was a river betwixt them. Hereat the king, more incensed, spurred his horse into the depth of the river, not without extreme danger of his life, the water being deep and the banks too steep and high for his ascending; yet at last, recovering land, with his sword drawn, he pursues the servant, who rode as fast from him; but finding himself too ill-horsed to outride the angry king, he reined, lighted on his knees, and exposed his neck to the blow of the king's sword. The king no sooner saw this, but he puts up his sword and would not touch him: a dangerous water could not hold him from violence, yet satis est prostrasse, his servant's submission pacified him. Thus, whilst man flies stubbornly from God, He that rides upon the wings of the wind posts after him, with the sword of vengeance drawn; but when poor dust and ashes humbles itself, and stands to mercy, the wrath of God, though ever so much incensed, is soon appeased.

Stowe's Chron.

"Armatura tutissima, animi modes-tia."—EVAGRIUS

MMXIV.—A faint-hearted Christian described.

A CERTAIN collier passing through Smithfield, and seeing some on the one side hanging, he demands the cause; answer was made, "For denying the king's supremacy;" on the other side some burning, he, asking the cause, was answered, "For denying the real presence in the Sacrament." "Some," quoth he, "hanged for Papistry, and some burnt for Protestantism? Hoity-toity on a God's name—chil be nere nother!" Such an one is every timorous, faint-hearted Christian, another Gallio, a new Nicodemus, that would fain steal to heaven, if nobody might see him; one that owes God some good will, but dares not show it; his religion is primarily his prince's, subordinately his landlord's; whilst Christ stands on the battlements of heaven, and beckons him thither by His Word, his heart answers, "Lord, I would fain be there, but that there is a lion or a bear, some trouble in the way." All his care is for a ne noceat; let him but sleep in a whole skin, then omnia bene—whether right or wrong, all is one to him.

Fox, Actr and Monuments.

Prov. xxii. 13.

MMXV.—The devil's hard dealing with the ensnared sinner.

It is not unknown how the Spanish Index deals with Velcurio, who, commenting on Livy, saith that the fifth age was decrepit under the popes and the emperors. The Index favourably takes out the popes, and leaves the emperors wholly obnoxious to the imputation. Thus the devil winds out himself at the last from the wicked, refusing to carry the burthen any longer, but leaves it wholly to their supportation; he that flattered them

Index Hisp. Faber, civilis.

before with the paucity of their sins now takes them in the lurch and over-reckons them; he that kept them so long in the beautiful gallery of Hope now takes them aside and shows them the dark dungeon of Despair, and, engrossing all their iniquities in great text-letters, hangs them on the curtain of their bed's feet, to the wracking amazement of their distracted and distempered souls.

Acontii Stratagemata Satana.

MMXVI.—The great folly of costly apparel.

*Whitaker's Serm.,
Lond., 1649.*

Look upon a man that dwells but in a borrowed house, expecting every hour when he shall have warning to avoid (evacuate), he doth not trouble himself to bestow any cost either in repairing or trimming up thereof, because he hath no time in it, no lease for term of years to come. Such is the condition of every living man: his body is but, as it were, a house lent unto the soul, from whence it looketh daily and hourly to depart. Why should he, then, be so careful to clothe this body with rich and brave apparel, when (God knows how soon) it must be laid down in the earth, there to rot and perish, and, in the meantime, neglect to adorn and beautify his precious soul with heavenly graces, which is immortal?

MMXVII.—How the wounded sinner is to be cured.

Jo Wann, Serm., de Tempore.

Speculum Exemplitum.

THERE is a story (nothing worth but for the moral) of a great king that married his daughter to a poor gentleman that loved her, but his grant had a condition annexed unto it: that whensoever the gentleman's side looked black, or he lost his wedding ring, he should not only lose his wife, but his life also. One day, pursuing his sports, he fell into a quarrel, where at once he received a bruise on his left breast and lost his ring in the scuffle. The tumult over, he perceived the danger whereunto his own heedlessness had brought him, and, in bitterness of soul, shed many tears. In his sorrow he spied a book, which, opening, he found therein his ring again, and the first words he read was a medicine for a bruised side; it directed him to those herbs whereof a plaster applied would not fail to heal him: he did so, was cured, was secured. Thus applied:—The great King of Heaven marries to man, poor man, His own daughter, Mercy, or everlasting kindness, but threatens him that his side must not look black, his heart must not be polluted with spiritual idolatry, nor must he lose his wedding ring, love to God and His saints, lest he forfeit both God's mercy and his own salvation. Man, in pursuit of worldly affairs, quarrels with his neighbours, and scuffles with Contention; so his heart gets a bruise, looks black with hatred, and charity, his wedding ring, is lost in these wilful turbulences and vexations. What should we do but mourn? Lo! God, in His goodness, directs him to a Book, the holy Gospel; then the Spirit helps him to his ring again, his former love; and, to heal his bruise, prescribes him these special herbs of grace, repentance, thankfulness, and meekness, which, being well applied, will keep his ring of faith sure from losing, and his heart from the self-procured blows of contention, and so hold for ever his dear espoused wife, the beautiful daughter of the King, God's everlasting goodness and mercy.

MMXVIII.—Minding of the day of judgment an excellent means to prevent sin.

Marshall's Serm., at Fait.

It is reported of a certain Christian king of Hungary, who, being on a time marvellous sad and heavy, his brother, who was a resolute courtier, would needs know what he ailed: "Oh, brother," quoth he, "I have been a great sinner against God, and I know not how I shall appear before Him when He comes to judgment." "These are," said his brother, "melancholy fits!" and so he makes a toy of them, as gallants use to do. The king replies nothing for the present, but the custom of that country was, that if the executioner of justice came and sounded a trumpet before any man's door, the man was presently, without any more ado, to be had to execution. The king, in the dead of the night, sends for his death's-man, and causeth him to sound his trumpet before his brother's door, who, seeing and hearing the messenger of death, springs in pale and trembling into his brother's presence, and beseeches the king to tell him wherein he had offended him. "Oh, brother," replies the king, "thou hast loved me and never offended me, and is the sight of my executioner so dreadful to thee? and shall not so great a sinner as I fear to be brought to the judgment-seat of God?" Thus, did but men stand in St. Jerome's posture, always hearing the trumpet sounding in their ears, "Surgite mortui, venite ad judicium," they would make more conscience of their ways; they would then strike upon their thigh, and cry out, "Quid faciam (What shall I do)?" And thus, in all their doings remembering their latter end, they would never do amiss.

MMXIX.—Man and wife to bespeak one another kindly

SUCH was the spiritual hatred of the Jews to the Lord Jesus, that they would not vouchsafe to give Him His name when they talked of Him or with Him; and, to show the utter dislike they had of Him, they used to say, "Is this He?" "Art Thou He that wilt do such a thing?" "Whither will He go that we shall not find Him?" They would not say, "Is this Jesus Christ? or the Son of God?" This, now, was a spiteful kind of speaking, and did bewray abundance of malice that lay hidden in their hearts. And so it sometimes falleth out betwixt man and wife: contempt, disdain, anger, and malice will not suffer the one to afford unto the other their names and titles, lest they should be put in mind of such duties as those names and titles require; whereas the very names of husband and wife doth greatly help to persuade the mind and to win the affections—yea, the very mention of these names doth oftentimes leave a print of duty behind in the conscience.

Burrough's Gospel Light.

John vii. 11, 15, 35.

MMXX.—The experimental Christian the undaunted Christian.

HE that hath been at sea and often escaped the many dangers of wind and weather (even then when both conspired to make a wreck of himself and the ship he went in) is the bolder and readier to entertain a new voyage. And why? Because he hath, by the assistance of his God, made way for deliverance in times of such imminent danger. Such an experimental, bold, logical Christian was David, when he made a lion his major, a bear his minor: "He that delivered me from the lion and the bear will also deliver me from this uncircumcised Philistine." And such are all good Christians upon whom the cross hath lain the heaviest, upon whose shoulders the persecuting ploughers have made the deepest furrows, whose feet have been often in the stocks, and into whose souls the irons have made a deep impression: they, having had from time to time the experience of God's deliverance from, and assistance in, the time of their trouble, are as bold as lions, and ready to meet death in the face, though it come in the most ghastly figure or shape that may be conceived.

1 Sam. xvii. 34.

MMXXI.—Sin; the strange nature thereof.

IT may seem strange that is written of the nature of thunder and lightning, that it bruise the tree, yet breaks not the bark; it cracketh the blade, yet never hurteth the scabbard; melteth the money in a man's purse, yet never toucheth his person. Such a thing and of such a nature is sin: it will bruise and wound the heart, but never harm the eyes, or the ears, or hands; it will pierce and afflict the conscience, but never hurt the outward man; it is even a plague unto the soul, yet a pleasure to the body.

Magici Physica.

MMXXII.—God's goodness, man's unthankfulness.

Westfield's Serm.,
 Lond., 1619.

It is observable that there are but three main rivers in this land, whereof that of Thames is held the best; insomuch that, when a courtier gave it out that Queen Mary, being displeased with the city of London, threatened to remove the term and parliament to Oxford, an alderman asked whether she meant to turn the channel of Thames thither or not: "If not," saith he, "by God's grace we shall do well enough." And, in truth, that river is such a prosperity to that city, it is such a loving Meander, that it winds itself about, and shows its silver arms upon her sides, ebbing slowly eight, but flowing merrily four hours, as if she longed to embrace her beloved city with rich presents of merchandise; but what return doth the city make? what thanks for all this love? She sweeps all the dirt of her streets in her face, and chokes her up with soil and rubbish. This is man's case: God crowneth him with blessings, protecteth him with His power, carries him on from mercy to mercy, &c., sed ubi fructus? The swelling river of God's favours, by the surfeit of a tide, doth no sooner bring in the increase of outward things, but that increase doth breed in his mind another swelling, and in his body another surfeiting; he swells in pride and surfeits in wantonness: and thus peace breeding wealth, wealth breeds pride, and pride makes contention, and contention kills peace, and by this means a civil war is raised, to the ruin both of Church and commonwealth.

"Pertusum vas
 est ingratus homincio."—CORNARIUS.

MMXXIII.—Popish miracles condemned.

Chron. Rob
 Amesburiensis.

It is recorded that at Amesbury, in Wiltshire, when Queen Eleanor, the wife of King Henry III., lay there, a man, that feigned himself to have been long blind, came to her and told her that he had now his sight restored at the tomb of the king, her deceased husband. The mother easily believed it, but her son, King Edward I., knowing this man—that he had ever been a dissolute wretch and a vile impostor—dissuaded her from giving faith unto it, protesting that he knew so well the justice of his father, that, if he were living, he would sooner put out both the dissembler's eyes than restore sight to either of them. So, without doubt, those saints, to the virtue of whose dead bones they of the Church of Rome attribute the glory of conversion, and enlightening, and restoring of limbs, would (if they were living) rather say, "These men had no eyes of grace at all, no lineaments of piety, than that any light was given them, any health restored out of their dead dusts or painted resemblances."

"Qui expectat miraculum, miraculum ipse,"
 —AUG.

MMXXIV.—The great danger of the least sin.

Adams, Contagion of Sin.
 James iii. 5.

A DRAM of poison diffuseth itself to all parts till it strangle the vital spirits and turn out the soul from the body: how great a matter a little fire kindleth! It is all one whether a man be killed with the prick of a little thorn or with the hewing of a broadsword, so he be killed. We have seen a whole arm imposthumated with the prick of a little finger; a little postern opened may betray the greatest city. Thus, a little sin infects a great deal of righteousness: if Satan can but wound our heel (as the poets feign of Achilles), he will make shift to kill us there—even from the heel to send death to the heart; if the serpent can but wriggle in his tail by an ill thought, he will soon get in his head by a worse action. Hence is it that Christ calls hatred murder, a wanton eye adultery; because that, besides the possibility of the act, they are the same in the intention of the heart. Let no tang of corruption come to the least part, if thou desirest to preserve the whole.

"Nolite contemnere venialia, quia minima sunt, sed timeo, quia plura."—AUG., de Decem. Eboridis.

MMXXV.—The heart of man the very seed-plot of all sin.

Sibbe's Cordial.

THAT which we call gunpowder is made of the salt and fatter earth; in the ground are the materials, which, when art hath concocted, chymed, prepared, charged, and discharged, it overturns towns and towers, forts and cities. So the heart of man is the seminary of all mischief—the seeds of all sins are naturally in us; not so much as treason, murder, perjury, but are in us quoad potentiam, yea, quoad naturam et propensionem (there is in our nature a proclivity to them). Nay, the heart is so apt ground to produce and mature these innata mala (inbred seeds) to actuals, that, without the preventing grace of God—unless the reason of a man and religion of a Christian keep them under from eruption—there is no avoiding them, “Plura machi-natur cor uno momento.”—

HUGO, de Anima,
lib. i.

MMXXVI.—The vanity of man in seeking after great things condemned.

WHEN Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, was solicited by the Tarentines and other people of Italy to be the head of their league against the Romans, whilst he sat musing on these affairs, Cineas, his great favourite, came in upon him, and, desiring to be acquainted with his thoughts, to which he was never made a stranger, Pyrrhus gives him notice of the embassy of the Tarentines, and asketh his advice; yet his purpose was to join with them against the Romans, and doubted not but to prevail. The orator demands, if he should have the battle, what would he do then. He answered that then Sicilia and Sardinia would be at his command. The other consented, but still asked what then should be done. He then replies that Africa could not hold out, but might be easily conquered; but Cineas still pursued him with his old question, what he would do then. He again answered, that when all these countries were subdued, Græcia would soon come in; but, being again demanded what he proposed to do then, he, apprehending the orator's intention, and smiling, replied, “Then, Cineas, we will rest and be merry.” The orator answered that he might do so presently, without any trouble to himself or others, if he would sit down and be contented with his own. This heathen, by the light of nature and reason, easily saw and excellently taught the miserable folly of wicked men, who, projecting beyond the moon, seeking great things, and vexing themselves and thousands of others by their wicked engagements, at length, with much fishing, catch a frog, and attain no more than what they might have long enjoyed with less labour and trouble to themselves and others.

Plutarch, in Vita

Sabel., lib. viii.

Æneid, iv.

“Nec tibi regnandi veniet tam dura cupido.”— VIRG., in Eclog.

MMXXVII.—All sin must be hated; and why so.

THERE is mention made by a good old Christian of a certain dog, whose master being slain by one of his enemies, he lay by him all the night with great lamentation—howling and barking. In the morning many came to see the dead corpse; amongst the rest he also came that slew his master. The dog no sooner saw the homicide, but he made at him and held him fast, whereby the wickedness of so close a murder was discovered. See here the love, the faithfulness of a poor brutish creature for a piece of bread, that was so incensed against the murderer of his master. And shall poor, sinful man make much of those enemies, those sins that killed his Lord and Master, Christ Jesus; cherish those that apprehended Him, that bound Him, that scourged Him, that violently drew Him to the cross, and there murdered Him? It was neither Pilate nor the Jews nor the soldiers that could have done Him the least hurt, had not our sins, like so many butchers and hangmen, come in to their assistance. Let, therefore, our fury be whetted against all sin; let that be the object of our hatred; be sure to be the death of that that hath been the death of so good a Master, and will, if not prevented, be the death of thy poor soul to all eternity.

Ambros., in Hexameron,
lib. vi., cap. 4.

“Agnosce homo quam gravia sint vulnera,” &c.

MMXXVIII.—The sad condition of borrowing upon usury.

Look but upon a silly sheep, how it makes for succour and shelter under a thorny bush in the midst of stormy and tempestuous weather, but still, as she goeth away, she leaveth part of her fleece behind, and the oftener she goeth the barer and nakeder she is, so that at last

Arn. Pontani,
Bibliothecæ, Com-scianum.

"Curas curis accumulat," &c.—
GREG. NYSS.

she is able to abide neither bush nor storm. Such a bush of thorns is every griping usurer to the poor borrower: he will leave him at length no fleece on his back, no house over his head, no money in his purse, no bed to rest upon, no flesh on his bones, no credit with the world.

MMXXIX.—Christians to walk worthy the name of Christ.

Plutarch, in Vita.

IT is said of Alexander the Great, that spying in his army a lusty, proper fellow, yet when he came to trial he proved a very coward, he asked him what was his name. He answered, "Alexander." "Nay, then," said Alexander, "either deny thy name or by some valorous exploit or other redeem thy credit; I will not have a coward of my name." Thus it may be said of many Christians, such as by outward profession are so accounted, "If ye be Christians, why are ye drunk? Why are ye covetous? Why are ye proud, envious, malicious, uncharitable? Aut occuletur nomen aut mutantur mores (Either waive your names or change your manners in life and conversation)."

Raworth's Serm.,
Lond.

MMXXX.—Afflictions, God's love-tokens.

A GENTLEMAN hath a hawk which he prizeth highly; he feeds her with his own hand, is very careful in the pluming of her feathers, sets her upon his fist, and taketh great delight in the sight of her; but for all this he puts vervels upon her legs and a dark hood upon her head. "Et quare capitulum? quare compedes?" saith the father. ("Why is she hoodwinked? why fettered?") Lest she should fly away; he would not by any means have her out of call; but that she might be always within the lure. Thus God deals with His children. There cannot be a more evident sign of His love than when He chastiseth them, nor a greater evidence of His hatred and rejection than when He gives men over to do what they list, to go on and prosper in all wicked and licentious courses. When He lets men neglect all duties without controlment, He makes it manifest that His purpose is to turn them out of service; and when He lets them feed at will in the pleasant pastures of sin, it is more than probable that He hath destinated them to the slaughter.

Bernard.

"Præsens indulgentia futuram penam accersit."
—ISIDOR, PELUSIOT.

MMXXXI.—God not the author of sin.

As a man that cutteth with a dull knife is the cause of cutting, but not of the ill-cutting and hacking of the knife—the knife is the cause of that; or if a man strike upon an instrument that is out of tune, he is the cause of the sound, but not of the jarring sound—that is the fault of the untuned strings; or as a man riding upon a lame horse stirs him—the man is the cause of the motion, but the horse himself of the halting motion: thus, God is the author of every action, but not of the evil of that action—that is from man. He that makes instruments and tools of iron or other metal, he maketh not the rust and canker which corrupteth them, that is from another cause; nor doth that heavenly workman, God Almighty, bring in sin and iniquity; nor can He be justly blamed if His creatures do soil and besmear themselves with the foulness of sin, for He made them good.

De Carbo, *Inter
Homs*.

"Delectanda et ab hominanda est opinio quæ Deum cujusquam malæ actionis credit authorem."—AUG.,
Respons. ad Ar.,
Job xxxiv. 11.
Ps. v. 4.

MMXXXII.—The appropriation of faith is all in all.

Judges vii. 20.

1 Chron. xxvi. 30.

Matt. xxv. 4.

IN Gideon's camp every heart had his own pitcher; amongst Solomon's men of valour every man wore his sword; the five wise virgins had every one oil in her lamp; Luther was wont to say there lay a great deal of divinity couched up in pronouns—as meum, tuum, suum (his, mine, thine, his). Thus, faith appropriated is all in all:

a bird shall as soon fly with another's wings as thy soul mount to heaven by another's faith. Whosoever will go to God, whether it be in prayer or in any religious performances, he must have a faith of his own; it must be fides tua (thy faith). It is not enough to say, "Lord, Lord!" but to say, with David, "My Lord!" with Job, "My Redeemer!" with the blessed Virgin, "My Saviour!" not to say, "Credimus," but "Credo"—not "We believe," but "I believe in God." Every man must possess and be accountable for his own faith. When a man believes his own reconciliation by the merits of Christ Jesus, and strengthens this belief by a desire of pleasing God, this is fides sua, the right appropriation of faith.

August., de Fide.

Matt. vii. 22.

Ps. xviii.

MMXXXIII.—God's judgment and man's not concurrent.

It is observable, that when the moon is lightest to the earth, she is darkest to heaven; and when lightest to heaven, the darkest to earth. Thus, they that seem best to the world are often the worst to God, they that are best to God seem worst to the world, and men most glorious to the world are obscurest to the Divine approbation; others obscure to the world's acknowledgment are principally respected in God's favour. The Samaritans were condemned by the Jews, yet nine Jews are condemned by one Samaritan. The Jews thought, that if but two men were saved in the world, the one should be a Scribe, the other a Pharisee; but Christ saith that neither of them both shall come into the kingdom of heaven. Samuel was mistaken in Eliab, Abinadab, and Shammah, for the Lord had chosen David. Isaac preferreth Esau, but God sets up Jacob—all this to justify that God's judgment is not as man's judgment; His thoughts not as man's thoughts, neither are His ways as man's ways.

Adams's Contagion of Sin.

Luke xvii. 13-28.

1 Sam. xvi.

Isa. lv. 8.

MMXXXIV.—The uncharitable Christian described.

DIOGENES, a witty beggar, would usually walk in a place where earthen statues were erected in honour of some that died for their country; to them he would pray, to them reach out his hand, bow, and beg; being asked the reason, he answered, "Nihil aliud quam repulsam meditor (I think of nothing but a repulse or denial)." We have many such living statues in these strait-laced times of ours—mere idols, that have mouths and speak not, eyes and pity not, hands and give not; the poor are sure of nothing but a repulse. They are just like St. Peter's fish, it had money in the mouth but not a hand to give it. Like Dives' dogs, they can lick a poor man with their tongues, else give him no relief. The Papists will rather lose a penny than a paternoster; these will give ten paternosters before one penny. They give the words of Naphtali—pleasant words, but no meat: as if the poor were like Ephraim, to be fed with the wind; or as if their words were Verbum Domini (the Word of God), that men might live by it.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

"Deus emit sanguine servos; Mercuri exiguus nos piget ære Deum." —BILLIUS, Hos. xii. 1. Matt. iv. 4.

MMXXXV.—The great danger and disgrace of lying under the guilt of one eminent sin.

WHEN one commended Alexander for his many noble acts, another objected against him, that he killed Calisthenes. He was valiant and successful in the wars: true, but he killed Calisthenes. He overcame the great Darius: so, but he killed Calisthenes. His meaning was, that this one unjust act poisoned all his better deeds. And there was Naaman, the Syrian, a man plentifully commended. When he was cured and converted by Elisha, first, he is charitable, offers gold and garments, but he excepts bowing in the house of Rimmon; he is devout and begs earth for sacrifice, but excepts Rimmon; he is religious and promiseth to offer to no one but the Lord, yet excepts Rimmon. This Rimmon, like the fly in the alabaster-box, spoiled all the good intentions. Thus, one Quin. Curt.

Plutarch., in Vita.

2 Kings v. 1.

"In facie plus offendit nævus," &c.—PLUTARCH, in Moral.

spot on the face spoils all the beauty, one vice in the soul disgraceth a great deal of virtue : "Oh, such a man is an honest man—a good man, but—" Let every man take heed : this is that "but" which the devil aims at. It is true we must hate all sin, and every sin sours, but to the repentant Christian it shall not be damnable. There is in all corruption, to most affliction, to none damnation that are in Christ. One sin may disgrace us and sour us, but, to our comfort, upon true repentance we are made sweet again by the all-perfuming blood of our Saviour.

MMXXXVI.—The sinfulness of sin.

Bromiardi Summa
*radicans.

THERE was a great prince, who, intending travel into a far country, left his daughter to the tuition of a servant ; him he made chief, and set under him a controller and five serviceable guardians. The prince was no sooner gone, but the servant falls to lust and riot, forceth the lady, the controller, and the guardians to the like intemperance, which they refusing, he despoils her of all her robes and jewels, them of their weapons, and turns them out, by beggary or pillage, to seek their lives in the wide world. This servant is man, God is the prince, his daughter the soul, the controller is reason, and the five senses the guardians : whilst these hinder man from spoiling his soul with riot and excess, he abuseth them, turns reason to madness, and makes all his senses but as so many instruments of wickedness ; but woe to that servant who, when his Lord cometh, He shall find so doing !

MMXXXVII.—The several degrees of faith.

Adams's Faith's Encouragement.

As meat digested turns to juice in the stomach, to blood in the liver, to spirits in the heart : so faith is, in the brain, knowledge ; in the reason, assent ; in the heart, application. As the child in the womb hath first a vegetative life, then a sensitive, lastly, a rational : so faith, as mere knowledge, hath but a vegetation ; as allowance, but sense ; only the application and apportioning the merits of Christ to the soul by it, this is the rational, the very life of it. To exemplify this similitude yet further : the vegetative soul is the soul of plants, and it is a true soul in the kind, though it have neither sense nor reason ; the sensitive soul is the soul of beasts—a true soul, includes vegetation, but is void of reason ; the rational soul is the soul of man—a distinct soul by itself, comprehends both vegetation and sense, having added to them both the perfection of reason. So there are three kinds or degrees of faith :—1. To believe there is a God—this is the faith of Pagans ; and it is a true faith, though it believe neither the Word of God ; nor mercy from God. 2. To believe what God says is true—this is the faith of devils and reprobates ; and a true faith, including the faith of Pagans, and going beyond it, yet it apprehends no mercy. 3. To believe on God, to rely upon His mercy in Christ—this is the faith of the elect ; comprehends both the former, yet is a distinct faith by itself.

"Interrogo te, utrum credas ; dicis, Credo : fac tu quod dicis, et fides est."
—AUG., in John.

MMXXXVIII.—The uncertain comfort in riches.

Lightfoot's Sermon,
Uttoxeter, 1624.

"Nil prodest pondus mihi divitiis auri."—TIBULL.,
lib. iii.

CAST but your eye upon a vagrant fellow, whom, because he is big-boned and well-limbed, and able to go through his work, a man takes in at his doors and cherisheth ; it may so be that for a while he takes pains and plies his work, but when he spies opportunity the fugitive servant is gone, and takes away with him more than all his service came to. Thus, the riches and preferments of this world may seem to stand a man in some stead for a season, but at last they irrecoverably run away, and carry with them all his joys and worldly comforts : as Jacob stole away Laban's idols, so they take away the peace and content of heart and leave him desperate.

MMXXXIX.—As to beware of all sins, so especially of beloved sins.

Look upon a city besieged, how wise governors will take care of every postern-door and of every part of the wall, and repair the least decays thereof, but if one gate be more likely to be entered than another, or if any part of the wall be weaker or more easily to be thrown down than another, they will be sure to set the strongest watch in that place where the danger is most. And so it is, or should be, with us in respect of our most precious souls : we have here a fort to keep, which is every day assaulted by our enemies, and we have a diseased soul of our own, distempered with many spiritual maladies ; but some of them are worse than others, and some parts of the fort are weaker and more in danger than others are—that is, there are some sins, as sins whereunto by constitution of body we are most inclined, such as are Delilah, bosom-beloved sins, by which the devil more easily surpriseth and captivateth our souls ; and therefore, as we should set diligent watch against all sins, so we should especially bend our forces against those that do or may in a more especial manner breed our harm and hinder our salvation.

Marshall's Serm.
Westm.

"Gravius est peccatum diligere quam perpetrare."—
HIERON., in Ep

MMXL.—The uncertainty of man's life.

It hath been usual with cathedral churches, and is still in use with colleges, to let leases of houses and lands for the term of three lives, so that the purchaser knows the certainty of his time, and that if one life will not hold another shall. But it is not so betwixt God and man : there is no man but is God's tenant-at-will. He may put him out of house and home when He list ; He never deviseth any tenement longer than for one life, the which being expired, shall never be renewed again ; nor will He suffer us to dwell any longer in the best and strongest of His houses than above seventy years. If, haply, some continue eighty, their term is exceeding long ; and yet, of all this time, they cannot be secured of one half-hour nor the peaceable possession of one moment—so many and so mighty are the enemies that waylay them—

"Brevis est vita, et ipsa brevis incerta."—AUG., de Verbo, Dom., Serm. xvi.

"Ferro, peste, fame, vinclis, algore, calore, Mille modis miseros Mors rapit una viros."

("By sword, plague, famine, by bonds, by heat, and cold,
And a thousand other ways, Death brings us to his fold.")

What, then, remains ? Since that our enemies are so strong, our earthly houses so weak, the coming of our Landlord unknown, and the term of our lease so uncertain, let us be sober and watching in prayer, and then happy shall that servant be who, when his Master cometh, He shall find so doing.

MMXLI.—The biting usurer described.

SAD was the condition of the Egyptians when the plague of flies was upon them ; they did so bite and sting them, that they were weary of their lives. Such are all biting usurers, that gorge themselves with the spoil of their poorer brethren, the suckers of their sap, the bibbers of their blood, the pinchers of their hearts, and the stingers and the wringers of their very souls, who, with noverint universi, &c. (make a universal ruin of many a man's estate), and so fetch him still within the condition of the obligation, that in the end his state is woeful, and his heart breaketh with the bitter grief of "Be it known unto all men."

Exod. viii. 24.

Price's Serm.,
Lond.

"Similis est pecunia usurarii morsui aspidis."—BRYAN, in Matt.

MMXLII.—How to deal with sin, being once committed.

AMNON, when he had deflowered his sister Tamar, forthwith hated her, and that in a far more exceeding manner than he loved her before ; then puts her out of doors, and locks

Shute's Serm.,
Lond.

the door after her, lest she should return again. Thus must we deal with sin : being once committed, hate it with a deadly hate—put it far from us, lock up the doors of our hearts, shut up the windows of our eyes, and take up a resolution of never sinning again.

2 Sam. xiii. 13.

MMXLIII.—How to make a right use of the doctrine of predestination.

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond.

CARDINAL POLE, a good man, though a Papist, being desired by one to tell him how he might come to understand the former part of St. Paul's epistles, which are for the most part doctrinal positions, made this answer : " By a careful practising of the latter part of the same epistles, which consist much in precepts and directions how to lead a life in all godliness and holiness of conversation." And thus, if any man desire to know the former part of predestination—whether his name be written in the Book of Life, whether he be of the election of grace, whether he be predestinated to life eternal—let him but look into the latter part of predestination, the means as well as the end of predestination, whether his conversation be in heaven, whether his life be suitable to the profession of the Gospel of Christ, and though he meet with many rubs in the way, and through frailty stumble and fall, yet riseth again and presseth on to the mark of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Thus, if a man do, he may conclude himself to be within the number of the elect. And this is the right use that is to be made of the doctrine of predestination. But it is otherwise with too, too many in these all-questioning days of ours : for whereas St. Paul presents us with a chain let down from heaven, election and predestination at one end of the chain, and glorification at the other end thereof, both which ends God keepeth fast in His hand. As for the middle links of the chain, calling and justification, those He leaves for them to lay hold on ; but they cannot be quiet, but must be tugging and labouring to wrest those parts out of God's hands, and so miss of the right use and comfort that is to be found in the abstruse, yet sweet doctrine of predestination.

Rom. viii. 29, 30.

MMXLIV.—The relation of parents, wife, children, to be slighted if they once appear in competition with the commandments of God.

In Vita ejus, per Anonym.

It was a pious (though erroneous) spirit that lodged in the breast of Sir Thomas More, once Lord Chancellor of England, being at that time a prisoner in the Tower of London, merely upon the account of denying the king's supremacy, who regarded not the prayers and passed by the tears of his loving and tender wife when she persuaded him with the forfeiture of his conscience to endeavour the restoration of his liberty. And thus it is that the relation of parents, wife, children, &c., are to be slighted when they once appear in competition with the commandments of God. "Pietas est impium esse pro Domino (It is piety towards God to be unnatural to our friends)"—nay, which is a more harsh expression, to hate them. Strange, that love itself should require hatred, but yet just—not in an absolute, but a comparative sense. We must not love father or mother more than God—yea, when their desires come in competition with His will, we must hate them for His sake ; we must say as Levi, "Nescio vos (I know you not) ;" or with Christ to His mother, "Quid mihi tecum (What have I to do with thee) ?" trampling under foot all natural relations which would hinder us from obedience to Divine injunctions.

Jerome.

Matt. x. 37.

Hardy's Serm.,
1648.

MMXLV.—The sincere, upright man described.

Niceph., Hist.,
lib. ix., cap. 14.

It is said of Pachomius, a religious abbot, that, digesting (arranging) his numerous monks into various classes, according to the letters in the Greek alphabet, suited the names he gave them to the natures he observed in them: as, for those whom he found politicians and dissemblers, he compared them to the letters ζ and ξ, which are full of crooked turnings; those whom he observed to be plain-hearted and upright, to the letter ι, which is carried right upward without any obliquity at all. And thus it is that the sincere, upright man is carried in a straight line to the performance of all religious duties; he levels all his actions to a right end; the loadstone of his soul is not self-interest, but God's honour; he casts no squint eye at by-respects, but looks directly forward at his Creator's glory.

Cassiani Annot. in Pacemii Regulam.

"Integer viam sce-lerisque purus."—
HORAT., Car. i.

MMXLVI.—Wives to be beloved of their husbands as wives.

WHEN Martia, Cato's youngest daughter, had buried her husband, it was, after some competent time, demanded why she did not marry again. She made answer, "Non se invenire virum," &c. (She could not find a man that would love her more than hers). Thus, it is heartily to be wished that this might not be charged on too many men: they love only with their eyes and their fingers, because of the beauty they see in, or the money they receive with, their wives, not with their hearts, out of an ingenuous, or rather pious, respect to that relation of a wife, wherein they belong to them.

Hieron., *Adversus
Jovin.*, lib. i.

"Facies, non uxoamatur."—JUVE-NAL., Sat., vi.

MMXLVII.—Ignorant, upstart preachers reproved.

PLUTARCH tells us that the virgins which were to attend Diana's temple were for many years, as it were, brought up in a school, and called μελλιερεῖς (such as should administer sacred rites), and then, being sufficiently instructed, they were called ιερεῖς (admitted to their divine mysteries), and afterwards they became παιτερεῖς (instructors of others). Then, surely, if the light of nature taught them to use so much care in educating those who were to perform the worship of a false goddess, how shameful is the blindness of those Christians who think some natural abilities of memory and elocution sufficient to qualify a priest of the true and Most High God—such who, whilst they can lay no just claim to an immediate inspiration, suddenly and unpreparedly enter upon so high employment; sacerdotes momentanei (such as in a day, in a moment, turn priests); modo idiota, mox clericus (now laics, anon clerks); such as skip from the shopboard to the pulpit, and owe more sacrifices for their own than the people's ignorance.

In Lib. Moral.

Hardy's Serm.
Lond., 1653.

Leo apud Gratian.

Greg. Naz., Orat.
xxii.

MMXLVIII.—Men or women painting themselves condemned.

WHEN a carpenter or joiner hath made some accurate piece of work, he will not think well that any one should discommend or rend and deface it; and can it be otherwise than a great disgrace when God hath, in a wonderful manner, framed and fashioned both men and women, but they must needs be tampering, and overlay His work with the devil's colours? What is this but in a sort to make Christ a liar; for whereas He saith, "Ye cannot make one hair white or black," they have a way to make them all of what colour they please.

Cyprian.

Lille's Serm., 1619.

"Delet pictoriam Dei, qui vultum summi materiali ab-linit."—AMBROS., in Hexamer.

Matt. v. 36.

MMXLIX.—Neutrality in religion reproved.

THE bat, like the woman with the adulterous eye, watcheth for the twilight; such are all equivocating hermaphrodite Christians, religious neuters, who love the twilight of truth better than the noonlight, whose religion may well enough be declined with the article hac, for it

Prov. vii. 9.

Hist. Nat., lib. xxxv., cap. 9.

Ephes. vi. 16.
Rawlinson's Serm.
at Court, 1625.

is of the neuter gender. Not much unlike him in Pliny whose picture was so ambiguously drawn by Polygnotus Thasius, a cunning painter, that it was doubted whether he had painted him climbing upward or going downward with his shield. And so silly do these utrinquetaries (persons who appear to be on both sides) carry their shield of faith (as the apostle calls it), that it justly may be doubted whether it be to defend us or our adversaries: they have one foot within the gates of Sion, another within the gates of Babylon; one within the Church of England, another within the Church of Rome; one wing to fly to us, another to fly from us, upon the least advantage that may be.

MML.—To be careful in the keeping of our vow made in baptism.

Justus Lipsius, de Milit., lib. i., dialogue 6.

Pet. Lillie, ut antea.

"Cultor Dei memento fontis et lavacri rorem subisse sanctum."
—PRUDENT.

THE Romans, in times past, when they pressed any soldiers, ministered an oath of fidelity unto them, which they called sacramentum militare (the oath of their military service), without which oath they made a scruple to bear arms; and we, when we take up soldiers, do not always swear them, but they receive press-money, which binds them sufficiently. What, then, is to be thought of a soldier that, after he is admitted into pay and enrolled in the muster-book, shall forsake the camp without leave of his general, or perhaps revolt and run to the enemy, or, staying in the camp, entertain private conference with the enemy, and, as opportunity serves, betray the trust committed to his charge, as divers in our times perfidiously and basely have done; or if he do none of these, yet, either out of cowardice or contempt, never fights a blow nor performs any duty commanded? Do not such soldiers deserve punishment greater than if they had refused to serve, notwithstanding their allegiance doth bind them? So it is in the matter of religion: we receive God's press-money, then we begin to be His soldiers, and by that mystery do bind ourselves as fast as any vow or oath can tie us; and, being thus bound, if we be desertores militiæ (forsakers of our Christian profession), and become apostates or disobedient soldiers, whose standing is in God's camp, but fight the devil's battles; or such as carry God's mark in their foreheads, but are the devil's servants in their actions; or such as, under the pretence of fighting God's battles, betray the whole army to the enemy,—then we are more guilty than if we had never contracted with God to serve Him.

MMLI.—Men and women to be knowing in the Scriptures.

Vives, de Verit.
Fidei, lib. ii., cap.
de "Vet. Test."
Conf., lib. iii.,
cap. 5.

2 Tim. iii. 15;

Acts xviii. 24.

White's Serm.,
Oxon, 1628.

It is said of Angelus Politianus, that he would not vouchsafe (condescend to) the reading of the Scriptures, as not containing elegancies suitable to his wit and style—as if he meant to be saved by criticisms and quainter phrases; and St. Augustine (whilst unconverted) valued Tully above all comparison, as worthier of his study than any of the inspired authors—a sad choice, God wot! But let all of us be heartily affected with the excellency of the Scriptures above all other writings whatsoever; let us be such as Timothy, to know the Scriptures from our youth; such as Apollos, mighty in the Scriptures, much learned and versed in them, even to the stopping of the mouths of all gainsayers, and not to suffer ourselves to be bewitched with such authors with whom Aristotle is more frequent than St. Paul, making them our solemnest and devoutest studies and the Bible only read at some by-hours, rather because we would not be altogether ignorant than that we should be very skilful in it.

MMLII.—The vanity of an unguided multitude.

Willan's Serm.,
Westm., 1622.
"Multitudo non ratione ducitur sed impetu."—
SILV.

It was a good emblem of Cardinal Farnese, describing the bootless attempts of an unguided multitude, a beech-tree with the top off—the motto, "Ruina relinquitur (I am left in ruin);" for as that tree withers when it is lopped, so multitudes vanish without leaders, whose power, being not directed, is at the best but armed folly; so that they suddenly, upon the first opposal, become a burthen to themselves and a prey unto those that pursue them.

MMLIII.—A wife and no wife.

As a learned man said sometimes of Rome, having been some while there, that a man might seek Rome in Rome, and yet not find it there—Rome was so much altered from what it had been; or as the orator said of Sicily after Verres had governed there, that men sought Sicily in Sicily—it was by him so impoverished; or as a reverend prelate of ours said of Bellarmine's later works, that many missed Bellarmine in Bellarmine—they were so much unlike unto and came so far short of his former: so may a man find much want of a wife in a wife, much miss of a wife in a wife, if he maketh his choice amiss, and so consequently do himself great wrong, embracing, with Ixion, a cloud instead of Juno, or, with Paris, a shadow without substance—a sorry help, a cold comfort, a wife and yet no wife in regard of any joy or comfort in her, in regard of any help or assistance from her; so that it were much better to be altogether without: for what can be more miserable than to have a wife as covetous wretches have wealth, to have the burthen of a wife and want the blessing of a wife, to have the care and not the comfort; whereas the man that liveth single, as he misseth of the one, so he is yet, withal, freed from and eased of the other.

Jos. Scaliger.

Cicero, in Verrem, iii.
Winton, Apolog. adv., Bellarmine.

Erasmus, Adag.

Euripid., Helena.

Plutarch, de Avaritia.

MMLIV.—The bountiful goodness of God to His children.

It is said of Cyrus, the great monarch of Persia, that he never sat down at the table to eat, but whatsoever dish liked him best he would send part of it to his friends or such as deserved best of him, semeos anseres, semeos panes (sometimes the meat off his trencher, and sometimes the bread that himself did taste of), with this kind and loving salutation, "The king sends you this because he likes it best himself, and holds it choice and dainty." But God entertains His friends, His children, and servants after another manner: He makes them eat and drink at His table, or rather makes Himself their meat and drink, who is the Bread of Life and Well-spring of salvation. There is nothing so dear to Him but they shall have part with Him—His own joy, His own secret, His own sweetness, His own comfort, His own robe, His own justice, His own clothing, His own righteousness; nay, they shall have His very life and spirit as a seal and pledge of extraordinary grace and favour.

"Cyrus tibi ista," &c.—XENOPH., de Institut. Cyri, lib. xiii.

Wall's Serm., Westm., 1623.

MMLV.—Graces of God's Spirit, though seemingly lost, yet found at last.

THERE is a story of a poor man that served God faithfully and yet was oppressed cruelly, having all his goods taken from him by an exacting knight, whereupon, in a melancholy humour, he persuaded himself that God was dead, who had formerly been so faithful to him, and now (as he thought) had left him. An old man met him and desired him to deliver a letter into the hands of his oppressor, upon receipt and perusal of which the knight was so convinced, that immediately he confessed his fault and restored the goods, which made the poor man say, "Now I see that God may seem to sleep, but can never die." Thus it is that God, in the dispensation of His graces, may withdraw Himself for a time, yet He will return at last; He may, in His great wisdom, for a time hide His face, yet at last He will in mercy lift up the light of His countenance, to the great joy of that poor soul that seems to be deserted, and make bare the arm of His power for comfort.

Speculum Exemplorum.

Hardy's Serm., 1653.

Isa. liv.

MMLVI.—Men to be active in regaining their lost souls.

Plutarch, in Vita Themistocl.

Rowlandson's
Serm., 1623.

It is said of Xerxes, the greatest of the Persian princes, that when the Grecians had taken from him Sardis, a famous city in Asia the less (in St. John's time one of the seven Churches), he charged, that every day at dinner, some one or other, speaking with a loud voice, should remember (remind) him that the Grecians had taken the city of Sardis from him. But what shall poor sinners do that have lost more than a city, even their precious souls, which are of more worth than all the world besides? Let them, then, give their Redeemer no rest, by incessant prayers, till He deliver them and repair their ruins; let them still be calling upon Him to remember His loss and theirs (for theirs are His) till they have regained by Him that which was at first taken from them by the enemy, even the image of their God, after which they were created.

MMLVII.—Hypocrites discovering their own shame.

Fulgent, Mytholog.
Job xxxix. 13.

Rawlinson's Serm.
at Court, 1625.

Matt. vi. 1.

It is said of the peacock, that his pleasant wings (as holy Job calls them) are more for ostentation than for use, for whilst he spreads out his gaudy plumes he displays the ugliness of his hinder parts. Such are many hypocritical, dissembling wretches at this day, who yet differ from the peacock in this, that whereas he is said to have Argus's eyes in his tail, they (it should seem) have them in their heads, else how could they espy so many faults in others, none in themselves; yet whilst they spread out their gay plumes, whilst they simper it devoutly, and rail Jesuitically against Church and state, whilst they hear sermons, pray, give alms, make a sour Lenten face—all to be seen of men—what do they else but discover their own shame, show the ugliness of their hinder parts, bewray the fearfulness of their latter end?

MMLVIII.—Sin the chief cause of a nation or city's ruin.

Bodin, on Gov.
Weal.

Greut's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

PHYSICIANS make the threescore-and-third year of a man's life a dangerous climacterical year to the body natural, and statists make the five hundredth year of a city or kingdom as dangerous to the body politic, beyond which (say they) cities and kingdoms cannot stand. But (which is matter of wonder) who hath ever felt a city's languishing pulse? Who hath discerned the fatal diseases of a kingdom?—found out their critical days? Do they wax weak and heavy, and old and shrivelled, and pine away with years, as the body of man? No; they may flourish still and grow green, they may continue as the days of heaven, and be as the sun before the Almighty, if His wrath be not provoked by their wickedness. So that it is not any divine aspect of the heavens, any malignant conjunction of stars and planets, but the people's loose manners, ungracious lives, and enormous sins, which are both the chief cause and symptom of a kingdom or city's sickness, and they, indeed, soon bring them to a fearful end and utter desolation.

MMLIX.—Wherein the poisonous nature of sin consisteth.

Joseph Scaliger, in Theophrast. de Plantis.

Crashaw's Parable of Poison.

It is credibly reported that, in some parts of Italy, there are spiders of so poisonous a nature as will kill him that treads upon them, and break a glass if they do but creep over it. This shows clearly that the force of this poison is not in measure, by the quantity, but in the nature, by the quality thereof; and even so the force of sin consists, not in the greatness of the subject or object of it, but in the poisonous nature of it, for that it is the breach of the law, violation of the justice, and a provocation of the wrath of God, and is a present poison and damnation to men's souls; therefore, as the least poison, as poison, being deadly to the body, is detested, so the least sin, as sin, being mortal to the soul, is to be abhorred.

MMLX.—Our own natural corruption the cause of sin.

As corruption and infection could not, by the heat of the air ambient, enter into our bodies if our bodies did not consist of such a nature as hath in itself the causes of corruption, no more could sin, which is a general rot and corruption of the soul, enter into us, through the allurements or provocation of outward things, if our souls had not first, of themselves, received that inward hurt by which their desire is made subject to sin, as the woman's desire was made subject to her husband, and (as the philosophers say) the matter to the form. The causes of sin are to be ascribed to our own concupiscence; the root is from our own hearts. It is confessed that Satan may instil his poison and kindle a fire of evil desires in us, yet it is our own flesh that is the first mover and our own will which sets the faculties of the soul in combustion.

Bastard's Serm., 1612.

Gen. iii. 15.

James i. 13.

MMLXI.—Death of the soul more to be lamented than the death of the body.

ST. AUGUSTINE confesseth that in his youth (as many wantons do) he read that amorous discourse of Æneas and Dido with great affection, and when he came to the death of Dido he wept for pure compassion. "But, O me miserum!" saith the good father, "I bewailed (miserable man that I was!) the fabulous death of Dido, forsaken of Æneas, and did not bewail the true death of my soul, forsaken of her Jesus." Thus it is that many unhallowed tears are sacrificed to the idols of our eyes, which yet are as dry as pumices in regard of our souls. We bewail a body forsaken of the soul, and do not grieve for the soul abandoned by God. Hence we are to learn, from every corpse that is buried, what the daughters of Israel were to learn from Christ crucified, "Weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves!" not so much for the loss of your bodies as for the death of your immortal souls.

Confess., lib. i.,
cap. 13.

A Serm., 1616.

Luke xxiii. 28.

MMLXII.—Not to wait God's good pleasure in times of affliction very dangerous.

A MAN that is unskilful in swimming, having ventured past his depth, and so in danger of drowning, hastily and inconsiderately catcheth at what comes next to hand to save himself withal; but it so happeneth that he often layeth hold on sedgy weeds, that do but entangle him and draw him deeper under water, and there keep him down from ever getting up again, till he be (by that whereby he thought to save himself) drowned indeed. Thus it is that, whilst many, through weakness of faith and want of patience, are loth to wait God's good pleasure, and, being desirous to be rid in all haste of the present affliction, they put their hand oft to such courses as procure fearful effects, and use such sorry shifts for the relieving of themselves as do but plunge them further and deeper into such a labyrinth of evils, out of which they seldom or never get out again.

Cyril. Alex., Ep.
xxix.

Gataker's Serm.,
1623

MMLXIII.—The great benefit of timely accounting with God.

A MERCHANT or tradesman that at leisure times casteth up and balanceth his accounts, and brings all to one entire sum, is at any time ready if, on a sudden, he be called to a reckoning, though he have not time or leisure then, amidst many distractions otherwise, to run over accounts or to cast up the particulars; yet, to tell how things stand with him, it requires no more than the bare reading; he needs not stand to recount it, being sure it was well and truly cast up before. So he that hath beforetime truly examined his own estate, and made up the account betwixt God and his own soul, may thereby know how it standeth

Isaiah, ad Demonic.

Gataker's Serm.,
1623.

with him in regard of God, by calling to mind only the issue of his former examination, when, by reason of disturbance and distraction through the violence of temptation, he shall have small liberty and less leisure to take any exact trial or proof of it at the present.

MMLXIV.—Ignorance, especially in the ways of God, reproved.

Maxim., Serm. xvii.

Bourne's Serm.,
 Lond., 1622.

SOCRATES being asked what was the most beautiful creature in the world, he answered, "A man decked and garnished with learning." And Diogenes being demanded what burthen the earth did bear most heavy, replied, "An ignorant and illiterate man." Now, if these philosophers did thus judge of the excellency of knowledge and vileness of ignorance, how should Christians blush, for very shame, that, having lived so long in the school of Christ, trod so often upon the threshold of God's sanctuary, and sat so many years under the droppings of Gospel dispensations, they should yet be found ignorant of Christ and of the ways to everlasting happiness.

MMLXV.—All the creatures subservient to the good will and pleasure of God.

De Urretta, Hist. de Ethiopia, lib. 1,
 cap. 20.

Sandy's Travels.

Rowlandson, ut
antea.

"Cui cuncta assistunt acta et agenda simul." PROSPER., in Sentent.

It is reported of the river Nile, that it makes the land barren if, in ordinary places, it either flow under fifteen cubits or above seventeen, and therefore that Prester John (through whose country it runneth, and in which it ariseth from the hills called the Mountains of the Moon) can, at his pleasure, drown a great part of Egypt, by letting into the river certain vast ponds and sluices, the receptacles of the melted snow from the mountains; which, that he may not do, the Turks, who are now the lords of Egypt, pay a great tribute unto him, as the princes of that land have done time out of mind—which tribute, when the great Turk denied to pay, till by experience he found this to be true, he was afterwards forced with a greater sum of money to renew his peace with that governor of the Abyssinians, and to continue his ancient pay. The truth of this relation may be questionable, but this we are all bound to believe, that the great Emperor of heaven and earth, who sits above us, can, at His pleasure, make our land and all the region of the earth fruitful or barren by restraining or letting loose the influences of His blessings from above: at His command the winds blow and again are hushed; the air pours down rain, or sends mildews upon the earth; and it rests in His power to make our land barren, if we continue disobedient, or to fructify it more and more, if we repent; He hath dams and ponds—yea, an ocean of judgments in store—which He can (when it seems Him good) let down upon us to make both the land fruitless and the soul itself accursed that rebelleth; not only fire, or hail, or lightning, or thunder, or vapours, or snow, or stormy winds, blasting or mildews, but even whole volleys or volumes of curses, more than can be numbered, are pressed to do His will, to afflict and vex them that grieve His Holy Spirit by their sins and daily provocations.

MMLXVI.—Heaven a place of holiness.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

Wall's Serm.,
 Westm., 1623.

It was a good inscription which a bad man set upon the door of his house, "Per me nihil intret mali (Let not evil pass through me)." Whereupon said Diogenes, "Quomodo ingreditur dominus (How, then, shall the master get into his own house)?" A pertinent and ready answer! How it agrees with our mansions upon earth, let every man look to that. But most sure it is that no unclean thing can enter into heaven: whatsoever is there is holy—the angels holy, the saints holy, the patriarchs holy, the confessors, martyrs, all holy; but the Lord Himself most holy and blessed, to Whom all of them, as it were, in a divine anthem, sing and say, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty; heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy glory!"

MMLXVII.—God a sure, fast Friend.

It is usual with men to make towards a sun-dial whilst only the sun shineth; and with women, to make much of flowers, and to put them in their bosoms whilst they are green and flourishing, but, when once withered, they cast them upon the dunghill. But the Almighty deals not so with His friends—yea, when their danger is greatest, His help is nearest; and though oftentimes the case is so desperate, that friends' society can only afford pity, not succour; they may look on, they cannot take off; but the presence of God is ever active and powerful; and whereas most faithful friends part at death, this Friend will not leave us. David knew He would be with him in the shadow of death; and St. Paul assureth us that neither death nor life shall separate His love, not only when we walk through the pleasant meadow of prosperity, but when we go through the salt waters of affliction—nay, when we pass mare mortuum (the sea of death), He will be with us. It is the deriding question which the saints' enemies put to them in the time of affliction, "Ubi Deus (Where is now thy God)?" but they may return a confident answer, "Hic Deus (Our God is here: nigh unto us, round about us, in the midst of us)." It was His promise to Joshua then, and is since repeated by St. Paul, as belonging to all the faithful, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

Hardy's Serm.,
1691.

Ps. lxxix, 10.

Joshua i. 5.

Heb. xiii. 5.

MMLXVIII.—To rely upon God's blessing, notwithstanding all opposition.

WHEN an alderman of London was given to understand by a courtier, that the king, in his displeasure against the city, threatened thence to divert both term and parliament to Oxford, he asked whether he would turn thither the channel of the Thames or no. "If not," said he, "by the grace of God we shall do well enough." Thus, when either envy of meaner men repineth, or the anger of greater persons rageth against our lawful thriving, we shall do well to remember that there is a river which shall make glad the city of God—a current (I mean) of God's blessings which, whilst He vouchsafeth to our honest labours and legal callings, no malice of man or devil shall be able to stop or avert; for whilst this blessed river of God keeps its course, we shall do well enough; but if His hand, for our sins, turn it aside, as it were, into another channel, no wonder then if we thrive backwards, if we prosper not in the labour of our hands.

Richard III.

Rowlandson, ut
anted.

Ps. xvi. 4.

MMLXIX.—Regeneration; the excellency thereof.

ST. AUGUSTINE maketh this observation of Demosthenes, who, being asked what was the first and chiefest amongst the precepts of rhetoric, he answered, "Elocution" (or good utterance); what the second, he answered, "Elocution;" what the third, he answered still, "Elocution." "After the same manner," saith the good father, "if you ask me what is the first, the second, or the third among the precepts of Christian religion, I must answer—Humility." And what St. Augustine attributes to humility, in the praise and commendations thereof, may justly be given to regeneration, or the new creature, and to the excellency and dignity of that. If it be asked what was the first, or the second, or the third amongst the graces of God's Holy Spirit, the answer will be, καὶνὴ κτίσις (Our new creation); and good reason too, for without this new creation there is no freedom from damnation, no happiness to be obtained. If any man be in his natural condition, and would have any benefit by the death of Christ, he must be a new creature.

Augustin., Ep. ad
Dionisium, lvi.

Bourne, ut antea.

MMLXX.—Ignorance, especially in the ways of God, condemned.

It is related of Bion, the philosopher, that, meeting with one of his friends, who was somewhat too curiously busied to have his picture hewed out to the life in a piece of stone,

Ptolemaeus, Apophi
thegm.

but over-careless in the study of learning, he reproved on this manner, "Tu ut tibi similis lapis fieret, &c. (Hast thou been careful that the stone might be made like thee, and art thou not as careful that thou by thy ignorance be not like unto the stone)?" The like may be said of all the sons of vanity, such as are stocks and stones rather than men, than Christian men, that are careful to fulfil their lusts, which will prove their destruction, and negligent to be filled with divine knowledge, which will bring them to eternal happiness.

MMLXXI.—A caveat for bloody-minded men.

Evagrii Hist., cap.
iii.

"Ab nimium faciles qui tristia crimina candis," &c.—OVID., Fast.

Wallei Prethum Mundl.

It was a Christian-like, gallant resolution of Anastasius, the emperor, "Quod nihil vellet aggredi," &c. (that he would adventure on no exploit, though never so honourable and glorious, if he thought it might cost him a drop of blood). Then, let all such know, that wallow in flesh and blood, the blood of their sins and the blood of their iniquities—that delight in blood, and make no conscience how they spill innocent Christian blood, that are set upon miracles and labour to convert water into blood, colour seas, dye rivers, as if they would sail and swim to heaven through the hearts'-blood of their enemies—that Christ's blood may witness against them and charge them with the blood of their slain, quocunque sub axe, whether it were at home or abroad; that, as His blood calls for pardon, so theirs for vengeance, and may one day come upon the desperate malefactor, without repentance, to his ruin and confusion.

MMLXXII.—Sincere, upright men; the scarcity of them.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

Jer. v. 1.

Ps. xxxvii. 37.

Hardy's Sermon,
1649.

Ps. xii. 1.

It is storied of Diogenes, that at noonday he went about the streets with a candle lighted, and being asked why he did so, returned this answer, "Hominem quæro (I seek for a man)," meaning one that might deserve the name of man, but all in vain. It is the same with us at this day: God commanded the prophet that he should run to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and seek in the broad places thereof to find a man that executed judgment. And the prophet David bids us behold the upright; but where shall we find one upright man to behold? Pretenders to perfection, professors of sanctity, this age swarms with, but few practisers; facings of religion were never more in fashion, but the linings of piety and goodness never more out of request; so that we may well take up that of the Psalmist, "Help, Lord, for there is not one godly man left."

MMLXXIII.—The borrower's duty and comfort.

2 Kings vi. 5.

Cottesford, Sovereign Oil to Restore Debtors.

"Domus aut famulitium abjiciendum ut ere liberemur alieno."—PLUT., Moral.

A POOR labourer being taken to fell timber for the building of a house for the children of the prophets, as he was felling of a tree, the iron fell from the helve into the water; then he cried and said unto Elisha, "Alas! master; it was borrowed;" as if the poor man should say, "The loss of the axe head doth not so much grieve me, as that I borrowed it and must restore it again." Just thus it must be betwixt the borrower and the lender: the borrower's care must be how to make restitution; if he have not wherewithal, and therein if he speak simply from his heart, then si non effectu tamen affectu—if he cannot come anything near to pay the whole debt, yet come as near as he can—he must show his readiness out of that little that is remaining, if not anything near to a full, yet towards satisfaction; and then, however, perhaps, it will not please men, yet, in having a good conscience, God will be well pleased.

MMLXXIV.—The time and place of a man's spiritual calling very uncertain to be known.

HE that is locked up in a dungeon, or otherwise immured within some darksome place, can and may easily discover the very moment of time when either the least beam of the sun or glimmer of sky-light shall break in upon him; whereas, on the other side, he that is in the open air is very sensible that the day is broke, that the sun is up, but cannot make out any certain account of the springing of the one or rising of the other. Thus it is in the matter of our spiritual calling: it is possible that a man may know the very time and moment when the Day-spring from on high did visit him, when it was the good pleasure of God to dart into his soul the graces of His blessed Spirit, as in the case of St. Paul, the good centurion, the jailor, the Jewish converts, and some others; but this is not ordinary: the wind bloweth where it listeth (yea, and when it listeth too), even so the Spirit, both time and place uncertain. Some are called at the first hour—that is, in their infancy or childhood, as Samuel, Jeremiah, and John the Baptist; some in the third hour—that is, in their youth, as Daniel the prophet and John the evangelist; others at the sixth hour—in their middle age, as Peter and Andrew; others at the eleventh hour—in their old age, as Gamaliel and Joseph of Arimathea; and some again, not only in the last hour of the day, but even in the last minute of that hour, as the thief upon the cross. Again, our calling is uncertain in respect of place, for God calls some from their ships, some from their shops, and some from under the hedges, and others from the market; so that, if a man can but make out unto his soul that he is certainly called, it matters not much for the time when nor the place where, both of them being so uncertain.

Præd. hominud. Scripta.

Acts ii. 27.

Boy's Postils.

Luke xxiii. 42.

Matt. ix. 9.

Luke xiv. 23.

Matt. xx. 3.

MMLXXV.—The minister's calling full of labour and toil.

THE vocation of a husbandman admits of little or no vacation from his daily labour; the end of one work is but the beginning of another; every season of the year bringeth its several travail with it. And the harvest labourers are, of all other, the sorest labourers; no labour more toilsome than theirs. Such is the calling of every faithful minister. Hath he broke up the fallow ground of his people's hearts, then must he sow the precious seed therein. Hath he sowed seed, then he must water what he hath set and sowed—yea, tares and weeds will grow and soon sprout up, sleep he never so little, and therefore great need of daily weeding: so that, surely, the sweat of the ministry (be it followed as it ought) exceeds the sweat of other callings, and with the sorest labour doth the minister eat his bread in the sweat of his brows. His calling is not easy, but painful and laborious; as it is an honour, so it is a burthen, and such an one, too, as requireth the strength of angels to bear it.

Rogers's Serm. on 2 Cor. xiii. 11.

"Nihil est in hac vita difficilius, laboriosius, periculosius," &c. "Presbyteria vita."—AUG., de Verb., Dom.

"Onus humeris angelorum non leve."—ST. CHRYSOSTOM,

MMLXXVI.—True brotherly love scarce to be found.

HISTORIES make mention of one Ursinus, a Christian physician, who, being to suffer martyrdom for the Gospel of Christ, began to waver and faint; which, when Vitalis, a holy man, saw, he stepped to him, and, though he knew it would cost him his life, comforted and encouraged him, saying, "What, have you been heretofore so industrious to preserve men's bodies, and will you now shrink at the saving of your own soul? Be courageous!" &c. For which faithful counsel he also was condemned to death, and suffered accordingly. But now so it is, that brethren have forgot that they are brethren, and almost every man stands aloof when necessity requires his succour; they flinch away as Demas and others did from Paul, leaving him to answer for himself. Few such friends as Vitalis are to be found, that will lay down their lives or hazard them to the relief of their distressed brother.

Hieron. Rubet Hist. Ravennat.

Nich. de Lyra, in loc.

"Fratrum quoque gratia rara est."—OVID, Met.

MMLXXVII.—Men to be compassionate one towards another ; and why so ?

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. xi., cap. 17.

"Cujus pectus tam ferreum, cor tam lapideum, ut pa-tientis non compatiatur."

1 Cor. xii. 26.

Junius, de Utilit.
Condit. Humanæ.

Annal. Minist.
Dixot. V. l. c.

Job vi. 14.

It is observed of the bees, that agrotante una lamentantur omnes (when one is sick they all mourn) ; and of the sheep, that if one of them be faint, the rest of the flock will stand between it and the sun until it be revived. Thus it is that God hath hewn us all out of one rock, tempered all our bodies of one clay, and spirited all our souls of one breath. We are all sons of one Father, members of one body, and heirs of one kingdom, in respect of which near-linking together there should be compassion and sympathy betwixt us. If one member do but grieve, all suffer with it. When a thorn is got into the foot, how is it that the back bows, the eyes pry into the hurt, and the hands are busied to pluck out the cause of the anguish? And we, being members of one another, should bear with and forbear one the other, the not doing whereof will stick as a brand upon our souls, that we are of the number of them that have forsaken the fear of the Almighty.

MMLXXVIII.—Men to be at peace one with another.

Suidæ Hist.

Plutarch, in Laco-nicks.

Rogers, ut antea.

"Candela nax homines, trux decet ira foras."—OVID, Amor. 1.

It is reported of two noble Lacedemonians, that being at mortal hatred, were met by Archidamus, their king, in the temple of Minerva. He requires them to put the matter to an indifferent umpire. They choose the king himself. He makes them swear to abide his order, which, accordingly, they do. "Now," saith the king, "I order that you shall not go out of this temple until you be friends." And so they parted friends (for an oath taken in that temple was unlawful to be broken). Now, it were heartily to be wished that we who are the temple of God, and such as usually meet in the temple of God, and there partake the holy things of God, would keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace—not to be unpeaceable with the peaceable, which argues a devilish mind ; nor unpeaceable with the unpeaceable, which argues a corrupt mind ; nor yet content ourselves in that we are peaceable with the peaceable, which argues but a civil mind ; but if it be possible, and as much as in us lieth, to be peaceable with the unpeaceable, which is that that argues only a true Christian and heroical mind. And so should we make it good that we are endowed with true grace, and are true subjects of that kingdom which is the kingdom of peace, whose King is peace.

MMLXXIX.—Men to labour that they be regenerated.

Lib. viii., cap. 6, de Christ. Deit. et in Ps. lvi.

Matt. x. 16.

ST. AUGUSTINE relateth of the serpent, that when she groweth old, she draweth herself through a narrow hole, and by this means, stripping off her old skin, she reneweth her age. Thus it is our Saviour's directions to be as wise as serpents, and if in anything, then sure it is in this, that we should follow their wisdom, that forsaking the broad ways of vices, we may pass through the narrow and strait way of repentance, and, leaving off our old coat of sin, we may be clothed anew with the rich garments of righteousness, and so become new men in Christ Jesus.

MMLXXX.—The minister's and magistrate's duty in the suppression of vice.

In Lib. de Spirit.
Sancit. cap. ult.

"Sævis inter se conuenit uris."

It was a good Christian resolution of St. Basil, who, writing to Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, hath these words : 'Αναρχία δε τις δεινή (The people, through ambition, are fallen into grievous anarchy), whence it comes to pass, that all the exhortations of the rulers are in vain ; no man will submit, but all would reign, being puffed up with pride growing from ignorance. Shall I, then, keep silence? I may not, though some supplant, others insult over me being down, and the rest applaud them that do insult. How can it be otherwise, since charity is decayed? Hence some sit no less implacable and bitter examiners of things amiss, than unjust and malevolent judges of things well done, so that we are become more brute than the very beasts, for they are quiet amongst themselves, but we wage cruel war against each other: Shall I, then, hold my peace? Charity will not suffer me. The children in Babylon discharged their duty, though they were but three. Having God, then, for my patron and protector, I will not be silent, &c. And thus it is that both minister and magistrate, in their respective places, are to beat down the vices of the time. Where the reins of government lie slack upon the people's shoulders, there they must needs be straitened; where wickedness and sin have put on a whore's forehead, it is high time to unmask them; nay, if God's people and the house of Jacob will be doing that which is not right, it is the minister's duty to set up his throat and tell the one of their sins and the other of their transgressions.

"Parcere subjectis
et debellare superbos."—VIRGIL.

Isa. lviii. 1.

MMLXXXI.—Peace linking the Church and commonweal together.

THE secretaries of nature (naturalists) say that the solsequey, or marigold, opens with the sun and shuts with the shade. Even so, when the sunbeams of peace shine upon the commonwealth, then, by the reflection of those beams, the Church dilates and spreads itself. And, on the other side, when the country's glory is once eclipsed, then is the Church's beauty clouded, as all men (whom the god of this world hath not blinded) must of necessity confess—the Church and commonwealth being so closely linked together, that the peace or distraction of the one doth redound to the welfare or ruin of the other.

Plin., Discorid., Theophrast.

Acts ix. 31.

Griffith's Serm.
Peace, Lond., 1642.

MMLXXXII.—A caveat for flatterers.

It was a significant and well-deserved punish ment that Alexander Severus allotted to Turinus, a fawning flatterer—one that could lick a mouth in a gnathonical (deceitful), sordid way—to be tied to a stake and stifed with smoke, with an herald standing by and proclaiming to all the people, "Fumo punitur qui fumum vendidit (He lived by smoke, blinding men's eyes, and by smoke let him die)!" A good caveat for those that think to purchase and preserve love and favour by deifying the undeserved, and crystallizing dusty, sordid actions. They may chance plead that he that will not flatter shall hang under the wheel; that he that dares to tell a great man he is not just, or a general that he is not valiant, or a lady that she is neither beautiful nor virtuous, shall never be counsellor, commander, or courtier; but Solomon—a wiser man—is rather to be believed, who bids us take it on his word, that he that rebukes a man (though for the present he may storm) shall afterwards find more favour than he that flattereth with his tongue.

Lampridius, in Vita.

Price's Serm.,
Lond., 1642.

"Isto maxime tempore regnat vitium adulationis," &c.—
TUL., ad Celsam.
Prov. xxviii. 23.

MMXLXXXIII.—The non-performance of vows, promises, &c., condemned.

It is said of Andreas, one of the kings of Hungary, that, having engaged himself by promise to go to the Holy Wars (as they then called them), went with all his forces, and, coming to Jerusalem, only bathed himself there, as one that had washed off his promise, and so returned back again without striking one blow. Such is the case with many men at present: their promises, covenants, and agreements with others (though sealed and subscribed) prove too, too often as brittle as the glasses they drink in; no bounds will hold them. They rob the Grecians of their proverb, and own it themselves; for, let but the worst of men say they will do this or that, it is as much as if they had sworn they would not do it, unless it be when they embark themselves in some unwarrantable actions, and the sun may sooner be thrust out of his sphere than they diverted from their adamantine resolutions.

Car. Bonfinius, de Reb. Hungaricis.

"Ut mundus sic sunt mundi promissa," &c.—
JAC. BIL., Anthol.

"Græca fides,"—
ERASMI Adagia.

MMLXXXIV.—Justice duly administered; the people's benefit thereby.

Jean. de Serres,
Hist.

Price, ut antea.

It is said of Francis I. of France, that, when a woman kneeled to him to beg justice, he bade her stand up, for said he, "Woman, it is justice that I owe thee, and justice thou shalt have; if thou beg anything of me, let it be mercy." A happy place and people, surely, where justice (as it seemeth) was not extorted, but dropped as kindly as honey from the comb; where there was no sale of offices, no exhausting of fees, no subtleties of delay, no trucking for expedition, no making snares of petty, penal statutes; where Justice had scales in her hand, not to weigh gold, but equity; where judges and magistrates were as Noah's ark, to take in weary doves, and, as the horns of the altar, for oppressed innocency to betake itself unto; where lawyers, advocates, pleaders, did not call evil good, and good evil, bitter sweet, &c.; where plaintiffs or accusers did not inform or prosecute through malice, envy, or for advantage; where subordinate officers durst not help potent delinquents out of the briars, nor suffer poor men, tempest-tossed in law, to languish in their business within ken of harbour for want of giving a sop to Cerberus or sacrificing to the great Diana of expedition; where those setting-dogs, such as base-promoting informers, were not countenanced, and severely punished upon any false, unjust, or malicious information; to close up all, where the magistrate owed justice to the people and paid it, where the people begged for mercy and had it.

MMLXXXV.—The state-politician's religion.

Athenei Delpnosoph., lib. ii., cap. 6.

Advers. Hæresilib. ii.

Modern Policy.

THERE is mention made of a river in Spain whose upper waters are sweet and pleasant, but towards the bottom very salt and brackish. And such is every wicked state-politician: he is only superficial, whilst others are fundamental Christians; he likes the humour of the Samseans in Epiphanius, that were neither Jews, Gentiles, nor Christians, but preserving a commodious correspondence with all; whatsoever he acts in reference to heaven is merely theatrical, and done in subordination to some other interest; it is to himself indifferent whether the religion he personates be true or false, so it be but popular; and, like the strictness of that notable thief, who always, before he went about the work of his calling—for so he called thieving—went to prayer, that God would bless and prosper him, so he says grace to his design, be it never so wicked, and gives thanks for his success, be it never so bloody.

MMLXXXVI.—The evil of excess.

Columnella, de Re
Rust.

"Omne nimium vertitur in vitium."

Aristotle.

Maurit. Bohem.,
Medit. Matut., Loc.
Script., Select.

HONEY is very sweet and comfortable, but too much honey causeth gripings in the belly, breedeth choler, and bringeth diseases; fragrant flowers are sweet to smell to, and much refresh the brain if used moderately, but too much smelling of them causeth pain in the head, as experience testifieth; how delightful is the light to our eyes, but too much staring into the sunbeams is the dazzling of the eyes, if not the blinding of them. Thus it is that the excess, even of good and lawful things, may be evil and unlawful; we may take of the good creatures of God (as it were upon a knife's point, or a spoonful at a time—that is, a stinted, moderate quantity) in due measure, but if we fall a-grasping with both hands, eat great morsels, or drink down great draughts at once, we may easily surfeit unto death, unless we evacuate one way or other after our exceedings. And the rule in philosophy holds true, "Vehemens sensibile lædit sensorium (Moderate sounds, such as in music, may much affect the ear with delight, but vehement sounds, as in ringing of bells near at hand, beating of drums, rattling of guns, or blowing of trumpets, dulls the hearing). Thus it is that moderate joys and delights are ever best, least hurtful, most contentful, and comfortable to our spirits; whereas intemperance, immoderateness, and excess mars all pleasures and delight, though themselves never so pleasant and delightful.

MMLXXXVII.—The state-politician siding with all parties.

THERE is mention made of Marquis Paulet, of Winchester, who, having successfully served four princes, and still in the room of favour, unshaken with the vicissitudes he had run through, being asked by one by what means he preserved his fortune, he replied that he was made ex salice, non ex quercu (of the pliant willow, not the stubborn oak)—always of the prevailing religion and a zealous professor. Thus it is that the wicked state-politician sides with all parties. If religion be fashionable, you can scarce distinguish him from a saint—he will not only reverence godly ministers, but (if need be) he will preach himself; if cunctation (delay) prevail, he acts Fabius; if the buckler must be changed for a sword, he personates Marcellus; if mildness be useful, Soderini of Venice was not more a lamb than he; if severities are requisite, Nero's butcheries are sanctities compared with his. Thus, like a subtle Proteus, he assumes that shape which is most in grace and of most profitable conducement to his ends, only he hath so much advantage of the cameleon, that he can turn himself into white, for he is often to be found wearing the vest of innocency to conceal the ugliness and blackness of his attempts, Nanton's Fragm. Regal.

"Paratus ad omni quare."—Observata, ex Machiavel., Borgia, &c.

"Simulata sanctitas."

MMLXXXVIII.—Tyrants raising themselves by a seeming compliance with the people.

ATHENEUS tells a pretty story of one Athenion, born obscurely, who, as long as he was private and poor, excelled in a soft and tractable disposition, but when, by juggling, he had obtained the Athenian government, there was none more odious for a cruel, barbarous, covetous tyrant. Nero's quinquennium (five years) will never be forgotten, nor that which is reported of Caligula, that there was never a better servant and a worse master. Thus it is, by woeful experience, made out that tyrannically-minded men personate goodness till they have accomplished their ends, make a show of all goodness till they have wrought themselves into the good liking of all those whom they intend to deceive, and then off goes the vizard of dissimulation, and they appear in their native colours what indeed they are—bloody, barbarous, inhuman.

Dipsinoph., lib. vi., cap. 13.

Sueton,

Modern Poltev.

MMLXXXIX.—True obedience.

IT is reported of the old kings of Peru, that they were wont to use a tassel, or fringe, made of red wool, which they wore upon their heads, and when they sent any governor to rule as viceroy in any part of their country, they delivered unto him one of the threads of their tassel, and, for one of those simple threads, he was as much obeyed as if he had been the king himself—yea, it hath so happened that the king hath sent a governor only with this thread to slay men and women of a whole province, without any further commission; for of such power and authority was the king's tassel with them, that they willingly submitted thereunto, even at the sight of one thread of it. Now, it is to be hoped that, if one thread shall be so forcible to draw infidel obedience, there will be no need of cart-ropes to haul on that which is Christian. Exemplary was that obedience of the Romans, which was said to have come abroad to all men. And certainly Gospel obedience is a grace of much worth, and of great force upon the whole man, for when it is once wrought in the heart, it worketh a conformity to all God's will; be it for life or death, one word from God will command the whole soul as soon as obedience hath found admittance into the heart.

Lev. Apollon., de Regno Peruano.

Bohem., ut antea.
Rom. xvi. 19.

MMXC.—The true improvement of peace.

IT is observable in Scripture, that Moses' altar was but five cubits in length, and five in breadth, and three in height; but Solomon's altar was much larger. Now, the reason Exod. xxvii. 1.

3 Chron. iv. 1.

Borhaſus, in lucum.M. B., A Christian's Delight.

hereof seems to be this, because Moses was in a warfare, in an unsettled condition, in the wilderness, in continual travel, full of troubles, and could not conveniently carry about an altar of that bigness; but Solomon was on his throne, in a tranquil estate, settled in quiet possession of his kingdom, and as his name was, so was he a true Solomon—that is, peaceable. Thus it ought to be with all good men, that, when they have more peace and prosperity than others, their service of God should be proportionable. Solomon's temple must outstrip Moses' tabernacle in beauty and glory, and Solomon's altar must exceed the bigness of Moses' altar. In their peace and plenty, their holiness should outshine others that are in want and misery; when God lays not so much sorrow upon them as upon others, they should lay the more duty upon themselves; if God send them fewer crosses and more comforts, they are to return more service and commit less evil.

MMXCI.—The true Christian's confidence and contempt of death.

I Sam. xv. 32.

De Mendoza, in loc.P. c. Martyr, in loc.

"Non potest male mori qui bene vixit."—AUG., de Doctrina Christi.

I Cor. xv. 55.

Phil. i. 21.

OBSERVABLE is that speech of King Agag, when Samuel sent for him, "Surely the bitterness of death is past." Now, the ground of this speech was either his false hope, as thinking that the worst was past, because he was fetched off the king's guard of soldiers and brought to Samuel the prophet, who was vir togatus (a man of peace); or else, if them essengers did tell him why he was sent for, then he set a bold face upon it, and spake out of stomach, intimating his resoluteness and contempt of death, that he was resolved to die bravely, and like himself. This, now, was carnal gallantry; and thus many a man may, Agag-like, condemn death and all God's judgments out of stoutness and stiffness of heart; but all true-believing Christians may and do graciously despise death, and say thus, from a principle of faith and certain hopes of heaven, "Surely the bitterness of death is past!" Certainly, Christ, by His death, hath taken away the bitterness of death, and hath sweetly perfumed our graves by the burial of His own blessed body, so that we shall taste nothing but the sweetness of death, and may now courageously and triumphingly sing and say, not as Agag did, "Surely the bitterness of death is past!" but as St. Paul did, "O death, where is thy sting?" &c., and "To me to die is gain!"

MMXCII.—Man's nothingness.

In Lib. de Hon.
Excellent.

Leo, Heb., *Dial.
de Amore*, Pythagoras.

Gen. xxii. 10.

Ps. xxxix. 5.

JOSEPHUS PHAVORINUS, a learned physician of Italy, marvelled at nothing in the world but man, and at nothing in man but his mind; and Abdala, the Saracen king of Toledo, being asked what he most wondered at upon the stage of the world, answered, "Man." One calls God an immortal Man, and man an immortal god; another sets him out as μικρόκοσμος (a little world), and the world μεγάνθρωπος (a great man). Now, these men were not certainly so well-knowing of God's Word and man's sin, and of the matter that man was made of, as they should have been; whereas such as know God in His most excellent glory, and man in his best estate to be but vanity, turned from his innocence to iniquity, must and do acknowledge themselves to be less than the least of God's mercies, such as He created being nothing, recreated being worse than nothing, and, without great mercy on His part, are like to fall again to nothing.

MMXCIII.—Men of corrupt judgments.

Fernelius, *de
Hæmorib.*, lib. vi.

As those that have the jaundice see all things yellow by reason of the humour of that disease corrupting the sight, by the overflowing of the gall over the whole body: so men of corrupt judgments misapply matters and persons, and are not able to give a right judgment according to truth, but run on according as their fancy leads them—just like a blind man that can see no more light at noonday than at midnight, and must needs there misjudge day for night and night for day.

MMXCIV.—Wanton hearers of the Word reproved.

SUCH as have weak and sickly stomachs are always finding fault with the carter, cook, or carver, and think they could feed a great deal better if there were better provision. And thus there are some queasy, wanton hearers of God's Word, such as find fault with their pastor, and think they could edify much better by such or such another, wherein they say they know not what; for it is neither Paul nor Apollos that can edify—that is, give increase, make the Word effectual. God hath reserved that work to Himself, that so His ordinance, not the gifts, His blessing, not the commendations of the preacher, might be regarded; that the treasure might not be esteemed for the vessel, but the vessel for the treasure, and so neither Paul magnified nor Apollos despised, nor either or both relied upon, and God Himself neglected; nor hearing severed from prayer, for that makes hearing unprofitable, but that, both being joined together, our obedience in hearing may make our prayers accepted, and our fervency in praying may procure our hearing to be blessed.

Croke's Pitt.
Serm., Bath, 1615.

"Nisi Spiritus sanctus auditorum corda replicat, ad aures corporum vox doctoris incessum sonat," &c.—
GREG., in Pastore.

MMXCV.—The vast difference betwixt the power of God and man.

IN matters of arithmetical accounts, set one against ten, ten against a hundred, a hundred against a thousand, a thousand against ten thousand, although there be great odds, yet there is some comparison; but if a man could set down an infinite number, then there could be no comparison at all, because the one is finite, the other infinite. So it is betwixt the power of God and man: set all the princes and powers of the earth in opposition to God, they shall never be able to withstand Him. It was once the saying of Pompey, that with one stamp of His foot He could raise all Italy up in arms; and the mighty men of the world may have nations, kingdoms, and commonwealths at their command, but yet God is more powerful than them all. If He do but arise, they shall all of them fly before Him. If He once fall to fettering of princes, it shall be done so sure, that no flesh shall be able to knock off their bolts again. If He but once make fast the bars of our city gates, we may trust to it, they shall be so fast, that no invader shall be able to break them open. So infinite is His power, that in David's thoughts it was not to be matched.

Gosson's Serm.,
Lond., 1598.

Plutarch, in Vita
Pomp.

Ps. lxviii. 8.

Ps. cxlix. 8.

Ps. lxxxix. 6.

MMXCVI.—The great danger of apostasy.

IN the affairs of this life it is a shame for a man to begin an enterprise and not to go through; to begin a piece of work, and leave it off in the middle; it will give just occasion for every man to point at him with his finger, deride and jeer him, saying, "This man began to build and was not able to finish; that he hath taken a great deal of pains to no other purpose but to leave a monument of folly and vanity for the world to laugh at." And thus he that hath received the common graces of God, and many good gifts of His Spirit, which have enabled him to do much good and faithful service, and then takes the grace of God and turns it into wantonness, and smothered and quenches the Spirit; or, having been in a fair way to heaven, having some time walked on religiously and faithfully, till he come within some sense of his reward, and within view of the crown prepared for him, then to turn out of the way and apostatize in the broad way, what is it else but to tread in a path that, without repentance, will lead to utter destruction?

Jay's Serm. at Court, 1632.

"Tunc vir apostolicus nunc vilis apostata factus."—
SEDUL., de Juda
Prodit.

Heb. vi. 1-8.

MMXCVII.—Wicked thoughts to be carefully washed off from the heart.

IT is the part of a skilful surgeon or physician, not only to take away any appearing ulcer, or to cool the heat of a burning fever with outward applications, but to look into the

Maverick's Serm.,
Lond., 1617.

Matt. xv. 19.

Jer. iv. 14.

Aquini Sum. Part,
2da, 2da. Quæst.
154.

inward causes and malignity of the disease, and so to to order the matter, that the cause being taken away, the effect may necessarily follow. Now, it is well known that the seed of all sins and the well-spring of all wickedness ariseth from the heart of man. The heart is, therefore, to be washed, as from all wickedness, so from all wicked thoughts, they being the source and originals of all unrighteousness; not that they are all so, for they may be some time accompanied with horror and detestation of sin, or cast into our hearts by Satan, yet not consented unto. But men think too little of such thoughts. The thoughts, therefore, that are to be thought on and cleansed from the heart are such as proceed from our own corrupt nature, or suggested into our minds by the malice of Satan, whereunto we give consent and liking, or else they be the allurements of the world, which we cherish and delight in.

MMXCVIII.—The high price of man's redemption.

Wolfgang. Lazius,
de Repub. Rom.Maurit. Bohemus, de Iis. Christ.

1 Pet. i. 18, 19.

AMONGST the Romans, those their proper goods and estates which men had gotten in the wars, with hazard of their lives, were called peculium castrense (or a field-purchase). Well, then, may the Church and every true member therein be called Christ's peculium castrense—His purchase, gotten not only by the jeopardy of His life, but with the loss of His life and blood. And if it were possible, He would rather lose His life a second time ere He would lose the least limb for which His life was so laid down.

MMXCIX.—God's great tenders of mercy to repentant sinners.

Hill's Penitent Sinner's Entertainment."Poenitentia est spes salutis, per quam Deus ad misericordiam provocatur," &c.—
ISIDORUS, de Sum.
Bonis.
Rom. viii. 17.

If a judge of an assize should say to a felon, or some malefactor in the gaol, "Confess but your faults and become an honest man, I will pardon you; and not only so, but you shall be made a justice of peace, or some great man, whereby you shall have power to judge and examine others!" surely, he would, upon this promise, be moved quickly to confess the felony and forego his theft. Thus it is that the Judge of all the world makes great tenders of mercy, that if a sinner will truly and from his heart confess his sins, and resolve to leave them, he shall have pardon; and not only so, but he shall be made a king and priest unto God the Father, an heir of God, and joint-heir with Christ Jesus.

MMC.—The fullness of reward reserved till after this life.

In Lib. de Consolat. ad Apollon. ex
Homero.Oldmayn's Sermon,
1636.

PLUTARCH, though an heathen, yet of honourable esteem even to this day amongst us, hath a story how that, upon a time, a complaint was sent from the Islands of the Blessed to the judges of the superior courts about certain persons sent thither who formerly had lived impiously, humbly entreating that this abuse thus offered unto them might speedily be redressed; whereupon these impartial judges, taking the business into their considerations, found not only the complaint to be true, but withal the reason and cause thereof, which was, that judgment and sentence was passed upon them here below in this life, whereupon it oft fell out that many persons clothed with honourable titles, riches, nobility, and other like dignities and preferments brought many witnesses with them, who solemnly swore, in their behalf, that they deserved to be sent to the Islands of the Blessed, when the truth was they deserved the contrary; to avoid which inconveniency, it was decreed by an eternal doom, that for the time to come no judgment should be passed till after death; and that by spirits only, who alone do see and plainly perceive the spirits and naked souls of such upon whom their sentence and judgment was to pass, that so, of what estate and condition soever they were, they might receive according to their works. Here, now, was a great deal of light in a dark vault, the divine eye of a mere natural man discovering a heavenly truth, which is, that definitive sentence is not to be passed upon any here below, nor that any whosoever shall receive his full reward of what he hath done, whether it be good or bad, till after this life be ended.

MMCI.—Good meanings of bad men destructive.

THE poets prate much of Pluto's ferry-boat, that never rested to carry men through the infernal river to the infernal place; so that what was then feigned is now verified; for, if there be any ferry-boat to hell, it is the thing that men call a good meaning. This is that which carries men and women down to hell by multitudes, by millions. There cannot be found so many passengers in all the boats upon any river as there are in this one wherry wafted down to the pit of perdition. Many in all ages have had their good meanings, and to this day the Jews, Turks, Pagans, Papists—the worst of them all—do not want for good meanings. It is the good meanings of bad men that brings them to an evil end: they think they do God good service by abusing His people, but they are sure to find and feel one day what disservice they have done to God and their own souls for ever, and that their good meanings before man shall never excuse their bad actings before God.

Maurit. Bohem.,
Medit. in Loc.
Select. Script.

MMCII.—God's readiness to maintain the cause of His Church.

As in public theatres, when any notable show passeth over the stage, you shall have all the spectators rise up off their seats and stand upright with delight and eagerness, that so they might take the better notice of the same: thus it is that, though by an article of our faith we are bound to believe that Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, the Father Almighty, as a Judge to pronounce sentence, yet He is said in the Scripture to stand upright at the sufferings of His people—as at the stoning of St. Stephen—either as an Advocate to plead the Church's cause, or as One in a posture of readiness to take revenge upon all her enemies.

S. Gerson, ut
antra.

Mark xvi. 19.

Acts vii. 56.
Ambros., lib. x.,
ep. 82.

MMCIII.—Men not to be proud of honours and preferments.

It is Pliny's observation of the pigeons, that, taking a pride in the excellency of their feathers and the height of their flying, they tower it in the air so long that at last they become a prey to the hawk; whereas otherwise, if they would but fly outright, they are swifter of wing than any other bird. Thus, men that take a pride in the height of that honour whereunto they are advanced are many times made a prey to the devil and a laughing-stock to men; whereas, did they but moderate their flight and make a right use of their preferments, they might become serviceable to God and their country.

Nat. Hist., lib. x.,
cap. 36.

MMCIV.—Moderation the forerunner of peace.

It is the observation of St. Hilary, that salt containeth in itself the element both of fire and water, "and is indeed," saith he, "a third thing compacted out of both." It is water, lest we should too much be incensed unto heat and passion; it is fire, lest we should grow too remiss and chill with neglect and carelessness. Hence is that advice of our Saviour to His disciples, "Have salt in yourselves, and peace one with another,"—that is, as St. Paul interprets, "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt;" let it not be rancid or unsavoury, larded with bitter and unchristian invectives, but tempered always with sobriety, meekness, and temperance; and then, when the salt is first set upon the table, peace, as the best and choicest dish, will follow after.

In Matt., can. iv.

Mark ix. 50.

Col. iv. 6.

Sciator's Remedy of Schim.

MMC.V.—The saints' infirmities.

Croke, The Waking Sleepers; a Sermon, 1615.

"Non arcum semper tendit."—
APOLLO.

As all men dwelling in houses of clay, and carrying about them the earthly tabernacles of their bodies, between whiles (will they, nill they) sleep, by reason of bodily infirmity, and by a kind of unwelcome heaviness nod towards the earth, as it were pointing at their natural element, whereunto they must, in a short process of time, be reduced: so even the best of God's children, compassed with flesh and blood, cannot but at times bewray their folly and unsteadfastness. The best artist hath not always his wits about him—quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus—and the most watchful, circumspect Christian doth not always stand so fast upon his guard of faith and a good conscience, but he may at one time or other, be taken napping.

MMC.VI.—God only to be trusted unto in time of distress.

Gosson, ut antea.

Isa. xxx. 3.

Jer. vii. 4.

Jer. xvii. 5.
1 Tim. iv. 10.
2 Sam. xv. 31.

As when little children do first learn to go alone, and, feeling the weakness of their feet, nature teacheth them to thrust out the hand to the wall, and trust it only for a stay unto them: thus it is that, especially in times of distress, nature and religion teach us to trust to a stronger than ourselves, that we shall have help at God's hands, and that without Him there is no real, true help at all—none in the smooth tongue of man, nor in his fair looks; not in the strength of man, nor in his riches; not in the wit of man, that may be turned into foolishness; but in God alone, who is able and willing to relieve His people in the time of their distress.

MMC.VII.—The great heat of ambition.

Coc. Sabel.,
Emend 6, lib. v.

"Regnandi dira cupido, Quid non f!"

C. Tacit., Annal.,
lib. xiv.

It is reported of Julius Cæsar, that, as he passed over the Alps in his journey to Spain, he took up his quarters one night in a little, poor, inconsiderable village, where one of his company came unto him and asked him merrily if he thought there would be any contention in that place for the sovereignty; whereunto he made this stout answer, "I had rather be the first man here than the second at Rome." Now, it is much to be feared that there are many at this day thus affected, that they had rather be kings, though it were but of a molehill, than to be in subjection unto any; yea, such is the heat of their ambition, that the intemperancy of Nero's mother may seem to be revived again, who, being very desirous that her son might be emperor, and being certified by the soothsayer that, if he were so, he should kill her, she broke out into this unstayed and outrageous speech, "Occidat, dum imperet (Let him kill me, and spare not, so he may be emperor)!" so they stick not to say, "Let us perish, so we may but bear rule and sway over others!"

MMC.VIII.—Dead men soon forgotten.

Matth. Paris, Hist.

Oldmaye, ut antea.

"Mortuus etiam grati sermones de-serunt."—MENAN.

Ps. lxxxviii. 5.

It is a memorable example, amongst many others that we have, of William the Conqueror's successor, who, being unhappily killed as he was hunting in New Forest, all his nobles and courtiers forsook him; only some few that remained laid his body in a collier's cart, which, being drawn with one silly, lean beast through a very foul and filthy way, the cart broke, and there lay the spectacle of worldly glory, both pitifully gored and also bemired. Now, if this were the portion of so mighty a prince, whom immediately before so glorious a troop attended, what, then, must others of meaner rank expect and look for but, only with Death's closing up of their eyes, to have all their friends excluded, and no sooner gone, but to be as suddenly forgotten? hence is it that Oblivion and Neglect are the two handmaids of Death, and her kingdom where she principally tyrannizeth is terra oblivionis (the land of forgetfulness).

MMCIX.—Man by nature lawless and ill-advised.

ORPHEUS, in the poet, had no sooner tuned his instrument, but all the birds and beasts assembled, and, forgetting their several appetites, though some were of prey, some of game, some of quarrel, yet they stood all together in a sociable manner, listening unto the sweetness of the music, the sound whereof was no sooner ceased or drowned by some louder noise, but every beast returned to his nature, ready to devour and to be devoured one of the other. Such is the nature and condition of man: lawless and ill-advised, full of savage and unreclaimable desires of profit, lust, power, and revenge; yet, as long as he gives ear to precepts, laws, and religion, sweetly touched with eloquence and divine persuasions, so long is society and peace maintained; but if these instruments be silent, or that sedition and tumult make them not audible, then all things dissolve into anarchy and mere confusion.

Ovid, Met., lib. 2.

"Gens humana ruik in vetitum nefas."

Bacon, de Augment.
Scient., lib. 1.

MMCX.—God the only object of His people's trust in time of distress.

THE fish distressed slides into the water, and is relieved; the bird flies to the dam, and is shrouded under her wings; the child runs to its parents; strike the dog, and he runs to his master; wound the soldier, and he flies to the army; and, by way of antiperistasis (the opposition of a contrary quality, by which the quality opposed acquires strength), cold makes the heat retire into the fire, and the force thereof is greater. Thus, if mere natural causes, whose goodness is finite, do cherish their effects, how much more shall God, whose goodness is infinite! It is He, and He only, that is the object of His people's trust in the midst of their distress—He is the first Cause of all things, and all things have recourse unto Him.

Gosson's Serm.
Lond., 1598.

"Tu vita, et genitor vitæ, tuncque pro-fundæ, tu lux vera Deus," &c.—MAR.
VICTOR.

Ps. cxlv. 15.

MMCXI.—How it is that God is more powerful than all the creatures.

IT is a rule in philosophy, that that is most active which is most separated from earthly parts, most elevated à materia; the physician distils his simples into waters, he makes his extractions and quintessences, that the more they be elevated à materia the more they might be active, and work the better. Hence is it that water is stronger than earth, fire stronger than water, angels stronger than men, God stronger than them all. And why? But because He is actus purus (above and over all), so full of activity, that none is able to inflict the least of passion upon Him.

Beda, Axiomate
Philosoph.

"Imbecilis est omnis homo, si cum Dei manibus confe-ratur."—CONST., Annal.

MMCXII.—In the apprehension of fear and courage, man's mistaking of the object spoils all.

HE that stands below and looks up to the top of St. Paul's, London, or some such high place, they that are upon the top of the steeple appear to be but of small stature, though in themselves they be tall and great, and they that are at hand upon the same flat seem to be great, and all this by reason of the distance of the one and the nearness of the other; but, è contrario, if a man stood upon the top of St. Paul's, and should look down, then they that are above would seem great and they that are below would seem little. So it is with men in time of trouble: if their eyes be fastened upon the earth, their enemies will appear to be great and mighty, and God, who is higher than the highest heavens, small and impotent; but if their eyes be in heaven, as Jehoshaphat's were, and that they look down from thence upon their enemies, then God will appear strong and mighty and the enemy weak and withered. It is the misapprehension of the object that makes many living creatures here below do and suffer many things more than they need to do: the sheep, at the first sight of the wolf, apprehends him for a terrible object of fear, whereas the lion passeth by him and all other beasts of the forest with an honourable scorn and disdain. As for men, the three 2 Chron. xx. 12.

"Animalia multa agunt," &c.—
ARISTOT.

Numb. xlii. 10.

Jaggard's Serm., 1635.

2 Kings vii. 1.

1 Esdras iv. 1

Isa. xl. 22.

spies that were sent out to discover the Land of Promise, having a sheep's eye. spied out more danger than they needed, whereas Caleb, having a lion's heart, apprehended no terror at all. The nobleman upon whom the king leaned in the siege of Samaria had so base an eye, that, looking upon the present miseries, he took them to be greater than God, and persuaded himself that although God should rain victuals out of heaven the famine could not speedily be removed; but Elisha had his eyes in heaven, and, looking down from thence, despised the present calamities in respect of the present help of God, who by next day would make the price of corn stoop so low at the gates of Samaria that it should be there at a very easy rate, and the siege removed. And there was a flattering courtier, who, looking upon the royal person of the king, held a paradox, that the king is the strongest thing in the world; but the good old prophet saw no such great matter in kings and princes: when they be compared with God, they were in his esteem but as so many grasshoppers skipping and leaping up and down the field. By all which may easily be concluded, that, in the apprehension of fear and courage, man's eye mistaking of the object spoils all.

MMCXIII.—Ministers to be men of knowledge and understanding.

De Wann's Serm.
de Tempore.

"Oportet ut prædicatoribus sint fortes in præceptis, terribiles in minis," &c.—
GREG., Moral. in 560.

THE archer first takes a view of his mark, then considers the distance of the ground, after that he carries his eye over all the shafts in his quiver; he pulls out and puts in one after another, until he have made choice of his arrow; then he proves it with his finger and judges by his ear whether it be fit to fly to the mark; then he considers how the wind sits, whether to help him or to hinder him; when he hath put his arrow into the bow and begun to draw, if there come a gust of contradiction in his way, he hath the discretion to bear with it till it have spent itself; when the blast is over, he sets his foot to the ground, draws his arrow up to the head, and sticks it up to the feathers. Thus it is that preaching is a kind of artillery exercise that requireth strength and knowledge, ministers a kind of archers, and the souls of men are the fairest marks that can be shot at; but it so cometh to pass that many, for want of growth to draw the bow of the prophets and apostles, or want of skill to shoot, or care to shoot when they have taken their aim, many times miss the mark, being either short or wide, and so become despised.

MMCXIV.—Christ to be made our example in bearing the cross.

Quin. Curt., lib. v.

"Te pater Æneâs et avunculus excitet Hector."— VIRG.
1 Pet. ii. 21.

WHEN Alexander the Great marched through Persia, his way was stopped with ice and snow, insomuch that his soldiers, being tired out with hard marches, were discouraged and would have gone no further, which he perceiving, dismounted his horse, and went on foot through the midst of them all, making himself a way with a pickaxe; whereat they all being ashamed, first his friends, then the captains of his army, and, last of all, the common soldiers, followed him. So should all men follow Christ their Saviour by that rough and unpleasant way of the cross that He hath gone before them—He having drank unto them in the cup of His passion, they are to pledge Him when occasion is offered; He having left them an example of His suffering, they are to follow Him in the self-same steps of sorrow.

MMCXV.—The slavery of sin.

Petrarch, de Vita Solitaria.

It is the observation of a learned, facetious Italian, that they who lead a servile life—as bodily servants in princes' courts, and menials in other houses—who, being occupied in other men's business, are ruled by the will of another man's beck, and learn in another man's countenance what they must do—all that they have is another man's: another man's threshold, another man's house, another man's sleep, another man's meat, and, which is worst of all, another man's mind; they neither weep nor laugh at their own pleasure, but they cast off their own and put on another man's affections; besides, they do another man's business, think another man's thoughts, and live another man's life. Such and worse is the slavery of sin and Satan. Never was there any vassal endured greater villany and drudgery, though never so hard and cruel, than every impenitent sinner doth under sin and the devil, who hath them at such command, that, if he bid them but go, they are ready to run; he leads them as a dog in a chain, he ruleth over them like a prince, and worketh in their hearts as in a shop, causing them to fulfil the will of the flesh.

Pemberton's Serm., 1653.

"Malusetsi regnat servus est; nec unius hominis, sed quod gravius est, tot dominorum quot vitorum."—
AUG., de Civit.
Dei, lib. iv.
Eph. ii. 3.

MMCXVI.—The great danger of not keeping close to God's Word.

It is a thing very well known in the great and populous city of London, that when children, or some of bigger growth newly come out of the country, and so not well acquainted with the streets, are either lost or found straying from their home, there is a sort of lewd, wicked people (commonly called "spirits") that presently fasten upon them, and, by falsehood and fair language, draw them further out of their way, then sell them to foreign plantations, to the great grief of their parents and friends, who, in all likelihood, never afterwards hear what is become of them. Thus it is that, when men and women are found straggling from God their Father, the Church their mother, and refuse to be led by the good guidance of the Blessed Spirit—when they keep not to the Law and to the Testimony, nor stick close to the Word of God, which is in itself a lantern to their feet and a light unto their paths—then no marvel if they meet with wicked spirits, seducers and false teachers, that lead them captive at their will, and that, not receiving the Truth in the love of the Truth, God gives them over to strong delusions, to believe a lie.

Marshall's Serm.,
Westm., 1651.

John xlii. 16.

Isa. viii. 20.

Ps. cxix. 105.

2 Thess. ii. 11.

MMCXVII.—How it is that men fail so much in the true service of God.

THE sunbeams collected in a burning-glass kindle a fire upon certain conditions—viz., that the object be combustible and apt to take fire, that the glass be held still and steady, and that it be in a just distance—neither too far off nor yet too near, but so as the beams may best unite their force. Such a burning-glass is Christ. Through Him God's fatherly love shineth upon us; He standeth as Mediator betwixt God and us, receiving the beams of His Father as His natural Son, and transfusing them altogether upon us, His adopted brethren. Being, then, in so clear a sunshine, and having so perfect a burning-glass, how comes it to pass that so many of us continue so cold, so key-cold (lifeless), so much failing in the true service of God? Surely there is some defect in the conditions. Some hold the glass too far off, and think of the mercies of God in Christ but slightly and confusedly; some hold it too near, and, being all upon "Mercy, mercy!" make remission of sins a plaster for presumption in sinning; some hold it not still, by steady and fixed meditations, but superficially glance upon it, by spurts and flashes; and some others are not of such combustible matter, not so fit to be fired by the heat of His mercies as to be feared (made to fear) by the fire of His judgments.

Luke xii. 49.

Bery's Serm.,
Exeter, 1615.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. xi., cap. 17.

Hill's Serm.,
London, 1649.

MMCXVIII.—Dissension the forerunner of confusion.

It is observed, that when sheep fall a-butting one against another, a storm follows not long after; and they say of bees, that when they stir and strive amongst themselves, it is a sign that their queen is about to remove and leave the hive. Surely, then, prodigious must needs be all intestine enmity. When the sheep of Christ are so malignant one against another, it is a fearful presage of an ensuing ruin; when there are such stirs and schisms in the Church, such tumults and hurly-burlys in the state, it may be justly feared that God is about to remove from us.

MMCXIX.—Hypocrisy discovering itself in the end.

Bond's Serm. before the Assembly of Divines, 1646.

"Nemo potest personam fictam diu ferre," &c.—SEN., in Ep. ad Neronem.

COUNTERFEIT diamonds may sparkle and glitter, and make a great show for some time, but their lustre will not last long; and experience shows that an apple, if it be rotten at the core, though it have a fair and shining outside, yet rottenness will not stay long, but will taint the outside also. It is the nature of things unsound that the corruption stays not where it began, but putrifieth and corrupteth more and more till all be alike. Thus it is that sincerity tells the Christian, "Nil fictum est diuturnum (Nothing counterfeit will last long)," and that man that hath a rotten heart towards God, his want of sincerity will in time be discovered, and his outside be made as rotten as his inside. Fraud and guile cannot go long unspied, dissembling will not always be dissembled, and hypocrisy will discover itself in the end.

MMCXX.—The devil's rage an argument of the day of judgment near at hand.

Peck's Serm., Exeter, 1632.

"Sævitia diaboli prodromus est judicii extremi,"—BERN., in Serm. Quodam.

As some ill-minded tenant, whom, if you should see to make havoc and spoil of everything upon the tenement he holds—as to fell the trees, rack out the ground, grub up the hedges, tear down the gates, rife the house—would you not be ready to think, "Surely, this man's lease is almost expired, else he would never play such wreck as he doth." So, now that the devil so ruffles abroad, stirs up contentions, conspiracies, tumults, wars, labours to bring all kind of sin into fashion, to convert the world all into pride, drunkenness, whoredom, epicurism, atheism, and attempts, above all former wont, to do do all the villany and mischief that he can, what implies it but that the date of his time is even almost out, his lease very near out, and Christ near at hand, to judgment?

MMCXXI.—The simonist discovered.

Strabo, Geograph., lib. 7.
Plin., lib. ii., cap. 7, 16.

Rawlinson's Serm., at Court, 1611.

THERE is mention made of a certain sort of Indian people near unto the river Ganges, called Astomi, who have no mouths, but a kind of hole instead thereof, whereby they receive the sweet scent of flowers, which is all the sustenance they receive for the support of nature. And just such are all simonists and simoniacal parties, who have no mouths to show forth the praises of God, but only a tongueless hole, by which they suck up the sweetness of Church livings, purchased by bribery at Steeple-fair; such as make their profession a mere mechanic trade or occupation, and their ministry a ladder only to climb to preferment; mercenaries, no true pastors; creepers in through the window, no true preachers; men easily to be known by their works, for they seek their own, not Christ's: they feed upon the fat of the flock, and clothe themselves with the wool, but suffer the sheep to starve for want of food, the people to perish for want of due instruction.

MMCXXII.—The excellency of justice.

Patricius, de Regno, lib. viii., cit. i., et Nigid. Figula.

"Omnes virtutum species uno justitie nomine continentur."—HIERON., ad Damas.

THE sages of elder times seated the Virgin Justice amongst the constellations of heaven, betwixt the signs of the Lion and the Balance—1. Power and Equity—receiving the comforter of the world, the sun in harvest-time, and bearing in her hand an ear of corn, in token of plenty to the husbandman. And before her walks or stalks Bootes, the herd or pastureman, holding up one hand as triumphing and blessing his security under the protection of Justice, and with the other guarding the crown against the Giant and the Serpent—2. Violence and Treachery—wisely showing, as by an emblem, visible to the eye of the world, that justice, laws, and magistracy are divine and heavenly things, mothers and nurses of piety, security, felicity—justice being the very life-breath which many thousands draw, who else would be a very burthen to themselves and a prey unto others. Do but take away justice, and what are great kingdoms but great thieveries? Justice is that which tames and bridles the fiercest, defends and strengthens the weakest, keeps all quiet, secure, peaceable, happy.

Augustin., de Civit. Dei, lib. iv., cap. 4.

MMCXXIII.—God predestineth to the means as well as to the end.

THERE is mention made of one Ludovicus, who was a learned man of Italy, yet wanting the guidance of God's Spirit, and so, never considering advisedly of the means of His salvation, grew at last to this resolution: "Si salvabor, salvabor, &c. (It is no matter what I do or how I live, for if I be saved I am saved; if I be predestinated to life I am sure of salvation; if otherwise, I cannot help it)." Thus bewitched with this desperate opinion, he continued a long time, till at length he grew very dangerously sick, whereupon he sent for a skilful physician, and earnestly requested his help. The physician, aforehand made acquainted with his former lewd assertion, how he would usually say, "If I am saved I am saved," directed his speech to the same purpose, and said, "Surely it will be altogether needless to use any means for your recovery, neither do I purpose to administer anything unto you; for if the time of your death be now come, it is impossible to avoid it." Ludovicus, musing in his bed of the matter, and taking the physician's speech into serious consideration, makes out this conclusion to himself:—That if means were to be used for the health of the body, then much more had God also ordained means for the salvation of men's souls. And so, upon further conference (with shame and grief), he recanted his former opinion, took physic, and was happily cured both of soul and body together. Thus it is that the determinate counsel of God, in the matter of predestination, doth not take away the nature and property of secondary causes, nor exclude the means of salvation, but rather sets them in order and disposes of them to their proper end. And common sense and reason teach, that in every action the end and the means of the end must go together. Now, the end which every one of us doth aim at is, eternal life. We must be sure, then, to lay hold upon calling and justification as the means ordained to come to this end; for God hath chosen us from everlasting. There is predestination; yet there He doth not leave us: but then He doth teach us by His Word. There is calling. This Word (through His Spirit) engendereth faith. There is justification; and faith lifts up unto God. There is the ultimate of all, glorification.

Maxey's Serm., on Rom. viii. 30.

Beyerlinck, in Theatre Magna Candienat.

Aristot., Rhet., lib. vii.

"Hac inur ad astra."

MMCXXIV.—Man, by refusing the tenders of grace, becomes the cause of his own destruction.

AMAN being sick and like to die, the physician, knowing his case, takes with him some preservative to comfort him, and coming to the door falls a-knocking. Now, if he either will not or be not able to let him in, he must of necessity perish, and the cause cannot properly lie at the physician's door, who was ready and willing to relieve him, but in himself, that is not willing to be relieved. Thus it is that sin is a disease whereof we are all sick. We have all sinned. Now, Christ is the great Physician of our souls: He came down formerly from heaven on purpose to heal us, and He comes down daily to the door of our hearts, and there He knocks. He bringeth with Him ἄρτον τῆς ζωῆς (the Bread of Life), His eternal Word, to comfort us, and if we but open the door of our hearts He will come in and sup with us, as He did with Mary, and forgive all our sins; but if we will not let Him in, or, through long contagion of sin, be not able to let Him in, we must of necessity die in our sins; and the case is evident, not because He doth not offer grace, but because we receive it not when it is offered.

Gab. Inchini Scala Calt.

ἐμπόριον νόσημα.—PLATO, de Leg., x.

Rev. iii. 20. Augustin., in Matt. ix. 12.

Luke x. 42. Musculus, in Matt.

MMCXXV.—Otherwise thus.

Maxey, ut antea.

"Mari justè comparatur hic mundus."—CASSIOD., super Ps. xliv.

John iii. 19.

Luke xiv. 24.

In the fourteenth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, our Saviour, walking on the sea, bade St. Peter come unto Him, who, being not anything acquainted with such a slippery path, and seeing a great storm arise, his heart failed him, and he began to sink, but, crying out for help, Christ, who only was able to give it, stretched forth His hand, took him into the ship, and saved him. This world (we know, by experience) is a sea of trouble and misery. Our Saviour, as He did to Peter, so He most lovingly willeth every one of us to come unto Him ; but as we walk towards Him, storms and tempests do arise, so that, through frailty of our flesh and the weakness of our faith, we begin to sink. Christ stretcheth forth His hand ; He giveth us ὄργανον ὄργανῶν (His Word, His Sacraments), the good motions of His Spirit, to save us from sinning, to keep us in the ship of the Church. If we refuse these means, we perish, we sink in our sins. And why so ? Not because Christ doth not most kindly put forth His hand unto us, but because, in want and distress, we lay not hold upon Him. It is He that invites all men to His great Supper ; but if they make excuses, or wilfully refuse to come, He may justly pronounce, "None of them that were bidden shall ever taste of My Supper."

MMCXXVI.—The giddy, uncertain disposition of the multitude, or common people.

Philostratus.

Plin , lib. viii.,
cap. 53.

Solinus.

Acts xxviii. 3.

Ezra iii. 12.

Westfield's Serm.,
Lond., 1634.

"Populi turba rerum novarum avida."—LIV., Dec. i.

It is said of the roes and hinds, that they are most tender and fearful of all beasts, affrighted with any noise, checked with the least foil, turned out of course with the snapping of a stick, presently make head another way, and when they are once out of their wonted walk, erranti in via nullus est terminus (they run they know not whither, even to their own death). Such is the natural disposition of the multitude, or common people : soon stirred up, quickly awry, sometimes running full head one way, on a sudden turned as much another, easily set agog, delighted with novelties, full of alteration and change, one day crying, "Hosanna !" the next day, "Crucify Him !" Whilst the viper is upon St. Paul's hand, he is a murderer ; but no sooner off, in the turning of a hand, a god. One while the people wept because they had no temple, and when the temple was built again, they wept as fast, because the glory of the second was not like the first. In the sad time of Queen Mary, there was lamentation and crying out that idolatry was set up, the Church polluted, and the Gospel taken away ; afterwards, in the time of that famous Queen Elizabeth, when, through the great mercy of God, the Gospel was advanced, and the light thereof did comfortably shine throughout the whole kingdom, then they murmured and cried out as fast again that we had no Church, no ministry, truth was wrapped up in ceremonies, and all was anti-christian. So giddy and uncertain—nay, such is the madness of the people.

MMCXXVII.—Sectarian, schismatical seducers ; their company to be avoided.

Clark's Serm.,
Lincoln, 1645.

"Melius est habere malorum edium quam consortium."
—ISID., Scolioqu.

Acts xxiv. 5.

As a man that travelleth with a great charge of money in a way where many robbers haunt, or happens to be in some great market or fair where many cheaters and cutpurses resort, had need look well about him, be very wary and circumspect ; or in times and places of the pestilence, where many be infected, shut up, and die of the plague, had need be very careful of himself in the provision of antidotes to comfort and preserve his spirits, and corroborate (strengthen) the vitals : so had every sober, humble, discreet Christian, that carrieth in him a precious, immortal, invaluable soul, bless himself out of he company, and carefully avoid all contagious, schismatical seducers, who truly are what Tertullus falsely said St. Paul was λοιμοὶ ἄνδρες (pestilent fellows).

MMCXXVIII.—Sin's lethargy.

It is said of those that are fallen into a lethargy, that their bodies are subject to a continual drowsiness, and their memories so shaken off, that they do not remember anything of what either they speak or do—nay, they forget the very necessary actions of life. So deals sin with the soul of man : it draws upon it such a deadly and fearful sleep, that it makes men to forget the most necessary thing, the unum necessarium, that which in a special manner concerns them, even all the ways of God, all reverent fear and obedience to His majesty, all peace of conscience, all salvation of their souls, all eternal joy and felicity—in a word, all consideration of their lamentable estate and condition.

Ægineta Trallianus.

Ressoldi Serm. de Peccati Contagione.

MMCXXIX.—The glass of the Law truly showing men what they are.

As it is with some old, foul, and wrinkled dame, that is soothed up by her parasites in an admiration of her beauty, to whom no glass is allowed but the picturer's, that flatters with a smooth, fair, and young image : let such a one come casually to the view of a true glass, she falls out first with that mirror, and cries out of the false representation ; but after, when, upon stricter examination, she finds the fault in herself, she becomes as much out of love with herself as ever her flatterers seemed to be enamoured on her. It is no otherwise with us : we easily run away with the conceit of our spiritual beauty, of our innocent integrity, everything feeds us in our overweening opinion ; but let the glass of the Law be brought once and set before us, we shall then see the shameful wrinkles and foul morphews (scurfs) of our souls, and shall say with the prophet, "We lie down in our shame, and our confusion covereth us ; for we have sinned against the Lord our God."

Hall's Exon. Serm. on Prov. xxix. 23.

"Index peccati lex est."—BILLIUS, Antholog.

Jer. iii. 25.

MMCXXX.—The great danger of cherishing wicked thoughts.

As the stream in the river Jordan doth carry the fish swimming and playing till, on a sudden, they fall into the Dead Sea, where, by reason of the brimstone and other bituminous matter wherewith that sea is infested, they presently die ; so there are many in the world that suffer themselves to be carried away so long with vicious thoughts and wicked imaginations, that on a sudden the powers of the mind become generally tainted and infected. It may seem a small matter to lend the devil an evil thought, but it is very dangerous so to do ; for he dares not tempt any one into murder, treason, or any such grievous sin, till he hath sent an evil thought before, to try whether he shall be welcome.

Joseph., in Lib. contra Apion.
Plin., Nat. Hist.
lib. v., cap. 15.

MMCXXXI.—Custom in sin not easily removed.

If a man take, in the spring, three or four plants, and set them altogether at one time, if he come by-and-by, or within a while after, he may easily pull up one of them ; if he stay a fortnight or a month, he may pull up another, but it will be somewhat harder ; if he stay a year or two, till it have taken deep root, then he may pull and pull his heart out, his labour is all in vain, he shall never be able to move it. And thus it is that one sin, one offence, if we labour to pull it up in time, it may be forgiven, it may be taken away ; and if we let that one go on to two or three, yet, with unfeigned repentance, with bleeding tears, with incessant outcries to a gracious God, they may be razed out and wiped away, but with greater difficulty ; but if a man give up himself unto sin, accustom himself to do evil, so that it take deep root in the heart and be settled in the soul, he shall never be able to pull it up, nor arise from the death of sin, which hath so fast seized on him.

Simson's Serm.
Lond., 1629.

"Longaque alit asuetudine flammæ."
—OVID, Mét. lib. x.

MMCXXXII.—Sectarian subtlety, diabolical delusion.Hooker's Ecler.
Falt., in Preface.

2 Pet. ii. 1.

Edwards's Antitypes, log., p. 296.Pagett's Heresiograph,
Eph. vi. 11.

Rev. ii. 24.

As common drunkards, when they get in a temperate man upon their alehouse bench, entice him, tempt him, tole (allure) him on, first to taste, then to pledge them, then, when he is well whittled (sharpened) and come on, cup after cup, this health and that health, till he be fully fuddled and his brains intoxicated: thus the subtle sectarians are modest at the first, and very maiden-like. They will not force upon their proselytes a full carouse of their Circean cups, but by degrees, by little and little, they wind into their hearts and privily bring in damnable heresies; they do not violently rush, but slyly creep into houses, and there they begin at the apron strings, with illiterate mechanics, silly women, such as are led more by affection than judgment; then they let fall an apple to see if Atalanta will take it up, some general received truth, but withal they secretly foist in some erroneous opinion or poisonous principle, scatter some sparks of their wild fire, to see whether they will heat or inflame; and having their methods and ways, μεθοδείας τοῦ διαβόλου (rules to go by), they grammar and ground their deluded followers, at their first admission, in general and fundamental principles of their black art, but let them not see at what they drive—acquaint them not at the first dash with the mystery of iniquity, the depths of Satan.

MMCXXXIII.—Men not to be proud of their lands and livings.

Æliani *Var. Hist.*Hall, Exon. Sermon, at Court, 1632."Quid superbia terra ac cinis?"—
BERN., in Sermon.

WHEN Socrates saw Alcibiades proud of his spacious fields and wide inheritance, he calls for a map of the world, looks for Greece, and, finding it, asks Alcibiades whereabouts his lands lay. When he answered, they were not set forth in the map, "Why," saith Socrates, "art thou proud of that which is no part of the earth?" And, to speak truth, why should any man bear himself high upon the greatness of his revenue, the largeness of his demesnes; for if the dominion of a king be but a poor spot of earth, what a nothing must the possession of a subject be—some small parcel of a shire, not worth the notice of a chorographer? And had he, with Lycinius, as much as a kite could fly over—yea, if all the whole globe were his—six or seven feet would be enough to serve his turn in the conclusion.

MMCXXXIV.—Repentance to be universal.

Jores, Sermon, Isle of Wight, 1633.

Prov. iv. 25.

"Universalis debet esse penitentia,"
&c.

If a ship spring three leaks, and only two be stopped, the third will sink the ship; and if a man have two grievous wounds in his body, and take order to cure only one, that which is neglected will kill him. Even so if we, having divers lusts which fight against our souls, do mortify but some of them, it is to no purpose; if the guilt of many sins lie upon us (as in many things we sin all), and we repent but of some of them, it will not avail us anything. Hence is that counsel of Solomon, "Let all thy ways be ordered." He that will make a true search must search all his ways and try all his thoughts, words, and deeds, repent of all sin; for he that favours himself in any one sin, be it never so small, that man hates no sin perfectly, what show soever he makes to the contrary.

MMCXXXV.—Wicked men see the miseries, but not the joys of God's people.

Needler's Sermon,
London, 1655.

As a man, standing upon the sea-shore, sees a great heap of waters, one wave riding on the back of another, and hears, too (especially if it be in stormy weather), the loud roarings thereof, but all this while, though he see the waters, he doth not see the wealth, the gold and silver, the infinite riches that lie buried in the bottom thereof: so it is that wicked men see the want, but not the wealth of God's people—their conflicts, but not their comforts. They easily take notice of the miseries and troubles that usually attend upon the bodies of the children of God, but they cannot possibly discover the joys and rejoicings of the Spirit that are in their souls; neither indeed can they, for they are spiritually discerned.

"Gaudium est quod non datur impiis, nec ab impiis videtur."— ISID., de Sum. Bon.
1 Cor. ii. 14.

MMCXXXVI.—Magistrates and great men not to raise themselves by the ruin of the Church.

It is reported of Sabbacus, a king of Ethiopia, who, being by dreams admonished that he could not possess himself of the kingdom of Egypt otherwise than by sacrilege and the slaying of the priests, he chose rather to lay aside his claim and advantages of war which he had gotten, and to refer the government of that country to twelve wise men, who erected to that prince's piety one of the stateliest pyramids of Egypt, which yet remains. How much more will it become Christians, in any way of power and magistracy, not to make their way upon the spoils, nor lay the foundations or carry on the fabric of their greatness and dominion upon the carcasses and ruins of any, much less of the Church and Churchmen—such as are able, true, and faithful ministers of the true God and the Lord Jesus Christ!

Herodotus Clis.

Servilius, de Mirandis.

Gauden's Apology for the Ministry.

MMLCXXXVII.—How it is that the sweet fruits of grace come to grow on the bitter root of nature.

It is a question put by Plutarch, how it comes to pass that the fig-tree, being of that extreme bitterness—the root, the branches, the leaves, the stock and stem, being all of them so bitter—the fruit should be so sweet and pleasant to the taste. The like may be proposed, how it is that the sweet fruits of the Spirit should ever grow upon the bitter stock of nature; how man, by nature being in the very gall of bitterness, should ever become a sweet-smelling savour in the nostrils of his God. Surely, no otherwise but that, by faith and repentance, being ingrafted into the stock Christ Jesus, he sucks in juicy sweetness from thence, and so is made a tree of righteousness in God's garden.

Symptiac., Quest. 9, lib. vi.

Du Moulin, Traicté de l'Amour de Dieu.

MMCXXXVIII.—How it is that afflictions lie oftentimes so heavy.

It is said of Hagar, that when her bottle of water was spent, she sat down and fell a-weeping, as if she had been utterly undone; her provision and her patience, her bottle and her hope, were both out together. Oh, what must she do? What? Why, there was upon the very place, and that near at hand, comfort enough—a well of water to refresh her—had she but had her eyes open to have seen it. Thus it is that, in the midst of afflictions and distress, men whine and repine as if they were quite lost; they eye the empty bottle, the cross that is at present upon them, but, for want of spiritual sight, they see not the Fountain of Living Waters, Christ Jesus, with the open arms of His mercy ready to relieve them; they, as it were, groan under the heavy burthen of oppression, but, for want of coming to Christ and believing on Him, they miss of that speedy refreshing which otherwise they might happily enjoy.

T. W., A Fast-Serm., Lond., 1655.

Gen. xxi. 19.

"Jugum Christi grave cum tuleris, leve cum tulit."—

MMCXXXIX.—The supernatural workings of the Spirit.

PHILOSOPHERS observe that the ebbing and flowing of the sea is by virtue of the moon: she flings her fainting beams into the sea, and, being not able to exhale them as the sun doth, she leaves them there and goes away, and that draws them, and when they grow wet, Aristotle.

Isaac Ambros., de Regenerat.

they return again, so that the sea ebbs and flows, not from any principle in itself, but by virtue of the moon. Thus, the heart of every poor creature is like the water, unable to move towards heaven, to think a good thought, much less to act anything that is good, till the Holy Spirit of grace bring in its beams and leave a supernatural virtue by them upon the soul, and thereby draws it up to itself.

MM CXL.—Afflictions; not to be altogether taken up with the sense of them.

It is very observable of Jacob, that when his wife died in child-birth, she called the child Benoni—that is, a son of sorrows. But Jacob, in all probability, thought thus with himself: “If I should call this child Benoni, every time that I name him it would put me in mind of the death of my dear wife, which will be a continual affliction to me, and therefore I will not have my child of that name, but will from henceforth call him Benjamin—that is, the son of my right hand.” And this of Jacob may serve to show us thus much: that when afflictions befall us, we should not give way to have our thoughts continually upon them, always poring on them, ever thinking and speaking of them, but rather to have our thoughts on those things that may comfort us, or that may stir up our thankfulness to God for mercies, even in the very midst of our afflictions afforded unto us.

MMCXLI.—To suffer anything for the cause of Christ.

It is said of Hormisda, a nobleman of great eminency in the king of Persia's court, that, because he would not deny Christ, he was degraded of all his honours, stripped out of his lordly habit, clothed with sordid rags, and so turned out to keep the camels. After a long time, the king seeing him in that base, slavish condition, and remembering his former estate, took pity on him, caused him to be brought into his palace, suited him like himself in rich attire, and then persuadeth him to deny Christ; at which he rent his silken clothes, and said, “If for these silly things you think to have me to deny my faith in Christ, take them again; I will none of them.” And so, with great scorn and reproach, he was the second time cast out. Thus it is that all of us should be ready to suffer anything for the cause of Christ, be contented to be made a by-word and laughing-stock for Christ, and to bear with willing shoulders the most disgraceful things that can, by the malice of men and devils, be put upon us for Christ—nay, to bear up our spirits though all the world should frown upon us, cast us off, scorn us, and account us as a disgrace unto them.

MMCXLII.—The sins of our religious duties corrected by Christ and then presented to God the Father.

As a child that is willing to present his father with something or other that might please him, as a posy or nosegay, goes into the garden, and there, for want of judgment, gathers sweet-smelling flowers and noisome stinking weeds together, but coming to his mother, she picks out the weeds and binds up the flowers by themselves, and so it is presented to the father: and thus it is, that whether we pray unto God, or hear God speak unto us in His Word, or are otherwise employed in the performance of any religious action, Christ comes and picks out the weeds, takes away the iniquity of our holy things, observes what evil or failing there is in duty, and draws it out, and so presents nothing but flowers, nothing but what is pleasing and acceptable to God His Father.

Gen. xxxv. 18.

Isaac Ambrose, ut supra.

“Tu ne cede malis sed contra audentior ito, quâ tua te fortuna sinet.”—VIRGIL.

“Si me hujus causa pietat,” &c.—THEODORET, Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. 28.

“Perfer et obdura; dolor hic tibi proderit olim.”—OVID, Amer iii.

Isaac Ambrose, Media.

“Pro nobis apud Patrem interpellans ut Advocatus noster,” &c.

Rom. viii. 34.

MMCXLIII.—The comfortable sight of Christ Jesus crucified to the poor repentant sinner.

IMAGINE that you saw some malefactor led along to the place of execution, wailing and weeping for his misspent time, for his bloody acts, for his heinous crimes, and that his wallings and his weepings were so bitter, that they were able to force tears from others, and to make all eyes shoot and water that did but look upon him ; but then, if this man, in this case, should suddenly see his king running and riding towards him with a pardon in his hand, what a sight would this be ! Surely, none like it. Thus, thus it is with man : sorrowing and repenting for sin, whilst he is weeping over the sadness of his condition, and confessing what a little step there is betwixt him and damnation (as if he were even dropping into hell), in amaze he looks up unto Christ, whom he sees with a spear in His side, with thorns in His head, with nails in His feet, and a pardon in His hands. This were a sight, indeed—a most pleasant, ravishing, heavenly sight—such as not all the rich and curious sights on earth nor all those glittering spangles in heaven could afford the like.

Isaac Ambrose, ut supra.

“Christi passio, solatium in tribulatione, internæ devotionis exercitium,” &c.—THO. A KEMPIS.

MMCXLIV.—Heart-communication ; the want thereof deplorable.

It was the ingenuous confession of a learned divine, sensible of his neglect, but more especially of the difficulty of the duty of heart-communication : “I have lived,” said he, “forty years and somewhat more, and carried my heart in my bosom all this while, and yet my heart and I are great strangers, and as utterly unacquainted as if we had never come near one another—nay, I know not my own heart ; I have forgotten my heart. Ah, my bowels, my bowels ! I could be grieved at the very heart, that my poor heart and I have been so unacquainted !” Thus he then, in a pious and conscientious manner expressing himself ; but, mutato nomine, it is the condition of most men now, in this Athenian age of ours, such as spend their time in nothing more than in telling and hearing news—how are things here ? how there ? how in this place ? how in that ?—none almost inquiring how things are with their poor hearts, few or none debating the matter, nor holding a serious communication, clear intelligence, and acquaintance with their own hearts, saying, “Heart, how doest thou ? How is it with thee for thy spiritual estate ? Heart, how wilt thou do—or what doest thou think will become of thee, when thou and I must part, and never have the happiness to talk with one another again ?”

R. J. Lightfoot, In a Sermon, before the House of Commons on Fr. iv. 4

“Aut nihil aut, male, aut aliud agendo.”

“Redi ad cor tuum, et subtiliter discute teipsum, considera unde venis, quò tendis,” &c.—HUGO, de Anima, lib. iii.

MMCXLV.—A faithful soul and an unbeliever ; their difference in relying upon God.

LOOK how it is with two watermen : the one hales his boat about the shore and cannot get off, but tugs and pulls hard, yet never puts her forth to the tide ; the other, having more skill, puts off presently, sets up his sail, and then sits still, committing himself to wind and tide, which easily carry him whither he is to go. Just thus it is with a faithful soul and an unbeliever : all the care of the one is to put himself upon the stream of God’s providence, to set up the sail of hope, to take the gale of God’s mercy ; and so he goes on cheerfully. And why, but because he is not moved by any external principle. It is faith in Christ Jesus that puts him on ; it is by faith that he hath got a skill and a kind of flight to put over all cares to another ; and though he take up the Cross, yet he hurls all the care upon Christ, and then it is an easy matter to lie under the burthen when another bears the weight. But the unfaithful, unbelieving soul, thinking, by his own wit and power, to bring things about, tugs and pulls hard, yet finds neither ease nor success, but sinks under the pressure of every carnal, worldly occurrence that betides him.

Isaac Ambrose, ut antea.

“Per fidem attingit intercessa, do-præhendit ignota, comprehendit immensa,” &c.—BERN., super Cant.

MMCXLVI.—Self-denial; *the excellency thereof.*De Wann's Serm.
de Tempore.

THERE is mention made of a certain godly man that was in his time fore-tempted by Satan; the man was much in duty, to whom Satan said, "Why takest thou this pains? Thou dost watch, and fast, and pray, and abstainest from the sins of the times, but, O man, what dost thou more than I do? Art thou no drunkard, no adulterer—no more am I; dost thou watch and fast—why, let me tell thee, I never slept, I never ate or drank—what dost thou more than I do?" "I will tell thee," said the good man. "I pray, I serve the Lord—nay, more than all this,"—which is, indeed, the sum of all—"I deny myself." "Nay, then," says Satan, "thou goest beyond me, for I am proud—I exalt myself;" and so vanished. Oh the excellency of self-denial, when Christ may be said to rule within a man—when in every way a man subjects himself to Christ: in his understanding to know Christ, in his will to choose and embrace Christ, in his thoughts to meditate upon Christ, in his fear to serve and honour Christ, in his faith to trust and depend upon Christ, in his love to affect Christ, in his joy to delight in Christ, in his desires to long after Christ, in his endeavours to exalt Christ, in all his duties, graces, gifts, and abilities, to make them serviceable to Christ, so that he may be said to live; yet not he, but Christ that liveth in him.

Isaac Ambrose, ut antea."Si Christum dñcis satis est ai cetera nescis."

Gal. ii. 20.

MMCXLVII.—Graces divine, *not parts human, hold out in the end.*Drexelius, in *Zadaca Christiana.*De Medulla Progress. Camisti."Gratia, sine qua nec infantes, nec quæ graves, salvi feri possunt."—
AUG., de Nat. et Gratia.

As it is with two children playing together in the day, when night comes, one child goes to his father, and the other to his father; it may be all the day they are so like that you cannot say whose child is this or that, but, when night comes, the father then cometh to his child and saith, "Come, my child, come in doors;" and if the other do but offer to come in, "No, child, you must go home to your father." So, while we are living, grace and gifts are mingled together: some men have gifts and some men have graces, and they look very like; ah, but when night comes, when death comes, then saith God to those that have grace, "Come, my children, enter in;" but if those that have gifts only come, He sends them another way: so that, if a man have never such parts and gifts, yet, if he have not grace withal, he may go to hell and perish to all eternity.

MMCXLVIII.—*How it is that graces of the Spirit may at present seem to be lost.*Dyke's Serm. on 1 Thess. v. 19."Gaudium salutis amittere, gratia Dei non excidere possunt electi."—FABRI-CIUS, in Ps. li. 14.

1 Thess. v. 19.

As in a fire, the fuel may be quite burnt out, the flame abated and quite extinguished, but yet there still remains a heap of coals on the hearth, and in them a good fire, though all may seem to be quenched; and it is obvious to every eye that the sun doth not always shine out in its lustre, a cloud may interpose and so intercept its beams, yet, for all that, the body of it is in the heavens as the fountain of all other light whatever: so it is that the graces of the Spirit—such as faith, hope, love—cannot be finally and totally extinguished in the soul when they are once wrought there by the Spirit, yet their lustre, their radiancy, their shine and flame, may be clouded for some time. And so it comes to pass that, though a man cannot lose his hope, yet he may at present lose the comfort and confidence of his hope; though he cannot lose his love, yet he may cool the heat and fervour of his love; the flame of the Spirit, the feeling and sense of it, may, in the secondary cause thereof, for a time be quenched, but yet the Spirit itself, and the cardinal graces thereof, remain still in their full glory and splendour.

MMCXLIX.—Sin *to be removed, as the cause of all sorrow.*Wann's Serm. de 7 Vitiis.

IF a man have a thorn in his foot, it puts him to a great deal of pain, it swells, and is full of anguish; now, let him anoint his foot, let him lap it up and keep it warm, let him sit still and not walk upon it, yet all the while the thorn is still in his foot he hath no ease, but it aches and throbs and goes to the very heart of him; the way, then, for ease, in such a case, is to remove the cause of the sorrow, by all means to get the thorn plucked out, to get that drawn forth. So, when a man's conscience is in trouble and disquiet, he may use plasters of ease, may seek to quiet his spirit with merry company, good fellowship, following his pleasures, minding his business, he may be paddling with these plasters and poultices that men of the world seek ease by, but yet, so long as the thorn is in the heart, guilt in the conscience, and sin in the soul, all these slabberments will do no good, the thorn must be plucked out—sin must be removed, as the cause of all sorrows whatsoever.

Similes, Sentences, &c.

Alphons. ab Aven-
dan., Com. in Matt.

“Delinquendi materia debet in omnibus præsindi.”—
CYPRIAN., lib. ii.,
ep. 2.

MMCL.—Means in the attainment of grace, and the use thereof enjoined by God.

It was as easy for Boaz, and might have been done with as little charges, to have given Ruth as much corn at once as would have yielded her an ephah of barley, and so have sent her home without any more ado; but he would have her to use her endeavours, to gather and to glean it, and beat it out, too, when she had gleaned it. Thus, God gives grace and the knowledge of His truth as Boaz gave Ruth corn; not but that He can (if it so please Him) give knowledge by immediate revelation, and grace by immediate infusion, yet He will have us to use the means of hearing, reading, conference, &c., and so leave the issue of all our labours and endeavours to His good will and pleasure.

Dyke's Serm. on Prov., xxiii. 23.

Ruth ii. 15.

“Illud quod medium est, atque inter utrumque probatur.”—MARTIAL.

MMCLI.—The great benefit of hearing and practising God's Word.

As we see in the siege of some stronghold, when men have been long cooped up, and have not had meat to eat, they have come out like so many dead carcasses—as it were, so many skeletons—so weak, so poor, with such ghastly looks, as it were, enough to scare any man with the sight of them; but, now, eating amends all this: upon eating follows strength to walk and strength to work, upon eating follows fatness and goodness of complexion. And thus it is upon eating of the Word: when men with readiness and forwardness receive the Word of God, and practise what they hear, then it is that they have strength in their souls to walk in the ways of God—then it is that they grow up as calves of the stall, full of good, fat and flourishing—and then it is that they have fair and good complexions: their wisdom and other graces cause their faces to shine in the fair and lovely carriage of their lives and conversations.

1 Kings xix. 8.

Aloys Novarinus,
in Elect. Sacri.
Nehem. ix. 25.

Dan. i. 13.

Jer. xv. 15.
Rom. xv. 24.
Ps. xcii. 14.

MMCLII.—Meditation; the difficulty in the first entrance thereupon.

As in the heating of an oven the fuel is set on fire, yet not without some pains to blow it up into a flame, but afterwards, when the oven begins to be somewhat hot, the fuel will catch and kindle of itself, and no sooner is it thrown in but it is all in a blaze on a sudden: such is the difficulty of meditation at the first. When there is but, as it were, a little spark of love in the heart, it will cost a man some pains to blow it up into a flame; but afterwards, when the heart is once heated with those flames of love, then it will enflame all the thoughts and set the affections on fire: insomuch, that the duty of meditation will not be only easy and delightful, but so necessary, that a man cannot tell how to avoid it.

White's Art of Divine Meditati.w.

“Nihil est quod ampliores curam postulet, quam co-gitare quid geren-dum sit.”—AUSON.

MMCLIII.—Satan's subtlety to ensnare.

Phil. Diez, *Sun.
Prædicant.*

THERE is a story of an excellent painter, that, to show the rarity of his art, drew a white line so small that it could hardly be discerned; whereupon another, that was looked upon as a very able artist, to show that he could excel him, drew a black line through the middle of it so exactly that it required an exquisite sight to discern either. Thus it is that the devil slyly insinuateth into, and craftily worketh upon, the hearts of the sons of men, the thread of his policy being so finely spun, the train of his subtlety so privily laid, and the black line of his temptations made so small, that it is almost impossible to discover the secret destruction that runs through the plausibility thereof.

"Mille artifex æt
Satanas, varias illius fraudes referare nemo potest."
—LAUR. JUSTI-
NIANUS, de *Vita
Monast.*, cap. 12.

MMCLIV.—Purity of heart; no comfortable sight of God without it.

Vinc. de la Nuzæ Tract. Evang.

As the eye that hath dust in it without, or thick vapours stopping the nerves within, cannot see except it be cleansed from the one and purged from the other; and as the glass on which there is a thick mist does not represent one's face clearly before it be wiped off: so neither can we see God in His creatures, in His Word, in His Sacraments, or in those secret, inward, and sweet manifestations of comfort and joy, whereby He often reveals Himself even in this life to them that love Him, so long as there is any impurity cleaves to us. The pure in heart are the only ones that shall see God. It is not learning, nor a clear understanding, nor religious education, not any one of these, nor all of these together, but holiness and purity of heart, that fits a man for such a blessed sight as God is.

"Hinc illud Hermenii, malo mori quam corde fordari."
Matt. v. 8.

MMCLV.—Active Christian the best Christian.

In Libro Politic.

PLUTARCH speaks of two men that were hired at Athens for some public work, whereof the one was full of tongue, but slow at hand, and the other blank in speech, yet an excellent workman. Being called upon by the magistrates to express themselves, and to declare at large how they would proceed, when the first had made a long speech, and described it from point to point, the other seconded him in few words, saying, 'Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, ὡς οὗτος εἴρηκεν, ἐγὼ ποιήσω' ("Ye men of Athens, what this man hath said in words that will I make good in true performance"). And as he was adjudged the better artisan, so is the man of action the better Christian. It is not the man of words, but the man of deeds—not the leafy, but the fruitful, not the discoursing, but the doing Christian—that shall be blessed here in this world and happy in that which is to come.

Bishop of Lincoln,
Sermon, at Funeral of King James, 1625.

John xliii. 17.

MMCLVI.—The good Christian's hope at the death of a child of God

Thebaid. iv.

As Papinius Statius reports of the old Arcadians, that, mourning all night for the setting of the sun, they were comforted, notwithstanding, at the break of day, when they saw him in his sphere again; and as the people, enraged at the death of Romulus, were quieted by-and-by with Proculus's news that he saw him in glory riding up to heaven: so it is that such as are without hope are extremely troubled at the death of their intimate friend and acquaintance, as if he were lost and they should never see him again. But the good Christian remains full of hope at the death of any child of God, well knowing that mors janua vitæ, and he had no way but by this mortality to clothe himself with immortality, and that, as he is gone before into glory, they shall both meet in heaven with comfort.

Plin., Secund. de Virt. Illustribus,
cap. 2.

"Pis mors ultra non est mors, sed nomen tantum habet mortis," &c.
—CHRYSOST., de
Matt.

MMCLVII.—Blessing of God attendant on people listening to the doctrine of their own minister.

PHYSICIANS say that the mother's milk, though not so weighty as another's, if no noxious humour be tasted in it, is more proper for the child than any stranger's can be, because it is more natural; and certainly it would not be an error if a man should say as much of the milk which the minister gives to his own flock, and that a people conscientiously lying at the breasts of their own minister (if the milk he gives be wholesome, the doctrine preached be sound and orthodox) may expect the blessing of God for their nourishment, though it hath not so much lusciousness to please the curious taster, so much of rhetoric to tickle the itching ear, as some others have.

Hippocrat., de Nat. Pueri.

Gurnall's Christ., Compl. Armour, in Ep. Ded.

MMCLVIII.—State of nature an absolute state of impotency.

If a ship that is launched, rigged, and with her sails spread, cannot stir till the wind comes fair and fills them, much less can the timber that lies in the carpenter's yard, hew and frame itself into a ship; if the living tree cannot grow except the root communicates its sap, much less can a dead, rotten stake in the hedge, which hath no root, live of its own accord. And thus, if the Christian's strength be in the Lord (as most certainly it is) and not in himself, then the Christless person must needs be a poor, impotent creature, void of all strength and ability of doing anything of itself towards its own salvation; if a Christian, that hath a spiritual life of grace, cannot exercise that life without strength from above, then surely one void of that new life, dead in sins and trespasses, can never be able to beget it in himself or any way concur to the production of it—so helpless is the state of unregeneracy, so impotent the condition of every man by nature.

Drexellii Gymnasium Patientie.

"Natura, i. corrupta nec dum regenta, nihil per se potest boni," &c.—EUCHER. LUGDUNENS.

MMCLIX.—The state of nature, for all its specious outside, a state of friendship with hell.

As it is with the fighting of two fencers on the stage, you would think at first they were in earnest, but, observing how wary they are where they hit one another, you may soon know they do not intend to kill one another, and that—which puts all out of doubt—when the prize is done, you shall see them merry together, sharing what they have got from their deluded spectators, which was all they fought for. Thus, you shall have a carnal heart—a man in the state of unregeneracy—make a great bustle against sin, by complaining of it or praying against it, so that there seems to be a great scuffle between Satan and such a soul, but if you follow him off the stage of duty (where he hath gained the reputation of a saint, the prize he fought for), you shall see the devil and him sit as friendly in a corner as ever.

Gurnall's Christian in Complete Armour.

MMCLX.—The sinner's desperate madness.

TERTULLIAN stood, as it were, amazed at the folly of the Roman's ambition, who would endure all manner of hardship in field and fight, and run through any difficulty whatsoever, and for no other thing but to obtain at last the honour to be consul, which he aptly calls "unius anni gaudium volaticum (a joy that flits away at the year's end)." Desperate, then, must needs be the madness of all wretched, sinful men, who will not endure a little hardship here, but entail on themselves the eternal wrath of God hereafter, for the short feast and running banquet their lusts entertain them here withal, which often is not gaudium unius horæ (a joy that lasts an hour)—nay, so transient, that it hardly seems to be at all.

In Lib. de Corona Militis.

"O cæcas hominum mentes, O pectora dura!"

MMCLXI.—The difference betwixt sermons preached and sermons printed.

Gurnall's Christian Completely Armed, in the Epist. Decent.

THERE is as much difference between a sermon in a pulpit and printed in a book as between milk in the warm breast and in a sucking bottle, yet what it loseth in the lively taste is recompensed by the convenience of it. The book may be had at hand when the preacher cannot. And that is the chief end of printing, that as the bottle and spoon is used when the mother is sick or out of the way, so is the book, to quiet the Christian and stay his stomach in the absence of the ordinance; yet he that readeth sermons and good books at home, to save his pains of going to hear, is a thief to his soul in a religious habit: he consults for his ease, but not for his profit; he eats cold meat when he may have hot; he hazards the losing the benefit of both by contemning of one, offering sacrifice for sacrifice, in robbing God of one duty to pay Him in another.

"Predicatoris vox, corda torpenta hominum excitat plus quam lectionis," &c.—GREG., super Evang.

MMCLXII.—The bare enjoyment of Church privileges doth not make up a true Christian.

Anno 1 ELIZ.

Pulton's Called, of Statutes.

Camden's Annal. Reg. Elizabeth.

Gurnall, Christian in Compl. Armour.

"Re non nomine Christiani."

WHEN a statute was made in Queen Elizabeth's reign that all should come to church upon penalty of being looked upon as in a way of recusancy, and so punishable by law, the Papists sent to Rome to know the Pope's pleasure. He returned them this answer, "Bid the Catholics in England give me their hearts, and let the queen take the rest." And withal a dispensation was granted, so that very many came to church, but it was more for fear than love, more for the saving of their purses than any thought at all of saving their poor deluded souls. And thus it is that, as Christ had His saints in Nero's court, so the devil his servants in the outward court of his visible church; so that a man must have something more to entitle him to heaven than living within the pale of the Church, and giving an outward conformity to the ordinances of Christ. There must be an inward conformity of the mind to the laws of God, a subjection to the sceptre of Jesus Christ, and a readiness to be led by the guidance of the Blessed Spirit; otherwise he may be of the Church, but not in the Church—a partaker of Church privileges, but no true proprietor of the graces and benefits thereby accruing.

MMCLXIII.—Acknowledgment of mercies received the ready way to have them further enlarged.

Agathocles,

Willigis.

See B. Smith's Sermons.

Dr. Prideaux, late Bp. Wigmor.

"Beneficia Dei omnibus hois, et omni tempore consideranda sunt,"—CHRYS., in Gen. Hom. lxxvii.

IT is and usually hath been the manner of great men (such as from baseness and beggary have ascended to kingdoms and empires, and from sitting with the hirelings and dogs of the flock have been seated on thrones of state and tribunals of justice) to be delighted to speak often of their poor and mean beginnings, to go and see the low-roofed cottages where they were first entertained and had their birth and breeding; yea, there was one of late years that, being got by desert into the divinity chair, did, without superstition, hang up in his closet some part of that mean apparel wherein he first saluted his Oxford mother. A good way, no doubt, and, being done with a good mind, the ready way to have mercies and blessings enlarged. It would not be unuseful, therefore, for the Christian to look in at the gate, to see the smoky hole where once he lay, to view the chains wherewith he was laden, and to behold the snares of sin and Satan wherein he was once entangled, but then to open his mouth with thanks unto God, who will be sure to fill it with His tender and loving kindnesses.

MMCLXIV.—The excellency of Christ Jesus.

It is observable that, when some great king or potentate draweth near unto his royal city, the dukes, marquesses, earls, lords, and others of the nobility and gentry ride before him. Now, if a stranger standing by should ask, "Who is this man? and who is that? What power hath that man at court? What place hath this? What means hath a third?" it would be answered, "This is my lord duke; that, such an earl; the other, such a great lord; such a one is the Lord Treasurer; that, the Lord Admiral; and that other, the Lord Chancellor," &c. But when the king comes, he saith no more but only, "That is the king." And why so? And why no more but so? Because in that one slender word all the greatness of the rest is included, the king being the fountain of honour from whence all their glory is derived. Thus it is that, if all the created goodness, all the privileges of God's children, all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them, were to be presented at one view, they would all appear as nothing and emptiness in comparison of the excellency and fullness that is to be found in Christ Jesus.

Alphons. ab Avendano, Moralitat. in cap. i. St. Matt.

"Incassum laborat in acquisitione virtutum, qui eas alibi quam in Christo quaerit."—BERN., in Cant.

MMCLXV.—The minister's joy in the conversion of souls.

If it cannot but delight the husbandman when he seeth his plants grow, his fruits ripen, his trees flourish; if it must needs rejoice the shepherd to behold his sheep sound, fat, and fertile; if it glad the heart of a schoolmaster or tutor to observe his scholars thrive in learning and increase in knowledge;—it must needs be matter of abundant joy to any minister of the Gospel when people are brought to fellowship with God in Christ Jesus, when they are, as it were, snatched out of the slavery of sin, the jaws of death and hell, and brought into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. Then it is that he may be said to reap the fruits of his labours, in the great comfort of his own soul.

Sen., Ep. xxiv.

Ven. Beda, in Ep. 1 Joh. ii. 4.

"Auditores benevoli, alacres redunt predicatorum."—CHRYS., in Heb.

MMCLXVI.—God's pardoning other repentant sinners a great motive to persuade us that He will pardon us also.

If one should come to a physician, of whom he hath had a large report of his skill, and should meet with hundreds by the way, such as were at that time his patients, and all of them should tell him how he hath cured and healed them of their several infirmities, this must needs encourage him to go on with confidence of his skill, that he will recover him also. So should every repentant sinner run to Christ, the Great Physician of his soul, because so many thousands have been healed, so many great sinners have been forgiven, such as Manasseh, Mary Magdalene, St. Paul, &c. This may be a great motive to persuade us all that, upon repentance, He is and will be ready to forgive us also, according to that of the apostle, "He hath showed mercy unto me, that others might believe in God."

Preston's Breast-plate of Faith and Love.

2 Chron. xxxiii. 13.

Luke vii. 38.
Acts ix. 18.
"O penitentia quid de te novi, referam," &c.—CYPRIAN.

MMCLXVII.—Men to be careful in the trial of their faith, whether it be sound or not.

If one be told that his corn is blasted, that all the trees in his orchard are dead, that all his money is counterfeit, that the deeds and evidences upon which his lands and whole estate depend are false, it must needs affect him much, and make him look about him to see if these things be so or no. And shall not men look, then, to the faith they have, upon which depends the eternal welfare of their immortal souls, seeing God accepteth none except it be sound, effectual, lively, and accompanied with good works; such a faith as worketh by love, purifieth the heart, and shows itself in fruits worthy amendment of life.

Treat. of Effect, Faith, ut supra.

"Non bove mactato, caelestia munera gaudent, sed fide quâ prastanda est."—OVID.
1 Thess. i. 3.

MMCLXVIII.—Men not to be ashamed of their godly profession, though the wicked speak evil of them.

Preston's Golden Sceptre,

1 Pet. iv. 4.

"Id mantice quod in ergo est non vident."

SUPPOSE a geometrician should be drawing of lines and figures, and there should come in some silly, ignorant fellow, who, seeing him, should laugh at him, would the artist, think you, leave off his employment because of his derision? Surely no; for he knows that he laughs at him out of his ignorance, as not knowing his art and the grounds thereof. Thus, let no man be ashamed of his godly profession, because wicked men speak evil of it; and why do they so but because they understand it not, it is strange to them. They see the actions of godly men, but the rules and principles that they go by they know not; and hence is it that they throw dirt in the face of religious profession, but a wise man will soon wipe it off again.

MMCLXIX.—God ordering all things for the good of His Church.

"Rudis indigestaque moles."—OVID.

*Serm. at Lincoln's Inn on Gen. xxii.
14, ut supra.*

PUT the case, all were turned upside down, as it was in the confused chaos, wherein heaven and earth were mingled together, and the waters overcoming all the rest; yet as, when the Spirit of the Lord did but move upon the waters, many beautiful creatures were produced, and the sea divided from the rest, so that those waters which then seemed to spoil all serve now to water all, without which we cannot possibly subsist; even so, were the Church in never so confused condition, yet God will, in His great wisdom, so order the things that seem to undo us, that they shall make much for us, and bring forth something of special use for the Church's good, something to water and make fruitful the house and people of God.

MMCLXX.—Sin; the godly man's hatred thereof.

Aldaywandi Ornitho-log., lib. xiv.

IT is said of the dove, that she is afraid of every feather that hath grown upon a hawk, and brings as much terror upon her as if the hawk were present; such a native dread is (as it seems) implanted in her, that it detests and abhors the very sight of any such feather. So the godly man, that hath conceived a detestation against sin, cannot endure anything that belongs to it or that comes from it—no, not the least motion or inclination, though it bring along with it never so fair pretences, never so specious shows, shall have the least welcome or entertainment.

MMCLXXI.—Vanity of the creature without God.

Preston's Church's Marriage.

"Ese accidentis plus est in subjecto," &c.—ARISTOT.
"Creatura sine Deo
nihil potest," &c.
—ISIDOR.

TAKE a beam of the sun, the way to preserve it is not to keep it by itself, the being of it depends upon the sun—take the sun away and it perisheth for ever; but yet, though it should come to be obscured, and so cut off for a while, yet, because the sun remains still, therefore, when the sun shines forth again, it will be renewed again. Such a thing is the creature compared with God: if you would preserve the creature in itself, it is impossible for it to stand—like a broken glass, without a bottom, it must fall and break. It is well known that the being of an accident is more in the subject than in itself; insomuch that, to take away the subject, the very separation is a destruction to it. So it is with the creature which hath no bottom of itself, so as the separation of it from God is the destruction of it; as, on the contrary, the keeping of it close unto God (though in a case that seems to be the ruin of it) is its happiness and perfection.

MMCLXXII.—How it is that God is to every one of His children alone.

It is observed that a mathematical point hath no parts, it is one indivisible; for, let a thousand lines come to one point, every one hath the whole, and yet there is but one that answers all, because it is indivisible, and every one hath all. So it is with God: though there be many thousands that He loves dearly, yet every one of them hath the Lord wholly; for that which is infinite hath no parts, and therefore He bestows Himself, not partly on one and partly on another, but He bestows all Himself on every one, and expects that every one should do the like unto Him.

Du Moulin, Traité de l'Amour de Dieu.

MMCLXXIII.—Excess of apparel condemned.

WHAT heavy things are thundered against those curious dames of Jerusalem by the prophet Isaiah, who, being himself a courtier, inveighs as punctually against the noble vanity of apparel as if he had late viewed the ladies' wardrobes; and our Saviour finds fault with the Scribes, that love to go in long clothing. But, to come nearer: in the year 1580, great ruffs with huge wide sets, and cloaks reaching almost to the ancles, no less comely than of great expense, were restrained here by proclamation, saith Mr. Camden. And need we not the like law now, when so many prodigals turn rents into ruffs, and lands into lace, "singulis auribus bina aut terna pendunt patrimonia (hang two or three patrimonies at their ears, a pretty grove upon their backs, a reasonable lordship or living about their necks)," as Seneca hath it?—from whence both St. Cyprian and St. Augustine drew up this conclusion, that superfluous apparel is worse than whoredom, because whoredom only corrupts chastity, but this corrupts nature.

Mark xii. 38.

In Vita Elizab.

Trapp's Com. on Matt. vi. 29.

MMCLXXIV.—God to be seen in the works of the creation.

A GODLY ancient being asked by a profane philosopher how he could contemplate high things, since he had no books, wisely answered, that he had the whole world for his book, ready open at all times and in all places, and that he could therein read things heavenly and divine. And most true it is that God is to be seen and admired in the works of the creation: there is not a flower in the field, not a pile of grass we tread on, but sets forth God unto us in very lively colours; so that not to see Him is to incur the curse He hath denounced against such as regard not the work of the Lord—i. e., the first making—neither consider the operation of His hands—i. e., the wise disposing of His creatures for our good.

Eremita, apud Augustin. de Doctr. Christ., lib. i.

"Refert quælibet herba Deum."—OVID.

ISA. v. 12.

MMCLXXV.—To keep close to the Word of God in seeking after Christ.

It is the observation of a good man, now with God, that the wise men, travelling to find Christ, followed only the star, and as long as they saw it they were assured that they were in the right way, and had great mirth in their journey; but when they entered into Jerusalem (whereas the star led them not thither, but unto Bethlehem), and there would be instructed where Christ was born, they were not only ignorant of the place where, but they had lost the sight of the star that should guide them thither. Whereof we learn, in any case, that whilst we be going to learn Christ, to seek Christ, who is above, to beware we lose not the star of God's Word, which only is the mark that shows us where Christ is and which way we may come to Him. These are the good man's own words, whereunto may be added, that whereas David made the Word of God a lantern to his feet, and a light unto his paths, we would not suffer ourselves to be led aside by every ignis fatuus, every false fire that presents itself unto us, but keep close to the Word of God, which will bring us to the knowledge of Christ here and the full enjoyment of Him hereafter.

Ep. Hooper, in a Letter to Mrs. Anna Warcup.

Fox's Acts and Monuments of the Church.

Ps. cxix. 105.

"Recurrendum est ad solas Scripturas."
—P. DE ALLIACO, in Sent.

MMCLXXVI.—What it is to trust in God really and truly.

Preston, Of Effect.
Lect. 1, Thess. i. 3.

THERE was a king of this land that, being engaged in war, sent to the general of his army to spare such a city: he had a command, under the broad seal and the king's own hand, to do it, and to disobey his warrant was death; but withal, the king gave him private instructions to destroy the city, and in so doing he would save him harmless; the general did so, and trusted the king for his life, so that if he had failed him he had been utterly destroyed. Thus, if a man be brought to such an exigence, if he will trust God in such a case, as wherein, if he fail him, he is undone; so to lean upon God, that if he slip away, he sinketh; so to be unbottomed off himself and every creature; so to cast himself upon God that, if he step aside, he is like to perish;—this is to trust in God really and truly.

"Si sæviat mundus, si fremat malignus,
&c. Tu es spes mea Domine,"—
BERNARD.

MMCLXXVII.—The monstrous sin of ingratitude.

Camden, Elloe.

QUEEN ELIZABETH, in a letter of hers to Henry IV., king of France, amongst many other expressions, hath this upon the sin of ingratitude: that if there were any unpardonable sin in the world, such as the sin against the Holy Ghost, it was ingratitude. "Call me unthankful," said another, "and you call me all that naught is." And, without all doubt, such a vice it is, that Nature frowns at, though she smile at many others—nay, it is a monster in nature, a solecism in manners, a paradox in divinity, an ugly sin; insomuch, that Christ Himself joined the evil and unthankful together.

"Ingratum si dix-eris," &c.—DAVID PAREUS, in Matt.
v. 6.
Luke vi. 35.

MMCLXXVIII.—How it is that faith is said to be made perfect by works.

Preston, Treat. of Effectual Faith.

As one that professeth that he hath an art, and that he is able to do this and that by his art, now, if he make up some exquisite piece of workmanship, by that he is said to make good his art; or as when we say such and such trees are good, because they have sap in them they are not dead trees, yet, for all this, the tree is made perfect by the fruit: so faith by works is made perfect. Not that works put life into faith—the sap must first be in the tree, and then it bringeth forth fruit: so there must be first a life in faith, and then it bringeth forth good works; so that, when it is said faith is made perfect by works, the meaning is, that faith is made good by works—that works declare faith to be right, as the fruit doth declare the tree to have sap.

"Per fructum dignoscitur arbor."

MMCLXXIX.—How to make trial of faith, whether it be right or not.

De Mediavilla, Clavis David.

TAKE a cup of wine and, if you would know whether it be good or not, drink it off; but if it heat you not, warm you not at the heart, quicken you not, nor in any way revive your spirits, you will say, "It is naught—flat and dead! Had it been good wine, it would have done all this." Then, if you come to plants, and find no fruit nor leaves, you say, "This plant is dead." If you come to take a dram of physic, and it do not work, you say, "It is bad physic." And so, if you take leaven and put it into the dough, if it sour not the lump, you say, "It is a dead leaven, a counterfeit." Thus, if a man find not faith in the operation thereof, that it works not a general change in the soul, that it fires not the heart with love to Christ, if there be no life in it, then let such a man know that he is deceived, his faith is not right, not effectual, not any way conducing to life eternal.

"Tunc enim fideles veraciter sumus," &c.—GREG., Hom.
xxix.

"Tu dicis quod credis, fac quod di-cin et fides est," &c.
—AUG., in Joñ.

MMCLXXX.—The proposal of rewards and punishments very useful to the bringing in to Christ.

A SPOUSE that is considering with herself whether she should marry such a husband or not, beginneth to consider what she should be without him and what she shall have with him; she considers him, perhaps, as one that will pay her debts and make her honourable, &c., and yet, it may be, she considers not the man all this while. However, these considerations are good preparatives to draw her on to give entertainment to him; but, after some converse and acquaintance with the person, she comes to like the man himself so well, that she is content to have him though she have nothing with him, and so she gives her full and free consent to him, and the match is made up betwixt them, out of true and sincere love and liking. Thus it is that the proposals of rewards and punishment are, as it were, a beginning, a prodromus, a good introduction to the full sight and fruition of God; when it is that men begin at first to consider their own misery most, and that, if they should apply themselves to other things as remedies, they would be still to seek—for there is vanity in all things; and if to themselves, they cannot help themselves in time of trouble; therefore they judge that they must go to Almighty God, who is able to do more than all, and to rid them out of misery; and they consider that, going to Him, they shall have heaven beside; yet all this while they consider not the Lord's power. However, this consideration makes way, that God and they may meet and speak together; it brings their hearts to give way, that the Lord may come to them; it causeth them to attend to Him, to look upon Him, to converse with Him, to admit Him as a suitor, and to be acquainted with Him; and whilst they are thus conversing with Him, God reveals Himself; and then, being come to the knowledge of Him in Himself, they love Him for Himself, are willing to seek His presence, to seek Him for a husband, though all other things were removed from Him; and now the match is made up, and not till now; and then they so look upon Him, that if all other advantages were taken away, they would yet still love Him, and not leave Him for all the world's enjoyments.

Preston's Golden Septuag.

"Frangit etiam magnorum virorum animi excitantur." — FERRON, lib. ii.

Eccles. i. 2.

"Jamque opus exegi," &c.— OVID, ult.

MMCLXXXI.—No man a loser by giving up himself unto God.

It is said of vapours, that, arising out of the earth, the heavens return them again in pure water, much clearer and more refined than they received them; or as it is said of the earth, that, receiving the sea-water and puddle-water, it gives it better than it received in the springs and fountains, for it strains the water and purifies it—that whereas, when it came into the bowels of the earth, it was muddy, salt, and brinish, it returns pure, clear, and fresh, as out of the well-head waters are well known to come: thus, if men would but give up their hearts' desire and the strength of their affections unto God, He would not only give them back again, but, withal, much better than when He received them—their affections should be more pure, their thoughts and all the faculties of soul and body should be renewed, cleansed, beautified, and put into a far better condition than formerly they were.

Gab. luther. Scola Cal.

"Et tibi (crede mihi) tempora veris erunt." — OVID, Fast. i.

MMCLXXXII.—Ignorance and wilfulness ill-met.

It is a maritime observation, that if a thick fog darken the air, there is then (the great God of heaven and earth having in His providence so ordered it) no storm, no tempestuous weather; and if it be so that a storm arise, then the sky is somewhat clear and lightsome—for, were it otherwise, no ship at sea nor boat in any navigable river could ride or sail in safety, but would clash and fall foul one upon another. Such is the sad condition of every soul amongst us wherein ignorance and wilfulness have set up their rest together. And why? Because that, if a man were ignorant only, and not wilful, then the breath of Fuller's Serm., Lond., 1655; occasioned by a sermon of bringing in of the Jews into England.

"Eheu, quàm miseros tramite devio abducti ignorantia," &c.—
BOET., lib. 8.

wholesome precepts and good counsel might in time expel those thick mists of darkness that cloud his understanding; and were he wilful, and not ignorant, then it were to be hoped that God in His good time would rectify his mind and bring him to the knowledge of Himself; but when the storm and the fog meet, when wilfulness and ignorance (as at this day amongst the Jews, and too, too many Christians) do close together, nothing, without the greater mercies of God, can befall that poor shipwrecked soul but ruin and destruction.

MMCLXXXIII.—Unsteadfastness, giddiness, &c., in the profession of religion reprov'd.

Athenæus.

It is said of an intoxicated man, who (the liquor being busy in his brain), fancying himself at sea in a great storm, and in present danger of shipwreck, thought there was a necessity of lightening the ship, and throwing some of the lading overboard, and so threw the goods of his house out at the windows: thus it is that this age hath been taken with an unhappy vertigo, which hath made some men not keep the ground they first stood upon, and wanton delight hath possessed many men to be meddling, trying of experiments, and ringing changes; nay, so distempered have divers been, that, like the drunken man, they have fancied a great necessity of abolishing and throwing away what they would have done better to have kept.

Hall's Sermon, at St. Paul's to the Sons of Ministers, 1655.

MMCLXXXIV.—Men in the midst of their worldly contrivances prevented by death.

Marshall's Sermon, Westminster, 1651.

As it is with a man, being come to some great fair or market with a considerable sum of money about him, who, whilst he is walking in the throng, considering with himself how he should lay out his money to the best advantage, some sly fellow either cuts his purse or at unawares dives into his pocket, and there is an end of all his marketing: so it is with the most of men, that whilst they are in the midst of all their secular employments, and, as it were, crowded in the throng of worldly contrivances—how to secure such a ship, advantage trade, compass such and such a bargain, purchase such and such lands, &c. (things in themselves with necessary cautions not unlawful)—in steps Death, cuts the thread of their life, spoils all their trade, and lays their glory in the dust.

"Heu mortem invisam," &c.—
MAPH. VEGIUS, in Appendice Virgil.

MMCLXXXV.—Riches; their uselessness in point of calamity.

• Mich. Paleologus.

NUGAS, the Scythian king, despising the rich presents and ornaments that were sent unto him by the Emperor of Constantinople,* asked him that brought them whether those things could drive away sorrow, diseases, or death, looking upon them as not worthy presenting that could not keep off vexation from him. And such are all the riches and glories of this world: they cannot secure from the least calamity, nor make up the want of the least mercy. It is not the crown of gold that can cure the headache, nor the gilded sceptre that can stay the shaking hand; not the honourable garter that can ease the gout, nor the necklace of pearl that can take away the pain of the teeth; and a bag of gold will prove but a hard pillow to rest on. Miserable comforters are they all! Only the useful riches of grace, that are to be found in Christ Jesus, give ease and refreshment under all pains and torments whatsoever.

Brooks's Unsearchable Riches of Christ.

MMCLXXXVI.—Apparel, whether richer or plainer; the necessity thereof.

Diog. Laert., lib. vi., cap. 6.

As Crates, reprov'd by the Athenians because (to countenance his professorship) he wore Σινδόνα—that is, a mantle of estate (being but a philosopher)—which Theophrastus before him was never seen to do, answered them again that Theophrastus (whom they all thought so well of) did many times wear a lighter garment; the which, when the magistrates would not believe, he brought them to a barber's shop, and showed him unto them all dight (dressed) as he sat in his pied napery (spotted linen); intimating hereby that costly apparel and other clothing in themselves are things indifferent, but grow often necessitated by the circumstances of time and place: as soft clothing for the court, and that which is coarser for the cart; a fine suit for the citizen, a plainer for the countryman—every one wearing that which is fitting for his place and calling.

Lib. v., cap. 4.

Aquin., 1^a, 2^a, qu. 169, art. 1, ad. 3.

MMCLXXXVII.—True comfort in God only.

GREAT was the grief of C. Figulus, who, to his friends that came to comfort him about the loss of the consulship, said, "Omnes consulere scitis, consulem facere nescitis (All can give me counsel, but ye cannot make me consul)." And could outward things rid us from the troubles of this life, from death the end of this life, from damnation after death, then said they something worth the hearkening to; but this they cannot do. They cannot make us happy, there is no true comfort to be drawn out of the standing pools of outward sufficiencies, but out of the living fountains of the all-sufficiencies of the Lord Almighty.

Val. Max., lib. ix., cap. 3.

Stoughton's Serm., Lond., 1624.

MMCLXXXVIII.—The resolved, constant Christian.

IN the Salentine country is mention made of a lake brim full: put in never so much, it runneth not over; draw out what you can, it is still full. Such is the condition of a resolved, constant child of God. Tide life, tide death, come what can come, He is still the same—so true to His primitive institution, that, if adversity frown, He entertains it as a trial of His patience; if prosperity smile upon Him, He looks upon it as a blessing extraordinary; whether it be peace or war abroad, sickness or health at home, He is resolved. Whereas a carnal man, who bears his prosperity neither with moderation nor prudence, but is full-blown, like a bladder, with the wind of his own pride, he seldom in adversity shows either courage or constancy: one small prick of disaster empties his swollen heart of all hopes, and, like an unskilful and dejected seaman upon every little storm, he cuts cable and mast, and throws all overboard, where but the slacking of a few sails would serve the turn, godly resolution would do the deed.

Plin., Hist., lib. ii., cap. 103.

Dallington's Aphorisms Civil and Military.

"Sorte sua contentus abi. Superbus secundis, dejectus adversis."—THUCYD.
"Sonus excitat omnis suspensum."—VIRGIL.

MMCLXXXIX.—The rage of war in the richest countries.

IN natural bodies, the longer they subsist in perfect health the more dangerous is the disease when it cometh, and the longer in curing, as having none of those humours spent which, by distemper, give foment and force to the approaching malady. So it is in bodies politic: when war once seizeth on a country rich in the plenties of a long peace, and full with the surfeits of a continual ease, it never leaves purging those superfluities till all be wasted and consumed.

Hippocrat., Aphor., iii.

Dallington, ut supra.

"Nulla salus bello."—VIRGIL.

MMCXC.—The grace of God is all in all.

WE get aqua-vitæ ready against qualms, bezoar stone and cordials against fits. It was well said of Rev. Dr. Lake, late bishop of Bath, when, in the time of his sickness, a cordial was tendered unto him—"Oh," said he, "the cordial of cordials which I daily take is this: 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all our sins.'" And it is true that art is blind and often posed; nature weak and often foiled (like a bow that must not be drawn beyond compass); only the grace of God is all in all, helps all. Get but that and you may sleep in a dungeon; want all, and yet have all; want that, and a flea may break your sleep, and a handwriting dash all your mirth in pieces.

Harris, Peter's Enlargement.

1 John i. 7.

Epn. ii. 8.

MMCXCI.—Promises without abilities of performance not to be regarded.

Plin., Hist., lib. iii.,
cap. 103.
Dallington's Apoph-orisms.

"Heu patior telis vulnera facta meis."
—OVID, Eps.

In the country Carinensis of Spain, there is a river that shows all the fish in it to be like gold, but take them into your hand they appear in their natural kind and colour. Such are promises, and specious pretences of love in his mouth, that would obtain his purpose: bring them to the touch, and thou shalt find all is not gold that glitters. Great boast and small roast will never fill the belly. He, therefore, that will engage himself into any great action upon promise of great assistance, if he be not as sure of his friend's ability in power as readiness in will, he reckons without his host, and sits down with the loss.

MMCXCII.—The workings of God in the deliverance of His people are various.

Acts xxvii. 24.

Frederick, on the Evening.

"Fata viam invenient."
—VIRGIL.

WHEN God said to Paul, that all the souls with Him should be safe, there were divers means used: all were not able to swim to the shore, and the ship was not able to bring them all to the shore, but yet, by broken boards and by one means or other, all got to the shore. So the Lord brings things to pass in a strange manner, sometimes by one way, sometimes by another; if one way do not hold another shall. He breaks in pieces many times the ship that we think should bring us to the shore, but then He casts us on such planks as we little thought on, opens a door for our deliverance that we little dreamt on.

MMCXCIII.—Kings, princes, governors, &c., to be regarded by those that are under them.

Evans, Treat. of Nature and Grace.

1 Tim. ii. 2.

2 Sam. xviii. 3.

ALL the members of the body have care one of the other, but especially of the head and the heart. If the head do but ache, all the humours of the arms run to the head, and therefore the arms become small and slender, because they want their proper nurture. And so if the heart be sick, or in danger, or in fear, the outward heat retires inward to comfort the heart, so that the body looks outwardly pale; yea, if the head or the heart be in danger (periculis se exponunt) the other members will hazard limb and life to save them. Thus should all subjects do for the king, their head; they ought to have special care of him. They are to care one for another, to pray one for another, and to do good one for another, but especially for kings and princes and those that are in authority. They are to prefer their lives before ten thousand of their own, as the people of Israel did; for if a member or some of the inferior members be cut off, yet the body may live, and do indifferently well; but if the head be taken off, if the king be set aside, actum est de republica (that kingdom, that people cannot long stand).

MMCXCIV.—Christ the proper object of the soul.

Aristot., Physica.Evans, ut antea.

THERE is no agent that takes any rest or contentment but in its proper object. If a man had all the musical raptures and melodious harmony in the whole world before him, he could not hear it with his eyes, because it is the proper object of the ear; if never so triumphant shows or courtly masks, he could not see them with his ears, because they are the proper object of the eye. So it is with the soul of man. If it were possible that all the treasures, pleasures, honours, preferments, and delights which the world doth affect were presented and tendered to the soul, yet would they not afford unto it any true satisfaction, because they be not the proper object and centre of the soul. It is the Lord only, or as a good martyr said once, "None but Christ—none but Christ can compass the soul about with true content and comfort."

Acts and Monuments.

MMCXCV.—Satan's aim at those that have most of God and religion in them.

PIRATES, and such as are robbers at sea, slightly pass by smaller vessels that are but poorly freighted, whilst ships that are richly laden and furnished with merchantable commodities become the object of their greedy thoughts, at whom they make the strongest opposition, and for the gaining of whom (rather than fail) they will hazard their lives to the utmost of danger imaginable. Thus it is that Satan—that arch-pirate—lets poor, silly, ignorant souls alone, such as by their own defaults are but as so many empty vessels floating on the sea of this world; oh, but when he spies out a rich soul, laden with the fruits of the Spirit, that hath much of God, Christ, and heaven in it, there it is that he bends all his forces, and against such a soul it is that he raiseth all his strength, that so, if possible, he may bring it under his more than miserable subjection.

Gab. Inchini Scala Cali.

"Aquila non capit muscas,"— ERASM., Adag.

"Validis incumbit remissio, omnem movet lapidem," &c.

MMCXCVI.—Sin to be abhorred, as the cause of Christ's death.

AFTER Julius Cæsar was treacherously murdered in the senate-house, Antonius brought forth his coat—all bloody, cut, and mangled—and, laying it open to the view of the people, said, "Look, here is your emperor's coat; and as the bloody-minded conspirators have dealt by it, so have they also with Cæsar's body!" whereupon they were all in an uproar, crying out to slay those murderers. Then they took the tables and stools that were in the place, and set them on fire, and ran to the houses of the conspirators, and burnt them down to the ground. But behold a greater than Cæsar—even the Lord Jesus Himself—all bloody, rent, and torn for the sins of the world! How, then, when we look on sin as the cause of His death, and seriously consider that sin hath slain the Lord of life, should our hearts be provoked to be revenged on sin! How should we loathe and abhor it as having done that mischief, that all the devils in hell could never have done the like!

Niceph. Gregoras, de Fitiis Cæsarium.

"Agnosce homo quam gravia sint vulnera tua," &c.
—BERN.
Brooke's Precious Remedies against Satan's Devices.

MMCXCVII.—A lesser sin given way unto makes way for the committing of greater.

It is St. Augustine's story of Manicheus, that, being tormented with flies, he was of opinion that the devil made them, and not God. "Why, then," said one that stood by, "if the devil made flies, then the devil made worms." "True," said he, "the devil did make worms." "But," said the other, "if the devil did make worms, then he made birds, beasts, and man." He granted all. "And thus," saith the good old father, "by denying God in the fly, he came to deny God in man, and consequently the whole creation." And thus it is that the yielding to lesser sins draws the soul to the commission of far greater, as in these licentious days of ours is too apparent. How many have fallen, first to have low thoughts of the Scripture and ordinances of God, then to slight them, afterwards to make, as it were, a nose of wax of them, and, in conclusion, to cast them quite off, lifting up themselves, their Christ-dishonouring and soul-damning opinions, above them, so that,

Exposit. in Evang. St. John Tract., cap. 1.

"Obstare primum est velle, nec labi via," &c.—SEN., Hippol.

Brooks, ut antea.

"A malo ad pejus."

falling from evil to evil, from folly to folly, and, as it is in all other cases of the like nature, from being naught to be very naught, and from very naught to be stark naught, till God in His most just judgment sets them at nought for ever.

MMCXCVIII.—Men to prefer suffering before sinning.

Suidas.

Niceph., *Hist.
Eccles.*, lib. x.,
cap. 9.

"Ut exiguum pecuniæ por-tionem daret."— THEODORETI
Hist., lib. iii.,
cap. 6.

It is reported of that eminent servant of God, Marcus Arethusus, who, in the time of Constantine, had been the cause of overthrowing an idol-temple, but Julian, coming to be the emperor, commanded the people of that place to build it up again. All were ready so to do, only the good bishop dissented; whereupon they that were his own people, to whom he had formerly preached, and who (as, in all probability, any one would have thought) might have learned better things, fell upon him, stripped off all his clothes, then abused his naked body, and gave it up to children and schoolboys to be lanced with their penknives; but when all this would not do, they caused him to be set in the sun, having his naked body anointed all over with honey, that so he might be bitten and stung to death by flies and wasps; and all this cruelty they exercised upon him because he would not do anything towards the re-building of that idol-temple. Nay, they came so far, that if he would give but a halfpenny towards the charge, they would release him; but he refused all, though the advancing of a halfpenny might have been the saving of his life. And, in doing this, he did but live up to that principle that most Christians talk of, and few come up unto. And thus it is that all of us must choose rather to suffer the worst torments that men and devils can inflict than to commit the least sin, whereby God should be dishonoured, our consciences wounded, religion reproached, and our souls endangered.

MMCXCIX.—Discretion a main part of true wisdom.

Brooks, Of Assurance, in *Ep.
Dedicat.*

"Tolle discretionem, et virtus vitiū erit."—
ISIDOR.

A FATHER that had three sons was desirous to try their discretions, which he did by giving to each of them an apple that had some part of it rotten. The first eats up his apple, rotten and all; the second throws all his away, because some part of it was rotten; but the third picks out the rotten, and eats that which was good—so that he appeared the wisest. Thus, some in these days, for want of discretion, swallow down all that is presented, rotten and sound together; others throw away all truth, because everything delivered unto them is not truth; but, surely, they are the wisest and most discreet that know how to try the spirits, whether they be of God or not—how to choose the good and refuse the evil.

MMCC.—The difference betwixt true and feigned love unto Christ.

Quintus Curtius,
Diodorus, lib. xvii.

"Vix diligitur
Jesus propter
Jesusum."—AUG.

WHAT Alexander said of his two friends, Hephestion and Craterus, is made good in the practice of too, too many in these days: "Hephestion," says he, "loves me as I am Alexander, but Craterus loves me as I am King Alexander;" so that the one loved him for his person, the other for the benefits he received by him. Thus, some Nathaniels there be that love Christ for His person, for His personal excellencies, for His personal beauty, for His personal glory; they see those perfections of grace and holiness in Christ that would render Him very lovely and desirable in their eyes, though they should never get a kingdom or a crown by Him. But so it is that most of those—which is to be lamented—do it only in respect of the benefit they receive by Him; scarce any love Christ but for His rewards. Some few there are that follow Him for love, but many for the loaves; few for His inward excellencies, many for His outward advantages; and few that they may be good by Him, but many that they may be made great by Him.

MMCCI.—The dangerous use of riches.

It was a wise and Christian speech of Charles V. to the Duke of Venice, who, when he had showed him the Treasury of St. Mark and the glory of his princely palace, instead of admiring it, or him for it, only returned this grave and serious memento, "Hæc sunt quæ faciunt invitos mori, &c. (These are the things that make men so loth to die);" so that they cry out with St. Peter, "Bonum est esse hic (It is good to be here)!" but that of St. Paul, "Cupio dissolvi, &c. (I desire to dissolve, and to be with Christ)," which is best of all, they cannot abide to hear of. Thus it is that riches not well used prove very dangerous. If poverty, with Saul, has killed her thousands, riches, with David, has killed her ten thousands. They are called thorns, and that not improperly, as piercing both head and heart—the head, with cares in getting them, and the heart, with grief in parting with them. Many are the minds that riches have blinded, many the hearts that riches have hardened, many the wills that riches have perverted, many the affections that riches have disordered; whereas the riches that are to be found in Christ Jesus are such as will neither harm nor hurt the soul—there was never any that was ever made worse by them.

Phil. Nepos, Imp. Vitæ.

Matt. xvii. 4.

Phil. i. 23.

Brooks's Unsearchable Riches of Christ.

"Pluræ nimia congesta pecunia curâ strangulat."—JUV., Sat. X.

MMCCII.—God's mercies to the worst of sinners repenting.

THERE is a story concerning a great rebel that had made a great party against one of the Roman emperors; a proclamation was thereupon sent abroad, that whosoever could bring in the rebel, dead or alive, he should have a great sum of money for his reward; the rebel, hearing of it, comes and, presenting himself before the emperor, demands the sum of money proposed; the emperor bethinks himself, that if he should put him to death, the world would be ready to say that he did it to save his money, and so he freely pardoned the rebel and gave him the money. Here, now, was light in a dark lantern—mercy in a very heathen. And shall such a one do thus that had but a drop of mercy and compassion in him, and will not Christ do much more that hath all fullness of grace and mercy in Himself? Surely, His bowels yearn to the worst of sinners repenting; let them but come in and they shall find Him ready to pardon—yea, One that is altogether made up of pardoning mercies.

Bodin, Com. Ital.

"Quid est peccatum ad Domini misericordiam? Teia araneæ quæ vento flante nunquam apparet."—CHRYS., in Ps. l.

Nehem. ix. 17.

MMCCIII.—Rulers, magistrates, &c., to be men of public spirits.

It is written of Augustus Cæsar (in whose time Christ was born), that he carried such an entire and fatherly affection to the commonwealth, that he called it filiam suam (his own daughter), and for that cause refused to be called dominus patriæ (the lord or master of his country), because he ruled not by fear, but by love; so that, at the time of his death, the people were very much troubled, and, much lamenting his loss, said, "Utinam aut non nasceretur, &c. (Would he had never been born, or never died)!" And such were Titus and Aristides and many others both in divine* and human story, that have been famous in their generations for preferring the public good before their own private advantage. And it were heartily to be wished that all rulers, magistrates, &c., may be so spirited by God, that they may be willing to be anything, to be nothing, to empty and deny themselves, and to trample their sinful selves under foot in order to the honour of God and the public good, that so neither saints nor heathens may be witnesses against them in that day wherein the hearts and practices of all the rulers of the earth shall be laid open and bare before Him that shall judge the world in righteousness and true judgment.

Macrobii Saturnal.

Suetonius.

* Moses, Nehemiah, Daniel.

"Nec tibi, nec tua temovant, sed publica vota."—CLAUD., Hono. iv.

MMCCIV.—The heavy weight of government ill-attained.

*In Operibus, cum
Com. Savar.*

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS relateth how a certain man, named Maximus, who, arriving at the top of greatness, and that by means sufficiently indirect, was, the very first day of his government, much wearied and perplexed in his thoughts, insomuch that, fetching a deep sigh, he broke out into this expression: "Oh, Damocles, how happy wast thou for having been a king but a dinner-while, whereas I have been so one whole day, and cannot possibly bear it any longer!" Thus, without all doubt, his heart, and head, too, must needs ache whose brows are impaled with a crown that is ill-acquired, his shoulders bow whereon lies the weight of a government usurped, and his hands tremble that sway the sceptre of an ill-gotten power and dominion.

"Vultu tyrannus
possit esse lædissi-mo, intus dolores sed fovet gravissimos."—SOPHOCLES.

MMCCV.—Worldly professors of the Gospel reproved.

*Exposit. in Evang.
S. Matt. vi.*

MELANTHON tells a story of an abbot that lived strictly, walked demurely, and looked humbly, so long as he was a monk, one in somewhat a lower form in the monastery, but when, by his seeming extraordinary sanctity, he got to be abbot, he grew intolerably proud and insolent, that, being asked the reason of it, he confessed that his former lowly looks were but to see if he could find the keys of the abbey. Such is the case of many worldly professors at this day: they look low that they may rise high, they put on religion but as a cloak to cover their foul designs, so that they are not actuated from spiritual and intrinsic principles, as from the sense of divine love to act for God, sweetness of the promises to wait on God, excellency of communion with God, and precious discoveries that the soul hath formerly had of the beauty and glory of God; but from poor, low, vain, external motives, as the ear of the creature, the eye of the creature, the rewards of the creature, and the keeping up of a name amongst the creatures, and a thousand such like considerations, as in Saul, Jehu, Judas, Demas, the Scribes and Pharisees, &c.

Brooks's Precious Remedies against Satan's Devices.

MMCCVI.—Riches of Christ inexhaustible.

Guicciardino, Hist. di Italie.

It is said of a Spanish ambassador, that, coming to see that so much cried-up Treasury of St. Mark, in Venice, fell a-groping at the bottom of the chests and trunks, to see whether they had any bottom; and being asked the reason why he did so, answered, "In this, among other things, my master's treasure differs from yours: in that his hath no bottom as I find yours to have!"—alluding to the mines in Mexico, Peru, and other parts of the western India. So it may be said, and Scripture, history, and experience do abundantly testify, that men's bags, purses, coffers, and mints may be exhausted and drawn dry, but the riches that are to be found in Christ Jesus have no bottom: all His bags are bottomless; millions of thousands feed upon Him, and He feels it not; He is ever giving, yet His purse is never empty; always bestowing Himself, yet never wanting to any that faithfully seek Him.

"Terrena substantia eternæ felicitati comparata."—
GREG., in Homil.

De Carbo, de Certitud. Gloriæ.

MMCCVII.—Men created for the service of God.

E. P., The Pretice's Practice in Godliness.

As we see birds make their nests and breed up their young; beasts make a scuffle for their fodder and pasture; fishes float up and down rivers; trees bear fruit; flowers send forth their sweet odours; herbs, their secret virtues; fire, with all its might, ascending upward; earth not resting till it come into its proper centre; waters floating and posting with their waves upon the neck of one another, till they meet in the bosom of the ocean; and air pushing into every vacuity under heaven;—shall we, then, think, or can we possibly imagine, that God, the great Creator of heaven and earth, having assigned to every thing in the world some particular end, and, as it were, impressed in their nature an appetite and desire to that end continually, as to the very point and scope of their being, that man (the most noble creature), for whom all things were made, should be made in vain, as not having his peculiar end proportionably appointed to the nobleness of his quality? Yes, doubtless, that God that can never err, nor oversee (omit) in His works, hath allotted unto man the worship and service of Himself as the main object and aiming point whereto he ought to lead and refer himself all the days of his life.

"Oshomini sublimē dedit cœlumque queri," &c.—OVID, Met. i.

MMCCVIII.—Prudential part of a man to do as well as he may.

PALINURUS, in the poet, finding that he could not sail against the wind into Italy, steered his course, by the approbation of Æneas, into Sicily—a place where they had before been friendly entertained. Thus, it is a great point of wisdom—the only prudential part of any man, who, when he cannot sail by a fore-wind where he would (and haply where he should), to tack about and sail by a bowline or side-wind, or, at leastwise, to cast anchor where he with most safety may; however, to strike sail rather than perish in the storm, and to sit down contented with what he can do when he cannot do what he otherwise would.

Virgil, Æneid,
lib. v.

"Quo fata trahunt, retrahantque sequa-mur."—VIRGIL.

MMCCIX.—God's dwelling in the soul that truly fears Him.

It hath been an usual observation, that when the king's porter stood at the gate, and suffered none to come in without examination, what he would have, that then the king was within; but when the porter was absent and the gates open to receive all that came, then it was an argument of the king's absence. So, in a Christian, such is the excellency of the fear of God, that when it is present, as a porter, shutting the doors of the senses, that they see not, hear not what they list, it is an argument the Lord of that house—even God Himself—is within; but when this fear is away, a free entrance is given to all the most dissolute desires, so that it is an infallible demonstration of God's removal from such a soul.

De Mediavilla,
Progreſſu, Cœlesti.

MMCCX.—The praiseworthiness of reading and inquiring into the Scriptures.

MANY have thought Agesilaus, that most wise and excellent king of Sparta, worthy of all commendations, that he would never go to bed nor rise up before he had looked into Homer, whom he called amasium suum (his sweetheart); but others have extolled Alphonsus, king of Arragon, for reading the Scriptures fourteen times over with glosses and expositions; and the Emperor Theodosius II., for reading prayers and singing psalms every morning with his family; nay, Scipio Africanus was thought worthy of commendations, that he had usually in his hands the books of Xenophon's "Institution of Cyrus," which yet were rather written according to the form of a just empire than the truth of the history. Oh, but how much more praiseworthy are they that read and inquire into the Holy Scriptures!—such as, with David, make the Law of God their delight and counsellor; such as consult those blessed Oracles of Truth, and, with those noble Bereans, are upon the search whether the things spoken or any otherwise delivered as concerning God be so or not.

PANORAM.

Xenophon, in Orat.
de Laud. Agesil.

Socrates, Hist.
Eccler.
Plutarch, Moral.

Acts xvii, 11.

MMCCXI.—Truth of religion lost, as it were, in the crowd of many religions.

As ingenious florists, to pick the purses of witty persons delighted with their art, have so heightened flowers by transplantations, preparations of mould, adumbrations of them at unbenign seasons of the year, by cutting their roots and sundry such not uncom-

Waterhouse's
Discourse of the Pity, Charity, &c., of Elder Times.

mendable feats of their skill, so that out of one single root of a lily hath come forth an hundred and odd blowings, and amongst roses, gillyflowers, and peonies incredible varieties : so, out of the doctrines—the glorious and pure doctrines of faith which the apostles and their followers comprised in “Repent, and believe!”—there is put forth such an ocean of points of religion, and all of them pressed on the people to be believed, that it is hard to find truth in the crowd of contests about her, and easy to mistake—as Mary did the gardener for Christ—error for truth, both pretending their *jus divinum*s (their authoritative confidences) as their just titles to men’s beliefs, and blaming men as restive and sottish if they resign not themselves to a senseless and universal credulity, when, all this while, the truth of religion is, in the heat of so much contention and in the midst of so much contradictory profession, as it were, quite lost and overclouded.

Joha xx. 15.

MMCCXII.—Ministers, of all men, not to be found trucking for preferments.

IN the time of King Rufus there was an abbot’s place void, and two monks of the convent went to the court, resolving to bid largely for it. The king, perceiving their covetise (avarice), looked about his privy chamber, and there espied a private monk that came to bear the other two company, and, looking on him, guessed him the more sober and pious man. The king, calling him, asked what he would give to be made abbot of the abbey. “Nothing, sir,” quoth he; “for I entered into this profession of mere zeal, to the end that I might more quietly serve God in purity and holiness of conversation.” “Sayest thou so,” replied the king; “then thou art he that art worthy to govern the whole convent.” Thus it is that every good man is contented to be in his station; to sit below till he hear the governor’s voice calling unto him, “Friend, sit up higher;” to walk before God in the light of his own candle; to keep in the warrantable circuit of his vocation; and if he see dangerous honours pursue him, he flies for it, and, with David, wishes that he had the wings of a dove, that he might fly away and be at rest. But what a sad thing must it needs be, then, to see ministers—men in holy orders—greedy after and trucking for Church preferment, ravelling out their lives in progging (begging) after great friends and fortunes, as if godliness were a strophe—a course of going backward and forward to the right and left hand for advantage sake.

Hollingshead,
Chron., pp. 18, 19.

Luke xiv. 10.

Ps. lv. 6.

Waterhouse, ut ante.

MMCCXIII.—God only able to persuade the heart fully.

A SMITH that undertakes to open such a lock that is out of order must, of necessity, first know all the wards; else he may make a key that will not fit: he may endeavour, but not be able to turn the lock. Thus it is that, whereas there are in the heart of man so many windings, so many turnings, such a labyrinth, such a depth in it, that in the eye of human reason there is no possibility to find out the bottom thereof, how, then, is it to be imagined that the most knowing, quick-sighted man should be able fully to persuade the heart? He cannot; that is peculiar to God only. He is that great Καρδιογνώστης that only knows all the inwards, all the secret passages, all the cunning contrivances, and all the cross-wards of the heart; to Him only belongeth that especial key of David; it is He that can best unlock the heart, answer all objections, enlighten all the corners, turn all the wheels of the soul, suit and fit the heart with such arguments as shall be effectual to persuasion.

Preston’s Sermon on Eccles., ix. 1, 2,
&c.

Acts i. 24.

Gomarus.

Rev. iii. 7.

MMCCXIV.—Ingratitude condemned.

PHILIP OF MACEDON, hearing of one in his kingdom that refused most unthankfully to receive a stranger of whom he had been formerly succoured in a time of extreme need, as having lost all he had by a wreck at sea, caused him to be worthily punished, by branding in his forehead these two letters, "I. H."—i.e., Ingratus Hospes (the unthankful guest). Now, if every unthankful man were thus used, there would be many a blistered forehead amongst us. Oh the unthankfulness that we show unto God, who, when we were strangers to Him, shipwrecked even in an ocean of sin, sent His Son Christ Jesus to deliver us!—yet we refuse to receive Him, to relieve Him in His distressed members, and to be obedient to His blessed commands. And then our ingratitude to one another is such, that though we come off with smooth fronts here in this world, yet such characters of shame and confusion are engraven on our souls, that men and angels shall read them with amazement when the books shall be laid open.

Pyttarch, Moral.

Zaingeri Theat. de Hun. Vita.

"Quam cito mortalibus beneficium perit," &c.—SOPHOCLES, in Ajace.

Dan. vii. 10.

MMCCXV.—The unhappiness of a disordered family.

It is said of that right religious and worthy George, Prince of Anhalt, that his very bed-chamber was a church, a university, and a court, wherein, besides the dispatch of civil business, there was daily praying, reading, writing—yea, and preaching, too; so that it cannot be imagined that the noble earl, having a church for God in his chamber, should suffer a temple to Bacchus in his cellar. But—which is to be lamented—in too, too many families Venus hath her altar in the chamber, and Bacchus his sacrifice in the buttery, which two, having shared their devotee's, what a poor third must be left for God and His people to delight in! Joshua's resolution for the better ordering his household and David's vow for reformation of his family are little set by. Let but a servant fail in the neglect of his master's profit or in the careless performance of his place, what ado is there!—yet, in the meantime, though the same servant be ignorant, scandalous, and what not, altum silentium (there is no notice taken of it at all).

Schultetus.

Melanethon, in Prefat. tom. v. Oper. M. Luther.

Josh. xxiv. 15.

Ps. ci.

MMCCXVI.—Signs of heaven, as sun, moon, with their eclipses, &c., as we are not to be dismayed at them, so not to be contemnners of them

PERICLES, the great and famous Athenian, who, in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, being ready with a great fleet of a hundred and fifty ships to hoist up sail, was presented (even as he went up into his galley) with a great and terrible eclipse of the sun, which made the sky so dark that some of the bigger stars appeared, at which the governor of the ship was sore affrighted, and thereupon, with the rest of the company, refused to set sail; which, when Pericles perceived (either truly contemning the threatenings of the stars or fearing that the hearts of his soldiers should fail), he put his cloak for a while before the governor's eyes and then, by-and-by taking it away again, asked him if that which he had done with his cloak portended anything. To whom the governor answered, "No." "No more," saith he, "mayest thou think is signified by this eclipse, though the moon be now betwixt the sun and our sight." Which being said, he commanded that they should hoist up sail and be gone about the intended expedition. But this of Pericles was surely an overbold presumption, as in the end appeared, there being soon after not only misery brought upon his own country and dishonour upon himself, but all Greece wasted under the sad calamity of a long-lasting war. Thus it is that as the signs of heaven, such as the eclipses of the sun and moon, comets, &c., are not things whereat we should, after a heathenish manner, be dismayed, so should we not contemn them nor the signification intended by them. They are called by the name of influences, from the Greek word ἐπίρρεσις, from ἐπὶ and ῥέω—super et fluo (that is, to flow into or upon); they must needs, then, have some object to flow into or work upon, and by their working they speak to all those who will but lend an ear to hear them—that is, to us who are here below, who inhabit this dull dark globe of mortality, over whose heads they hang, that casting our eyes upon them, we may

Plutarch, in Vita.

Swan, Signa Caeli, Serm., 1652. Job xxxviii. 37.

"Præstat tamen teipsum cognoscere quam siderum curiosus, vim herba um." &c.—BERN., Medit.

not only behold them, but, according to that wisdom which God hath given us, look into their significations, by considering their motions, configurations, risings, settings, aspects, occultations, eclipses, conjunctions, and the like.

MMCCXVII.—The several books of God slighted and neglected by the most of men.

Rutherford's Serm.,
Weston, 1643.

Ps. xix. 1.

Acts xiv. 17.

Dan. vi. 26.

"Conscientia colex est, in quo peccata conscribuntur," &c.—CHRYSOST., in 1^a.

Rom. i. 20.

Ps. xix. 7.

It is usual and well known that children sport themselves and play with the pictures in a book, gaze upon the golden cover, and admire the silken strings, but all this while they little mind what is in the book. Thus it is that whereas God hath four especial books—first, that of the creation, a large and visible book; secondly, that of ordinary providence, which is a kind of chronicle or diurnal of a Godhead and a testimony that there is a God; thirdly, that of the extraordinary works, reaching upon occasion even to nations without the borders of the visible Church; lastly, the book of man's conscience, a book that though here, by reason of our sinful blindness, it may seem to be uncorrected, dim printed, and written with white and waterish ink, so that God is not at present seen distinctly in it; yet this book, together with the rest, are but played withal, slighted and neglected, the most of men looking upon them, but not into them, are able to discourse of them, but have no mind to be truly informed by them; so that if the heathen be left without excuse, what shall become of Christians, knowing Christians, to whom is shown a more excellent way?

MMCCXVIII.—God's decree of election not to be made the proper object of faith.

Rutherford, ut supra.

SUPPOSE a rope cast down into the sea for the relief of a company of poor shipwrecked men ready to perish, and that the people in the ship or on the shore should cry out unto them to lay hold on the rope, that they may be saved; were it not unseasonable and foolish curiosity for any of those poor distressed creatures, now at the point of death, to dispute whether did the man that cast the rope intend and purpose to save me or not, and so, minding that which helpeth not, neglect the means of safety offered?—or as a prince proclaiming a free market of gold, fine linen, rich garments, precious jewels, and the like to a number of poor men upon a purpose to enrich some few of them, whom of his mere grace he purposeth to make honourable courtiers and great officers of state; were it fitting that all these men should stand to dispute the king's favour, but rather that they should repair to the market, and by that means improve his favour so graciously tendered unto them. Thus it is that Christ holdeth forth, as it were, a rope of mercy to poor drowned and lost sinners, and setteth out an open market of heavenly treasure. It is our parts, then, without any further dispute, to look upon it as a principle afterwards to be made good, that Christ hath gracious thoughts towards us, but for the present to lay hold on the rope, ply the market, and husband well the grace that is offered. And as the condemned man believeth first the king's favour to all humble suppliants before he believe it to himself, so the order is, being humbled for sin, to adhere to the goodness of the promise, not to look to God's intention in a personal way, but to His complacency and tenderness of heart to all repentant sinners. This was St. Paul's method, embracing by all means that good and faithful saying, "Jesus Christ came to save sinners," before he ranked himself in the front of those sinners.

1 Tim. i. 15.

MMCCXIX.—Justice moderated.

It is observable that, by the place of that sign in the zodiac which (according to the doctrine of the astronomers) is called the Virgin, the Lion is placed on the one side and the Balance on the other : the Lion bidding, as it were, the Virgin Justice be stout and fearless ; the Balance minding her to weigh all with moderation, and be cautious. Thus it is that Justice may be said to be remiss when it spares where it ought to punish, and such sparing is cruelty ; and Judgment may be said to be too severe when it punisheth where it ought to spare ; and rigorous, if at any time it be more than the law requires, and if at all times it be so much. Extreme right often proves extreme wrong, and he that always doth so much as the law allows shall often do more than the law requires ; whereas the righteousness of God calls not for an arithmetical proportion—i. e., at all times and on all occasions to give the same award upon the same law—but leaves a geometrical proportion, that the consideration of circumstances may either increase or allay the censure.

Caryl's Serm.,
Westm., 1643.

"Summum jussum-ma injuria. Adsit regula peccatis, quæ pœnas irroget æ-quas."—HORAT.

MMCCXX.—Neutrality in Church or state condemned.

THERE is mention made of a certain despot of Servia (which, in the Eastern parts of the world, is as much as a governor or ruler of the country) that, living among the Christians, kept correspondence with the Turks, was a public worshipper of Christ, yet a secret, circumcised Turk, so that the Turkish mark might save him, if need were. And such are all neutralists, whether in Church or state—such as, under pretence of benefactors for Christ, drive a trade for the devil and antichrist ; such as trade in both Indies, have a stock going on both sides, that so they may save their own stake which side soever win or lose, and live in a whole skin whatever become of Church or state, and by this means procuring external safety, with the certain ruin of their most precious and immortal souls.

Knolcs, Turk. Hist.

"Intus Nero, fortis Cato."

Marshall's Serm.,
Westm., 1643.

MMCCXXI.—The great danger of not standing fast in the profession of religion.

It is observable that a herd of cattle, being shipped for sea, when the storm doth roll the ship on the one side, the brutish herd run all over to the other, thinking thereby to avoid the toss ; but their weight soon brings back the vessel, and then they flee over to the old side again, and so the ship is oftentimes overset and all drowned at last. And such is the danger of all those who do not stand fast in their holy profession, that do not maintain their ground, keep close to their station, and stand upright in the ways of God ; for whilst they are not true to their principles, but affected with every novelty in religion, now of this church or congregation, anon of that, and it may be after a while of neither, no wonder if, being given over to strong delusions, they believe a lie, and make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience to their eternal ruin.

Bond's Serm.,
West., 1648.

"Frequens migratio instabilis est animi."
—PASCAL, de
Virt. et Vitii.

MMCCXXII.—Life, liberty, estate, &c., to be undervalued when religion is in danger of losing.

It is storied of Epaminondas, that exquisite Theban commander, that, having received his death's wound by a spear in a battle against the Lacedemonians, the spear's head remained in the wound till he heard that his army had got the victory, and then he rejoicingly commanded it to be plucked out, his blood and life issuing out both together, with these words in his mouth, "Satis vixi, invictus enim morior (I have lived enough, that die unconquered) !" and being told a little before his death that, however he had lost his life, yet his shield was safe, he broke out, by way of exultation, "Vester Epaminondas cum sic moritur, non moritur (Your Epaminondas, thus dying, doth not die) !" Thus it is that life, liberty, estate, relation of wife, children, friends, and all, must be laid aside when the Trogus, lib. vi.

Plutarch, in Paral.

Æmil. Prob., in Vita.

"Quilque perit
Christi causa, peri-isse juvabit."

cause of God suffers, when religion lies at the stake bleeding even to death; and, certainly, that estate is well weakened that strengthens the power of religion, and that life well lost that helps to save the life of truth: and yet, a life so lost is not lost at all, but saved.

Mark viii. 35.

MMCCXXIII.—The Church's fall the Church's rise.

SUPPOSE a stranger, one that never heard of the ebbing and flowing of the sea, should come to some navigable river, as to the Thames' side, at high water, and should there observe how much it fell in six or seven hours, would he not conclude that, after that rate, the river would run itself dry in a short time?—whereas they that are acquainted with the tides know for certain that, when the ebb is at the lowest, the tide of a rising water is upon the return. Thus it is with the Church of God: it may seem to be at a dead low water, and in a sinking condition, but even then its lowest estate is an immediate forerunner of its rising again—as, for instance, the most raging and violent of those ten bloody persecutions was that of Diocletian, but (by the great mercy of God) attended by the mild and peaceable times of Constantius the father and Constantine the son,—all ages, from time to time, making this out for a truth, that the darkest and saddest night of sorrow that ever befel the Church of God hath been followed with a gladsome and comfortable morning of joy; that its worst condition was but as a leading card to bring in days of more rejoicing.

Green's Serm.,
Westm., 1644.

"Nihil violentum est perpetuum."
OSIANDRI Cent.
iv., cap. 5.

Calvisius, in Chro- nolog. 1298.

MMCCXXIV.—Prayer a spiritual, prevailing sword.

It is said of Constantine the Great, that, after God had blessed and honoured him with many victories, whereas the effigies of other emperors were engraven upon their loins in a triumphant manner, he would be set in a posture of prayer, kneeling, to manifest unto the world that he attributed all his victories more to his prayers than his sword. And surely prayer is a prevailing sword: it can give victory in doubtful battles, it can raise the most confident and desperate siege. What was said of the wicked—"Their tongue is a sharp sword; swords are in their lips"—may truly be said of the tongues and lips of God's people in prayer: they are as two-edged swords in their hands to execute vengeance. And without all doubt, God's enemies have often found the power of this sword of prayer; and those which are the Lord's people may say of this, as David once said of that which was Goliath's, "There is none like that; give it me."

Niceph., Hist.
Ecclesi., lib. xii.

Judges xx. 2.

Isa. xxxvii. 36.

P^s. lvii. 4.

"Flectitur iratus vocerogante Deus."
—OVID, Amor.

1 Sam. xxi. 9.

MMCCXXV.—The loss of good men not laid to heart condemned.

As you may see a silly hen go clucking and scraping in the midst of her chickens; then comes the kite and snatcheth away first one, then another, after that a third, till all are gone, and the hen bristles and flutters a little when any of them is so snatched away, but returns instantly to her scraping and picking as if she had lost nothing: even so do the most of men. God hath in these latter times made many great and lamentable breaches amongst us, topped the greatest cedars in this our Lebanon, deprived us of many excellent men, both in Church and state, and we (it may be for a moment) bewail their loss in some such like passionate expression, "There is a brave man lost! I am sorry such a man is dead!" &c.; and then every one goeth on again in his own way, presently forgetting the loss; but no man sitteth alone by himself to inquire what God hath done and what He meaneth to do with us, or what we have done to provoke Him thus far against us: we thrust such thoughts far away from us, passing by on the other side, as the priest and Levite did by the wounded man, as if nothing at all concerned us.

Funeral Sermons.

"Prejosa debet esse mors bono-rum," &c.—ISID.,
de Sum. Bono.

MMCCXXVI.—The woeful gradation of sin.

As mariners setting sail first lose sight of the shore, then of the houses, then of the steeples, and then of mountains and land; and as those that are waylaid by a consumption first lose vigour, then stomach, and then colour: thus it is that sin hath its woeful gradations. None declines to the worst at first. Lust, having conceived, brings forth sin, and so proceeds to finishing—as thus: sin hath its conception, that is delight; and its formation, that is design; and its birth, that is the acting; and custom is the education of the brat; then follows a reprobate sense, and the next step is hell to all eternity.

“Nemo fit repente pessimus.”—JUV.

James i. 15.

MMCCXXVII.—The great danger of admitting the least sin.

As when Pompey could not prevail with a city to billet his army with them, he yet persuaded them to admit a few weak, maimed soldiers, but those soon recovered their strength, and opened the gates to the whole army. And thus it is that the devil courts us only to lodge some small sins, a sin of infirmity or two, which being admitted, they soon gather strength and sinews, and so subdue us. How many have set up a trade in swearing with common interlocutory oaths, as “Faith” and “Troth”? How many have begun thieving with pins and pence? How many drunkenness with one cup more than enough? How many lusts with a glance of the eye? And yet none of them ever dreamt they should be prostituted to those prodigious extremities they afterwards found themselves almost irrecoverably engulfed in.

Plutarchi Vita.

Price's Sermon,
Westm., 1640.

MMCCXXVIII.—Destruction is from ourselves.

As Noah was drunk with his own wine, Goliath beheaded by his own sword, the rose destroyed by the canker bred in itself, the breast by a self-bred wolf, the apple by the worm, the dam's belly eaten through by the young vipers, Agrippina killed by Nero, to whom she gave breath: so we are undone by ourselves—our destruction is of ourselves. The cup of the bitter waters of Marah and Meribah, that we have and do drink so deep of, is of our own mingling and embittering; the rods that scourge us are of our own making—sin, like a friar, whips itself—punishment is connate, innate to sin. “Fools, because of their iniquity, are afflicted,” saith David. We may thank our own folly for our own bane.

Vine's Sermon,
Lond., 1654.

Hos. xiii. 9.

Lipsius.

Ps. cxvii. 17.

MMCCXXIX.—Man not to be trusted unto.

It is reported of Cæsar Borgia, one of Pope Alexander's ungodly bastards, that having built infinite projects upon his interest in so holy a father, when news was brought him of his sudden death, cried out, “This I never thought upon! Now my designs are all lost!” which fell out accordingly. Thus, for a certain, whoever it be that looks for much from men—how great, how potent, how excellent soever—will prove like those who go to lotteries with their heads full of hopes and return with their hearts full of blanks, and be forced to lay his hand upon his mouth, and say, “What a fool was I to expect any great things from man, whose breath is in his nostrils!”

Guicciardin., Hist.
di Ital.

“O fallacem hominum fragilemque speciem.”—CIC., de Orat.

Isa. ii. 22.

MMCCXXX.—Afflictions, though grievous, yet profitable.

SUPPOSE that a man were driven to great straits in the want and need of these outward things, as not knowing at present which way to turn himself, so that, walking sad and solitary in the streets, some friend of his, taking notice of his condition, should, from a Alphons. Salmeron, de Miracul, in

John iii.

chamber window or the like place, throw down a bag of money unto him, and by the fall thereof should hurt his hands or break his head, so that the poor man, not perceiving at present what the matter was, should be daunted and grieved at the multiplying of his sorrows; but after some small time, having recollected himself, and finding the bag not to be filled with stones, but silver, whereby he should be enabled to pay his debts and have somewhat to spare for the better maintenance of himself and family, would he not soon forget the breaking of his head, love his friend never the less, and fall into a serious and hearty thanksgiving that ever he was so happily wounded? Thus it is that there is no affliction so grievous but it brings comfort with it; there is no persecution, be it never so bitter, but brings a bag of gold, joy unspeakable, to God's people; and though it may somewhat hurt them in the fall, yet by that time they have picked out of the gold, tasted of the comfort thereof, they will love God the more, and cry out with David, "It is good for me that ever I was afflicted!"

"Sol nubibus ob-tectus, lætius postea splendet," &c.—
NAZ., in Orat. de Cyprian.

Ps. cxix. 71.

MMCCXXXI.—The excellency of Divine meditation.

Luther's Declarat.
Popularis de Terris
Præcepto, tom. i.

LUTHER relates a story of two cardinals riding to the Council of Constance: by the way they heard a shepherd weeping and bewailing himself bitterly; one of the cardinals, moved with compassion, turned aside out of the way to comfort him as his necessity should require, and he found him looking on an ugly toad, and he told him he could not but weep in consideration of the goodness of God and his own unthankfulness, that God had not made him such a creature as that toad; with which the cardinal was so affected, that he fell off his mule in a swoon, and coming to himself again, he continually cried out, "Well said St. Augustine, 'Indocti rapiunt cælum, &c.' (The unlearned take heaven by violence, and we, with all our learning, wallow in the delights of flesh and blood).'" Thus it is that the meditating Christian makes out some spiritual advantage upon all that he hears and sees: if he see nothing of God in those things which the world counts great, he looks upon them as nothing—as honour, a bubble; worldly pomp, a fancy; the rich man, a lie; there is not a beast of the field, a fish in the sea, a fowl of the air, no, not the least pile of grass that he treads on, but affords him a meditation; and as to the matter of providence, there is not the falling of a sparrow, the turning of the wind, the changing of counsels, the alteration of affections, or the answer of the tongue, but he takes notice of them in a way of spiritual improvement.

Strong's Serm.,
Westm., 1666.

"Adversa rerum, vel secunda pradicat, meditanda cunctis comicus Terentius."— AUSON.

MMCCXXXII.—God only to be worshipped as the great Creator of heaven and earth.

Weems's Christ,
Synag.

Chap. x. 11.

"Justum est ut
creatura laudet
Creatorem," &c.—
AUG., in Lit.
Support., part. iii.

De Civitat. Dei,
lib. v., cap. 20.

It is the observation of one well skilled in the Jewish learning, that there is only one verse in the prophecy of the Prophet Jeremiah which is written in the Chaldee tongue, all the rest being in the Hebrew—viz., "So shalt thou say to them, Cursed be the gods, who made neither heaven nor earth!" and this so done by the Holy Ghost on purpose, that the Jews, when they were in captivity and solicited by the Chaldeans to worship false gods, might be able to answer them in their own language, "Cursed be your gods! We will not worship them, for they made neither heaven nor earth." Thus it is that God only is to be worshipped as the great Creator of all things: God must have the glory in all, being the Maker of all. The whole scope of Ps. cxlvii. and cxlviii. tends to this effect, that God must be praised, because He is Creator of all things. "Let any make a world and he shall be a God," saith St. Augustine; hence is it that the holy Catholic Church maketh it the very first article of her creed to "believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth;" and particular churches abroad begin their public devotions thus, "Our help be in the name of the Lord, Who hath made both heaven and earth." Let us, then, with the four-and-twenty elders, fall down before Him, and say, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive honour, glory, and power: for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created." Rev. iv. 11

MMCCXXXIII.—The religious hypocrite discovered.

It is observable that the eagle soareth on high, little intending to fly to heaven, but to gain her prey; and so it is that many do carry a great deal of seeming devotion in lifting up their eyes towards heaven, but they do it only to accomplish with more ease, safety, and applause their wicked and damnable designs here on earth: such as without are Catos, within Neros; hear them, no man better; search and try them, no man worse: they have Jacob's voice, but Esau's hands; they profess like saints, but practise like Satans; they have their long prayers, but short prayings; they are like apothecaries' gallipots—having without the title of some excellent preservative, but within they are full of deadly poison. Counterfeit holiness is their cloak for all manner of villanies, and the midwife to bring forth all their devilish designs.

Bale's Serm. on James iii. 2.

"Verbis aliud prodit quam mente volutat."—LAT., ex Homer.

MMCCXXXIV.—Men by nature hardly brought to the confession of their sins.

It is said of the elephant, that before he drinks in the river he troubleth the water with his feet, that so he may not see his own deformity; and it is useful to such as are well struck in years not so much to mind the looking-glass, lest therein they behold nothing but hollow eyes, pale cheeks, and a wrinkled front—the ruins of a sometime more beautiful visage. Thus it is that men by nature are hardly drawn to the confession of their sins, but every man is ready to hide his sins, by excusing them with Aaron; by colouring them with fair pretences, as did the Jews; by laying them on others, as Adam did; or by denying them, with Solomon's harlots. They are ready to decline sin through all the cases (as* one said wittily)—in the nominative by pride, in the genitive by luxury, in the dative by bribery, in the accusative by detraction, in the vocative by adulation, in the ablative by extortion—but very loth to acknowledge them in any case, very hardly brought to make any confession of them at all.

Plin., Hist., lib. vii., cap. 4.

Bija Salutis Dorn. 8 post Pentecost.

* T. Adams's Serm., Lond., 1619.

MMCCXXXV.—Not to murmur under afflictions; and why so.

SUPPOSE a man to have a very fair house to dwell in, with spacious orchards and gardens set about with brave tall trees, both for use and ornament, what a most unreasonable thing were it in this man to murmur because the wind blows a few leaves off the trees, though at the same instant of time they are fully laden with fruit? Thus, if God take a little and leave us much, shall we be discontent? If he take an only Son, and give us His own Son—if He cause the trees to bring forth fruit, shall we be angry if the wind blow away the leaves? Shall we murmur and repine at light and momentary afflictions, when God, at the same time, is preparing for us a far more exceeding weight of glory?

Seneca, de Tran- quill. Animi.

"Superanda omnia fortuna ferendo est. Dabit Deus meliora."—VIRG.

MMCCXXXVI.—A great, exceeding mercy to be one of God's dearest children.

It is observable in Scripture, that God hath always had saints of several degrees and sizes, and that some of them have had more communion with Him than others. From among the multitude He chose twelve to be with Him; from among the twelve He chose

Verning, Canaan's Flouring.

Luke ix. 28.

John xxi. 7, 20.

Matt. xxi. 16.

1 Sam. xxv. 12.

1 John ii. 14.

"Præstat esse servus Domini quam servorum Dominus."—AUG.

three (Peter, James, and John), who, were è secretioribus of the privy council; from among the three He chose out John as His peculiar darling and bosom favourite, of whom it is said five times that he was the disciple whom Jesus loved. So now, to this day, God hath His babes, who eat milk and nothing else; His children, who know their Father's will and are assured of His love; His young men, who go out to war; and the fathers in Israel, whose grey-headed experience and wisdom abounds, for they knew Him from the beginning. But is it not a great mercy to be one of God's, though but one of His little ones—yea, the least of all?—to be a star, though not of the first magnitude; to be a disciple though not a John, nor one of the three nor one of the seventy, but to be a John—a darling, to lean on His breast, to lie in His bosom? Oh, how great a mercy! It is mercy to be new born, though one be but newly and as one newly born; but to grow up to a perfect stature, to be a man in Christ Jesus, oh, how great a mercy!

MMCCXXXVII.—Removal of good men by death a forerunner of judgment.

Dunsterville's
Serm., 1642.

EVEN as a careful mother, who, seeing her child in the way when a company of unruly horses run through the streets in a full career, she presently whips up the child in her arms and takes him home; or as the hen, seeing the ravenous kite hovering over her head, she clucks and gathers her chicken under her wings: even so, when God hath a purpose to bring a lingering, heavy calamity upon a land, it hath been usual with Him to call and cull out to Himself such as are His dearly beloved; when some fatal judgment hovers, like a flying, fiery scroll, over a land or people, He gathers many of His choice servants unto Himself, that He may preserve them from the evil to come. Thus was St. Augustine removed a little before Hippo (wherein he dwelt) was taken, Paræus dead before Heidelberg was sacked, and Luther taken off before Germany was overrun with war and bloodshed. Nay, what else can be the meaning that of late so many lights—so many eminent ones—have been extinguished in this nation but to fore-signify the great darkness that, without God's great mercy, is inevitably coming upon us.

In Vita, per Anonym.
Melch. Adamus,
in Vita.

MMCCXXXVIII.—Worldly-minded men little think of heaven; and why so.

Melandri Joco-seria.

THERE is a fable how that a wolf, being exceeding hungry, came into a tanner's yard, and there espying raw hides in the pit, had a great mind to have eaten of them, but being covered with water could not tell how to come at them; at last he resolves to drink up the water, but after a while his belly was so full that he had no mind at all to the hides. This is the case of all earthly-minded men, that being filled with the things of this world, they have no stomach to the things that are more heavenly. Having dined with all the dainties as earth can present—such as honours, riches, and the like—they have no appetite to the Supper of the Lamb, Christ Jesus, at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore.

Alphons. ab Avendan., in Pi. cxix.

MMCCXXXIX.—Christ ready to revenge Himself upon the enemies of His Church.

Jellani Var. Hist.,
lib. ii., cap. 5,
citat. per Ulyss. Aldrovand., de Quadruped.

IT is said of lions, that as they are mindful of courtesies received (witness the story of Androclus, that fugitive servant of Rome), so they will be sure to revenge injuries done to them: they will prey on them that would make a prey of them. When Juba, king of the Moors, marched through the desert of Africa, a young man of his company wounded a lion, but the year following, when Juba returned, the lion again meets the army, and from among them all singles out the man that hurt him, and tears him in pieces, suffering the rest to pass by in peace and safety. Thus it is that Christ Jesus, that Lion of the tribe of Judah, is always ready to revenge the cause of His Church, and take vengeance on all that have wounded Him or His people. Such as will prey on them shall be made a prey to Him; and though they wound them in their passage through the wilderness of this world, yet certainly, when He comes again to judge the world, He will single out all that shoot their arrows at Him or His, or Him in His members, and will without mercy tear them in pieces: but as for the peaceable, peace be to them and the whole Israel of God!

⁴⁴ Ecclesiæ sum Deus Judæ est et vindex."—ISID., de Sum. Bono.

MMCCXL.—Christ the saints' wonder and admiration.

THE sun is gazed on by all the world with admiration—yea, it is so admired, that by many it is adored and worshipped for a god, as by the Persians at this day; and many insensible creatures (some by opening and shutting, as marigolds and tulips; others by bowing and inclining the head, as the solsequy and mallow flowers) are sensible of its presence and absence: there seems to be such a sympathy, that if the sun be gone or clouded, they wrap up themselves or hang their heads, as unwilling to be seen by any eye but His that fills them. Thus it is, and that in a far larger sense, that Christ's name is Wonderful. Angels and saints for love, the world and devils for fear, wonder at Him; the saints duly and truly adore Him for their God; and were there ten thousand suns, the saints would admire Christ ten thousand times more than them all. He doth so attract and ravish their hearts by the beaming forth of His love-rays on them, that they seem to be sick and dying if they be not with Christ; they open when Christ comes, and shut when Christ withdraws, and will not be kissed by any lips nor embraced by any arms but His.

Dresserus, de Statu
Relig. in Perit.

Isa. ix, 6.

Venning's Myst.
and Revelat.

MMCCXLI.—Christ's watchfulness over His people for good.

It hath been a tradition that lions are insomnes (that they sleep not); it may be they sleep not so much as other creatures do, yet that they sleep not at all were absurd to think: however, their eyelids being too little to cover their great eyes, they do sleep with their eyes somewhat open and shining, which hath occasioned it to be supposed that they slept not at all. But most true it is that Jesus Christ, who is the Keeper of Israel, neither slumbereth nor sleepeth, never shuts His eyes, but hath them always open upon the just. He winks not so much as to the twinkling of an eye; He always stands Sentinel for His people, and ever looking about Him to see if any danger be approaching; He watcheth over His people for good.

Oppianus.
Plin., Hist., lib. iii.,
cap. 5.

Ulyss., Aldrovandi
Lib. de Quadruped.

MMCCXLII.—Time's redemption.

THERE is mention made of Archias, a Lacedemonian, that whilst he was rioting and quaffing in the midst of his cups, one delivers him a letter, purposely to signify that there were some that lay in wait to take away his life, and withal desires him to read it presently, because it was a serious business and matter of high concernment. "Oh," said he, "seriatim (I will think of serious things to-morrow)." But that night he was slain. Thus, it is very dangerous putting off that to another day which must be done to-day, or else undone to-morrow. "Nunc aut nunquam (Now or never)" was the saying of old. If not done now, it may never be done, and then undone for ever. Eternity depends on this moment of time. What would not a man give for a day when it is a day too late? Let every man, therefore, consider in this his day, to-day, whilst it is day, to do the things of his peace, lest they

Plutarch, in Lib Moral.

Zuingeri Theat.
Hum. Vitæ.

⁴⁴ Qui non est
hodie, cras minus aptus erit. Hora senescimus, effug ætas."—SEN., Hippolyt.

should be hid from his eyes; and so, whilst, like a blind Sodomite, he gropes to find a door of hope, fire and brimstone rain about his ears from heaven, against which he hath so highly offended.

MMCCXLIII.—Men not easily brought to believe the world's vanity.

Venning, Mills and Honey.

"Vanitas vanitatis, omnia vanitas," &c.

"Hunc versuculum elapserent homines, qui in potentia et divitiis versantur," &c.—CHRYST, in Matt., Hom. XX.

A GENTLEWOMAN (some piece of vanity, no doubt) being told that the world and all the glory thereof was but vanity—"Vanity of vanities, all is but vanity," so said Solomon—"It is true," said she, "Solomon did say so, but he tried first whether it was so or not; and so will I." Thus it is that most of us are very hardly drawn to believe the world's vanity, as that the wisdom thereof is but enmity with God, the riches thereof nothing available, the honours thereof but dependent and apt to lie in the dust, the pleasures thereof but momentary, and all of them such whereupon may be truly written, "Vanity;" but here is the misery. Men will not take God's Word for it that it is so; they cannot believe till (not scarce when) they see; the world hath bewitched them before they will believe it to be a witch; neither will they believe it to be poison till they are poisoned therewith.

MMCCXLIV.—Every one to strive for eminency in Christianity.

Plutarch, in Lib. Moral.

"Frequentius (quod dolendum est) boni imitantur malos quam mali bonos."—ERASM, Aphorism.

ARISTIDES was so famous amongst the Athenians for his justice, that he was called "Aristides the Just." When two came before him, said he that accused the other, "Oh, Aristides, this man did you such an injury at such a time," as thinking, by such a suggestion, to have made him partial in the business; whereunto Aristides made answer, "Friend, I sit not here to hear what he hath done against me, but what he hath done against thee." Oh that Christians were so famous for holiness and justice, that it might be said there is such a one the humble, such a one the meek, such a one the holy, such a one the just, such a one the patient! It could have been said so of Noah, Abraham, Moses, and Job, &c. And why should not every man strive to be the like?

MMCCXLV.—The will of God to be resigned unto in all things.

Venning, Canaan's Flowings.

"Fiat voluntas tua, Domine."

THERE is mention made of a good woman, who, when she was sick, being asked whether she were willing to live or die, answered, "Which God pleaseth." "But," saith one that stood by, "if God should refer it to you, which would you choose?" "Truly," said she, "if God should refer it to me, I would e'en refer it to Him again." Here, now, was a good woman and a good resolve well met. And it were to be wished that there were many such in these loose, licentious times of ours, that would not be almost, but altogether persuaded to lay aside themselves and their self-will, and in all occurrences of time and all occasions of interest (whether public or private) to lie down in the dust and to submit to the good will of God, whether it be for good or evil that shall in this life happen unto them.

MMCCXLVI.—The great benefit of faith truly appropriated.

Chap. xii.

In the Book of Judges there is mention made of a war betwixt the men of Gilead and the Ephraimites, wherein the men of Gilead had the victory and pursuit upon the Ephraimites; but the men of Gilead having gained a pass upon the river Jordan, over which the Ephraimites were to run homewards, it so fell out that every single man was forced to beg his way; whereupon the men of Gilead questioned their country, whether they were Ephraimites or not. They, poor creatures, being struck with fear, answered in the negative, they were no Ephraimites ; but the men of Gilead, distrusting them, commanded that every man as he passed should clearly pronounce the word "Shibboleth" (which signifies a ford or passage), whereby the Ephraimites were discovered. For pronouncing "Sibboleth" instead of "Shibboleth," two-and-forty thousand of them were put to the sword in that day. Thus it is that all of us are to pass through the gates of death, and to give an account for what we have done here in the flesh, whether it be good or bad. And then he that can clearly pronounce "Shibboleth," that can say with David, Daniel, and many others, "My Lord and my God," that can by faith appropriate the merits of Christ Jesus unto his own soul, and say with holy Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," shall enter into his Master's joy ; whereas he that lispeth out "Sibboleth," that, with those five foolish virgins and those other hopeless creatures, shall, without the least sense of faith, barely cry out, "Lord, Lord!" shall be shut out for evermore.

Stella, in Luc.,
cap. iii.

Chap. xix. 25.

Matt. xxv. 11.

Luke xiii. 25.

MMCCXLVII.—True grace in the soul may be seemingly, but not really at a loss.

As it is amongst us in a court of record, the seal being once passed is as true a seal and as good evidence in law (though the print be defaced, diminished, and not so apparent) as any that is most fair, fresh, full, and not defaced at all. So it is that the least drop of true grace in the soul can never be exhausted, nor the least dram of true spiritual joy be quite dried up or annihilated. And why so? Because that in the court of heaven, when, on a sealing day, the graces of God's Spirit are stamped on the soul, it may and doth oftentimes so fall out, that there may be afterwards a dimness of the seal, and the marks, as it were, may be worn out, so that the fair impression, once so visibly seen, may not at present appear ; yet all this mars not the evidence nor ought it to weaken the assurance of heaven, for there it shall go current, and hold out in the matter of right as a greater, fairer, and fuller, because it was once as good as any, and once loved, ever loved to the end.

J. R., in Lib. cut titulus 772 vel
Sponsa Cœlestis.

"Quoad apostasiam
sanctorum, in illis gratia possit suspendi non amittitur"
&c.

MMCCXLVIII.—Christ a sure paymaster.

It is reported of a certain godly man, that living near to a philosopher, did often persuade him to become a Christian. "Oh, but," said the philosopher, "if I turn a Christian, I must or may lose all for Christ." To whom and to which the good man replied, "If you lose anything for Christ, He will be sure to repay it a hundred-fold." "Ay, but," said the philosopher, "will you be bound for Christ—that if He do not pay me, you will?" "Yes, that I will," said the other. So the philosopher became a Christian, and the good man entered into bond for performance of covenants. Some time after it so fell out that the philosopher fell sick on his death-bed, and, holding the bond in his hand, sent for the party engaged, to whom he gave up the bond and said, "Christ hath paid all ; there is nothing for you to pay. Take your bond and cancel it." Thus it is that Christ is a sure, willing, able paymaster ; whatsoever any man ever did for Him hath been fully recompensed ; and put the case so far, that a man should be a loser for Christ, yet he shall be no loser by Christ—He will make amends for all in the conclusion.

Venning, Canaan's
Fleeting.

"Bonus ille Sama-ritanus qui persolvit omnia."—ISIDOR.

MMCCXLIX.—The soul's neglect condemned.

THERE is a story of a woman, who, when her house was on fire, so minded the saving of her goods, that she forgot her only child, and left it burning in the fire ; at last, being minded of it, she cries out, "Oh, my child! oh, my poor child!" So it is that the most of men here in this world scramble for a little pelf, and in the meantime let their souls be consumed with cares, and then, at the time of their death, cry out, "Oh, my soul! oh, my poor

De Mediavilla,
Fragres, Cœlestis.

"Quid in decentius quàm cuiusdam recto corpore gerere animam," &c.
"Melius est corpus quam animam perire."—
MENAND.

soul!" So mad are they, so bewitched with the things of this life, that while they pamper their bodies they starve their souls; great care is taken to neatify the one, when the other goes bare enough, not having one rag of righteousness to cover it: so that many times, under a silken and satin suit, there is a very coarse soul; in a clean house, a sluttish soul; under a beautiful face, a deformed soul; but all such will one day find, that he that winneth the world with the loss of his soul hath but a hard bargain of it in the conclusion.

MMCCCL.—How our love to the creature is to be regulated.

Dyke, Com. on Psaltem 5.

RIVERS that come out of the sea, as they pass along, do lightly touch the earth, but they stay not there, but go on forward, till at last they return again into that sea from whence they first came. Thus it is that our love must first come from God to the creature, yet, being so come, it must not rest and settle there (however, like a river, it may in passage touch it); no, it must return back again into that infinite sea, even God Himself, whence it first came. All creatures, therefore, are to be loved in God, and for God only; so that the love of the creature must be so far from taking anything from the love of God, that rather it must confirm and increase the same. And then is the love of the creature truly regulated when it is referred to the Creator; when it may be said, "We love not so much the creature as the Creator in the creature."

"Omnia propter
Deum, sed Deus propter seipsum amandus est."—
BERN.

MMCCCLI.—How to demean ourselves after we are sealed by the Spirit.

Andrews' Sermon,
1613.

Look but upon a poor countryman, how solicitous he is, if it be but a bond of no great value, to keep the seal fair and whole, but if it be of a higher nature—as a patent under the broad seal, or the like—then to have his box, his leaves and wool, and all care is used that it take not the least hurt. And shall we, then, make slight reckoning of the Holy Ghost's seal, vouchsafing it not that care, do not so much for it, as he for his bond of five nobles, the matter being of such high concernment? Let us, then, being well and orderly sealed by the Spirit, be careful to keep the signature from defacing or buising; not to suffer the evil spirit to set his mark, put his print with his image and superscription upon it; then not to carry the seal so loosely, as if we cared not what became of it; and whereas we are signati (to be close and fast), not to suffer every trifling occasion to break us up, not to have our soul to lie so open as all manner of thoughts may pass and repass through them without the least reluctance.

"Spartan nactus hanc orna."—
ERASM., Adag.

MMCCCLII.—Rulers, magistrates, &c., to stand up for the cause of the poor and needy.

King James,
Basilicon Doron.
Schickardus,
de Jure Reg. Heb.
chist. ex Claud.
Berneg., ad cap. iv.
Suetonii.
Cuspinian., Hist.

It is an honourable memorial that James V., king of Scots, hath left behind him, that he was called the poor man's king; and it is said of Radolphus Habsburgius, that, seeing some of his guard repulsing divers poor persons that made towards him for relief, was very much displeased, and charged them to suffer the poorest to have access unto him, saying that he was called to the empire, not to be shut up in a chest, as reserved for some few, but to be where all might have freedom of resort unto him. And thus, as great persons are in Scripture expressed by the sun, which affordeth his influence so well to the lowest shrub as to the tallest cedar, shines as comfortably upon the meanest cottage as the stateliest palace, that amongst other good things done by them, they may be renowned to posterity for being the poor man's advocate—eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, always ready to right and relieve those that have no other means to right and relieve themselves but by flying to them for shelter.

Prov. xxxi. 8.

MMCCLIII.—The vanity of all worldly greatness.

As it is in a lottery, the plate with the great basin and ewer make a glistening show, and are exposed to the public view of all, and if a man by chance light upon a prize, it is usually no great matter, only it is drummed out and trumpeted abroad to tell the world; and this is the glory of it. Even so, if some of those many that venture hard for honours and struggle for greatness do speed, it is no such great matter, only the business is trumpeted out, told abroad, and the world hath some apprehension of it; but the wisest of mortals found this also, amongst other things, to be vanity—a supposed excellence which hath no true being, accompanied with cares and cumber, the object as well of envy as esteem—the happiness of all such greatness consisting in this, that it is thought happy rather than that it is so indeed.

Hardwick's Serm., 1644.

"Ardua per præ-ceptis gloria vadit iter."—OVID, Tritt.

MMCCLIV.—The welfare of the soul to be preferred before any worldly enjoyments whatsoever.

THERE is a story of one Marinus, a soldier, who, having hopes of preferment to some place, being a Christian, it was suggested unto him that he must first forsake his religion before he should be invested in his place. It was so strong a temptation to him, that he began to stagger betwixt his preferment and his Christianity; but, by the good providence of God, there cometh one Theodistus unto him, brings him into the temple, and layeth by him a sword and the Gospel, the sword being the ensign of his place and preferment. "Now," saith he, "whether had you rather have, the Gospel or the sword?" and dealt so seriously with him, that it pleased God to overcome him, so that he chose the Gospel and let the sword go; forsook all worldly pomp, that so he might save his soul, and preferred the welfare thereof before any earthly enjoyments whatsoever. And it is heartily to be wished that there were many at this day to be found in the midst of us raised up to the pitch of such an heroic resolution, that whatsoever the competition be—whether place, preferment, office, &c.—they would lay the Bible by it, and seriously consider that, if ever they mind the saving of their souls, they must let go their hopes and professions, and deny themselves in them, rather than let go their share in the Gospel of Christ Jesus, whereby they have a firm title for the eternal happiness of their immortal souls.

Zuingeri Theat.
Hum. Vita.

Hill's Splitle Serm., 1644.

"Vis ut animæ tuæ: caro tua serviat, Deo serviat anima."—
AUG.

MMCCLV.—Silence; when and how commendable.

It is said of the ambassadors of the King of Persia, that coming to Athens (the then metropolis of learning) in the time of the seven wise men, they desired that every one would deliver in his sentence, that they might report unto their master the wisdom of Greece, which accordingly was done; only one of them was silent, which the ambassadors observing, entreated him also to cast in his symbol with the rest. "Tell your prince," quoth he, "there are of the Grecians that can hold their peace." And certainly there is a time, though an evil one, when a prudent man is to hold his peace—that is, when speaking will do no good; nor can he be wise that speaks much nor he known for a fool that says nothing. It is a great misery to be a fool, but it is yet a greater that a man cannot be a fool but he must needs show it. Some there have been who have scorned the opinion of folly in themselves, yet for a speech, wherein they have hoped to show most wit, have been censured of extreme folly by one that hath thought himself wiser; and another, hearing his sentence again, hath condemned him for want of wit in censuring. Surely, then, he is not a fool that hath unwise thoughts, but he that utters them. Even concealed folly is wisdom, and sometimes wisdom uttered is folly; therefore, while others care how to speak, let every man's care be how to hold his peace.

Zuingeri Theatrum Hum.
Vita.

Amos v. 13.

"Conticuisse nocet nunquam, nocet esse loquutum."—
BIL.

Hall's Med. and Vet., cent. iii.,
med. 32.

MMCLVI.—No pains to be thought too much for the getting of heaven.

It is almost incredible to believe how they that travel in long pilgrimages to the Holy Land, what a number of weary paces they measure, what a number of hard lodgings and known dangers they pass, and at last, when they come to the view of their journey's end, what a large tribute they pay at the Pisan Castle to the Turks. And when they are come thither, what see they but the bare sepulchre wherein their Saviour lay and the earth that He trod upon, to the increase of their carnal devotion? Oh, but, then, what labour should every Christian willingly undertake in his journey to the true Land of Promise, the celestial Jerusalem, where he shall both see and enjoy his Saviour Himself! What tribute of pain or death should he refuse to pay for his entrance, not into His sepulchre, but His palace of glory, and that not barely to look upon it, but really to possess it!

Hall, ut supra, cent. iii., med. 34.

"Audendo bella expedias, pigra extulit astra. Haud unquam sese virtus."—VAL.
FLAC.

MMCLVII.—Why it is that God affords some glimpse of heaven even in this life.

THE Jewish rabbins report (how truly is uncertain) that when Joseph, in the times of plenty, had gathered much corn in Egypt, he threw the chaff into the river Nile, that so, flowing to the neighbouring cities and nations more remote, they might know what abundance was laid up, not for themselves alone, but for others also. So God, in His abundant goodness, to make us know what glory there is in heaven, hath thrown some husks to us here in this world, that so, tasting the sweetness thereof, we might aspire to His bounty that is above, and draw out this conclusion to the great comfort of our most precious souls: that if a little earthly glory do so much amaze us, what will the heavenly do? If there be such glory in God's footstool, what is there in His throne? If He give us so much in the land of our pilgrimage, what will He not give us in our own country? If so much to His enemies, what not to His friends?

Plantavit, Florileg.
Rabbinum.

Waker's Serm.,
Lond., 1629.

MMCLVIII.—Comfort nearest when afflictions are at the highest.

It may seem a strange course, in the eye of common reason, which Christ took at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee. The guests wanted wine; He bids them fetch water. Cold comfort, when wine was expected, to call for water; yet, for all that, wine was then nearest, when the water-pots were filled with water even to the brim: so oftentimes comfort is then nearest us when our afflictions are at the highest. God works by contraries—as light out of darkness, at the Creation; life out of death, glory out of shame, as in the Redemption; the blind man's sight out of clay and spittle; yea, heaven out of hell—for when He brings His children into heaven, He throws them first down into hell; first humbles them, and then exalts them. It is not, then, for anyone to be discouraged, though Christ pour never so much water on them; for look, what their water is, that shall their wine be—what their crosses, such their comforts.

John ii. 1.

Dyke, Six Evang.
Hist.

"Cum dupliciter
laeres tunc venit Moxes."—AUG.

Ps. xc. 15.

MMCLIX.—The comfortless hypocrite.

As a man can have very small comfort to be thought by the world to be rich because he hath a shop full of wares and driveth a great trade, when, in the meantime, he knows, poor man, that he is worse than nothing, and oweth much more than he is worth; or because he maketh a counterfeit show of rich wares, whereas he hath nothing but empty boxes with false inscriptions, or but pieces of wood and brickbats made up in paper instead of silks or other costly wares: so is it with all those that seem to be religious, that make

Downham's Pre-
parat., to Sacrament.

a goodly show of godliness, yet, in the meantime, are very bankrupts in grace, and like one of Solomon's fools (Prov. xiii. 7) that boast themselves of great riches, when they are, indeed, exceeding poor. But cui bono? Why do they so? what get they by it? What comfort reap they by it? None at all; their consciences bearing them witness that they are none such as the world takes them to be.

"Si castum me simulo, et aliud est in conscientia, habeo gloriam mer-cenariam," &c.—
AUG., in Matt.

MMCCLX.—The loss of an only son or nearest relation not to be overmuch lamented.

It is said of Cleobis and Biton, that, in absence of the horses, they drew their mother's chariot to the temple themselves, for which obedient act of theirs she prayed that they might be both of them rewarded with the greatest blessings that could possibly happen from God to man; but so it happened, that they were both of them found dead in their beds the next morning. News thereof was brought to their mother, as matter of great misfortune, which she in a manner slighted, saying, "I will never account myself unfortunate that was the mother of two such sons, whom the gods have invested with immortality for their pious and obedient actions." And shall, then, a pagan mother, having no other light but that of dusk nature, take it for a divine favour, that her two sons did so early quit this life? And shall Christian parents, or any others within the pale of the Church, such as are better enlightened, pule and repine and look sour upon heaven and upon God when, in mercy, He hath done for theirs, not what is pleasing to them, but what is most fit and commodious for both, nothing being done but for the best to them that love Him; so that, for the most part, life is not so much taken away as death given for a special favour and advantage.

Is. Tzetz, Var.
Hist.

Plutarch, in Orat.
Consolat.

"Noli autem tuam et filii tui, optimam sortem lugere, ille iter ambiguum à tergo habet," &c.
—PETRARCH, in Dialog. 48.

MMCCLXI.—No return from hell.

THERE is a story of an ignorant man, that being at church, and hearing the preacher set out the pains of hell as a just reward of all those that forget God, said that he would not believe there was any such thing as hell, or any such pains at all. To whom the preacher replied, that if one should come thence and tell him the truth thereof, yet he would not believe or take any care to avoid it; for as the party came thence to tell him of it, so he would hope to do as much when he was there to warn another. But let no man be deceived; that cannot be; vestigia nulla retrorsum (there is no return from hell). Dives being there may make it his suit, but all in vain. For as the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave or hell (as it is sometimes expressed) shall come up no more—i.e., shall never converse or transact any business upon the earth again.

De Wann, Deme
infr. Oct. Aucea.
Serm. 47.

"Facilis descensus
Averni, sed revocare gradum," &c.
Luke xvi. 24.
Job vii. 9.
Prov. xv. 11.
Ps. ix. 17.

MMCCLXII.—Powerful preaching of the Gospel.

It is said in the Revelation of St. John, that amongst many other visions, he saw an angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell upon the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, "Fear God, and give glory to Him," &c. And what next followed? Another angel, saying, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen; Babylon, the great city, is fallen!" &c. See here, now, the efficacy and power of Gospel preaching. Let but the Gospel be sincerely preached, Babylon must down; the devil and Dagon must fall before the ark of God's presence. Whatsoever the purposes, projects, pretences, policies, conspiracies, combina- tions, and confederacies of lewd, atheistical, and wicked men be, yet they shall never be able to stop the stream of God's Word, dam up the wells of salvation, or hinder the free

Stella, in Luc.
cap. 10.

Rev. xiv. 7, 8.

Attersoll, in Philem.
P. 2-3.

"Magna est veritas, et prævalebit."

passage of the Gospel, no more than to bind up the wind in their fists or stop the rain of heaven from watering the earth. It is true that the ministers of the Gospel may, by the instruments of Satan, be stocked, stoned, hewn asunder, burned with fire, slain with the sword, clapped up in prison, fettered in chains, sequestered, plundered, decimated, &c., yet the Gospel itself may be—nay, is—in lively operation, a light that cannot be put out, a heat that cannot be smothered, a power that cannot be broken; for even then the constant sufferings and patient bearing of the cross doth, as by a lively voice, publish and proclaim the truth of the Gospel for which they suffer, and serveth to win many to the faith of Christ Jesus.

MMCCLXIII.—Punishments of the wicked in this life nothing in comparison of those in hell hereafter.

Stephan. Meno-chius.
Fr. Toller, in locum.

"Intende nunc quascunque seculi penas, dolores,
&c., et compara totum gehennæ," &c.—BERN., Med.

It is said of Christ, that going up to Jerusalem and finding in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting, He made a scourge of small cords—"quasi flagellum (as it were a scourge)," saith the vulgar translation, made of small cords, such as He gathered up from amongst the people in the binding of their sacrifices, bearing the likeness and form of a scourge—and with this He drove them out of the temple. And so it is that the sorrows, troubles, vexations, and punishments that befall the wicked in this life, they are but quasi tales (as it were such); they are but the type, the figure, the similitude of such; the mere beginnings of sorrows—but flea-bitings in comparison of what shall befall them hereafter; for when Christ shall come to judgment He will make a whip indeed—such a one, that by the stripes thereof the wicked shall be whipped into hell, and all such as forget God.

MMCCLXIV.—Faith and love inseparable.

Cic., de Offic. de
Quæst., lib. iii.

Vincent. de la
Nuxa, Tractatus
Evangel.

It is a rule published by the heathen, that all virtues are so interwoven and linked together in a chain, that he that hath one hath all, and he that wanteth but one wanteth all. So it is with that worthy pair of graces, that heavenly couple, faith and love: faith not without love, nor love without faith, but both together; not faith without works, nor works without faith: but the one must be fruitful to bring forth works and the other thankful to confess them. Faith must work by love, and love live by faith; for faith without love is but seeming, and love without faith is disordered. Then, as it is Christ's own rule that the things which God hath joined together no man should put asunder, so faith and love, being lodged as two guests in one house, and locked up as two jewels in one cabinet, they should by no man whatsoever be disjoined or divided.

MMCCLXV.—Sacrilegious persons condemned.

Tit. Liv., Decas ii.,
lib. v.

Coc. Sabel., Hist.,
lib. i., Ennead 8.

"Quis enim læsos impune putaret esse
Deos?"—LUCAN.

THE ancient Romans, by the light of nature, disliked and checked Quintus Fulvius Flaccus because he had uncovered a great part of Juno's temple to cover another temple of fortune with the same tiles. They told him that Pyrrhus and Hannibal would not have done the like, and that it had been too much to have done to a private dwelling-house, being a place far inferior to a temple; and in conclusion forced and compelled him, by a public decree in senate, to send home those tiles again. What a shame, then, is it for Christians, such as pretend to be knowing Christians, to come behind the heathen, who did more for their idols than they will do for the honour of the true God—such sacrilegious wretches as rob the Church and enrich themselves with the spoil thereof, such as take the houses of God into their own possession, and with that whore in the Proverbs, wipe their mouths as if they had done no hurt at all; but let all such know that their wealth so gotten shall melt as snow before the sun, and their fields of blood, purchased by the spoil of Christ, shall prove as unfortunate to them and theirs as the gold of Toulouse did to Scipio's soldiers, of which whoever carried part away never prospered afterwards.

"Aurum Tholosanum."—ERASM., Adag.

MMCCCLXVI.—Prosperity attended by fears and cares.

As winter's thunder is, in a proverbial speech, held to be the world's wonder, so in the extremity of summer's heat it may chance to thunder as it were afar off; but the main claps and noise of thunder usually fall out in the spring and autumnal part of the year, when the face of the sky is at the clearest: so it is that fears and jealousies, restlessness of spirit, and distractedness of mind are usual concomitants with the prosperous conditions of men, and attendant upon such as, in the flourishing spring of temporal success and fruitful autumn of worldly increase, are lifted up on high and puffed up with the vain conceit of their own acquired greatness; whilst he that is pinched with the winter of adversity, and scorched with the heat of persecuting necessity, sings care away, comforts himself in the Lord his God, lives contentedly, and dies comfortably.

Stella. in Luc., cap. 12.

"Feriuntque summus fulgura montes."—HORAT.

"Cantabit vacuus," &c.

MMCCCLXVII.—Perseverance in goodness enjoined.

It is the part of a good workman not to leave his work imperfect; a good physician will not forsake his patient when he hath done but half his cure; the husbandman gives not over when he hath sown but some part of his ground; and he that doth but half build a house is but half a carpenter. So he that entereth into the way of Christianity, and standeth still, is but half a Christian; the greatest part of his work is yet behind. It is not enough to begin well, but to continue in well doing; it is not so much the entrance into, as the perseverance in goodness that is required. God left not that great work of the Creation in the first or second day thereof, but in six days finished it, to the glory of His name; nor as then in the generation of the creatures, but now also in their regeneration. Whom He loveth, He loveth to the end; and the good work that He hath begun in any shall be perfected. Having, then, so fair a copy to write by, so good an example to live by, let us so run that we may obtain, so sail in the sea of this world, that we never give over till we arrive in the desired haven; so to begin, as to be sure to make an end; that it may never be said, to our great and just reproach, "This man began to build, but was not able to finish."

Whittaker's Serm. Lond., 1631.

John xiii. 1.

Phil. i. 6.

"Incasum quippe bonum agitur, si ante vitæ terminum deseratur."—GREG., Moral.

Luke xiv. 30.

MMCCCLXVIII.—Temptations from within or without; how to be dealt withal.

If a man find weeds growing in his garden and naturally springing out of his own ground, he taketh much pains to weed them out; but if he seeth that they have no rooting there, and are only cast over the wall by some ill-willer, he careth not much for it, because he can with as small pains cast them out again as they took that cast them in. So, if we perceive that the weeds of temptation are rooted in our sinful nature, and spring from our corrupt flesh, we must take the more care and pains to weed them out; but if they be only injected by the malice of Satan, we are not to be so much moved therewith, but to cast them out of our minds and hearts, as often and as easily as he cast them in.

Downham's Christian Warfare, Addit. M., lib. iii., cap. 11.

MMCCLXIX.—Justice to be purely administered.

THE Grecians placed Justice betwixt Leo and Libra, thereby signifying that there must not be only courage in executing, but also indifferency in determining; the Egyptians express the same by the hieroglyphical figure of a man without hands, winking with his eyes, whereby is meant an uncorrupt judge, who hath no hands to receive bribes, no eyes to behold the person of the poor or respect the person of the rich; and before our tribunals we commonly have the picture of a man holding a balance in one hand and a sword in the other, signifying by the balance, just judgment, by the sword, execution of judgment: for, as the balance putteth no difference between gold and lead, but giveth an equal or unequal poise to them both, not giving a greater weight to the gold for the excellency of the metal because it is gold, nor a less to the lead for the baseness of it because it is lead, so they were with an even hand to weigh the poor man's cause as well as the rich. But it is most notably set out by the throne of the house of David, which was placed in the gate of the city, towards the sun-rising—in the gate, to signify that all who came in and out by the gate of the city might indifferently be heard, the poor as well as the rich, and might have free access and regress to and from the judgment-seat; and towards the rising of the sun, in token that their judgment should be as clear from corruption as the sun is clear in his chiefest brightness.

MMCCLXX.—There is no fighting against God.

THERE is mention made of the Psilli, a people of low stature and less wit—silly ones, no doubt—that, being troubled with the southern wind, went out on a day to make war against the same; but the farther they went, the more it blew, until at last it covered them all with the sands, and so they perished. And the same end, or worse, will betide all those that dare adventure to stand at variance with God—such as, with the Pigmies, dare contend with Hercules, and with the giants in the poet, θεομαχεῖν, make war against God. But let all such know, that, impar congressus, there is no fighting against God, no standing out against His power, no resisting His will—never any that did so prospered. It were, then, the best way to sue for conditions of peace, to lay down arms, forbear all acts of hostility, and seek unto Jesus Christ, the blessed Peacemaker betwixt man and God offended.

MMCCLXXI.—Death put off from one to another.

PLUTARCH, in the life of Solon, tells a story, that on a time the young men of Iona, standing by the river-side where the Milesian fishermen had newly cast in their net, bought of them that present draught. And it so happened that, when they drew their net unto the shore, they found therein, besides their fishes, a golden table or trivet which Helena had let fall in that place as she sailed towards Troy; whereupon the buyers required the same as a part of their bargain, but the sellers would part with nothing but their fishes. The contention grew hot, and would have come to a height had not both sides concluded to rest satisfied with the arbitration of Apollo, who determined it should be given to the wisest of all men. So they sent it to Thales Milesius, then looked on as the wisest man in all Greece, but he, refusing the same, caused it to be sent to Bias Prienæus, and he returned it to a third, the third unto a fourth, and so from one to another till at last it came to Solon, and he, judging Apollo to be the wisest, caused it to be presented for an altar in the house of his oracle. Now, so it is, that as these men did in modesty with the golden trivet, so all men out of fear deal with death: when it knocks at the poor man's door, he sends it to the rich man's gate; the rich man pays dear to translate it to the scholar; he, with his learning, persuades it to the city; the citizen will carry it himself to the court; the courtier hath no desire to bid it

Coel. Rhodog.,
Var. Lect.
Pierii Hieroglyph.

Nich. Causin.

Perkins, Com. on
Gal. vi.
Ps. cxxii. 5.

Plin., Hist. Nat.,
lib. viii., cap. 2.

Williams's Delight of Saints, part ii.

Euidas.

Diog. Laert., in Vita Thaletis.

τὸς σοφὸς πάντων πρώτος.

"Mortis diem omnes affuturum sciunt;
eum tamen omnes aut pene omnes differre conantur,"
&c.—AUG., de
Gratia No. Test.

welcome, and therefore he posteth it over to his page ; he, like a wild buck, runs away, and leaves it to take hold of his lord ; the lord had rather it should carry away his lady ; and the lady would more willingly prefer her maid ;—and so of all the rest. All refuse it, none will accept of it, every one puts it off to another.

MMCCLXXII.—The sad condition of the fearless, heart-hardened sinner.

IT is said of Nero, that bloody tyrant, when Seneca, his tutor, dissuaded him from his villanies and exhorted him so to demean himself "ut facta superi comprobent sua (that the gods might approve of his works)," that he answered, like a dogged atheist and a wicked wretch, "Stulte, verebor ego deos, cum talia faciam (O fool, dost thou think that I believe there be gods when I do such things)?" And this is the case of every fearless, heart-hardened sinner, who is so accustomed to his wicked ways, and so delighted with his own works, that he will believe nothing, know nothing, fear nothing, being herein worse than the very devils themselves, for they believe and tremble : they believe there is a God, and tremble to think that there is one ; but the brawny-hearted, seared, obdurate sinner, if he believe, doth not tremble ; or, if he do believe, yet doth not fear to commit the greatest wickedness : were it otherwise, he would fear more and sin less.

Vita Neronis ex Variis Collecta.

Chrysostom, de David, Cant., tom. ii.

MMCCLXXIII.—Charity to be well and rightly ordered.

AMONGST other things in the learning of the Egyptians, there is to be seen the picture and figure of Charity, hieroglyphically set out like a child that is naked, with a heart in his hand, giving honey to a bee that wanteth wings—1. A child, humble and meek, as Moses ; not churlish and dogged, like Nabal. 2. Naked, because the charitable man must not give his alms for ostentation, to be seen of men. 3. With a heart in his hand, because the heart and the hand of a charitable man must go together ; he must be a cheerful giver. 4. Giving honey unto a bee, not to a drone ; relieving poor men that will labour, not lazy beggars that will take no pains. And lastly, to a bee without wings : to such as would gather honey if they were able, would work if they could, but the want of wings, lack of strength, health, and other the like abilities make them unable to help themselves ; thus to do is not charity mistaken, misapplied, ill-bestowed, but seasonable, suitable, and well regulated.

Joh. Pierius, Horus Apollo,* Nilietus, Tacitus.

2 Cor. ix. 7.

Williams's Seven Golden Candlesticks, serm. xii.

MMCCLXXIV.—How it is that truth doth not always appear.

TIME was when Truth lived in great honour, but, through the envy of her enemies, she was disgraced, and at last banished out of the city, where, sitting upon a dunghill, sad and discontented, she espied a chariot, attended with a great troop, coming towards her. She presently perceived who it was, her greatest enemy, the Lady Lie, clad in changeable coloured taffety, her coach covered with clouds of all the colours in the rainbow. Impudency and Hypocrisy were on the one side, Slander and Detraction on the other, as attendants ; Perjury ushered all along ; and many (more than a good many) were in the train. When she came to Truth, she commanded her to be carried as a captive, for the greater triumph. At night she fared well, and would want nothing, but when morning came, she would be gone and pay for nothing, affirming she had paid the reckoning over-night. The attendants, upon examination of the matter, justified their lady ; only Truth confessed there was nothing paid, and was therefore compelled to pay for all. The next night the lady did the like, but withal committed a great outrage, and being for the same brought before the judge, Impudency Peraldi Sum. Vert. et Vit.

Speculum Exemplum.

"Temporis filia iustitias."

William, ut antea.

"In apicam pro-feret aetas."

Isa. xlix. 14.

1 Cor. xiii. 13.

and Hypocrisy began to justify their lady, Perjury cleared her, Slander and Detraction laid all the fault on poor Truth, who must now suffer death for that she never did. The judge demands what she had to say for herself; she could say nothing but "Not guilty;" neither had she any friend that would plead for her. At last steps up Time, a grave, experienced councillor and an eloquent advocate, and desires favour of the court to sift and search out the matter a little better, lest the innocent might suffer for the nocent. The motion was granted. Then Time began to expel the clouds from the lady's chariot, unmasked her ugly face, unveiled all her followers, and made it appear at last that the Lady Lie was guilty of all the villany; and poor Truth was thus, by the help of Time, cleared and set at large. And thus it is that, though Truth is great and will prevail at last, yet it doth not always appear, but may fall down in the street and be trampled under foot for a time; may be abused, banished, and made to come behind lies and falsehood—yea, executed, buried—when it cannot have time to clear itself until it be too late to save it. Hence it is that the apostle doth not say, "Now remaineth truth," because truth is often banished, but, "Now remaineth charity"—Faith, Hope, and Charity, graces which give a being to every Christian, of which sort Truth manifested is none; for I can believe in Christ, hope for heaven, and love my enemies, though I be belied; but without these I can be no Christian.

MMCCLXXV.—Body and soul sinning together, liable to be punished together.

Matt., in 2 Reg.,
cap. iv. citat. lib.
Jud. Rabbinit.

"Parces culpæ, parces pœnæ."

Ambrose, de Fide et Resurrect., cap. xix.

Heidekel, de Pœnat.

THERE was a master of a family who committed the custody of his orchard unto two of his servants, whereof the one was blind and the other lame; and the lame servant, being taken in love with the beauty of the fruit, presently told his blind fellow that if he had but the use of his limbs and his feet to walk as well as he had, it should not be long ere he would be master of those apples. The blind man answered he had as good a mind to enjoy them as himself, and if his eyes had not failed him, they had not rested all that while upon the tree: whereupon they both agreed to unite their strength and join their forces together—the whole blind man took the well-sighted lame man upon his shoulder, and so they reached the apples, and conveyed their master's fruit away; but being impeached for their fault, and examined by their master, each one framed his own excuse: the blind man said he could not so much as see the tree whereon they grew, and therefore it was plain he could have none of them; and the lame man said he could not be suspected, because he had no limbs to climb, or to stand to reach them; but the wise master, perceiving the subtle craft of the two false servants, put them as they were, one upon the other's shoulders, and so punished them both together. Thus it is that sin is neither of the body without the soul, nor of the soul without the body, but is a common act both of body and soul: they are like Simeon and Levi, brothers and partners in every mischief; like Hippocrates' twins, they have idem velle et idem nolle (they do commonly will and nill the same thing); and therefore God, in His just judgment, will punish both body and soul together, if they be not repaired and redeemed by Christ.

MMCCLXXVI.—How Christ, by His death, overcame death.

Aldrovandus, de Quadrupes.
Helian., de Animal.,
lib. ii., cap. 23.

It is said of the leopard, that he useth a kind of policy in killing such apes as do molest him: first, he lieth down as dead, and suffereth the apes to mock him, trample upon him, and insult over him as much as they will; but when he perceiveth them to be weary with leaping and skipping upon him, he revives himself on a sudden, and with his claws and teeth tears them all in pieces. Even so our Saviour Christ suffered the devil and death and all the wicked Jews, like so many apes, to mock Him, to tread upon Him, and trample Him under foot, to crucify Him, to bury Him, to seal up His grave, and set a guard of soldiers to watch Him, that He should not rise any more, and did indeed what they list with Him; but when He saw they had done their worst, and that they could do no more, then He awaked as a giant out of sleep, and smote all His enemies on the cheek-bone, spoiled principalities and powers, led captivity captive, and brought them unto shame and confusion of face for ever.

Ps. lxxviii. 65.
Col. ii. 15.

MMCCLXXVII.—Confession of sins irksome to the devil.

THERE is a story how that, on a time, a sinner being at confession, the devil intruded himself and appeared unto him; and being demanded by the priest wherefore he came in, made answer that he came to make restitution. Being asked what he would restore, he said, "Shame; for it is shame that I have stolen from this sinner, to make him shameless in sinning: and now I am come to restore it to him, to make him ashamed to confess his sins." And thus it is that he deals with the most of men: he makes them shameless to commit sin, even with Absalom in the sight of all Israel, and in the sight of the sun; but he makes them ashamed to confess any sin—he persuades them to commit sin, and he also persuades them to conceal sin; he cannot endure, by any means, that they should confess their sins. And why? But because God is merciful and just to forgive them.

De Wann, Serm. de Tempore.
Speculum Exemplorum.
2 Sam. xvi. 22.
1 John i. 9.

MMCCLXXVIII.—To depend upon God's all-sufficiency in time of trouble.

ABRAHAM, considering that God was El Shaddai (a God of all-sufficiency), did assure himself that, although Sarah's womb was dead, yet God was not dead, but was as able to raise him a living son out of her dead womb as He is to raise our dead bodies out of the senseless earth: so Moses, when he had six hundred thousand people and upward to provide for in a sandy desert, which yielded them neither bread nor water, considering the power of God, did believe that he could bring drink out of the rock as out of a river, and meat out of the clouds as out of a cupboard: so Jonathan, when he went against the Philistines, that were thousands, had this resolution for his encouragement, that God could deliver with few as well as with many: and so Asa went as far as he, when he had a huge army of Ethiopians, consisting of thousand thousands, besides three hundred chariots (the greatest army that ever was read of), come against him, he cried unto the Lord his God, and said, "Lord, it is nothing with Thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power," &c. And so it is that every man should depend upon his God, who can help with few friends or no friends, with small means or no means, as well as if He had all the means or all the friends in the world; and, therefore, let no man be dismayed in the time of affliction, nor faint in the hour of temptation; but, if his troubles be great, let him remember that God is greater; if his enemies be mighty, let him know that God is mightier than they—His hand is of iron, and His feet of burning brass, not only to tread upon, but trample under foot the enemies of His Church and people.

Gen. xvii. 1.
Exod. xvi.
1 Sam. xiv. 6.
2 Chron. xiv. 12.
Williams, Seven Golden Candlesticks, part ii., chap. 4.
Rev. i. 15.

MMCCLXXIX.—Simplicity of men to be more affected with the loss of things temporal than spiritual.

IT is said of Honorius, a Roman emperor, that when one told him Rome was lost, he was exceedingly grieved and cried out, "Alas, alas!" for he supposed it was his hen so called, which he exceedingly loved; but when it was told him it was his imperial city of Rome that was besieged by Alaricus and was taken, and all the citizens rifled and made a prey to the rude, enraged soldiers, then his spirits were revived that his loss was not so Zonaro, Hist., tom. iii.

Sigonius, Imp. Occident., lib. ii.

"O vanas hominum mentes! ò pectora cæca!"

Zech. xii. 1.

Exod. xxxiii. 6.

Ps. xlix. 20.

great as he imagined. Now, can it be otherwise thought but that this disposition of Honorius was most simple and childish? Yet the most of men are under the same condemnation, as being too much affected with the loss of a poor silly hen, with the deprivation of things temporal, nothing at all minding the want of those which are spiritual; if they lose a little wealth, the least punctilio of honour, a little pleasure, a little vanity—things of themselves good for nothing, because of themselves they can make nothing good (and then, as the proverb goeth, that is too dear of a farthing that is good for nothing),—yet for these things they will vex and fret, weep and wail, and their mourning shall be like that of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo; but when they lose their precious souls in the deserts of sin, and God for sin—when they are rifled and stripped naked of grace, not having the least rag of Christ's righteousness to cover them—then, with the Israelites, they sit down to eat and drink, and rise up to play;—so foolish are they and ignorant, even as the beast which perisheth.

MMCCLXXX.—The sufferings of Christ as so many examples to teach us to suffer.

1 Mac. vi. 34.

"Christo duce, et auspice sequar;"
Chrysost., in Matt., cap. xxvii.

It is said of Antiochus, that being to fight with Judas, captain of the host of the Jews, he showed unto his elephants the blood of the grapes and mulberries, to provoke them the better to fight. And so the Holy Ghost hath set down unto us what injuries, what contumelies, and torments our Saviour Christ hath borne, and how patiently He did bear them, to encourage us to endure whatsoever calamities shall betide us during this our pilgrimage here on earth. It is well known that He came into the world without sin, but He went not out without sorrow; and, therefore, what if we suffer reproaches, poverty, shame, death? What matter of shame can it be to us, seeing Christ hath suffered all for us? Nay, what a shame is it if we will not be ready to suffer anything for His name's sake that hath suffered so much for our sins—that, leaving us so fair an example, we should not follow His steps.

MMCCLXXXI.—God hardly accepting of late service done unto Him.

Lev. xxiii.

Menochius, de Repub. Hebræorum, lib. ii.,
cap. 16.

"Tolle moras;
semper nocuit differe paratis."
LUCAN., xxii.

It is observable that there were three payments of first-fruits amongst the Jews: the first was primitiæ spicarum (the first-fruits of their ears of corn), early about Easter; the second was primitiæ panum (the first-fruits of their loaves), and that was somewhat early, too—about Whitsuntide; and the third was primitiæ frugum (the fruits of all their latter fruits in general), and that was very late—about the fall of the leaf, in September. In the two first payments, which were offered early, God accepted a part for Himself; but in the third payment, which came late, God would have no part at all. Even so, if we offer the first-fruits of our young years early unto God, He will accept of them as seasonably done; but if we give our best years unto Satan, sacrifice the flower of our youth unto sin, serve the world and follow after the lusts of our flesh while we are young, and put all the burthen of duty upon our weak, feeble, and decrepit old age—give our first years to Satan and the last unto God—sure it is that, as He then refused such sacrifices under the Law, He will not easily receive them now in the time of the Gospel.

MMCCLXXXII.—Why it is that late service done unto God is seldom accepted.

Will'ams, ut antea.

It would seem preposterous—nay, ridiculous—that some inferior man should present his prince with a horse that was lame, a clock out of order, or a book that was torn and imperfect. Yet thus all of us do: our flesh is our beast, the course of our life is our clock, and the history of our actions is our book. And shall we offer, then, our flesh unto God when it is lame and tired out with excess of wantonness?—shall we commend our lives unto Him when all the whole course thereof is out of order? or shall we present the story of our actions unto Him, when a thousand sins of our own (for which we should be sorrowful), and a thousand blessings of God (for which we should be thankful), are quite defaced and razed out of our memory? or, if we should offer such unto God, why should we think it strange that He should reject them? We cannot; for continency, abstinency, temperance, and such like, are in old age no virtues, but a disability to be vicious. As to leaving good fellowship when we are sick, and many other sins when we are old, it is not so much a leaving of sin as sin leaving us; and surely such service will be hardly accepted.

"*Pœnitentia
sera, rarò verà.*"

Boskier, *Tal.
Naufragi.*

MMCCLXXXIII.—Honesty the best policy.

THEMISTOCLES, at a meeting of the Athenians, told them that he had found out a way which would make very much for the advance of their glory and dignity, but it was not fit to be published to all the people. The senate thereupon determined that it should be revealed only to Aristides, and if he approved thereof, they would all receive it; so Themistocles told Aristides that the burning of all the naval stations—that is, all the shipping and haven-docks of the Grecians—would prove a notable design to make the Athenians masters of all Greece. Aristides having his errand, told the Athenians in brief, "Themistoclis consilio nihil esse utilius," &c. (that there could not be a more profitable counsel for them than that of Themistocles, but withal there could not be a more dishonest); whereupon the people charged Themistocles that he should never speak of it any more. A most excellent example of a virtuous, though heathen people, that would utterly refuse all profit that came not in by the way of honesty, hearken to no counsel that tended to any kind of turpitude, nor lend an ear to any advice that was not just. And it is heartily to be wished that all such as profess themselves to be Christians would learn so much of the heathen as not to do evil that good may come of it, not to make religion a stalking-horse to policy, not to raise themselves by the ruin of others, nor to make use of their weaker brother as a stirrup, to mount them into the saddle of their so-much-desired greatness; but to be honest, to do righteous things, to do as they would be done by, always remembering that saying of our English Solomon: Honesty will prove to be the best policy in

Plutarch, in Vita Aristidis.

Diodorus, lib. xli

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1624.

"Probus quæd probat."

King psalms.

THE END.

GENERAL INDEX.

A.

ABELARD, Peter, his self-conceit, 135.

ABRAHAM, God's dealings with, noted, 14; conduct of, when the king of Sodom offered him part of his spoils, 58.

ABUSE of a thing no ground for giving up the use, 49.

ACHILLES, how killed, 121.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT of mercies received the ready way to have them enlarged, 622.

ACTION and contemplation to be united in the Christian, 19; the life of the soul, 347; our every, to be ruled by Scripture, 370; our every, to be for Christ, 455.

ACTIONS, glory of God to be the aim of all our, 15; discretion the guide of all religious, 560.

ACTIVITY, every man to show, in his place, 202.

ADOPTION known by sanctification, 162; how distinguished from election, 265.

ADRIAN, Emperor, complaint of, when dying, 27.

ADVERSITY, the good of, 83; seeks God, 118; preserves piety, 124; in time of prosperity to provide for, 418; few or no friends to be found in time of, 425.

AFFECTION unites Christians, 83; greatness of a mother's, for an only son, 520.

AFFECTIONS, our, to be regulated, 110; combat with our, 572.

AFFLICTED, God's children are, to make them perfect, 400.

AFFLICTIONS from God for good, 4; not to be afraid of, 11; to the godly not destructive, but corrective, 45; the ready way to heaven, 50; the very approaches of, torment the wicked, 77; the good man bettered by them, 78, 181; surer way to heaven than pleasures, 89, 90; to be looked on as coming from God only, 98; lead to heaven, 102; add to the Christian's beauty, 111; drive us to heaven, 120; follow the godly man in this world, 166; God's method of trying His children, 220; happen to both good and bad, but with several ends, 245; in all, God to be eyed, 288; not to be daunted at, 298; not to rejoice at, in others, 308; consideration of former mercies should bear us up under present, 353; should not be troubled by, 354; men to be prepared for crosses and bad, 402; when lighter will not serve the turn, God will send heavier, 404; friendship tried in times of, 426; of this life, and the use to be made of them, 434; a child of God bettered by, 438; fit us for heaven, 444; will make us seek God, 447; a heavenly-minded man looks through and beyond, 450; be thankful unto God in, 459; Christ the best shelter in times of, 519; be patient under, 544; are God's love-tokens, 584; dangerous not to wait God's good pleasure in times of, 593; lie heavy, 615; not to fill our whole mind, 616; though grievous, yet profitable, 641; not to murmur under, 643; comfort nearest in the height of, 650.

AFRICANUS, Scipio, pious custom of, 1; son of, and the Roman censors, 10.

AGATHOCLES and Willigis, their humility, 56.

AGE, how it is it becomes truly honourable, 330.

AIDANUS, bishop of Scotland, on catechising, 125.

ALBANS and Romans, their agreement to fight, 99.

ALEXANDER the Great and King Porus, 44; and the Poems of Homer, 155.

ALLUREMENTS, worldly, dangerous, 73.

ALMANACS, ancient, curious frontispiece in, 41.

ALMSGIVING to the poor, the giver's gain, 32, 33; how to be regulated, 396.

ALPHONSUS, king of Arragon, speech of, 144.

AMBITION (see also PRIDE) proves its own ruin, 43; poisonous nature of, 86; the folly of, 559; the great heat of, 606.

AMBER ring worn by ancient Romans, 88.

AMBROSE, Saint, to Theodosius, offering to come to the sacrament, 171.

ANABAPTISTICAL spirits, their madness, 410.

ANECDOTE of Scipio Africanus, 1; of St. Cyprian, 1; of a city besieged, 2; of one who offered to give his horse to his fellow, 2; of the dolphin and crocodile, 3; of the Bishop of Constantinople, 3; of Sir Francis Drake, 4; of Themistocles, 6; of King Oswald, 8; of the destruction of Jerusalem, 9; of the Emperor Caligula, 9; of a monk and the Emperor Phocas, 10; of Tigranes and his wife and Cyrus, 10; of the panther, 11; of the Emperor Augustus, 11; of Apelles, the famous painter, 11; of Mulesius and the dolphin, 12; of a poor woman mentioned in Fox's Book of Martyrs, 12; of Aristippus and Æschines, 12; of the eagle and hart, 13; of Pope Silvester, 15; of Dionysius the tyrant, 18; of King Edward III., 20; of those living near the pole, 21; of Henry VII. and the star-gazer, 21; of Martianus and the Jew he ordained, 22; of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, 22; of Robert Holgate, and how he became Archbishop of Canterbury, 23; of one Pambo, by Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, 23; of a noble Bohemian at the siege of Belgrade, 25; of a young nobleman who attended Alexander the Great, 26; of the hedgehog, 26; of Leonides, a captain, 27; of Cambyses and his counsellors, 28; of Pelaretus, a Lacedemonian, 31; of Pythagoras and his scholars, 32; of the Emperor Saladin, 35; of a fool, 35; of Fabius Maximus and Hannibal, 35; of a melancholy person, 37; of Cæsar and Pharnaces, 39; of Themistocles and the men of Andros, 39; of Themistocles when he entered the Olympic games, 40; of Æschines and Socrates, 40; of an old woman in the Low Countries, 40; of Dr. Andrew Wilket, 42; of King Porus and Alexander the Great, 44; of King Antigonus, Pope Adrian VI., and Henry IV. of England, 45; of Alexander Severus, 46; of Artemisia, queen of Caria, 46; of St. John and Cerinthus, 47; of Plato and Socrates, 49; of the nation who supposed an ass had eaten up the moon, 52; of Charles IX. and the Prince of Condé, 53; of Pompey and his soldiers, 53; of the she-wolf, 55; of Paulus Emilius and his wife, 55; of the King of Sicily and the Archbishop of Mentz, 56; of Plato, 56; of Vitus Theodorus and Melancthon, 59; of Procrustes, a thievish inn-keeper, 63; of Macedonius the monk and the Emperor Theodosius, 66; of Phocion's wife, and of the mother of the Gracchi, 67; of a gentleman and a shepherd, 68; of Mr. Thomas Wilket, 70; of Mrs. Wilket when on her death-bed, 72; of a fantastical prophet in Friesland, 73; of Dr. Lake, bishop of Bath and Wells, 75; of a great man on his death-bed and his fool, 75; of two Grecian bishops, 76; of Archbishop Cranmer, 77; of St. Augustine, 77; of Flaccus, when a prisoner in Andros, 79; of the beggar and the magistrates of Gaunt, 81; of Zeno the emperor, 82; of Robert Grosthead, bishop of Lincoln, 89; of a devout man who had the gift of healing and one Chromatius, 96; of a King of England and a King of Wales, 97; of a cunning artisan and his two crows, 98; of the Romans and Albans, 99; of Simonides and Hiero, king of Sicily, 101; of Tiberius Cæsar and one who had offended him, 102; of Themistocles, and how he appeased King Admetus, 104; of Zeuxis, the famous painter, 108; of Symphorianus, the martyr, and his mother, 109; of Edward I. and his queen Eleanor, 118; of Luther and Calvin, 120; of Antigonus and his soldier, 120; of a people in Ethiopia, 122; of Archbishop Whitgift, in preparing his sermons, 123; of a company of poor banished Christians, 124; of a holy man and a book with three leaves, 126; of a dying father and his three sons, 126; of Henry IV. of France and the King of Spain, 130; of the three Roman ambassadors, 131; of Xerxes and his army, 132; of the chameleon and the serpent, 132; of Androcles and the lion, 132; of Diogenes and the archer, 133; of a beggar and a lady, 135; of Scipio and the ten soldiers, 135; of Edward VI. and the Bible, 136; of the devil and a dying man, 137; of the King of Denmark's musician, 137; of William I. and the Earl of Kent, 144; of Cressinus, when charged with witchcraft, 145; of Monica, the mother of St. Augustine, 147; of the oyster, crocodile, hedgehog, and snail, 147; of Luther's wife, 147; of the nobleman and the ring, 149; of the merchants of London and Queen Elizabeth, 149; of the young men of Ionia and the fishermen, 150; of the Roman magistrates, how they executed the sentence of scourging, 152; of Thomas Aquinas, 153; of Valens the emperor and the monk Aphrates, 153; of Scius' horse, 153; of Aldus Manutius and the busy-bodies, 154; of the sailor and St. Christopher, 154; of Alexander the Great and the Poems of Homer, 155; of the people called Habassines, on receiving the Sacrament, 157; of Philetus and St. James, 159; of Euclid and his brother, 159; of Pyrrhus and the aged captive, 159; of Piso, the cruel Roman general, and the three soldiers, 161; of Thales and the golden tripod, 166; of Amurath, emperor of the Turks, and the dying soldier, 173; of Lysimachus and the cup of water, 175; of Orpheus, when he went to fetch his wife out of hell, 175; of Demosthenes and the Athenians, 180; of Constantine the Great, when attending divine service, 181; of Psapho and the prating birds, 184; of the two goats, 186; of the Emperor Augustus, when at supper with Pollio, 187; of a Polish judge and a bribe, 191; of Victorinus, and how he professed Christianity, 195; of the two silver cranes at Mentz, and the priests, 196; of St. Augustine's three wishes, 196; of King Canute and his flatterers, 196; of a young man at sea whose father was pilot, 197; of Constantius and the golden cross, 198; of an Emperor of Germany and a mis-shapen priest, 200; of Epaminondas at the battle of Leuctra, 201; of the Emperor Charles V. and the people of Sienna, 203; of the Emperor Charles and the bones of Luther, 212; of the King of Navarre and the Protestants, 216; of the musician and the market-bell, 217; of Themistocles and how he appeased King Philip, 222; of George Herbert, 229; of a Laconian who collected for the gods, and of Philippus, a priest, who begged for his living, 229; of St. Bernard and his sermons, 231; of Wolfgang Musculus and his courage as a preacher of the Gospel, 233; of Uthazanes the Persian nobleman, 234; of Cato and why he studied the Greek language, 234; of Edward I., 235; of a man who had lost his purse at an inn, 240; of a carver and Bishop Bonner, 242; of a prince who was required to drink up the sea, 244; of a wicked man who hoped to be saved by saying three words, 248; of St. John and the bird, 251; of Petrarch and his four judges, 253; of Alexander the Great and Diogenes, 254; of a dying rich oppressor and his son, 256; of Demosthenes and Philip of Macedon, 257; of Queen Anne Boleyn, when about to be beheaded, 260; of a pagan and some Christians he saw receiving the Sacrament, 262; of St. Christopher and the devil, 263; of a citizen and a mariner, 269; of a picture-seller in a fair, 276; of Denton and Wolsey and their profession of Christ, 278; of a judge and a prisoner at the bar, 279; of Hadrian VI. and the college of Louvain, 280; of Vladislaus, king of Hungary, and Amurath, emperor of the Turks, 280; of Philip of Spain after the defeat of the Armada, 281; of the young gallant and ring, 285; of a swaggering ruffian, 286; of Spyridon, bishop of Cyprus, and his brother-bishop, Triphillius, 286; of the citizens of Constantinople when besieged by Mahomet the Great, 291; of the badger and fox, 291; of a runagate son and what became of him, 292; of St. Origen, 294; of a gentleman and his servants, 294; of a virgin and a soldier of Antioch, 294; of a king who was never seen to laugh or smile, 295; of St. Bernard, 297; of a madman and a cook, 300; of the thief and the Pope's pardon-monger, 304; of a mountebank, 304; of Doctor Story, the persecutor, 308; of dying misers and their money bags, 314; of Theodorus the martyr, 322; of Antoninus, archbishop of Florence, and the usurer, 327; of the martyr Bilney, 328; of Pacuvius Calavius and the people of Capua, 329; of an abbot and King Louis XI., of France, 332; of a bishop and his hearers, 336; of a nation changing its king every year, and how one king provided for himself, 345; of Alexander the Great, 346; of the Marian persecution, 349; of Mrs. Honeywood and the Venice glass, 350; of an ancient king, and how he honoured poor Christians, 371; of the fat sheep made lean, 372; of the wise and foolish travellers, 373; of St. Basil, 374; of Latimer, 376; of two painters, 380; of the apes and the glowworm, 380; of the clemency of Augustus Cæsar, 382; of St. Anselm, 410; of Prince Henry, 414; of one in a dream, 417; of Alexander in extreme thirst, 417; of Zeuxis, his picture of Venus, 418; of Xenophon, 420; of one Terentius, a Christian soldier, 428; of Æsop buying all tongues, his reason why, 433; of a king of Persia who must have an imaginary heaven, 446; of a goose turning into a toad, a rebuke of self-hiness, 451; of one of the Trent doctors, 462; of a Frenchman, 464; of Fox, the martyrologist, 465; of a poor shepherd, 466; of an atheist, 467; concerning customs, 470; of Æsop, 472; of an usurer, 479; of Alexander and Diogenes, 489; of St. Anthony, 503; of a barbel, 508; of Alexander the Great and his philosopher, 512; of some seeking for Paradise, 514; showing how to speak in relation of anything, 531; of a king and his ass, 531; of one wanting to become speedily rich, 532; of a girl sleeping at church, 540; by Erasmus, of one at sea, 541; of a birdcatcher, 551; of a drowning man, his thoughts on seeing a rainbow, 561; of a pagan carter, 564; of a young virgin, 570; of a piper, 571; of a man who bade his wife go to church for herself and him, 575; of Edward I. and his servant, 579; of Julius Cæsar, 606; of a rebel chief and the reward offered for his capture, 633; of two cardinals, the shepherd, and the toad, 642; of the Christian and the philosopher, the bond for Christ, 647; of the golden trivet, 654.

ANDROCLES and the lion, 132.

ANGELICAL, how human nature may be said to excel the, 457.

ANGELS, the ministry of, to God's people, 322; invocation of, condemned, 541.

ANGER, God not to be provoked to, 17; not to be retained by Christians, 76; not to continue in, 172, 202; humility appeaseth God's, 382, 499.

ANGRY words, how to answer, 306; not to be, with our brother, 476; words, not to take notice of all that is spoken against us, 535.

ANSELM, the depth of his repentance noted, 100; on the opposition of flesh and spirit, 192.

ANTIGONUS and the cares of royalty, 45; his reply to the sophister, 50; and the soldier, story of, 120.

ANTINOMIAN madness, 562.

ANTINOMIANS and thieves compared, 48.

ANTIOCH, sedition in, 66.

ANTONINUS, Archbishop, and the usurer, 327.

APELLES, the famous painter of Greece, and his scholar, 11.

APOLOGUE of Honesty, Utility, and Pleasure, 293.

APOSTASY, great danger of, 603.

APPAREL, wantonness in, reproved, 174; men and women to wear their own, 294; vanity of gay, 439; pride in, condemned, 518; great folly of costly, 580; excess of, condemned, 198, 625; whether richer or plainer, the necessity of, 628.

APPARELLING, Christian, described, 283.

APPEARANCE of things, the, man's judgment on, condemned, 156.

AQUINAS on quenching the Spirit, 19.

ARABIA, character of its trees, 88.

ARATUS on the integrity of Homer's Poems, 122.

ARCHIMEDES, how found when Syracuse was taken, 106.

ARGUS and Mercury, story of, 13.

ARISTIPPUS and Æschines, story of, 12.

ARISTOTLE, his ungrateful conduct towards Plato, 82.

ARMED man, the completest, naked without God's protection, 306.

ARMOUR, the whole, of God to be put on, 121.

ARMS, other men's harms to be our, 41.

ARRAN, Isle of, noted for good air, 20.

ARTEMISIA, queen of Caria, her great love for her husband, 46.

ARTISAN, the cunning, story of, 98.

ASSISTANCE, danger of relying on foreign, 566.

ASTOMI, a people of India, mentioned by Pliny, 109.

ATHEISM advanced by the distractions of the Church, 158; condemned, 246; punished, 247; will unman any man, 304; increase of, 385.

ATHENIANS, how reconciled by Thrasybulus, 24; custom of, in month of May, 102.

ATTRIBUTES, the divine, of God agree, 103.

AUGUSTINE, St., his hatred of backbiting commended, 77; his story of a man fallen into a pit, 83; his bitter experience of heresy and vice, 95; his judgment as to the time of Christ's birth, 163; how converted, 165; story of his friend Alipius, 165; story of Victorinus, 195; on the mystery of the Trinity, 289; story of a mountebank, 304; on the danger of slighting assemblies of the Church, 305.

AUGUSTUS the Emperor and a gentleman of Rome, story of, 11.

AURELIUS, Quintus, put to death unjustly, 58.

B.

BAD, the, should be imitated when they do well, 102; company, a good man tedious to, 551.

BAPTISM renounced by lewdness of life and conversation, 321; how it is that godfathers and godmothers undertake for children in, 485; of infants asserted, 544; to be careful in the keeping of our vow made in, 590.

BASIL, St., on a cheap religion, 8.

BASILISK, the alleged nature of, 85.

BEASTS, better to live amongst, than beastly-minded men, 168.

BECKET, Thomas-à-, his answer to an appeal for moderation, 66.

BEES and wasps, different habits of, illustrated, 8.

BEGGAR, the, of Gaunt, story of, 81.

BEGINNINGS, weak, of grace not to be despised, 155.

BEHAVIOUR, reverent and devout, to be observed in church, 320.

BELIEVE not that which is incredible, 551.

BELIEVERS, paucity of true, 393.

BENEFITS, real thanksgiving to be made unto God for all, 540.

BILNEY, the martyr, mentioned, 118, 328.

BISHOPS, two Grecian, how reconciled, 76.

BITTER spirits not gracious spirits, 22.

BLASPHEMY, the commonness of, 128.

BLESS God for all people, 445.

BLESSEDNESS of having God for our Lord, 142; and happiness the only things desirable, 304.

BLESSING of God makes a little go far, 12; to have

- children, God's great, 458, 486; rely upon God's, 595; of God attendant on people listening to the doctrine of their minister, 621.
- BLESSINGS turned into curses, 67; of God more to be eyed than our own endeavours, 74; outward, do not always make a blessed man, 112; God's different disposal of His, 384.
- BLINDNESS, spiritual, the aim of the devil, 13; wilful, condemned, 284; the natural man's, in spiritual things, 476.
- BLOOD, innocent, cries to heaven for vengeance, 20, 21.
- BOASTERS, the smallest doers, 427.
- BOCHNA, the sad story of, 116.
- BODLEY, Sir Thomas, the arms of, 20.
- BODY, care of the, more than the soul condemned, 11; infinite power to be seen in the resurrection of, 15; deformity of, not to be contemned, 200; more care of, than the soul reprobable, 539; be more careful of the soul than the, 543; and soul sinning together, liable to be punished together, 656.
- BOHEMIAN, a noble, conduct of, at the siege of Begrade, 25.
- BOLTON, Mr., to his children on his death-bed, 117.
- BOOK of Martyrs, story of a poor woman in the, 12; the, with three leaves, 126; of nature, always translate the, into the book of grace, 571.
- BOOKS, how to read the apocryphal, 167; scandalous and seditious, only fit for the fire, 296; of piety and religion, a testimonial at the judgment-day, 466; the book of Scripture to be preserved above all other, 524.
- BORROWER, the, duty and comfort of, 596.
- BORROWING upon usury, the sad condition of, 583.
- BOUNTY of God, its greatness, 125.
- BRACHMANNI, a sect of philosophers, custom of, 125.
- BREAD and wine, sacramental, how different from others, 271.
- BRIBERY, sin of, condemned, 331, 369.
- BRISTOL and Cornish stones, their lustre, 85.
- BROTHER, the word, how far extended, 179.
- BUCHOLCERUS, his counsel to Huebnerus, 86.
- BURIAL, not to be over-careful for the place of our, 577.
- BUSY-BODIES condemned, 142, 154; described, 287.
- C.
- CÆPIO, the Roman consul, and the temple of Toulouse, 64.
- CÆSAR, Julius, his account of French soldiers, 54; Tiberius, his reply to an offender, 102.
- CALAMITY, security the cause of all, 557; uselessness of riches in point of, 628.
- CALAVIUS, Pacuvius, his contrivance to preserve peace in Capua, 329.
- CALIGULA, the Emperor, foolish conduct of, described, 9.
- CALLING, every man to be employed in his, 34; the certainty of our, not the time of, to be much looked into, 264; time and place of a man's spiritual, uncertain, 597.
- CALLINGS, men of other, not to meddle with that of the ministry, 243.
- CALVIN, John, his excellent spirit toward Luther, 120.
- CAMBYSES, king of Persia, story of, 28.
- CANDLE, easily puffed out by wind, illustrative of human mortality, 13.
- CANUTE and his flatterers, 196; and Edward Ironside, 326.
- CARE for the body more than the soul condemned, 11.
- CARES, distrustful, reprov'd, 131; and crowns inseparable, 208; attend men in authority, 300.
- CAREFULNESS for the soul's good required, 189.
- CARELESS hearers of the Word reprov'd, 22.
- CARNAL and spiritual men, difference between, in knowledge, 61, 62; unregenerate men unserviceable to Church or state, 522; professor described, 569.
- CASSIUS, the Roman judge, wisdom of, noted, 204.
- CATECHISING, the necessity of, 125; an excellent way to instruct youth, 413.
- CATO the elder, his habit of boasting, 37.
- CAUSE of God, to be zealous in the, 256.
- CAVEAT, a, for bloody-minded men, 599; for flatterers, 599.
- CECIL, Sir William, anecdote of, 78.
- CENSURE, how it becomes a habit, illustrated, 130; of others, to be careful in the, 215, 461.
- CENSURERS condemned, 21, 75; men not to be, of one another, 362.
- CEREMONIES of the Church not to be any cause of separation, 432.
- CHAMELEON and serpent, 132.
- CHANGING this life for a better not matter of grief, 283.
- CHARITABLE, why we must be, to all men, 340.
- CHARITY to the poor ought to be real, 8; the, of former times abused in these times, 205; mistaken, 243; to the poor and needy commend'd, 301; rewarded in full, 370; men to do what they promise unto God in the matter of, 484; to give in here, is to lay up treasure in heaven, 485; attended by the certainty of reward, 517; to be well ordered, 549; to be well and rightly ordered, 655.
- CHARLES IX. of France and the Prince of Condé, 53; V., his reply to the ambassador of Sienna, 203; the Emperor, and the bones of Luther, 212.
- CHEAP religion the worldling's best, 45.
- CHILD of God, a true, half in heaven while on earth, 318; deliver'd out of the bondage of Satan, more careful for the future, 318; faith of a, 459.
- CHILDREN to be brought up in the fear of God, 51; to be well-principled, 61; to be begged of God by prayer, 291; the Christian instruction of, a great benefit, 312; very hardly drawn from natural inclinations, 335; education of, 360; parents not to be too much dejected at the death of, 402; how it is that men may be said to learn of little, 403; a great fault in mothers not to nurse their own, 419; not to marry without their parents' consent, 433, 464; correction of, 437; to be ready in relief of the parents' necessities, 451; to be religiously educated, 452; are God's great blessing, 458; of persons excommunicated to be baptized, 461; to submit to their parents' correction, 471; parents to carefully educate their, 472; to set their hands to all honest employments, 473; a blessing of God, 486; not to repine at the loss of, 510; parents to be careful in the instruction of their, 521; fatherly counsel prevalent with, 530; how it is that the sins of parents are visited on their, 571; not to repine at a great charge of, 578; not to be allowed in competition with God, 588.

CHILDREN OF GOD to seek Him at all times, 1; to see His hand in all afflictions, 4; will look after their prayers and wait answers, 5; must have God's qualities, 10; comforted with hope of heaven, 14; God the only object of their delight, 25; not only delivered, but comforted, 27; not distracted by spiritual desertions, 52, 53; their love a sincere love, 79, 80; restless till they come to heaven, 107; object of God's special love, 117; best known by affections to God, 126; they only delight in God, 145; chastised for their security, 148; infirmities in the best, and why so, 149; grace sometimes seemingly lost in, 151; their adoption known by their sanctification, 162; wicked men instrumental in their good, 207; tried by afflictions, 208; their joys invisible, 220; God cleanses their hearts, 221; heaven their inheritance, 246; all things work together for their good, 246; preserved, although slighted by the world, 263; the reason why God suffers them to want outward things, 302; shall have a happy resurrection, 312; afflicted for the improvements of their graces, 324; God afflicts His, to try their sincerity, 397; God exercises the graces of His, 398; God afflicts His, to make them perfect, 400; union and fellowship of, 489; a great exceeding mercy to be one of the dearest, 643.

CHOICE, a snd, 420.

CHREMES' reply to his son Clitipho, concerning life and death, 69.

CHRIST fully revealed in the New Testament, 6; the devout soul will have none but He, 10; the good Christian and He inseparable companions, 19; no quietness in the soul till it come to, 20; victory over Satan illustrated, 25; deceived the devil, 31; His government peaceable, 32; the soul's comfortable union with Him, 46; the soul's only life, 47; the true Christian's all in all, 67; His sufferings, how made ours, 72; His death the ground for special sacramental blessing, 80, 81; His cross to be loved, 88; His endeavours are for peace, 104; appeases the wrath of God, 104; His wisdom above all earthly wisdom, 108; conduct of, when near death, 109; can make up the soul's lost grace, 117; in all His excellencies, the Christian's object, 148; an interest in, the best of all, 152; compared to an eagle, 181; not given in the same measure to all, 182; His excellencies given to them who are in Him, 192; sought after in time of trouble, 193; we are not to be ashamed of professing Him, 195; faith in, the only support in trouble, 201; He only to be esteemed of any worth, 201; the way of acceptance, 222; the rest of the heart, 223, 287; the proper food of the soul, 223; to be our Lord and Master, 229; the cause of justification, 236; how to recover His love when lost, 240; His kingdom peaceable, 251; to be received into the heart by faith, 256; the poor man's object as well as the rich, 257; seen more clearly under the Gospel than under the Law, 261; how to be made like to, 264; His name the ground of prayer, 268; the only object of the devout soul, 276; reconciliation with, to be made sure, 292; nothing but love all over, 300; friendship to be made with God in, 301; all men to be highly affected at His name, 320; as the Eternal Son of God, properly called the Word, 325; makes Himself and all He hath over to His people, 326; great mystery of the hypostatical union in, shadowed out by way of similitude, 332; at the second coming of, how it is the frame of the world shall not be consumed, 337; how to meet, 339; the great love of, 342; only four women are mentioned in genealogy of, 347; more than husband, our all in all, 349; the abundant love of, 358; excellency of the knowledge of, 360; the joyful coming of, in the flesh, 362; the precious aims of, 365; our life in, 366; be zealous for the honour of, 375; all-sufficient goodness of, 381; emptiness of all worldly delights without, 383; weakness of a Christian without, 388; the inestimable value of, 401; the captivated soul restless till it be in, 409; the soul's restlessness till it be united to, 413; mercies of God in, to be sought while they may be found, 419; be ready to suffer persecution by the example of, 420; consideration of the name of, to be a motive from sin, 440; God showing mercy only for the sake of, 443; to be the sum of all our actions, 455; necessity of having the righteousness of, 463; to be our example and pattern of imitation in life and death, 475; wounds of, the only hiding-place of a Christian, 480; the good man's chief portion, 495; intercession of, 507; best shelter in the time of affliction, 519; the end of the ceremonial law, 522; freely discovers Himself to all that truly seek Him, 523; humanity of, 525; the true Light, 526; the true knowledge of, 542; voluntarily engages to take away the sins of the world, 555; men to be ready to die for, 565; walk worthy the name of, 584; to be our example in bearing the cross, 608; stretcheth forth His hand, 612; to suffer anything for the cause of, 615; the sins of our religious duties corrected and presented to God by, 616; excellency of, 623; keep close to the Word of God in seeking, 625; rewards and punishments useful to the bringing in to, 627; the proper object of the soul, 630; difference betwixt true and feigned love unto, 632; ready to revenge Himself upon the enemies of His Church, 644; the saints' wonder and admiration, 645; the watchfulness of, over His people for good, 645; a sure Paymaster, 647; at the marriage-feast, 650; by His death, overcame death, 656; His sufferings examples to teach us to suffer, 658.

CHRISTIAN, the good, and Christ inseparable companions, 19; the, to unite contemplation and action, 19; the true, takes no comfort in this world, 20; must be a thankful person, 22; the silent, the sound Christian, 24; the true, his hopes of heaven, 30; a godly, a constant Christian, 44; the weak, still a true Christian, 45; the resolved, 53; every, ought to be ingenuous, 60; to love one another, 62; a negligent, no true Christian, 69; a contented, will be courageous, 70; the only comfort, his propriety in God, 76; a true, thrives by afflictions and troubles, 83; a true, a picture of Christ, 97; inside religion and outside must be suitable, 100, 101; not formal and specious, 106; makes his way through all difficulties, when resolved, 111; the worth of, 130; hath a like esteem for all God's ordinances, 135; to be heavenly-minded, 142; the best artist, 143; a faint-hearted, described, 145; Christ in all His excellencies his object, 148; his safety in danger, 219; the slothful, reproved, 222; his heart never quiet till it be in Christ, 223; the ungrateful, reproved, 223; the confident, 247; apparelling described, 283; the true, restless without Christ, 287; true, fruitful, 326; God's omnipresence a motive for confidence, 376; duty of the complete, 379; weakness of the, without Christ, 388; desires of the true, are all for heaven, 389; spiritual growth of, when seemingly

- dead and declining, 392; formal, described, 397; the active, the object of the devil's malice, 424; how eve'y good, should order his life, 407; happy succession of a family, 416; what every good, should do to redeem time lost, 450; formal, discovered, 442; a good, will rather part with his life than his integrity, 457; Christ's wounds the only hiding-place of a, 480; difference in growth of grace in the hypocrite and the true, 495; library of the, 506; watchfulness enjoined, 518; description of a faint-hearted, 579; the experimental, the undaunted, 581; active, the best, 620; hope of, at the death of a child of God, 620; bare enjoyment of Church privileges doth not make the true, 622; the resolved, constant, 629.
- CHRISTIANITY, neglect of the main duties of, reproved, 384; the best nobility, 390; every one to strive for eminency in, 646.
- CHRISTIANS, primitive, how persecuted, 101; and their knowledge to be communicative, 232; to be charitable, and why so, 266; active, the only Christians, 274; good, always thankful to God, 281; should behave like, 346; to be assured, we must be patient, 349; zeal of, compared to heathens, 405; men to be provident, 434; attaining perfections by degrees, 435; not to revile and reproach one another, 437; having an eye upon the heavenly rewards, not to be daunted at any outward troubles, 453; Christ's wounds the only hiding-place of, 480; to be careful that they may find comfort in death, 497; growth in grace of, enjoined, 567; to walk worthy the name of Christ, 584; their contempt of death, 602.
- CHRISTMAS-DAY to be held in remembrance, 446.
- CHROMATIUS and the physician, story of, 96.
- CHRONICLE, English, story of a passage between the kings of England and Wales, 97.
- CHRYSOSTOM on quenching the Spirit, 19.
- CHURCH, decaying, 6; enemies of, in God's hands, 14; religion and unity, only support of, 17; robbed on pretence of reformation, 18; the peace of, precious, 34; prayers and tears the weapons of, 55; complaint of want of maintenance, 66; ruin of her enemies to be desired, 125; must pass through fiery trials, 136; her enemies made to do her good, 137; distractions of, advance atheism, 158; danger of introducing useless ceremonies into, 175; condition of, under the two Testaments, 182; spoilers of, condemned, 207, 215; sad condition of, not to be slighted, 273; great danger of slighting the assemblies of, 305; time of trouble to, 310; God looks upon His, with a special eye of providence, 327; difference betwixt God and man towards the, 344; troubles of, should be laid to heart, 345; of God may have war but not contention, 361; excellency of unity in the, 396; sad condition of, to be laid to heart, 417; of the Gospel, its amplitude above that under the Law, 430; ceremonies of the, not to be any cause of separation, 432; innovations are dangerous to the, 436; carnal unregenerate men unserviceable in the, 522; divisions in, to be prevented, 546; ignorant reformers of, reproved, 566; the distress and comfort of the, 568; and commonwealth linked together by peace, 599; God's readiness to maintain the cause of His, 605; magistrates and great men not to raise themselves by the ruin of the, 615; privileges do not make the true Christian, 622; God ordering all things for the good of His, 624; neutrality in the, condemned, 639; the fall, the rise of the, 640; Christ ready to revenge Himself upon the enemies of His, 644.
- CHURCHMAN, careless, condemned, 66.
- CICERO on the folly of expecting personal security in times of public danger, 9.
- CIRCUMSPECTLY, how to walk, 212.
- CITY, besieged, like the soul of man, 2.
- CLEOPATRA, queen of Egypt, and Mark Antony, 22.
- COMFORT of peaceful men, 4; the only, to have propriety in God, 25, 26; only in God, 173.
- COMFORTS, Scriptural, the only true, 268; worldly, are transitory, 355; concerning the abuse of lawful, 355; of this life compared to snow, 355; the only, are found in God's love, 367; day of death becomes the good man's, 391; the good man's, in death, 410.
- COMMANDMENTS of God, the reasonableness of, 255.
- COMMONWEALTH, the, known best by the administration of justice, 3; God's laws obeyed, the best support of, 182.
- COMMUNICANTS, unworthy, a caveat for, 115.
- COMMUNICATING, unworthy, danger of, 117; condemned, 148, 162, 171; reproved, 157.
- COMPANY, ill, to be avoided, 47, 194; how to come off well in, 197.
- COMPASSION towards one another commended, 302.
- COMPETENCY, the best estate, 172.
- CONCEIT, self, 335; in matter of religion, condemned, 338.
- CONDESCENSION the great man's glory, 97.
- CONDITION, an impatient, a discontented, 44; the sad, of Church and state not to be slighted, 273; the incorrigible sinner's desperate, 576.
- CONDONATION of the injured a conquest over the injurious illustrated, 12.
- CONFESSION, the laity abused by the Roman clergy, in the matter of, 573; of sins, men by nature hardly brought to the, 643; of sins irksome to the devil, 657.
- CONFIDENCE of much knowledge an argument of none, 166.
- CONFIDENT persuasion, every, no sure testimony of a state of grace, 324.
- CONFUSION, Popery a mere heap of, 433; dissension the forerunner of, 609.
- CONQUEROR, the heavenly, the happy, 203.
- CONSCIENCE, bless God for peace of, 35; the hell of a guilty, 79; a good, the security of, 58; guilty, terrors of, 158; wounded, the sad effects of a, 205; good, the great comfort of, 274, 315; a register of all our actions, 308; spoils the wicked man's mirth, 372; man's best friend at last is a good, 408; worldly policy not to prejudice the truth of a good, 460; the most silent, will speak out at last, 492; the best friend is a good, 497; the pain of a wounded, increased by the folly of the patient, 550; torture of a wounded, 552; nature cannot work out peace of, 553; merry company or drinking will not give peace of, 554.
- CONSIDERATION to be had in all undertakings, 176; of our former and present condition should occasion humility, 273.
- CONSTANCY of holy duties makes the performance of them easy, 434.

CONSTANTINE the Great, his attention to public worship commended, 181.

CONSTANTINOPLE, conduct of Bishop of, during a terrible fire, 3; visited by an earthquake, 118; the siege of, 291.

CONSTANTIUS, his reply to those who asked for his treasures, 67; his visit to Rome, 200; Tiberius and the golden cross, 198.

CONSULTATION with flesh and blood, in the ways of heaven, dangerous, 241.

CONTENT, a great blessing from God, 30; brings in all things, 111; keeps the soul in the saddest conditions, 112; inconsistent with covetousness, 205; suits with all conditions, 206; a little with, is sufficient, 508.

CONTENTMENT necessary to our present condition, 43; men to argue themselves into a mood of, 491; quietness of, 492; the spiritual benefit of divine, 494.

CONTENTION, the evil of, 330.

CONTROVERSIES in matters of religion dangerous, 296.

COUNSELLOR, to make God our, 233.

COUNSELS, secret, of God not to be pryed into, 29.

CONVENTICLES, danger of, 121.

CONVERSATION with heretics and seducers reprobated, 530.

CONVERSION, the, of great ones to be endeavoured for example's sake, 192; the, of a sinner wrought by degrees, 195; the, of a sinner painfully wrought, 285; the, of a sinner not wrought all at once, 305; matter of great rejoicing, 312; hardness of a rich man's, 549; a great blessing of God to be gently used in the matter of, 550; of souls the minister's joy, 623.

CONVERTS, more, made by preaching than reading, 533.

CORRECTION of children and servants, how to be moderated, 437; children to submit to their parents', 471.

CORRECTIONS become instructions, 147.

CORRUPTION, natural, men easily drawn by, 297; why it is that they who have the strongest graces are subject to the strongest, 370.

COUNSEL, destructive, 423; kings, princes, and rulers to hearken to good, 509.

COUNSELLOR, a faithful, the great comfort of, 57.

COURT favourite, the, his condition, 214.

COVENANT or oath-breakers not to be trusted, 334.

COVETOUS man good for nothing till death, 71; never satisfied, 317.

COVETOUSNESS in the clergy condemned, 576.

CRANES, how they fight, 13.

CRANMER, Archbishop, his great charity commended, 77.

CREATURE, the, moves not but in and by God, 63; necessity of labouring to become a new, 313.

CREATURES, all the, at peace with good men, 101; use of, condition, 107; subject to God's pleasure, 173.

CREATION, all species made perfect at one and the same time in the, 490; God to be seen in the works of, 625.

CRESSINUS, the story of, 145.

CROCODILE, story of fight with dolphin, 3; how he grows, 72.

CROSS of Christ to be our glory, 88; sure way to heaven, 89, 90; be ready to bear the burden of our, 544.

CROSSES not to be slighted, 88.

CROWN of perseverance, 543.

CRUELTY of the wicked no prejudice to the godly, 513.

CURATII and HORATII, story of fight between, 99.

CURFEW-BELL, when and by whom commanded, 203.

CURIO, Marcus, his contentment noted, 110.

CURIOSITY in hearing God's Word, condemned, 141.

CURSES usually fall on the curser's own head, 299.

CYPRIAN, St., remarkable dream of, 1.

CYRUS, clemency of, 10; generous conduct of, at the restoration of the Jews, 74.

D.

DAILY, we die, 169.

DANGER, to be careful in the prevention of, 253; of jesting at religion, 374; of not reconciling ourselves unto God, 385; of living in any one known sin, 447; no safety to be expected in the midst of public, 481; times of, reveal the true from the false professors, 549; of relying upon foreign aid and assistance, 566; and disgrace of lying under the guilt of one sin, 585; of apostasy, 603; of not keeping close to God's Word, 609; of cherishing wicked thoughts, 613; of not standing fast in the profession of religion, 639; of admitting the least sin, 641.

DANGEROUS to sleep before being reconciled to God, 87.

DARLING SIN, how it is that every man hath one, 326.

DAVID, example of, in prayer, 1; God's dealings with, noted, 14.

DAY, every, to be looked on as the day of death, 323.

DAYS of trial, to be provident for, 50.

DEAD, the, to speak well of, 212; prayer for, unavailable, 218; resurrection of the, asserted, 504.

DEATH strips us of all outward things, 35; encompasseth men on all sides, 41; to be expected daily, 70; knows no difference of persons, 89; dangerous to be unprepared for, 107; at time of, to be only mindful of heaven, 109; day of, to be mindful of, 125; not to be mindful of, extreme folly, 127, 143; the good man's gain, 129; strips of all worldly outward things, 129; consideration of, cures all distempers, 140; the true Christian's advantage, 160; to be always prepared for, 189, 299; the benefit of meditations on, 258; insensibility to, reprobated, 259; all men alike in, 265; the end of all, 267; to be mindful of, at all times, 269; is it lawful to desire, 270; the unexpected, of friends not to be matter of excessive sorrow, 284; meditation thereof profitable to the soul's conversion, 285; every man to be persuaded of his own, 299; impartiality of, 302; every day to be looked on as the day of, 323; frequent meditation of, a great benefit, 366; men nothing mindful of, 372; the day of, better than the day of life, 401; parents not to be dejected for the,

- of an only child, 402; the good man's comfort in, 410; consideration of the shortness of life a memento of, 422; sin unrepented of, heavy upon the soul at the time of, 448; difference of good and bad men in their preparation for, 454; the godly man rejoicing in, 454; the faithful minister's joy at the time of his, 462; of others takes away the sense of, 468; a child of God triumphing over, 478; the good Christian's absolute victory over, 482; to be always prepared for, 483; all men alike in, 484; Christians to be careful that they may find comfort in, 497; to be careful in the keeping of and presenting our souls clean at the time of, 504; worldling's woe the just man's joy at, 506; more generally excused than accused, 513; kings, princes, and protectors subject to, 514; greatness of same no protection from, 515; God's comfortable appearance to His people in the hour of, 542; be patient at the time of, 547; smallness of ground required for the greatest landed man at the time of, 549; the generality of men not enduring to hear of, 565; of the soul more to be lamented than the death of the righteous, 593; the true Christian's confidence and contempt of, 602; of a child of God, 620; men in the midst of worldly contrivances prevented by, 628; put off from one to another, 654; how Christ, by His death, overcame, 656.
- DEATH OF CHRIST ground for special praise to God, 80, 81.
- DEBTOR, the poor, his comfort, 307.
- DECEIT and unfaithfulness in trade condemned, 447.
- DECEITFULNESS of riches illustrated, 16.
- DECEIVE, the devil's cunning to, 564.
- DELIBERATION in prayer, the importance of, 272; to be used in all ways, 450.
- DELIVERANCE best in God's time, 5; patiently wait for God's time of, 552.
- DELIVERANCES, in all, give glory to God, 558.
- DEMADES, the coffin-maker, story of, 113.
- DEMOSTHENES and Philip of Macedon, 257.
- DESERTIONS, spiritual, no distractions to the child of God, 52.
- DESPERATION the complement of all sins, 317.
- DESTRUCTION is from ourselves, 171, 641; man, by refusing the tenders of grace, becomes the cause of his own, 611.
- DEVIL, terror of the, when sin is mortified, 2; aims to strike men with spiritual blindness, 13; deceived by Christ, 31; endeavours to darken the mind, 137; story of his visit to a dying man, 137; his intercourse with witches, 185; his baits, 207; his night-nets, 213; most busy in time of prayer, 226; plots to root out learning, 278; rewarding his servants, 490; his cunning to deceive, 564.
- DEVILS, desperate, 90.
- DEVOTION, the quality rather than the quantity acceptable to God, 16; at bed-time, the great benefit of, 251.
- DEVOTIONS, men to be as well industrious in their callings as zealous in their, 527.
- DIE, all must, 340; why it is that the children of God usually, sooner than others, 511; all men must, 511.
- DIFFERENCE, the great, of good and bad men in life and death, 165.
- DILIGENCE in our callings commendable, 145.
- DIogenes and the archer, 133.
- DIONYSIUS, the tyrant, conduct of, in a temple, 18; his reception of Plato, 108.
- DISCORD ill-beseems the disciples of Christ, 46; in Church or commonwealth prejudicial, 62.
- DISCRETION the guide of all religious actions, 560; a main part of true wisdom, 632.
- DISPOSITION, a peaceable, a God-like disposition 25.
- DISSEMBLER, the, at one time or other discovers himself, 469.
- DISSENSION, attended by destruction, illustrated, 13; the forerunner of confusion, 609.
- DISSOLUTION of past ages a memento to posterity, 105.
- DISTRACTIONS prove destructions, 9.
- DISTRESS, God's gracious answer to His people's prayers in time of, 528; faith a sure anchor-hold in time of, 537; God only to be trusted unto in time of, 606, 607.
- DIVINE meditation, excellency of, 642.
- DIVINITY, the study of, most necessary, 225; what jewels and ornaments may adorn, 563.
- DIVISION, the evil of, 456.
- DIVISIONS, amongst Christians, disgraceful, 47; all, against-nature, 79; danger of, 99, 317; usher in destruction, 210; in Church and State to be prevented, 546.
- DOCTRINE, false, is treason against God, 46; windy, goes with windy knowledge, 87; erroneous, to beware of, 247.
- DOLPHIN, story of fight with crocodile, 3; story of a, and Milesius, 12.
- DRAGON, story of fight with elephant, 2.
- DRAKE, Sir Francis, mistake of, 4.
- DREAMS not to be altogether slighted, 1; the right use to be made of, 241.
- DRINK, to be temperate in meat and, 422; will not give peace of conscience, 554.
- DRINKING, to be careful of extraordinary, 465; excessive, condemned, 466; excess of, reprov'd, 566.
- DRUNKARD, sad condition of a scoffing, 463.
- DRUNKARDS hardly reclaimed, 92.
- DRUNKENNESS condemned, 146; the shame of England, 197; increase of, 212; generality of, 283; a great punishment of itself, 474.
- DUBLIN, the library in, 4.
- DULLNESS and drowsiness in the service of God reprov'd, 181.
- DUTIES, holy, to be free from malice in, 108; men to be constant in the performance of holy, 391; be watchful in the performance of holy, 421; constancy of holy, makes the performance of them easy, 434; holy, call for holy preparation, 460; sins of our religious, 616.
- DUTY to God and man, to be careful of our, 11; outward performances of, to rest in, dangerous, 185; complete Christian, 379; neglect of the main, of Christianity reprov'd, 384; the saint's, 391; religion consists in, both to God and man, 393.
- DYING condition, a, man always in, 13.

E.

EAGLE and hart, story of, 13; how said to act when hungry, 70.

EARTH, the, to be converted to a Sabbatical use at Christ's second coming, 337; heaven not to be found upon, 446; God only to be worshipped as the great Creator of heaven and, 642.

EDUCATE children religiously, 452.

EDWARD III. and Kings of Scotland and France, 20; Edward VI. and the Bible, 136; Edward Iron-side and Canute, 326.

ELEANOR, Queen, how she saved the life of her husband, 118.

ELECTION known by sanctification, 80; how distinguished from adoption, 265; cause of man's happiness, 290; to make sure our calling and, 479; the true comfort of, 572; how to be assured of our, 572; God's decree of, not to be made the proper object of faith, 638.

ELEPHANT, story of fight with a dragon, 2; unwilling to go into water, and why, 113.

ELIZABETH, Queen, and the town of Dunkirk, 149; her reserve, 307.

ELLESMERE, Lord, his love of mercy commended, 80.

ELOCUTION, rhetorical, effects of, 115.

ELOQUENCE, if not affected, an excellent gift of God, 286; not to be abused, 307.

EMILIUS, Paulus, and his wife Papinia, 55.

EMINENT persons, God's choice of them to be examples to others, 14.

ENDEAVOUR to be united with prayer, 564.

ENDEAVOURS, good, assisted by God, 164.

ENEMIES of the Church in God's hand, 14; our, to love them and do them good, 77; how we may hate them, 144, 218; the great good which cometh by, 218.

ENEMY, a foreign, to be feared and prevented, 35, 36.

ENGAGEMENTS, great, to love another, 159.

ENGLAND, her distractions, 176; her ingratitude to God, 196; drunkenness her shame, 197; increase of drunkenness in, 212; her distractions should be peaceable directions, 200.

ENJOYMENT, loss of worldly, should not make us mourn, 353; in midst of worldly, to mind eternity, 433.

ENVY, the great power of, 180; destructive quality of, 507.

ERASMUS on Rome's follies, 154.

ERROR, the incorrigibility of, 190.

ERRORS in doctrine to be distinguished from faults in manners, 261.

ÆSCHINES and Aristippus, story of, 12; and Socrates, 40.

ESTATE of the sinner miserable, 94.

ETERNAL, the vanity of temporal things compared to those, 432.

ETERNITY of God, 47; in all our doings, to have our eye on, 108; to be served, 208; nothing but, will satisfy the gracious soul, 431; in the midst of worldly enjoyments, to mind, 433; of hell-torments considered, 435; in all our doings, to think upon, 436.

ETHIOPIANS, how they are said to make sepulchres, 48; description of a singular people amongst the, 122.

EUCLID, his brotherly affection noted, 159.

EUSEBIUS, his account of the persecutions of primitive Christians, 101.

EVENT, the, of things, to accept with patience, 252.

EVERY DAY to be looked upon as the day of death, 70.

EVERY MOTION towards God not a true motion, 17.

EVIL overruled for good to the people of God, 23; speaking counteracted by the testimony of a good conscience, 315; company, hindrance in the ways of God, 359; do good for, 491; the, of excess, 600.

EXAMINATION of ourselves, the daily, a source of comfort, 296.

EXAMPLE of godly parents may prevail with bad children, 69, 70; a good, the prevalency of, 260; parents to set a good, to their children, 402; of patience, 529; in bearing of the cross, Christ to be our, 608.

EXCESS, the evil of, 600.

EXPERIENCE, the, of God's love, a motive for better obedience, 132.

EZRA, Aben, learned conceit of, 39.

F.

FABLE of the old man and death, 80.

FACTIOUS-SPIRITED men unfit for the work of the ministry, 22.

FAITH, the life of, the happy life, 43; fountain of all grace, 54; gradations of, 56; trial of, the means of its enlargement, 78; justifying, accompanied with good works, 103; certainty of, 117; makes us partakers of every good thing in God's ordinances, 119; needful in time of trial, 156; justifieth alone, and how, 170, 255; power of, to revive the sin-sick soul, 184; in Christ, the only support in time of trouble, 201; great power of, seated in the heart, 234; least measure of, rewarded, 235; receives Christ into the heart, 256; necessary to please God, 264; the root of all graces, 265; though weak, yet rewarded, 339; why so, 339; the first act of repentance, 341; to be observed as the head of all graces, 343; true saving, all in all, 357; challengeth a superiority above other graces, 365; least degree of true saving, accepted by God, 400; a strong, better than a weak, 428; not always sensible, 500; the force of justifying, 507; a sure anchor-hold in times of distress, 537; and repentance to be daily renewed and increased, 542; saving, the only, 575; the appropriation of, is all in all, 584; the several degrees of, 586; men to be careful in the trial of their, 623; said to be made perfect by works, how it is, 626; how to make trial of, 626; God's decree of election not to be made the proper object of, 638; truly appropriated, the great benefit of, 646; and love inseparable, 652.

FAITHFUL servants, the, of God, well rewarded, 276; their paucity, 294; and seeming servants of God differentiated by way of reward, 452.

FALLING of others into sin should affect us, 297.

FAMILY, the happy succession of a Christian, 416.

FALSEHOOD condemned, 574.

FATHER, the, and his three sons, story of, 126.

FATHERLY counsel prevalent with children, 530.

FAULTS in manners to be distinguished from errors in doctrines, 261.

FAVOUR, God's, above worldly contentment, illustrated, 7.

FEAR, apprehension of, 607.

FEARS and jealousies, dangers of, 99.

FEAST, comfortably, how to, 446.

FERVENCY in prayer, 522.

FLACCUS, his cruelty against the Jews, his guilty conscience, his fears, 79.

FLATTERERS to be avoided, 432; a caveat for, 599.

FLAVITIUS, how he became a bishop, 82.

FLESH, the, its lusts, to be aware of, 147; and spirit, their opposition, 192; and blood, consultation with, in the ways of heaven, dangerous, 241; and blood not to be hearkened unto, 423.

FLESHLY lusts, the danger of, 329.

FOLLY not to provide for heaven, 9.

FOOL, a story of a, 35; a rich, described, 75.

FOREFATHERS, our, the wisdom of, in trades and occupations, 308.

FORGIVING one another, the great difficulty of, 159.

FORGIVENESS of others, an argument of God's forgiveness of us, 52; of one another commanded and commended, 119.

FORMAL Christians not true Christians, 106.

FORMALITY, outward, only, in the service of God, condemned, 194; motions of God's Spirit in wicked men tend to outward, 351.

FORTUNE, wheel of, 5.

FREE grace, doctrines of, abused, 39.

FRIEND, a faithful, very hard to be found, 367, 368; a good conscience is a man's best, at last, 408; a good conscience the best, 497; God a sure, fast, 595.

FRIENDS, the death of, not to be slighted, 268; not to repine at the loss of, 510.

FRIENDSHIP tried in times of affliction, 426.

G.

GALBA promised that he should become emperor, 14.

GENTLEMAN, and the tomb-stone, 67.

GEORGE David, a fantastical prophet, quoted, 73.

GERMANY, custom of, mentioned, 103.

GLORY of God to be the aim of all our actions, 15; to be given to God only, 16, 290; the, of a Christian to pass by offences and injuries, 59; excellency of the crown of, 489; sad effects of not giving unto God His due, 541.

GLOUCESTER, inscription on the dial-piece of the College Church of, 216.

GLUTTONY reprov'd, 436.

GOAT-SUCKER, the, Aristotle's account of, 68.

GODLY MAN, the, desires riches only in God's way, 58; a, bettered in evil company, 111; his desires above his reach, 128; is mindful of his latter end, 133; a good example to others, 133; censured by the world, 134; has no terror but sin, 138; the, God's favourite, 232.

GOD to be consulted at all times by prayer, 1; only to be seen in Christ, 3; afflicts His children for their good, 4; His way the safest, 5; His time the best, 5; His knowledge and man's, difference between, 5; His favour above the world's contentment, 7; His children to be like Him, 10; the Author of affliction, 11; our duty to, 11; His blessing makes a little go far, 12; His choice of eminent persons to be examples to others, 14; His glory to be the aim of all our actions, 15; His infinite power to be seen in the resurrection of the body, 15; glory to be given Him only, 16; must be loved for Himself, 16; not to be provoked to anger, 17; His Law perfect, 20; brings good out of evil for His people's good, 23; He and His graces go together, 23; the only object of His children's delight, 25, 145; propriety in, the only comfort, 25, 26; delivers and comforts His children, 27; the manifestation of, in several respects, 27, 28; contentment a blessing of, 30; to be blessed for peace of conscience, 35; the Author of man's being, 39; His goodness satisfied with man's thankfulness, 40; curiosity in hearing His Word condemned, 43; all in all, 44; eternity of, 47; One and Three Persons demonstrated, 49; knows His people, however distressed, 49; who has Him has all, 50; His omnipotency, 55; His grace above all riches, 57; must be served like Himself, 61; Author of all creaturely life and motion, 63; proper object of man's memory, 65; will and purpose of, certain, 73; fullness of, 74; blessing of, to be sought, 74; accepts will for deed, 85, 86; to have the glory in all things, 87; the proper Agent in all things, 89; how said to be angry with His children, 90; will not hear the prayers of sin-regarding sinners, 91; His wisdom to be submitted to in outward things, 92; dispenses things worldly in wisdom, 94; a Husbandman, 95; His blessing on the use of means, 97; impossible to be known perfectly in this world, 101; His attributes and He agree, 103; heaven His dwelling-place, 105; specially loves His children, 117; sought in adversity, 118; slow to anger, 121; unchangeable, 123; His omnipresence a great comfort in affliction, 124; His exceeding bounty, 125; His leisure to be awaited with patience, 125, 133; His way the best, 130; His patience provoked turns to fury, 131; the thought of His omnipresence a curb on the sinner, 134; to be trusted for riches, 134; mercy and judgment His two hands, 136; His rhetoric in the delivery of His law, 139; His time the best time, 146; His tribunal, no appeal from, 147; chastiseth His children's security, 148; only wise, 150; His mercy above His justice, 151; slow to anger and of great patience, 152; to be consulted in all great undertakings, 155; His will to be submitted to in all things, 158; pleased with the winning of one soul, 159; delights in the repentance of a lapsed sinner, 162; assists good endeavours, 164; suffers wicked men to torment His people, 167; dangerous to pry into His counsels and secrets, 169; all creatures subject to His pleasure, 173; His great goodness in the gift of His Son, 174; hath a peculiar blessing for His children, 176; His service demands activity, 177; He is to be eyed in all occurrences, 177; cares for His children, notwithstanding their aberrations, 179; His service to be free from dullness, &c., 181; His laws obeyed are the support of a commonwealth, 182; all things come from Him, and He is therefore to be praised, 188; thankfulness due to Him at all times, especially in prosperity, 188; will have the whole heart in His service, 189; His goodness ought to procure men's thankfulness, 190; difficulty of returning to, having long strayed from, 191; His grace the only armour of proof, 191; both powerful and merciful, 192; gives a moderate answer to prayer, 193; a mighty God, 196; the great Lord Protector of His people, 197; His people meet with many discouragements in this world, 198; gives warning before He smites, 198; comfort in appeal to, 204; His spiritual blessing on a man's calling, 206; is to be thanked in all conditions, 207; neglect of prayer to, condemned, 208; His trial of His children by afflictions, 208; wills not the death of a sinner, 209; His power, wisdom, &c., to be seen in all the creatures, 211; regardeth and rewardeth His people, 213; His wisdom attended with patience, 215; His service easily neglected by worldly men, 217; irreverence toward, a sign of a decaying kingdom, 217; tries His children by afflictions, 220; His Spirit comes silently into the heart, 221; cleanses the hearts of His children, 221; accepts sinners through Christ, 222; only can give the sense of sin, 227; His providence to be eyed at all times, 229; to have the glory in all things, 230; to be thanked in adversity as in prosperity, 230; seeketh His people in His Church, 230; afflicts His children for their good, 231; His favourite, 232; to be our Counsellor, 233; His justice, what it is, and how defined, 235; how it is His proceedings in justice are not so clearly discerned, 236; His cause requires resolution, 236; a merciful God, 238; the several expressions of, in His mercies, and why so, 240; the generality of His knowledge, 240; His goodness and man's ingratitude, 241; orders all things to work for the good of His children, 246; His workings and man's, very different, 248; should have the time of youth, 254; His cause demands zeal, 255, 256; His commands reasonable, 255; He only to be trusted in, 259; His guidance to be sought in reference to marriage, 260; preserves His child though never so much slighted by the world, 263; the centre of true knowledge, 263; cannot be pleased without faith, 264; His love of election and love of adoption, how distinguished, 265; His Spirit only regenerates, 268; to be prayed unto in Christ's name, 268; His omniscience, 269; requires us to be deliberate in prayer, 272; excuses sin, when not consented unto, 274; well rewards His faithful servants, 276; a just God as well as a merciful, 277; brings order out of confusion, 277; His judgments visit perjury, 280; rewards the least of faithful service done to Him, 287; accepts the meanest of graces, 287; His name to be had in reverence, 288; only to be eyed in afflictions, 288; His afflicting hand to be borne with patience, 290; His free election causeth man's happiness, 290; He only to have all glory, 290; to be asked by prayer for the gift of children, 291; reconciliation with, to be made sure, 292; how said to will and nill the death and punishment of a sinner, 293; His faithful servants are few, 294; friendship to be made with, in Christ, 301; why He suffereth His dearest children to want outward things, 302; only heareth and answereth the prayers of His people, 304; His protection necessary, 306; to be feared in His judgments, 307; to have the whole heart, 310; graces of His Spirit not given in vain, 311; His worship demandeth due preparation, 315; hope in, the best holdfast, 318; His knowledge not to be made out by the wisest of men, 318; riches, beauty, and wisdom, compared with, are lying vanities, 319; promises not to be made but with reference to His good pleasure, 320; to be waited upon in His ordinances, 321; will not hear sinful prayers, 321; submission to His will in all things enjoined, 323; afflicts His children to improve their graces, 324; His readiness to pardon repentant sinners, 325; His promises, how to make a right use of, 327; looks upon His Church with a special eye, 327; as He is a God of mercy, so He is a God of judgment, and therefore not to be provoked, 328; excellency and comfort of His promises, 328; to commit ourselves to Him in all things and to be thankful to His holy name, 330; seeking of, not to be left till old age, 337; give glory to, in all deliverances, 338; the wrath of, to be appeased by a timely repentance, 339; rash worship of, condemned, 339; regulate our wills by, 341; in all humility appear before, 341; observing the providence of, in the occurrences of the world, 342; wronged when we do not learn from the things of life, 342; the will of, towards His Church, 344; our Great Landlord, 348; has so ordered it that few or none of His people die without assurance of salvation, 350; foundation of, sure, though our knowledge may not be, 350; deliberate sin greatly provokes the Spirit of, 351; consult the revealed Word of, 353; God sends good ofttime through trouble, 354; only to be sought in times of distress, 357; how it is the hypocrite deceives himself in seeking after, 358; evil company a great hindrance in the ways of, 359; difference betwixt a spiritual and worldly man in the ways of, 360; Church of, may have war, but not contention within, 361; men not to hasten their own death, but submit to the will of, 367; assurance of, the only comfort, 367; the good names of the people of, made manifest, 367; perfect freedom in the service of, 374; excellency of resolution in the cause of, 374; His omniscience demonstrated from His omnipresence, 375; is displeased with those who do not honour His Son equally with Him, 374; omnipresence of, a motive of Christian confidence, 376; great patience of, 378; providence of, 379; humility appeases the anger of, 382; people of, to be at peace with one another, 382; different disposal of blessing by, 384; the great danger of not reconciling ourselves unto, 385; by the Word of, we discover Satan's plots against us, 387; negligence in the ways of, reproved, 389; loves His children even in the midst of spiritual desertion, 390; comfortable presence in ditto, 392; backwardness in the service of, reproved, 392; to have all the glory, 395; man to be thankful unto, 395; afflicting His children to try their sincerity, 397; exercising the graces of His children, 398; least degree of true saving faith accepted by, 400; children of, afflicted, 400; learn to depend upon the bare Word of, 401; the causes of the judgments of, considered, 403; the only true love is the love of, 403; zeal of heathens to their false gods compared to that of Christians to their true, 405; the true fear of, 406; men to hear the Word of, though they come with prejudiced thoughts, 407; wicked men made by, instrumental for the good of His people, 412; happiness of him who hath the Lord to be his, 415; goodwill and pleasure of, to rest content with, 415; the poorest man may, in his calling, do very good service unto, 416; mercies of, and danger of dallying with them, 418; not to be set out by any representation or image to the eye of man, 418; rewards the least of good done to His people, 427; men to be forward in promoting the cause of religion and of, 428; consideration of the omnipresence of, to be a restraint from sin, 428; men to be forward in frequenting the ordinance of, 429; heavy judgment of, on sacrilege, 431; a child of, is bettered by afflictions, 438; the true love of, will cause familiarity with, 439; how to be truly thankful unto, 440; printing of learned men's works instrumental to the glory of, 442; reproaches and sufferings made honourable by, 443; showing mercy only for Christ's sake, 443; the goodness of, a motive from vain swearing, 443; bless, 445; affliction, if anything, will make us seek, 447; rich men to be mindful of what they have received at the hands of, 448; heavenly-mindedness of a child of, 450; servants of, and their reward, 452; the soul of man precious in the sight of, 453; the immortality of, 455; order to be in the Church of, 456; reverence to be used in the worship of, 457; worldly policy not to be prejudicial to the honour of, 459; be thankful unto, in the saddest of times and conditions, 459; a cheerful giver loved by, 472; be content with the good pleasure of, 472; the inexhaustible treasure of the children of, 476; Himself the reward of all good endeavours, 477; how to think of, in prayer, 477; the promises of, are for the most part conditional, 482; why, suffers His children to be in a wanting condition, 483; watches over His people for their good, 487; fetching testimonies of truth out of the mouths of adversaries, 488; the only Searcher of the heart of man, 488; dwells in the humble spirit, 491; a merciful, 500; the mercies of, to be recorded to all posterity, 441, 501; the providence of, not secondary causes, to be rested on, 501; impossible to have a perfect knowledge of, 521; jealous of His honour, 523; loves us, how and why so, 524; gracious answer to earnest prayer by, 528; prayer for others prevalent with, 530; the minister's calling to be owned from, 534; keep close to the Word of, 537; exceeding love of, 538; raising up instruments for the deliverance of His people, 538; effects of not giving due glory to, 541; curious inquirers into the secrets of, punished, 541; the prejudice of murmuring at the doings of, 545; only able to work man to will and to do, 556; no worldly thing must hinder the service of, 561; omniscience of, 563; the only Searcher of the secrets of the heart, 563; blessing of, on the means employed does all, 567; the commands of, to be obeyed, not questioned, 568; tyrants and infidels forced to acknowledge the providence of, 569; only to be served, 570; to be at the will and disposal of, is the best position, 570; certainty of the good man's reward from, 570; His goodness and man's unthankfulness, 582; not the Author of sin, 584; the relation of parents, wife, and children to be slighted if they once appear in competition with the commandments of, 588; the bountiful goodness of, 591; benefit of timely accounting with, 593; all the creatures subservient to the goodwill and pleasure of, 594; a sure and fast Friend, 595; rely upon the blessing of, 595; ignorance in the ways of, condemned, 595; difference between the power of, and man, 603; the only One to trust in time of distress, 606, 607; more powerful than all His creatures, 607; how it is that men fail in the true service of, 609; predestination to the means as well as to the end, 611; benefit of hearing and practising the Word of, 619; the Christian's hope at the death of a child of, 620; ordering all things for the good of His Church, 624; vanity of the creature without, 624; how it is that He is to every one of His children alone, 625; to be seen in the works of creation, 625; what it is to really and truly trust in, 626; no man a loser by giving himself unto, 627; only true comfort in, 629; all in all is the grace of, 629; works in the deliverance of His, in various ways, 630; men created for the service of, 634; dwells in the soul that truly fears Him, 635; only able to persuade the heart fully, 636; has always had salots of several degrees, 643; all things to be resigned unto the will of, 646; no fighting against, 654; is all-sufficient in time of trouble, 657;

hardly accepting of late service done unto Him, 658; and why it is seldom accepted, 658.

GODLINESS, the best friend, 219; the ways of, more comfortable than wordly men can imagine, 424; a great mystery, and why so, 445; a very gainful trade, 448.

GODLY, cruelty of the wicked no prejudice to the, 513; company, the benefit of, 527.

GOLD, its precious qualities, 7.

GOOD DEEDS, not to talk of our, 238.

GOOD MEN to be used while we have them, 46; the prop and stay of a country, 50; as pillars in Church and state, to be preserved, 206; the falls of, presage the nation's ruin, 226.

GOOD and BAD MEN, the difference of, in life and death, 165; they look on death in a different manner, 166.

GOODNESS, different notions of the godly and ungodly concerning, 135; beginnings of, to be encouraged, 156; to persevere in to the end, 275; not greatness, that holdeth out to the last, 513.

GOSPEL, the, to rejoice in the light of, 21; to fear the loss of, 100; promises of, the support of poor men, 122; how it propagates itself, 199; reveals Christ more clearly than the Law, 261; how the preaching of, has so little success, 325; the operation of, on different persons, 368; ministers of, to be of godly lives and conversation, 414; implacable malice of wicked men against professors of the, 419; the Church of the, its amplitude above that under the Law, 430; ministers to preach the, notwithstanding the discouragements of their auditory, 449; the different effects of the, preached, 472; invitation to comfort, 545; the work of the Law preceding the work of the, 546; the soldier's choice, or the sword and the, 649; powerful preaching of the, 651.

GOSPEL LIGHT in more danger from causes at home than abroad, 15.

GOVERNMENT of the tongue required, 23, 24; the happiness thereof, 54; excellency of, 68, 69; the good of, 129; who fit for, in temporal estate, 228; change of, not to be effected, 238; tyrannic, the sad condition of people under, 311; rulers and men in authority subject to many failings in, 399; a good wish to good, 423; the great weight of, 444; the multitude always desirous of a change in, 458; happiness of good, 573; the heavy weight of, ill attained, 634.

GOVERNORS a curse or blessing, according to their character, 9; when wise and religious, the gift of Divine love, 10; to be prudentially qualified, 116; when wicked, their example dangerous, 199.

GRACE in the heart cannot be smothered, 21; total deprivation of, deplorable, 24, 25; loss of, recovered in Christ, 76, 77; not greatness, maketh magistrates glorious, 45; of godly parents cannot avail for bad children, 69, 70; saving and seeming, much resemble one another, 85; true, is diffusive, 93; is accompanied with humility, 93; when lost, can only be made up by Christ, 117; different measures of, in different persons, 145; sometimes seemingly lost to a child of God, 151; not to be despised because of weak beginnings, 155; sense of want of, a true sign of, 163, 184; may be in the heart, yet long concealed, 186; the only armour of proof, 191; seemingly lost in the soul, 249; keeps from sinning, 324; faith the head of, 343; not growing in, reproved, 345; worldly-mindedness a great hindrance to the enjoyments of, 349; in the heart certain, 350; men to be thankful for little strength of, 368; why those who are strong in, are subject to strongest corruptions, 370; and goodness to be esteemed even in men of lowest condition, 371; partial desertion of, not final in God's children, 378; minding of good things a way to increase, 501; growth of, in the soul, 526; to be communicated, 544; endeavour to the perfection of, 550; the Christian growth in, enjoined, 567; sweet fruits of, on the bitter root of nature, 615; means in the attainment of, enjoined by God, 619; of God is all in all, 629; true, 647.

GRACES and God go together, 23; to stock them up against a day of trouble, 258; of the Spirit to be held fast in the midst of temporal losses, 463; of the Spirit to be made the soul's furniture, 560; of God's Spirit, though seemingly lost, yet found at last, 591; divine, 618; of the Spirit, 618.

GRACIOUS spirits not bitter spirits, 22.

GRACCHI, mother of the, her reply to those who asked for her ornaments, 67.

GREAT FOLLY of late repentance in anything, 18.

GREAT MEN not to depend on popularity, 53; to be merciful, 135.

GREATNESS, worldly, danger of trusting to, in distress, illustrated, 6; the way to, full of danger, 11; and goodness seldom united, 114; and goodness well met together, 197.

GREENHAM, Mr., on non-residents, 115.

GREGORY of Nyssen, on the fruits of Baptism, 152.

GRIEVE not at the world's discourtesies, 340; not too much for the loss of that which cannot be recovered, 551.

GROSTHEAD, Robert, bishop of Lincoln, his reply to one seeking preferment, 89.

GUERRICUS, the cause of his conversion, 105.

II.

HABASSINES, the, alleged custom of, after receiving the Sacrament, 157.

HADRIAN VI. and the cares of the papal crown, 45.

HALLELUJAH, THE GREAT (Psalms cxlii. and five following), sung at the celebration of the Passover, 80.

HANNIBAL, speech of, when defeated by Maximus, 36; description of Marcellus by, 52; soldiers of, how effeminated, 91.

HAPPINESS and blessedness the only things desirable, 304; no true, found in the best of creatures here below, 365; no way but holiness to, 390; heavenly, not to be expressed, 391; of him who hath the Lord to be his God, 415; knowledge of God, through faith in Christ, the way to true, 522; of good government, 573.

HARLOTS the devil's night-nets, 213.

HARMS of others to be our arms, 71.

HART and eagle, story of, 13.

HEED to be taken who we trust, 86.

HEALTH, the, of the soul the true health of the body, 169.

HEARERS, not doers of the Word, condemned, 172; partial, of God's Word reproved, 245; captious, of the Word condemned, 452; of the Word, good and bad, 496; careless, of God's Word, reproved, 559; wanton, of the Word reproved, 603.

HEART, devotion of, like pleasant perfume, 2; a good, a melting heart, 7; grace in, cannot be smothered, 21; total deprivation of grace in, deplorable, 24, 25; when humble, contented, 141; hard, remedy for, 151; goes with the tongue, 173; can only find rest in Christ, 223, 287; author of all good and bad actions, 279; purged by repentant tears, 296; to be wholly given to God, 310; benefit of meditation as to the mollifying of the, 423; the, and purity seldom meet together, 498; a good man denominated from the goodness of his, 542; God the only Searcher of secrets of the, 563; communications, the want of, is deplorable, 617; no comfortable sight of God without purity of, 620.

HEATHEN, the, their conversion to be endeavoured, 38; zeal of, compared to that of Christians, 405.

HEAVEN, how to know if a man belong to, 4; folly not to provide for, illustrated, 9; things of this world a stop in the way to, 12; poor child of God comforted with hope of, 14; true Christian's hopes of, 30; the best inheritance, 84; God's dwelling-place, 105; hope of, the good man's encouragement, 109; the rewards of, will make amends for all, 142; worth contending for, 161; kingdom of, everlasting, 182; the great state of, 202; how to get into, 203; no impediments in the way to, should be admitted, 227; but one sure way to, 227; the inheritance of God's children, 246; regard for, should lead us to condemn the world, 297; men desirous to come to, but will not take the pains, 301; the way to, through tribulation, 303; joys of, not to be expressed, 312; the poor saints' inheritance, 345; whilst in the world, provide for, 345; the true Christian's desires are all for, 389; happiness of, not to be expressed, 391; the martyr's welcome to, 442; afflictions fit us for, 444; not to be found upon earth, 446; mis-giving thoughts of a worldly-minded man of the enjoyments of, 449; wait with patience for the things of, 452; joys of, 456; joys of, a winning subject upon the souls of men, 457; lay up treasure in, 485; every man is to make himself sure of, 561; to be always in our thoughts, 571; the Christian's claim to, and what it is, 577; a place of holiness, 594; not to be dismayed at, or contempters of the signs of, 637; and earth, God only to be worshipped as the great Creator of, 642; no pains to be thought too much for the getting of, 650; why it is that God affords some glimpse of, 650.

HEAVENLY PRINCIPLES tend heaven-ward, 51.

HEAVENLY THINGS (see also HEAVEN), every man to make himself sure of, 561.

HEBREW tongue, excellency of the, 398.

HEDGEHOG, habits of, noted, 26, 99.

HELL, the wicked believe not of its existence till in it, 73; eternity of its punishments, 102; fear of, a restraint from sin, 378; torments of, considered, 435; the great pains that wicked men take to go to, 465; broke loose by the swarms of sectaries and ranters, 501; no return from, 651.

HELP, the duty of, as God hath enabled us, 168.

HENRY IV. of England, when on his death-bed, 45; of France and the Duke of Alva, 114; his remarks on the extent of the King of Spain's dominions, 130.

HENRY VII. and the star-gazer, 21.

HERALDRY, Job's true, 141.

HERBERT, George, his piety noted, 229.

HERESIES to be avoided, 95.

HESSE, Landgrave of, and the blacksmith, 125.
HIERO, king of Sicily, his question concerning God, 101.
HILARY, St., 6.
HISTORY, the benefit of, 516.
HOLINESS an excellent thing, 363; no way to happiness but by, 390.
HOLY SPIRIT, the, His guidance to be implored, 322; difference in the enjoyment of the motions of, 351; how it is to be understood that the, dwelleth in us, 352; nature and properties of, set forth in the similitude of a dove, 394; supernatural workings of the, 615; how to demean ourselves after we are sealed by the, 648.
HONESTY and learning to go together, 253; the best policy, 659.
HONOUR and greatness, the vanity of, 365; is like a meteor, 365; God a jealous God of His, 523.
HONOURABLE, how to be truly rich and truly, 454.
HONOURS, transitory, 6; riches, &c., the devil's bait, 207; the vanity of, 556, 558; different uses made of, 557; men not to be proud of, 605.
HOPE well and have well, 187; of future joy sweeteneth present sorrow, 477; in the midst of perplexities, 495.
HORATII and Curatii, account of fight between, 99.
HORTENSIIUS, his great memory noted by Tully, 65.
HOSPITALITY commended, 70, 71; the want of, reprov'd, 573.
HUMBLE, how to be truly, 243.
HUMILIATION, the Christian's exaltation, 56; the way to glory, 201.
HUMILITY, no harm in, 132; occasioned by the consideration of our former and present condition, 273; how it is advanced, 275; appeaseth God's anger, 382, 499; vast difference between pride and, 554; the true nature of, 554; the excellency of, 555; the virtue of, 556; sovereign virtue of, 557; exalted, 561; appeaseth the wrath of God, 579.
HUSBAND, the, head of the wife, 487; and wife, each other's crown, 567; to bespeak one another kindly, 581.
HUSBANDMAN, the unthankful, condemned, 228.
HUSBANDRY, God's, 9.
HUSBANDS to bear with their wives' infirmities, 36; not to be uxorious, 292.
HYPOCRITE, how it is the, deceives himself in seeking after God, 358; the subtle, 380; an, being true to none, is loved by none, 417; difference in growth of grace in the true Christian and the, 495; the religious, discovered, 643; the comfortless, 650.
HYPOCRITES, in saying well and doing ill, reprov'd, 54; their inconstancy, 55; how to judge of, 130; described, 176; discover themselves, 181; discovered, and when, 220; their ways not easily traced, 232; characteristically laid open, 237, 286; discovering their own shame, 592.
HYPOCRISY may pass for a time undiscovered, 69; discovered, 212; the generality of, 235; discovering itself in the end, 610.
HYPOSTATICAL UNION, the, in Christ, shadowed forth by similitude, 332.

I.

ICARUS, story of, 53.
ICTUS, the Polish judge, and the beggar, 191.
IDLENESS the inlet of all temptations, 346.
IGNORANCE of God's mind will not excuse at the last, 203; in the way of God reprov'd, 594; especially in the ways of God, condemned, 595; and wilfulness ill-met, 627.
IGNORANT reformers in Church or state to be reprov'd, 566; upstart preachers reprov'd, 589.
IMAGINATION, the strength of, demonstrated, 203; how it prevails so much in matters of religion, 323; strength of, in matters of religion, 380.
IMMEDIATE addresses unto God by prayer find acceptance, 64.
IMPROPRIATORS, idle, the plenty of, 298.
INCLINATION, children hard to draw from their natural, 335.
INCONSTANCY, the, of the unresolved man, 334; always by degrees, 459.
INDEPENDENCY not to be had in this life, 87, 88.
INFIDELS, parents not to be forsaken, though they be, 441; and tyrants forced to acknowledge the providence of God, 569.
INFIRMITIES in the best, and why so, 149; men to bear with those of each other, 259.
INFIRMITY, sins of, how known from other sin, 276.
INGRATITUDE, baseness of, illustrated, 12; reprov'd, 265; to ministers from their people condemned, 279; monstrous sin of, 626; condemned, 636.
INHUMANITY condemned, 399.
INJURIES, past, to be forgotten in making peace, 24; forgetfulness of, commended, 90; to be forgiven and forgotten, 102.
INJURIOUS persons conquered by forgiveness, 12.
INJUSTICE, courts of judicature to be free from, 377.
INNOCENT blood cries to heaven for vengeance, 20, 21.
INNOVATIONS very dangerous to Church or state, 436.
INSTABILITY in religion, the cause of, 254.
INSTRUCTION of children, 521.
INTEGRITY, a good Christian will rather part with his life than his, 458.
INTERCESSION, the excellency of Christ's, 507.
INVOCATIONS of saints and angels condemned, 541.
IONIA, young men of, and the piece of plate, 150.
IRELAND, a strange ancient custom concerning, 4.
ISOCRATES, his counsel to Demonicus, 33.
ITALY, form of begging in, noted, 32.

J.

JACOB'S vision of the ladder and angels explained, 93.
JEALOUSY, image of, seen in vision by Ezekiel, 99.
JAMES, St., and Philetus, 159.
JEALOUSIES and fears, dangers of, 99.
JEHOVAH, a name of great power and efficacy, 288.

JEROME, St., 2; his love for Christ, 112.

JESUS, name of, all men to be highly affected at, 320.

JEWS, custom of, when they read the Book of Esther, 60; at the Paschal Feast, 80.

JOB, God's dealings with, noted, 14.

JOHN, the Evangelist, and Cerinthus, 47.

JOSEPHUS, how distractions may prove destructions, 9.

JOY of the just man more inward than outward, 57; how to be regulated, 225; in the midst of affliction, 319.

JUDGES and magistrates to be patrons of justice, 12.

JUDGMENT of Solomon, 9; of man on the appearance of things condemned, 156; minding the great day of, a means to live godlily, 234; prejudice in, danger of, 237; the day of, a terror to the wicked, 261; difference of, in minds of men, 362; how far there may be a lawful compliance with others of different, 399; causes of God's, considered, 403; books of piety and religion testimonial at the day of, 466; atheistical wicked men at the hour of death forced to confess God's, 467; the day of the last, 515; of God not concurrent with man's, 585; men of corrupt, 602; the day of, near at hand, 610; removal of good men by death a forerunner of, 644.

JUDGMENTS, national, call for national repentance, 72; great, attend great sins, 288.

JUNIUS, how converted from atheism, 165.

JUPITER, greatest of heathen gods, 55.

JUSTICE, robe of, compared with other robes, 40, 41; described, 183; administration of, best test of the state of a commonwealth, 3; not to be over hasty in the desire of, 7; under-agents and instruments to be considered in, 314; commutative, to do as we would be done by, 398; of Truth, Peace, Mercy, and, 417; worldly policy not to be prejudicial to commutative, 461; duly administered, the people's benefit, 600; excellency of, 610; moderated, 638; to be purely administered, 654.

JUSTIFICATION and sanctification, difference between, 100; by Christ, the extent of, 236.

K.

KILLING of men heretofore made ordinary, 26.

KINGLY OFFICE, the, attended with cares, 309.

KINGDOM of heaven, an everlasting kingdom, 182; a, divided against itself cannot long stand, 202; a sign of a decaying, 217; of Christ a peaceable kingdom, 251; and commonwealth, their succession from God, 310.

KNIGHTS, several orders of, noted, 203.

KINGS and co-rivals, the inconsistency of, 210; princes and rulers to hearken to good counsel, 509; same subject to death, the greatness of same no protection from death, 515; difference between good and bad, 534; to be regarded by those that are under them, 630.

KIRJATH-SEPPER, meaning of the name noted, 68.

KNOWLEDGE, usefulness of, in reformation, 4; God's and man's compared, 5; must go hand in hand with zeal, 16; of all a man's sins impossible, 61; of each other in heaven, 72; windy, and windy doctrine go together, 87; of Scripture the only necessary knowledge, 94; of God merely national, not true knowledge, 106; experimental, the only knowledge, 163; much confidence of, an argument of having none, 166; not to be reserved, 175; must go with practice, 180; concealed, the danger of, 199; without practice, reprov'd, 219; true, never rests till it centres in God, 263; to be put into practice, 269, 286; in political affairs very uncertain, 270; all, but in part, 272; of Christ better than all human learning, 360; and learning to be acknowledged wherever found, 406; experimental, the only 429; the keys of, much abused by those that keep them, 499; a perfect, of God too deep for men or angels, 521; of God, through faith in Christ, the way to true happiness, 522; of Christ, wherein it is evidenced, 543.

LACEDEMONIANS, way of, to make their children hate drunkenness, 71.

LADY, the, and the beggar, 135.

LAKE, Dr., Bishop of Bath and Wells, pious conduct of, commended, 75.

LANGUAGE, blasphemous, condemned, 234.

LATRO PORTIUS, his remarkable memory, 65.

LAW-SUITS, great danger of, 212; tedious length of, 219.

LAW of God, a perfect, 20; the known, of any nation, the rule of obedience, 295; practice of, absurd, 423; the, abused by libertinism, 477; said to be the strength of sin, 481; tedious length of suits at, condemned, 513; Christ the end of the ceremonial, 522; work of the Gospel preceded by the work of the, 546; the glass of the, shewing what men are, 613.

LAWFUL to praise the dead, 48.

LAWS, civil, style of beginning, 1; ancient Saxon, had decalogue prefixed, 1; of Justinian, 16; of England concerning noblemen, 25; of God delivered with majestic ceremonies, and why, 98; man's duty to attend to it, 139; how to behold ourselves in the glass of, 250; brings men to the sight of themselves, 298.

LEARN, no man too good to, 439; man never too old to, 462.

LEARNERS, more teachers than, 421.

LEARNING or parts, not to admire our own, 175; university, to be countenanced by men in authority, 224; the necessity of, 244; to go with honesty, 253; a man of, speaks little, 267; the devil's plot to root out, 278; commodity and discommodity of, 363; knowledge and, to be owned wherever found, 406; right use of human, 413; the right use of human, in divinity, 473; necessity of using ditto, 474; much, found in a small compass of expressions, 554; impossible to arrive at a full perfection of, 555; policy of the devil to root out, 562; human, in sermons, the lawful use of, 563;

LEONIDAS, story of, 27.

LETHARGY of sin, 613.

LEX TALIONIS, illustrated in the death of Lord Hastings, 164; and Maxentius, 409.

LIAR, the reward and punishment of a, 435.

LIBERTINES impatient of government, 81.

LIBERTY, Christian, abused by sectarians, 28; the cause of covetousness, 494.

LIGHT of the Gospel, ground for rejoicing, 21; nature of, 96; hated by the wicked worker, 179.

LIKE to like, 239.

LIKENESS to be a motive to loveliness, 408.

LION and fox, story of, 41; the, shows his force only where he finds resistance, 335.

LIFE a voyage, 9; subject to all sorts of calamity, 64, 65; precious, and to be preserved, 66; the whole, to be a course of repentance, 100; of the worldly, chosen by many who desire the death of the good, 107; an ungodly, leads to an ungodly end, 107, 248; brevity of, should lead to moderation, 109; a good man's, preserved for the good of others, 165; cannot be preserved by temperance when God calls for it, 178; blamelessness of, enjoined, 219; misery of, 224; watchfulness of, rewarded, 252; difference betwixt the natural and spiritual, 366; men mistaken in the thoughts of long, 372; daily amendment of, enjoined, 378; consideration of the brevity of, 387; the day of death better than the day of, 401; how every good Christian is to order his, 407; consideration of the shortness of, a memento of death, 422; afflictions of this, and the use to be made of them, 434; not to be dejected, though the joy of the just be not perfect in this, 508; spare not thy, for the cause of God, but spare it against temporal dangers, 531; impossible to arrive at a full perfection of learning in this, 555; uncertainty of man's, 587; fullness of reward reserved till after this, 604; to be undervalued when religion is in danger of losing, 639.

LIVING well to be learned before we desire to die, 69.

LORD'S PRAYER, story of repetition of, 2.

LOSS of Gospel light more to be feared from causes at home than abroad, 15; the, of a faithful ministry not to be slighted, and why so, 262; of an only son or nearest relation not to be too much lamented, 651.

LOSSES not to be mourned for, 58.

LOVE, for the most part, but complimentary, 9; want of, cause of all sorrows, 38; the bond of perfection, 52; of a true Christian for Christ wonderful, 112; the strength of, 118; want of, to be deplored, 138; to Christ, how to be recovered when lost, 240; to be preserved with all men, 313; unity, and peace, best supporters of kingdoms, 371; the great want of, to be deplored, 396; of God the only true, 403; of God and His ordinances, 438; true brotherly, scarce to be found, 597; difference between true and feigned, unto Christ, 632; how our, to the creature is to be regulated, 648; faith and, inseparable, 652.

LUCULLUS, his great memory noted by Tully, 65; his sincerity commended, 146.

LUKEWARMNESS in religion forerunner of evil, 333.

LUTHER quoted, 6; on the saints' knowledge of one another in heaven, 72; his difficulties in seeking Reformation, 78; his wrong to Calvin, 120; his wife's testimony to the benefit of affliction, 147; on the safety of the Church of God, 310.

LUSTS of the flesh, to be aware of, 147; danger of, to be avoided, 329; danger of fleshly, 467.

LYCURGUS on home influence, 29, 30; method of, adopted to prevent drunkenness in Lacedæmonia, 49, 50.

M.

MACEDONIUS, the monk, his answer to the Emperor Theodosius, 66.

MADNESS, the desperate sinner's, 446, 621.

MAGISTRATES to be diligent in their places, 66; not to be too forward in seeking preferments, 93; to be the support of the place where they live, 126; to be advised in point of justice, 130; to do justice, 138, 164; to be peaceably-minded, 144; to look to their attendants, 150; called to do justice at all times, 271; madness of, not to be guided by the counsel they give to others, 300; ministers, &c., to be men of courage, 422; and men in authority to be exemplary to all others, 505; to be men of understanding, 512; to be impartial judges, 514; to be active examples of good, 519; not to be guilty of that which they forbid in others, 520; the great comfort of good, 527; to stand up in the cause of God against opposition, 529, 533; their rule to walk by, 560; deaths of faithful, to be lamented, 561; duty of, in suppression of vice, 598; not to raise themselves by the ruin of the Church, 615; and rulers to be men of public spirits, 633; to stand up for the poor, 648.

MAHOMET II. at the siege of Belgrade, 25; his method of establishing his religion, 81.

MAINTENANCE, the want of, wastes religion, 214.

MELANCHTHON, his parable of the wolves and dogs, 201.

MALICE and envy not fit guests for God's table, 77, 78.

MAN, idle, subject to temptations, 8; his being is from God, 39; our duty to, 11; always in a dying condition, 13; the nature of, sinful altogether, 20; thankfulness of, satisfies God's goodness, 40; dead in sin is senseless, 48, 84; a contented, not base-spirited, 110; when wicked, unwilling to examine himself, 113; given to change, 123; when rich, God's steward, 135; careless when unregenerate, 141; to be peaceable, and why so, 149; to be sociable, 195; every, haunted with some evil spirit, 214; reverence for, more than God, sign of a decaying kingdom, 217; the best and worst of creatures, 221; the fall of, described, 221; inconstancy of, 233; the great vanity of, in proposing to himself long life, 333; a prudent, how he may lawfully comply with the times, 334; the unresolved, inconstancy of, 334; his ingratitude contrasted with God's goodness, 241; losing himself in the pursuit after knowledge, extraordinary, 242; since the fall, subject to the creatures, 258; a, to be wise for himself as well as for others, 289; falling from God, the sad condition of, 300; to be a social creature, 316; every, has one darling sin, and how so, 326; vain-glorious, deceives himself, 335; self-conceited, 335; different conditions of, 336; compared to chess, to the stage, 340; prosperity will discover, 343; should not fret at the prosperity of the wicked, 347; difference in a godly and a wicked, 348; different enjoyment of the Holy Spirit by a reprobate and regenerate, 351; nakedness of, 358; the least, in the ministry not to be contemned, 363; no, free from temptations, 369; sad condition at the time of death of the wicked rich, 372; God's great patience, notwithstanding the provocations of, 378; should be wise for himself, as well as for others, 383; religion consisting in duty to God and, 393; the extremity of, is God's opportunity, 482; one, punished for another's sin, 412; every wicked, a curse to the place he lives in, 413; the poorest, may do good service unto God, 416; God not to be set out by any image to the eye of, 418; should walk circumspectly, 437; none too good to learn, 439; how a, should behave if fallen into bad company, 445; how to know whether a, be heavenly or earthly minded, 451; the soul of, precious in the sight of God, 453; the godly, rejoicing in death, 455; comfort of the good, in matters of worldly loss, 456; never too old to learn something, 462; an uncharitable rich, no heavenly-minded, 473; God the only Searcher of the

- heart of, 488; excellency of the soul of, 492; a good, merciful to his beast, 502; some one sinful quality predominant more than other in the heart of, 535; how the devil makes use of the world to destroy, 578; the sincere and upright, described, 588; difference betwixt the power of God and, 603; by nature lawless and ill-advised, 607; by refusing the tenders of grace, becomes the cause of his own destruction, 611; to do as well as he may prudently, 635; not to be trusted unto, 641.
- MANIFESTATION, the, of God, in several respects, 27, 28.
- MANNA, the, of God's Word, how to relish it, 220.
- MANUTIUS, Aldus, and the busy-bodies, 154.
- MARRIAGE to be sought of God by prayer, 260; not to be made for money only, 515; folly to repent the choice of a wife after, 517.
- MARTIANUS, bishop of the Novatians, and Sabatius, 22.
- MARTYR, Peter, treatment of his wife's remains under Queens Mary and Elizabeth, 15.
- MATYR'S, the, welcome to heaven, 442.
- MATTER enough within us to condemn us, 161.
- MAUD, mother to Henry II., how she escaped from prison, 69.
- MAXIMUS, Valerius, story of a young nobleman, 26.
- FABIUS, his conduct in the battle-field, 35, 36.
- MAYOR, the, and vintners, story of, 12.
- MEANINGS, good, of bad men destructive, 605.
- MEANS, the use of, God's blessing on, 97; good, how to be used, 120; the greatest of things wrought by God without, 475; God predestineth to the, 611.
- MEDITATION, heavenly, the great comfort of, 198; frequent, of death a great benefit, 366; the benefit of, as to the mollifying of the heart, 423; the necessity of divine, 424; the beginning of divine, in practice, very difficult, 425; natural wants and weaknesses not to be objected against the practice of divine, 426; want of matter not to be pretended against the practice of divine, 427; the difficulty of first entrance upon, 619; excellency of divine, 642.
- MELANCHOLY person, the story of a, 37.
- MEMENTO, the sinner's, 210; of death, 422.
- MEMORY, to bless God for our, 67; helped by repetition of good things, 101; must be active, 112; ought to be the treasure of all goodness, 155; good and bad, the difference betwixt, 334; excellency of a good, 535; general badness of, in good things, 536.
- MEN, though differing in judgment, not to differ in affection, 48; not to censure others, but look to themselves, 49; the greatest, subject to mortality, 129; when good, the pillars of the state, 156; bloody-minded, condemned, 187; married, better for the commonwealth than bachelors, 209; not repairing to church reprov'd, 249; to be helpful one to another, 258; self-seeking, reprov'd, 280; of self-ends condemned, 281; and women not to wear each other's apparel, 294; easily drawn by their own natural corruption, 297; to be compassionate one towards another, 302; should stand up for the credit of their places, 332; rich, to consider their beginnings and be thankful, 333; not to hasten their own deaths, 367; should be thankful for little strength of grace, 368; condemned for being easily taken off their holy profession when judgment is taken off, 381; to be willing to have their sins reprov'd, 385; reprov'd for preferring one preacher before another through spiritual pride, 388; reprov'd for seeking after the varieties of worldly things, 388; to keep up the credit of their names, 389; to be constant in the performance of holy duties, 391; to be prepared for crosses, afflictions, troubles, &c., 402; said to learn of little children, dumb shows, &c., 403; he that feareth God passeth not the affronts of, 406; malice of wicked, against professors of the Gospel, 419; to bear with the infirmities of their wives, 425; to be forward in promoting the cause of God and religion, 428; to be forward in frequenting the ordinances of God, 429; the company of wicked, to be avoided, 430; to be provident Christians, 434; how to bear the reproaches of, 438; upon hearing of the joys of heaven, to be much taken therewith, 456; joys of heaven to be a winning subject upon the souls of, 457; best of, not free from sin in this life, 461; how it is that drunken, think well of themselves, 464; poor, not to be slighted, 465; proper names of, not to be so much regarded as appellative, 466; to be careful in the choice of servants, 474; reconciliation to be made with all, 478; are, by nature, desirous of things unlawful and prohibited, 480; to argue themselves into a mood of contentment, 491; in authority to be exemplary to all others, 505; usually judging others to be like themselves, 516; to be as well industrious in their callings as zealous in their devotions, 527; to pray for others as well as themselves, 529; by nature, looking more after their bodies than their souls, 559; who seek after preferment not fit to be entertained therein, 564; to be ready to die for Christ, 565; the generality of, not enduring to hear of death, 565; to be active in regaining their lost souls, 592; a caveat for bloody-minded, 596; scarcity of sincere, upright, 596; to be compassionate, 598; to be at peace with one another, 598; to labour that they be regenerated, 598; nothingness of, 602; corrupt judgments of, 602; not to be proud of honours and preferments, 605; when dead, soon forgotten, 606; not to be proud of their lands and livings, 614; to be careful in the trial of their faith, 623; not to be ashamed of their godly profession, though the wicked speak evil of them, 624; prevented by death in the midst of wordly contrivances, 628; to prefer suffering before sinning, 632; created for the service of God, 634; the several books of God slighted and neglected by most, 638; loss of good, 640; are, by nature, hardly brought to a confession of their sins, 643; not easily brought to believe the world's vanity, 646.
- MERCIES, sins against, double sins, 184; of God in Christ Jesus to be sought while they may be found, 419; of God to be recorded to posterity, 441; acknowledgment of, the ready way to have them enlarged, 622; of God to the worst of sinners repenting, 633.
- MERCIFUL, a good man is, to his beasts, 502.
- MERCIFULLY minded, to be, is praiseworthy, 170.
- MERCURY and Argus, story of, 13.
- MERCY, works of, rarely found, 306; not to be put off from one to another, 307; of Justice, Truth, Peace and, 417.
- MERIT-MONGERS, confuted, 272; condemned, 406.
- METALS, hearts compared to, 8.
- MILESIUS and the dolphin, story of, 12.

MINISTERS to be wise master-bu-and young, blameworthy, 32; their looked to, 37; ill-lived, a scandal to the not to be afraid of the faces of men, 62; soul-murdering, 63; to be diligent in the 66; to be well-principled, 67; to be able and furnished, 68; their blessing after sermon to attended to, 74; of all men, not to be covetous, 75; not to be noisy, 77; to be men of merciful dispositions, 80; may repeat their sermons, 87; not to be too forward for preferments, 93; to distinguish auditors, 109; to speak opportunely, 115; to be the support of the place where they live, 116; to be careful in the delivery of God's message, 117; to be men of knowledge and understanding, 140; to be peaceably-minded, 144; to cry down the sins of the times, 147; to stand up for the truth, 153; to teach the practice as well as the knowledge of religion, 183; their labour, though unsuccessful, rewarded by God, 183; to live according to the doctrine they teach others, 195; of all men, to be painstaking in their calling, 224; how to preach profitably, 225; when lewd, what like to, 227; to be encouraged and protected against plots of wicked men, and why so, 257; the duty of, 277; to be painstaking in the discharge of their duty, 278; of God's Word to be constant in preaching, 279; to preach plainly as well as learnedly, 284; and magistrates, the madness of, not to be guided by the counsel they give to others, 300; a, in necessity, matter of great grief, 321; how it is they have so little success in preaching the Gospel, 325; accountable unto God, 336; the least, not to be contemned, 363; the, and magistrates go hand in hand together, 364; advised in the method of profitable preaching, 377; people should show love to their, in the vindication of their credit, 383; and magistrates to be examples of good unto others, 394; should practise what they preach, 405; to be had in respect by the people, 410; to be of godly lives and conversations, 414; magistrates and, to be men of courage, 422; piety, not promotion, that makes godly, 426; to preach the Gospel notwithstanding the discouragements of their auditory, 449; to be men of gravity and experience, 459; joy of, at the time of death, 462; young, raw, to be reprov'd, 502; negligent, advised, 503; to be acquainted with the state of men's souls, 506; to keep close to the text, 514; to be careful in reproving sinners, 517; should show Christ to all that diligently seek Him, 523; to be spiritual men, 530; to be earnestly zealous in preaching God's Word, 531; to be active and vigorous in the reproof of sin, 532;
 the calling of, to be owned from God, 534; not to be verbal, but real in their expressions, 534; their rule to walk by, 560; deaths of faithful, to be lamented, 561; non-resident and slothful, discouraged, 571; their calling full of labour and toil, 597; duty of, in suppression of vice, 598; to be men of knowledge and understanding, 608; conversion of souls, the joy of, 623; not to be found trucking for preferments, 636.

MINISTRY, the, factious-spirited men unfit for, 22;
 the, its honour and dignity, 217; if in want, will soon become contemptible, 229; the loss of a faithful, not to be slighted, and why so, 262; four sorts of men who undertake the work of the, 536.

MIRACLES, why ceased, 41.

MISERIES, to compassionate others', 517.

MISERY of others a warning, 337; attendant on the haters of God's people, 358.

MODERATION, little set by, 185.

MODESTY, Christian, commendable, 297.

MOLE, the, alleged to see when dying, 73.

MONICA, mother of St. Augustine, her prayers noted, 146.

MORNING prayers, neglect of, condemned, 294.

MORTALITY, memorandum of, 113, 216; all men and things subject to, 200.

MORTIFICATION, excellency thereof, 386; necessity thereof, 395.

MOSES, God's dealings with, noted, 14.

MULTITUDE, the, uncertainty of, 38; inconsiderate, 174; not to be guided by the, 420; the giddy, uncertain disposition of the, 612.

MURDER, &c., short-lived, 10.

MURMURING at God's doings, 545.

MUSICIAN of the King of Denmark, story of the, 137.

MYTHOLOGISTS, their story of pleasure and sorrow, 94.

MYSTERY, godliness a great, 445; of the blessed Trinity shadowed in familiar resemblances, 454.

N.

NAME, a good, once lost, not easily recovered again,
 143; excellency of a good, 562.

NECESSITY for young ministers to be well-principle, 67.

NEGLECT in the hearing of God's Word dangerous,
 571; of the soul condemned, 647.

NEGLIGENCE in the ways of God reprov'd, 389; ministers advised against, 503.

NEIGHBOUR, a good, a great blessing, 6; every man to speak truth to his, 12; in loving our, we love God, 90.

NERVA, his government described, 32.

NEPTUNE, story of, 14.

NET of fisherman and the world compared, 23.

NEUTRALITY, danger of, in religion, 226.

NOLANS and Neapolitans, story of, 98.

NON-PROFICIENCY in the ways of God and religion condemned, 547.

O.

OATH, or covenant-breakers, not to be trusted, 334;
 men to be careful how they make, 512.

OBEDIENCE, true, 601.

OBSTINATE sinner, the, deserves eternity of punishment, and why so, 13.

OCCAM, famous schoolman, saying of, to Louis the Emperor, 87, 88.

OCCASION not to be given that religion be ill-spoken of, 262.

OFFENCES, the, of brethren, to be passed by, 309.

OLD AGE, the great danger of putting off repentance till, 539.

OMNIPRESENCE of God a motive to Christian confidence, 376; a dissuasive from sin, 377; the consideration of God's, to be a restraint from sin, 428.

OPPORTUNITY, to make good use of, 238.

OPPRESSION, &c., short-lived, 10.

OPPRESSOR, the rich, and his son, 256.

ORDER commanded and commended, 106; all out of, 359; to be in the Church of God, 456.

ORDINANCES, the true love of God will cause a man to love His, 438.

ORIGIN, his remark concerning his father's martyrdom; his appearance in the pulpit of a church in Jerusalem, 113.

OSWALD, King, charitable conduct of, 8.

P.

PAIN, eternal, the thought of, should deter from sin, 18.

PAMBO, story of, 23, 24.

PAMPHLETS and books, scandalous and seditious, fit for the fire, 296.

PANTHER, the, habits of, 11, 43.

PAPISTS and Protestants, differences between, not easily reconciled, 193; the, blind zeal discovered, 196; abuse of Scripture, 228; seduce their followers, 316; what they did in Elizabeth's reign, 622.

PARDON of sins the only comfort, 115; of repentant sinners by God a motive to us, 623.

PARENTS' care only to enrich their children reprov'd, 186; not to be over-careful to make their children rich, 256; to be careful what they say in their presence, 282; to be careful in the education of their children, 360; not to be too much dejected for the death of an only child, 402; on children marrying without the consent of, 433; not to be forsaken, though they be infidels, 446; children to be ready in relief of the necessities of, 451; to show good examples to their children, 462; children to be carefully educated by, 472; sins of, visited on their children, 511; to be careful in the instruction of their children, 521; not to be allowed in competition with God, 588.

PARITY in Church and State not admissible, 29, 30.

PARSIMONY in times of public danger condemned, 291.

PARTIALITY in reproof of sin condemned, 266.

PATIENCE, the height of, 260; example of, 529; under afflictions, 544.

PATIENT at the time of death, and why so, 547.

PATIENTLY to wait God's time for deliverance, 552.

PAUL, St., quotes from heathen writers, 102.

PEACE with men will make our peace with God, 18; sets up religion, 51; we ought to follow the things that make for, 360; love, unity, and, best supporters of kingdoms, 371; seek our, with God, 385; never be at, with sin, 410; the saint's everlasting, 478; of conscience nature cannot work out, 553; same, not wrought out by merry company, 554; men to be at, one with another, 598; linking the Church and commonweal together, 599; true improvement of, 601; moderation the forerunner of, 605.

PEACEABLE man's comfort, 4; every, frame of spirit not a sure testimony of a state of grace, 324.

PELARETUS, story of, 31.

PELOPIDAS, his speech recorded, 34.

PEOPLE, a divided, dangerous to interpose with, 78; attending the house of God must be peaceably-minded, 144; of God, the Lord is their great Protector, 197; the sad condition of, under tyrannical government, 311; how it is that they, are incompetent judges of the preacher and his doctrine, 336; the, of God to be at peace with one another, 382; should show love to their ministers in the vindication of their credits, 383; ministers to be had in respect by the, 410; wicked men made by God instrumental for the good of His, 412; God rewarding the least of good done to His, 427; should begrudge no hardship in seeking the services of God, 429; safety of God's, 471; God raising up instruments for the deliverance of His, 538; plots of the wicked turning to the good of God's, 540; wicked men see the miseries, not the joys, of God's, 614; Christ's watchfulness over His, 645.

PERFECTION, Christian, to be attained by degrees, 435; of grace to be endeavoured, 550; of learning impossible in this life, 555.

PERFORMANCE of holy duties made easy by constancy, 434.

PERSECUTION, the crown of all good actions, 114; by Christ's example, be ready to suffer, 420.

PERSEVERANCE, the crown of, 543; in goodness enjoined, 547, 653.

PERSIANS, ancient law of the, 54.

PERJURY, God's judgments attend upon, 280.

PERSUASION, danger of a false, of our effectual calling, 350; invalidity of natural, 524.

PHAETON, story of, 16.

PHARISEE and publican, the, difference between, 214.

PHARNACES, story of, 39.

PHILIP II. of Spain, story of, 20.

PHILO, his description of Aaron's ephod, 91.

PHILOSOPHY subservient to divinity, 60.

PHILOTIMUS, a learned physician, his treatment of an insane person, 37.

PHOCAS, Emperor, his character, 10.

PHOCION, wife of, her reply to those who asked for her jewels, 67.

PHYSICIANS, of all men, not to be covetous, 76.

PIETY and learning, their downfall to be deplored, 124; not promotion, that makes a godly minister, 426; progress in, 504; and policy not inconsistent, 574; progress in, enjoined, 575.

PISMIREs, their habits, used to illustrate prevention of growth of sin, 11.

PISO, the Roman general, the injustice of, 161.

PLACE, without grace, cannot keep from sinning, 324.

PLACES, men to stand up for the credit of their, 332.

PLAGUES, the ten, of Egypt compared to the Ten Commandments, 337.

PLAINNESS in preaching illustrated and commended, 284.

PLATO, his habit of reflection commended, 56, 57; on the Divine existence, 101.

PLEASURE, how to take it safely, 28, 29; to rest contented with God's good will and, 415.

PLEASURES, carnal, to be changed into spiritual, 27; former, the thought of, adds to present sorrows, 91; temporal, hinder joys spiritual, 92; of the world only counterfeits, 95; momentary, attended by eternal sorrow, 175.

PLOTS and contrivances of the wicked turning to the good of God's people, 540.

- POLICY above strength, 3; uncertain, 160; of the Pope to advance his holiness, 184; a prudential piece of, for the continuance of peace, 329; religion not to be made a stalking-horse to, 462.
- POLITICAL affairs, the knowledge of, uncertain, 270.
- POLITICIANS spoiled in the height of wicked designs, 376; wicked, discovered, 569; religion of, 600.
- POMPEY, how he kept his soldiers from desertion, 53.
- POOR, distressed men, their comfort in appealing to God, 204; and needy, to be charitable to the, 301.
- POPERY a mere heap of confusion, 433.
- POPILIUS and Antiochus the Great, 62, 63.
- POPIISH miracles condemned, 582.
- POPULAR government, popular confusion, 52.
- POSTERITY, mercies of God to be particularly recorded to, 441, 501.
- POVERTY, the spiritual benefit of, 493; a rich man pleading, condemned, 519.
- PRACTICE must accompany knowledge, 180; should go with profession, 200; Scriptural, to accompany Scriptural knowledge, 286; ministers should, what they preach, 405; of the law absurd, 423; beginning of divine meditation very difficult in the matter of, 425.
- PRAY for others, 529.
- PRAYER, worldly thoughts and distractions in time of, condemned, 2; fervent, great power of, 3, 224; spiritual and carnal, 5; fervency, not length, 16; continual, what it implies, 27; the Blessed Trinity co-operate in, 32; with the tongue not the only, 68; to be made for all men, 91; unanimity in, 114; when not prevailing, how to be regulated, 122; preparation necessary for, 138; certain prevalence of, 149; when faithful, the great return of, 185; ought not to be slothful or contracted, 191; receives a moderate answer from God, 193; neglect of, condemned, 208; for the dead unavailable, 218; of the wicked ineffectual, 223; drowsiness in, to be avoided, 235; should accompany preaching, 242; to be fervent in, 255; to be used in reference to marriage, 260; to be made in Christ's name, 268; requires deliberation, 272; the only means to supply all defects, 275; danger of distraction in, 278; to be used to obtain the gift of children, 291; to be attended to each morning, 294; turns earth into heaven, 309; fervency in, not length required, 316; sinful, not heard, 321; no comfortable return of, till sin is removed, 405; of Theodorus, a young Christian, when refusing the worldly enjoyments of his father's house, 433; of St. Augustine and of Fulgentius, 434; how to think of God in, 477; the best time for, 505; rash, inconsiderate, reprov'd, 509; fervency in, 522; God's answer to fervent, 528; for others, in same condition with ourselves, prevalent with God, 530; all endeavours to be sanctified by, 539; how to discover our thought in preparation to, 543; things unlawful not to be asked of God in, 548; and endeavour to be united, 564; a spiritual prevailing sword, 640.
- PREACH, ministers should practise what they, 405; how to, 531.
- PREACHER, the sincere, his comfort, 231; his courage, 233; men who, through spiritual pride, prefer one before another, reprov'd, 388; lewdness of the, no warrant to slight the ordinance of preaching, 411; the, to be careful that he be well prepared, 503.
- PREACHERS, conscientious, not to be slighted, 213; painstaking, the poverty of, 298; ignorant, upstart, reprov'd, 589.
- PREACHING, plain, most profitable, 77; rash, condemned, 123; and prayer to go together, 242; how it is that, is of a double operation on different persons, 368; minister advised in the method of profitable, 377; lewdness of the preacher's life no warrant to slight the ordinance of, 411; advice against negligent, 503; variety of gifts in the ordinance of, 528; of God's Word to be done earnestly and zealously, 531; more converts made by, than by reading, 533.
- PREDESTINATION, how to make a right use of the doctrine of, 588.
- PREFERMENTS, transitory, 6; and gifts not to be envied, 31; ministers, of all men, not to be found trucking for, 636.
- PREJUDICE, danger of, 237.
- PREPARATION for religious duties must be free of worldly distraction, 78; holy duties call for holy 460.
- PRIDE, the complement of all sin, 113; the vanity of, 420; the vanity and sinfulness of 552; memento of, 552; a main engine of the devil, 553; difference between humility and, 554; in riches, honours, and preferments, the vanity of, 556; in apparel condemned, 558; folly of, 559.
- PRINCE, a good, no advantage to a bad people, 111; to be prudentially qualified, 116.
- PRINCIPLES, good, the benefit of keeping close to, 209.
- PRINTING, how and when invented, 313; of learned men's works instrumental to God's glory, 442.
- PRECIOUSNESS of singular saints, illustrated, 14, 15.
- PROCRUSTES and his bed, story of, 63.
- PROFESSORS, the trial of true and false, 463; times of trouble and danger reveal true from false, 549; carnal, described, 569; worldly, of the Gospel reprov'd, 634.
- PROFESSION, without practice, not acceptable, 39; to be joined with practice, 273; without practice, signifieth nothing, 287; men not to be ashamed of their godly, 624; of religion, unsteadfastness and giddiness in, reprov'd, 628.
- PROFIT, the great god of this world, 204.
- PROGRESS in piety to be endeavoured, 504, 575.
- PROMISES in adversity not performed in prosperity condemned, 154; not to be made, but with reference to God's pleasure, 320; of God, the, how to make a right use of, 327; of God are, for the most part, conditional, 482; non-performance of, condemned, 599; without abilities of performances not to be regarded, 630.
- PROMISING much and performing little reprobable, 245.
- PROMOTION always by degrees, 459.
- PROSPER, ill-gotten goods never, 486.
- PROSPERITY of wicked men destructive, 33, 197; the evil of, 83; divides Christians, 85; unhappy, 302; uncertain, 303; men apt to be unthankful in, 322; discovers man, 343; of the wicked should not trouble us, 347; to provide for adversity in time of,

418; of the wicked not to be envied, 421; draws envy, 494; attended by fears and cares, 653.

PROTESTANT RELIGION the only comfortable religion to die in, 22, 23; the, promoted by persecution, 118, 119.

PROUD man's memento, 552.

PROVIDENCE of God, the, to be eyed at all times, 229; special, towards the Church, 329.

PRUDENCE and policy, worldly, the uncertainty of, 160.

PUBLIC men to have public spirit, 34.

PULSE, the, best test of state of health, 3.

PUNISHMENT, the liar's reward and, 435; wicked men reserved for exemplary, 496; rewards and, are useful to bring unto Christ, 627; of the wicked here no comparison to that hereafter, 652.

PUNISHMENTS, strange, for strange sins, 190.

PURGATORY, the place of, a mere dream, 480.

PURITY and the heart of man seldom meet together, 498.

PYRRHIAS and the old man rescued from pirates, story of, 159.

PYTHAGORAS, rules of his school, 32.

Q.

QUALITIES of God should be in God's children, 10.

QUESTIONS, needless and intricate, the vanity of, 64.

QUIETNESS, the good of, 330.

R.

RANTERS', the, religion, 431; hell broke loose by the swarms of sectaries and, 502; and roaring boys, their conversion, not confusion, to be endeavoured, 526.

READING, how to be done with profit, 239.

REASON must submit to faith, 131; not the square of good actions, 148.

RECONCILIATION with God, necessity of, 87; with God, the importance of making sure of, 292; to be made with all men, 478.

RECREATION, the necessity thereof, 251; when lawful, the benefit of, 254.

REDEMPTION, the high price of man's, 604.

REFORMATION, knowledge necessary to, 4; a pretence for robbing the Church, 18; of a Church, a bad, is a deformation, 27; sometimes pretended, 122.

REGENERATION, the necessity thereof, 266; the work of God's Spirit only, 268; the excellency of, 595; men to labour for, 598.

RELIGION, a cheap, the beloved religion with most men, 8; and unity the only supporters of Church and state, 17; the Protestant, only comfortable religion to die in, 22, 23; not lawful to fight for, 81; neutrality in, enmity, 85; ceremonials of, not to be much attended to, 98; when pretended, means mischief, 136; the square of good actions, 148; wasted by want of maintenance, 214; danger of neutrality in, 226; cause of instability in, 254; to avoid giving occasion of speaking against, 262; danger of controversies in, 296; slothfulness and lukewarmness in, forerunners of evil, 333; danger of jesting at, 374; how it is imagination persuades so much out of the way in matters of, 380; how it is that there arose many professors and so few practisers of, 391; consists in duty both to God and man, 393; way of, irksome in the beginning, but comfortable in the end, 411; men to be forward in promoting the cause of God and, 428; the, of ranters, 431; not to be made a stalking-horse to policy, 462, 659; pretended, mischief intended, 483; non-proficiency in, condemned, 547; neutrality in, reproved, 589; great danger of not standing fast in the profession of, 639.

REJOICING to be with trembling, 164; no true cause of, in this world, 295.

REPENTANCE, true, what it is, 30; time of, not to be deferred, 36; the great folly of being too late in, 18, 71; to be universal, 96, 160; to extend over the whole life, 100; when seasonable, is safe, 128; fruits of, to be outward as well as inward, 152; will not admit of any sin, 167; not to be put off till old age, 337; timely, will appease the wrath of God, 339; how it is that faith is the first act of, 341; the grammar school of obedience and, 353; Satan's policy in keeping us off from timely, 387; the great work of, not to be deferred, 407; not to be put off till old age, 479, 539; and faith to be daily renewed and increased, 542; every man in himself to find out the impediments of, 545; to be universal, 614; a motive to persuade us to, 623.

REPENTANT sinners, God's readiness to pardon, 325; tears, the benefit of, 438; sinners, God's mercy to, 604.

REPROACH, how to bear, 438; and because God is concerned therein, 439; and suffering for the name of Christ a mark of salvation, 441; and made honourable by God, 443.

REPROOF of sin, partiality in, condemned, 266; of sin to be vigorous and active, 532.

REPROOFS of a wise man not to be slighted, 512.

REPROVED, self-seekers, 371; men to be willing to have their sins, 385; spiritual sloth in the ways of God, 393; being more careful for the body than the soul, 393; for the neglect of the soul, 516; careless hearers of God's Word, 559; ignorant reformers in Church or state to be, 566; excess in drinking, 566; inconstancy in the ways of God, 569; multiplicity of law-suits, 573; the want of hospitality, 573; affectation of novelty in religion, 577; neutrality in religion, 589; wanton hearers of the Word, 603; worldly professors of the Gospel, 634.

REPROVES, what one, in another he should be clear of himself, 440.

REPUTATION, Love, and Death, fable of, 143.

REQUISITES needful to a proper hearer of God's Word, 300.

RESOLUTION requisite in God's cause, 236; excellency of, in the cause of God, 374.

RESTITUTION, the necessity thereof, 292; neglect of, condemned, 469.

RESURRECTION of the body, God's infinite power will be seen in, 15; the, of the body proved by natural demonstration, 154; the, of God's poor despised people, 312; of the just asserted, 401; of the dead asserted, 504.

RETAINING, the, of one sin spoils much good in the soul, 155.

RETURNING to God, the difficulty of, having long strayed from Him, 191.

- REUBENITES renounced their interest in the Land of Promise, 12.
- REVELATIONS, imposture of pretended, 467.
- REVENGE, growth of, 84; not to be hasty in the matter of, 533.
- REVERENCE to be used in the service of God, 26; to be used in the worship of God, 457.
- REWARD and punishment of the liar, 435; faithful and seeming servants of God differentiated by way of, 452; charity attended by the certainty of, 517; certainty of the good man's 570; fullness of, reserved till after this life, 604.
- RICH men would rather part with God than their gold, 42; their vanity, 131; poor men, 172; man, the unprofitable, 247; men to consider their beginnings, and be thankful, 333; men to be mindful of what they have received at God's hand, 448; how to be truly, 454; better to be honestly than hastily, 486; men pleading poverty condemned, 519.
- RICHES avail not in day of wrath, 4; transitory, 6; cannot follow us out of the world, 7; deceitfulness of, 16; have wings, 31; without content, yield no comfort, 57; often prove pernicious to the owners, 58; without grace, yield no comfort, 92; are snares, 93; to be trusted to God, 100; vanity of heaping up, 104, 105; readiest way to be obtained to trust God for, 134; dangerous when not well used, 137; ill-gotten, never prosper, 144, 304; how to use, 199; how to become true possessors of, 355; a blessed thing to have, with a heart to use them aright, 373; danger of, not being well used, 395; the danger attending, 487; danger in getting of, 550; vanity of, 556; the different uses to be made of, 557; dangerous is the love of, 557; how to be used, 576; the uncertain comfort in, 586; their uselessness in point of calamity, 628; dangerous use of, 633; of Christ inexhaustible, 634.
- RIGHTEOUS, the, many troubles of, 70.
- RIGHTOUSNESS, pleasures of, not discerned by unrighteous men, 384; the necessity of being found with Christ's, 463.
- RIOT and excess condemned, 293.
- RHETORIC, the, of God in delivery of His Law, 139; of Holy Scripture, 167.
- ROBBERY in king's highway, ancient law concerning time of, 5.
- ROBE of justice, the excellency thereof, 40, 41.
- ROMANISTS, the error of, in antiquity of ceremonies, 157.
- ROMANS, ancient, custom of, 26; conduct of, to Grecians at time of Isthmian games, 35; method adopted by, to try issue with the Albans, 99.
- RUIN, the sudden, of secure worldlings, 262.
- RULE, the golden, to do as we would be done by, 170.
- RULERS and governors supporters of a commonwealth, 31; their actions to be exemplary, 34; their sins hasten the ruin of states, 40.
- S.
- SABBATIUS and Martianus, 22.
- SACRAMENT, the, how to benefit by, 158; not to be received with worldly thoughts, 178.
- SACRAMENTAL bread and wine better than ordinary, 110 how differentiated from others, 271.
- SACRIFICE, the, of ourselves, acceptable to God, 161.
- SACRILEGE, great danger of, 54, 55; never thrives, 64; cursed with a curse, 65; condemned by the example of Cyrus, 74; justly punished, 311; the heavy judgment of God on, 431; sin of, condemned, 574.
- SACRILEGIOUS persons condemned, 652.
- SAFETY, particular, in midst of general dangers impossible, 178; not to be expected in the midst of public danger, 481.
- SAINT, a singular, a precious saint, 15.
- SAINTS in glory, what they hear and see, 196; invocation of, condemned, 541; the infirmities of, 606.
- SALADIN'S command when dying, 35.
- SALISBURY, Earl of, his advice to his son on choice of a wife, 19.
- SALVATION, the joy of, gives content, 86; of the Lord, 179; assurance of, 350; except by the mercies of God through Jesus Christ, there were no, 417; reproaches and sufferings for the name of Christ, marks of, 441.
- SANCTIFICATION the proof of election, 80; not perfected at once, 99, 100; difference between, and justification, 100; not wrought at once, and why, 150, 188; evidence of adoption, 162.
- SATAN, evil suggestions of, during prayer, 2; Christ's victory over, 25; tries to hinder the hearing of the Word, 36; suits himself to all humours, 51; restless in temptation, 52; tempts by degrees, 72; subdued by Christ's death, and how, 132; his policy to ensnare us by the observance of our natures, 187; subtlety of, in his temptations, 373; discovered by Scripture, 387; his policy in keeping us off from timely repentance, 387; in not taking the right notion of sin, men are deluded by, 390; allowed the first crop, will sow with acorns, 497; subtlety of, 620; friendship between a sinner and, 621; aims at those that have most of God and religion, 631.
- SAUL, length of time he reigned, 16.
- SCANDERBEG, the sword of, 226.
- SCHISM, deplorable condition of ringleaders of, 386.
- SCHOLARS, young, to mind their books, 42; to be thankful to their universities, 82.
- SCHOOL-DIVINITY, the study of, not altogether necessary, 245.
- SCIOPI and the two soldiers, 135.
- SCOLOPENDRA, the, its alleged habits, 97.
- SCOTS, deadly feud of, referred to, 76.
- SCRIPTURE abused by schismatics, 63; excellency of, described, 74; special places of, marked by special Divine authority, 108; harmony of, 121; excellent connection of, with God, 144; not to be jested with, 151; the New Testament, an exposition of the Old, 151; how to read, 167; rhetoric of, 167; varieties of, 225; a dead letter without the Spirit, 226; the only true comfort, 268; phrases of, their excellency, 282; great usefulness of, 285; knowledge of, and practice to go together, 286; not to be played with, 303; the, to be made the rule of all our actions, 370; consequence of not rightly searching the, 380; by the, we discover Satan and sin, 387; the Holy, to be valued above all other writings, 429; only the, to be rested upon, 500; to be preserved above all books, 524; bless God for the revelation of Himself in the, 525; men and women to be knowing in the, 590; praiseworthiness of reading and inquiring into the, 635.

SECRETS of God's counsels not to be pryed into, 29.

SECURITY, personal, not possible in times of public danger, 9; in time of danger, condemned, 106, 122; carnal, reprov'd, 253; the cause of all calamity, 557.

SECTARIAN party, the, abuse Christian liberty, 28; schismatical seducers to be avoided, 612; the subtlety of, a diabolical delusion, 614.

SECTARIES and Papists seduce their followers, 316.

SEDUCERS, danger of their doctrine, 230.

SEEMING religion, not saving, 64.

SELF-CONCEITED men blameworthy, 135; condemned as dangerous, 157, 187.

SELF-CONFIDENCE, the danger of, 278.

SELF-EXAMINATION required, 56, 57; benefit of, 213; comfort of, 296.

SELFISHNESS condemned, 35.

SELF-PRAISES condemned, 37.

SELF-SAFETY, how far it may be consulted, 531.

SELF-DENIAL, the excellency of, 618.

SELF-TRIALS smooth the way to all other trials, 118.

SENECA to Demetrius, 19; to the courtier who had lost his son, 58; remarkable memory of, 65; tells how Egyptian husbandmen neglected to look up to heaven, 74.

SEPTUAGINT, the, by whom and how executed, 114.

SEIUS, the horse of, story concerning, 153.

SERMON, not done till practised, 257.

SERMONS, repetition of, warrantable, 87; preached and printed, difference between, 116; may be the means of conversion many years after having been preached, 120; when good, not to be questioned, but practised, 190; danger of sleeping out, 540; difference between preached and written, 622.

SERPENT, strange kind of, described by the Greeks, 73.

SERVICE of God, reverence to be used in the, 26; must be personal, 575; God hardly accepting of late, 658; and why it is seldom accepted, 658.

SEVEN sacraments, the, of the Papists, not of Divine institution, 28.

SEVERUS, Alexander, his command on seeing Christians contend, 46.

SHEBA, Queen of, her visit to Solomon, 20.

SHEPHERD, the, and gentleman, story of, 68.

SHE-WOLF, alleged defect in procreation, 55.

SICILY, fragrance of flowers in, 92.

SICKNESS immediately inflicted by God, 496.

SIGHT, spiritual, how to recover, 86.

SILENCE commendable, 331; in the cause of God's honour, condemned, 468; when and how commendable, 649.

SILENT coming, the, of God's Spirit into the heart, 221.

SIMILITUDE of the hypostatical union in Christ, 332.

SIMONIDES on the mystery of the Divine existence, 101.

SIMONIST, the, discovered, 610.

SIMPLICITY, 657.

SIN, mortification of, 2, 133; the growth of, to be prevented, 11; the prevention of, 42; the least, to be checked, 49; trampleth on Christ, 53; sense of, the entrance to a state of grace, 59, 60; to be renounced as the cause of Christ's death, 62; weight of, to be seriously poised, 81; when rooted in the heart, hard to be plucked up, 82; remembrance of past, the way to prevent in future, 88; regarding sinners, their prayers not heard, 91; relapses into, dangerous, 94; custom in, makes men content, 95; overthrows all, 153; opportunities of, to be avoided, 165; attends the best religious performances, 177; never goes alone, 180; not to be in love with, 205; one, spoileth much grace, 209; when come to a height, followed by destruction, 211; sense of, from God only, 227; no man able to free himself from, 244; danger of slighting the least, 260; partiality in reproof of, condemned, 266; not consented to excusable, 274; custom of, no excuse for, 279; relapses into, to beware of, 282; destructive in its nature, 290; defiles the soul, 291; pollution of, purged by repentant tears, 296; falling of others into, should affect us, 297; great danger of any unrepented, 299; all, to be repented of, and the reason why, 315; how it is that every man hath one darling, 326; distemper of, not easily cured, 331; custom in, causeth hardness in, 348; the more a man is troubled for, now, the less he shall be troubled hereafter, 348; full sight of all, got by singling out of one beloved, 349; committed with deliberation, greatly provokes the Spirit of God, 351; to take heed of small, bringing on great, 352; love of Christ in dying for our, 358; men covering their, reprov'd, 358; excellency of godly sorrow for, 359; hard to be drawn from custom in, 363; great danger of little sins, 364; beware of masked, 364; of bribery condemned, 369; hard to part with a beloved, 372; consideration of God's omnipresence a dissuasive from, 377; fear of hell a restraint from, 378; pleasures of, commits in hell, 382; reprov'd, 385; when it is that a man is said to thoroughly forsake his, 386; must be removed, or there can be no comfortable return to prayer, 405; of a dangerous spreading nature, 409; not to be at peace with, 410; how it is that one man may be said to be punished for another man's, 412; every man to confess that his own is the cause of punishment, 414; God's omnipresence, the consideration of it to be a restraint from, 428; the sight of, whensoever, wheresoever, or by whomsoever committed, to be avoided, 430; new inventions of, condemned, 444; the great danger of living in any one known, 447; unrepented of, heavy upon the soul at the time of death, 448; consideration of our secret, a motive to compassionate others, 449; the cause of all sorrow, 455; best of men not free from, 461; hard to break off custom in, 470; not to consent unto, 471; law said to be the strength of, 481; slavery of, to be avoided, 489; of the meanest man in a nation may be the destruction of it, 498; the extreme folly of, 499; may be excused in this world, but not in the next, 503; what makes godly sorrow for, 508; sadness of, insensibility to, 510; careful in the reproof of, 517; avoid the occasion of, 519; is the destruction of any people or nation, 520; to be looked on as it is, fierce and cruel, 523; and the sinner very hard to part, 524; ministers to be active in the reproof of, 532; some one sinful quality predominant more than other in the heart of man, 535; the remainders thereof even in God's children, 536;

- beware how we come into the debt of, 544; sorrow for, must be in particulars, 546; sorrow for, must be proportionate, 547; of other men, the good man's sorrow, 567; in its original, easy to be found, 568; of sacrifice condemned, 574; resist the least, 578; minding of the day of judgment, an excellent means to prevent, 580; the strange nature of, 581; great danger of the least, 582; the heart of man the seed-plot of all, 582; must be hated, 583; God not the Author of, 584; the danger and disgrace of lying under one eminent, 585; the sinfulness of, 586; beware of all, but especially of any beloved, 587; how to deal with, 587; the chief cause of a nation or city's ruin, 592; wherein consists the poisonous nature of, 592; the cause of, 593; the slavery of, 608; lethargy of, 613; custom in, 613; the cause of all sorrow, 618; the godly man's hatred of, 624; of ingratitude, 626; to be abhorred, as the cause of Christ's death, 631; a lesser, given way to, makes way for the committing of greater, 631; the woeful gradation of, 641; the danger of admitting the least, 641; men by nature hardly brought to a confession of, 643.
- SINNER, obstinate, deserves eternity of punishment, 13; every impenitent is his own tormentor, 53; graceless, will continue, a, 97; mortality of his life to be deplored, 132; how discharged from the devil's charge, 137; cares more for his body than his soul, 178; his memento, 210; his security, what it is like, 221; his stupidity when incorrigible, 267; wilful blindness of a, condemned, 284; conversion of a, painfully wrought, 285; wrought by degrees, 305; matter of great rejoicing, 312; confession of one to another may convert both, 344; encouragement for the repentant, 347; desperate madness of the, 446; the secure, careless, 498; and sin very hardly parted, 524; how the sins may be said to outlive the, 571; the devil's hard dealing with the ensnared, 579; the wounded, how he is to be cured, 580; the comfortable sight of Christ crucified to the repentant, 617; desperate madness of the, 621; sad condition of the fearless, 655.
- SINNERS, impenitent, the sad condition of, 327; ministers to be careful in reproving, 517; crucifying the Lord of life daily, 525; God's mercy to repentant, 604.
- SINS of rulers hasten on the ruin of states, 40; little, if not prevented, bring greater ruin on the soul, 59; of men regenerate and unregenerate, difference between, 63; little, the great danger of, 223; great, attended by great judgments, 288.
- SLANDER of a brother, danger thereof, 141.
- SLANDERERS, discovered, 288.
- SLEEPING during sermons, the danger of, 540.
- SLIGHTING Christ, when offering mercies, deplorable, 39.
- SLOTH in the ways of God reproved, 393.
- SLOTHFUL contractedness, the, of our prayers to God reproved, 191.
- SLOTHFULNESS in religion, forerunner of evil, 333.
- SOCIETY, composed of three sorts of men, 336.
- SOCRATES and Plato at a banquet, 49; Socrates and Æschines, 161.
- SOLDIER, the mere, an enemy to peace, 113; the truly noble, 335; Terentius, a Christian, 428; the calling of the is honourable, 505; the true valour of, 532; the Gospel and the sword, a choice of the, 649.
- SOLDIERS preaching, 82.
- SON, an ungracious, not worthy to be his father's heir, 42.
- SOOTHSAYERS of Rome, upon earthquakes and other signs, 18.
- SOLOMON, judgment of, 9.
- SORROW, true, for the most part silent, 295; the sick man's, 356; excellency of godly, for sin, 359; sin the cause of all, 455; sense of future joy sweeteneth present, 477; godly, for sin, 508; least proportion of godly, for sin accepted, 509; for sin must be in particulars, 546; and proportionable, 547; other men's sin the good man's, 567; sin the cause of all, 618.
- SORROWS, the, of this life, not comparable to the joys of another life, 169.
- SOUL, the, compared to a city besieged, 2; the devout, will have none but Christ, illustrated, 10; the, being safe all is safe, 44, 45; the, comfortable union with Christ, 46; the, lives in Christ only, and how, 47; and body, the loss of both, a sad thing, 116; the winning of one, acceptable to God, 159; and body, happy meeting of, in the resurrection, 183; delight of the, once set upon God, hardly to be removed, 190; the, breathing after Christ in time of trouble, 193; the devout, Christ the only object of, 276; care for the safety of, 346; action the life of the, 347; men reproved for living as if they had not a, to save, 365; and body both punished, 373; for being more careful for the body than the, reproved 393; the captivated, is restless till it be in Christ Jesus, 409; comfortable enjoyment of Christ by the, 412; restlessness of the, till united unto Christ, 413; nothing but eternity will satisfy the gracious, 431; the precious, to be careful of, 450; of man precious in the sight of God, 453; excellency of the, 492; the polluted, the object of God's hatred, 493; the high price of the, 493; the folly of parting with the, for trifles, 494; the loss of, irrecoverable, 495; the, not to be starved for the want of means, 496; the safety and danger of the, 496; the keeping of our, 504; neglect of the, reproved, 516; to be more careful for the body than the, reprovable, 539; be more careful of the, than the body, 543; death of the, 593; difference between the faithful, and an unbeliever, 617; neglect of the, condemned, 647; welfare of the, to be preferred before worldly enjoyments, 649.
- SOULS, men to set a high value upon their, 553; men by nature looking more after their bodies than their, 559; men to be active in regaining their lost, 592; the minister's joy in the conversion of, 623.
- SPIDER, the, its manner of weaving its web, 104, 105.
- SPIRIT, the Holy, how quenched, 19; the Holy, necessary to the efficiency of the Scriptures, 226.
- SPIRITUAL blindness, the devil's aim, 13; carnal men and, their difference in doing good, 119; corporal blindness and, 408.
- SPOILERS, the, of Church and state condemned, 215.
- SPYRIDON, bishop of Cyprus, and Triphillius, anecdote of, 286.
- STAGE-PLAYS, the danger of, 204; lawfulness of, questioned, 277.

STATE, innovations are very dangerous to the Church or, 436; divisions in, to be prevented, 546; the, politician's religion, 600; the, politician siding with all parties, 601; of nature, an absolute state of impotency, 621; same, a state of friendship with hell, 621.

STAUPITIUS, ostentatious display of memory by, 67.

STORAX, its alleged qualities, 88.

STORY, Doctor, his cruelty and punishment, 308.

STRANGE sins, strange punishments, 190.

STRIVE not beyond thy strength, 551.

SUFFERINGS for the name of Christ marks of salvation, 441; of Christ so many examples to teach us to suffer, 658.

SUN, shining of the, its various effects, 123; and Wind, fable of the, 124; illustrates the spread of the Gospel, 199.

SUNDAY, excellency of, above other days, 527; to be strict in holy observance of the, 528.

SYLVESTER, Pope, place and time of his death, 15.

SYMPHORIANUS, the martyr, how animated at death, 109.

SWEARING, the commonness of the sin of, 128.

SWELLING, big words of wicked men not to be regarded, 281.

SWORD of war impartial, 443; the soldier, or the Gospel and the, 649.

T.

TALK, a man full of, full of vanity, 239.

TALKERS, not doers of religion, condemned, 103, 104.

TEACHERS, false, dangerous to be seduced by, 68; beware of erroneous, 411; more, than learners, 421.

TEARS, repentant, the prevalency of, 175; repentant, purging nature of, 296; the great benefit of repentant, 438.

TEMPERANCE cannot preserve life when God calls for it, 178.

TEMPERATE in meat and drink, 422.

TEMPLE of Solomon built without noise, 77.

TEMPORAL things, the vanity of, compared with those eternal, 432; victories and successes, the uncertainty of, 479.

TEMPORISER, the, described, 98.

TEMPORISERS, the condition of, 26.

TEMPTATION, the idle man subject to, 8; the, of a soldier and his choice, 649.

TEMPTATIONS led to by idleness, 346; no man free from, 369; subtlety of Satan in his, 373; from within or without, how to be dealt with, 653.

TERTULLIAN on the command given in Paradise, 113.

THANKFUL Christians, true Christians, 22.

THANKFULNESS, Christian, the true cause of, 280.

THANKFUL, how to be, unto God, 440.

THANKSGIVING to be made unto God for all benefits, 540.

THEMISTOCLES selling his farm, 6; his demand on the men of Andros, 39; his visit to the Olympic games, 40; on forgetfulness of injuries, 90; how he appeased king Admetus, 104; and king Philip, 222; on the ingratitude of the Athenians, 230.

THEODORUS, Vitus, and Melancthon, 59.

THEODOSIUS, his care of the Church, 34.

THINGS of this world a stop in the way to heaven, 12; worldly, dispensed by God in wisdom, 94; of this world, in the getting of, God's way the best, 130; how to use them, 140; the event of, to accept with patience, 252; worldly, cannot help us, 270; their sudden downfall, 271.

THOUGHTS, worldly, to be set aside before receiving the sacrament, 178; how the devil is said to know our, 452.

THRASYBULUS, how he reconciled the Athenians, 24.

TIGERS, how said to be affected by drums and tabors, 77.

TIGRANES' wife, her admiration of her husband, 10.

TIME, God's, the best for deliverance, 5; to be well used, 19; shortness of, will not admit of long discourse, 43; to be well spent, 126; often ill spent, 134; not to use the present, dangerous, 140; to be well husbanded, 168; servers, the multitudes of, 206; present, to be well husbanded, 216; to be taken while time serves, 248; least moment of, cannot be assured, 254; present occasion of, to be made use of, 356; present, to be husbanded, 366; when mispent, to be carefully redeemed, 430; must not be misspent, 572; redemption of, 645.

TIMES, the, how a prudent man may lawfully comply with, 334.

TOADS and snakes, strange ancient custom concerning, 4.

TONGUE, government of, required, 23, 24; an ill, never speaks well of any one, 59; prayer, not the only prayer, 68; commendable, 153; the, is the heart's interpreter, 211; the heart's interpreter, 369; for the most part, a mischievous member, 433; be careful how we come under the evil of a reviling, 437.

TONGUES, the study of, to be encouraged, 104; nimble to evil reprov'd, 109.

TOXARIS and Anacharsis meeting in Athens, 54.

TRADE, every man to follow his own, 89.

TRADES and occupations, wisdom of our forefathers in, 308.

TRADESMEN, preaching, 82.

TRAVEL into foreign parts, when loose, the danger of, 163.

TRAVELLERS, misery of, in Syrian deserts, 76.

TREACHERY, the just reward of, 305.

TREES said to grow in the Red Sea, account of, 83.

TRIBE, reasons why one (Dan), is not mentioned in Rev. vii., 345.

TRIBULATION, the way to heaven, 303.

TRINITY, the Blessed, co-operate in a righteous man's prayer, 32; mystery of, inconceivable, 289; mystery of, shadowed out in familiar resemblances, 454.

TROUBLE, men not to run into, 250; not to be allayed by wrong means, 343; let not afflictions, you, for God intends good by them, 354; men to be prepared for crosses, afflictions, and, 402; Christians having an eye upon the heavenly reward not to be daunted by any outward, 453; how the heart of man may be kept up in times of, 537; keep close to the Word of God in times of, 537; times of, reveal the true and false professors, 549; God's all-sufficiency in time of, 657.

TROUBLES, how to get out of, 83; easy to get into, hard to get out of, 210.

TRUE motion towards God, what it implies, 17; brotherly love scarce to be found, 597; obedience, 601; improvement of peace, 601; Christian's confidence and contempt of death, 602; grace in the soul may be seemingly but not really at a loss, 647.

TRUTH, every man should speak it to his neighbour, 12; seeks no corner, 146; the castle of, its siege and defence, 217; beloved in the general, but not in the particular, 247; the telling, begets hatred, 249; men of all sorts to stand up for, 250; God's, committed to His ministers, 336; God fetching testimonies of, out of the mouths of adversaries, 488; commended, falsehood condemned, 574; of religion lost, as it were, in the crowd of many religions, 635; doth not always appear, and how it is, 655.

TULLY, his habit of self-praise, 37; charge against sluggards, 66; story of Nolans and Neapolitans, 98.

TURBULENT spirits, the great danger of, 84.

TYRANTS not long lived, and how, 2, 10; the policy of, in doing many good things for the public, 237; raising themselves by a seeming compliance with the people, 601.

U.

ULYSSES and Circe, story of, 95, 96.

UNANIMITY, the excellency thereof, 397.

UNCERTAINTY, the, of prudence and worldly policy, 160.

UNDER-AGENTS to be considered in matters of justice, 314.

UNDERSTANDING, not to be children in, 172.

UNHAPPINESS of a disordered family, 637.

UNHAPPY prosperity, happy adversity, 413.

UNION, hypostatical, in Christ, shadowed out by way of similitude, 332.

UNITY and religion the only supporters of Church and state, 17; love, and peace, best supporters of kingdoms, 371.

UNIVERSAL obedience unto God enjoined, 539.

UNIVERSITY learning to be countenanced by men in authority, 224.

UNPROFITABLE hearers of the Word described, 79.

UNREGENERATE man, the, a careless man, 141.

UNREPENTED sin heavy upon the soul at the time of death, 448.

UNTHANKFULNESS to God for grace received the way to become graceless, 88.

USTHAZANES, a Persian nobleman, how he became a martyr, 234.

USURER, the griping, and his broker characterised, 329; and the devil compared, 566; the biting, described, 587.

USURY, sad condition of borrowing upon, 583.

UXORIOUSNESS reprov'd, 292.

V.

VAIN glory, a remedy against, 314; swearing, God's goodness to us to be a motive from, 443.

VALENS, the emperor, and the monk, story of, 153.

VANITY, listening after, reprov'd, 180; of man, in proposing to himself long life, 333; of honour and greatness, 365; men reprov'd for seeking after, 388; of pride, 420; words, if not attended with deeds, are, 427; of temporal things compared with those of eternal, 432; of gay apparel, 439; of using many words, 510; of worldly things easily discerned, 518; of pride, 552; of riches, honours, and preferments, 556; of man in seeking after great things condemned, 583; of an unguided multitude, 590; of the creature without God, 624; men not easily brought to believe the world's, 646; of all worldly greatness, 649.

VIRGINITY, the convenience of, 148.

VIRGINS, the ancient Vestal, how they lighted the altar fire, 117.

VOWS and promises made in the time of extremity, 482; non-performance of, condemned, 599.

W.

WAIT patiently on God's will and pleasure, 529.

WANT of faith, the complaint of, an argument of true faith, 37, 38.

WANTON hearers of the Word reprov'd, 603.

WAR, direful effects of, 85; the event of, uncertain, 173; the sword of, impartial, 443; rage of, in the richest country, 629.

WARNED by the miseries of others, 337.

WASPS and BEES, different habits of, 8.

WATCHFUL in performance of holy duties, 421; God is, over His people for their good, 487.

WATCHFULNESS, Christian, enjoined, 518.

WATER, baptismal, the power and virtue thereof, 193.

WATERFORD city, motto of, 20.

WAVERING-MINDEDNESS, how to prevent, 186.

WAY, God's, the only safe, 5; to greatness full of danger, 11; to God a cross way with the world, 105.

WEAK ones, how to be catechised, 139.

WELL-PRINCIPLED in religion, the importance of being, 254.

WHITGIFT, Archbishop, how he prepared for the pulpit, 123; his works and charities, 124.

WICKED, the, no peace with, 33; men, their prosperity destructive, 33, 103, 222; laughter of, but from the teeth outward, 55; prosperity of, a stumbling-block to the godly, 168; worker hates light, 179; the, instrumental for the good of God's children, 207; men, slanders of, not to be regarded, 243; terrified by the judgment day, 261; men, how said to hasten death, 263; men, swelling, big words of, not to be regarded, 281; prosperity of the, unhappy, 302; uncertain, 303; prosperity of, not to trouble us, 347; not to be envied, 421; persons may be in a godly family, 453; cruelty of the, 513; not to be disquieted at the prosperity of the, 520; men not God's children, 548; children, a great grief to their parents, 563; thoughts to be washed off the heart, 603; thoughts, danger of cherishing, 613; men see the miseries, not the joys of God's people, 614.

WIFE, to be careful in choice of a, 19; to be subordinate to her husband, 136; every man to think best of his own, 420; should be a house-wife, 425; choice of, not to be repented after marriage, 517; not to be allowed in competition with God's commandments, 588; a wife and no, 591.

WILFULNESS and ignorance ill met, 627.

WILLIAM I. and the bishop, 144.

WILLIGIS and Agathocles, their humility, 56.

WILL, the way to have our, to be subject to God's will, 68; accepted for deed, 85, 86; our, to be regulated by God's, 341.

WILLET, Dr. Andrew, his extraordinary attainments, 42; Mr. Thomas, generous conduct of, noted, 70.

WINE and BREAD, sacramental, how differenced from others, 271.

WINGS, the, of riches, 31.

WISDOM of God, submission to, in outward things, 92; the, of the world proves folly, 170; how to be regulated, 577; discretion a main part of true, 632.

WISE and foolish men compared to the body and soul, 373; men dying as well as fools, 469.

WIT, how to make a right use thereof, 565.

WIVES to love their husbands cordially, 470; to be subject to their husbands, 471; not to be allowed in competition with God, 588; to be beloved of their husbands, 589.

WOLSEY, Cardinal, punishment of his sacrilege, 311.

WOMAN, the old, dying, and the friar's cowl, 40; the captive, 565.

WOMEN and men not to change apparel, 294; four only mentioned in the genealogy of Christ, 347; reformers intolerable, 505; painting themselves condemned, 589.

WORD, the, not to be careless hearers of, 22; of God, the, Satan endeavours to hinder the hearing of, 36; and Sacraments, the, how to receive benefits from, 156; preaching of, the powerful effects, 159, 185; great danger of not listening to, 160; power of, 165; hearing and not meditating on, dangerous, 194; safety in attending to the ministry of, 211; partial hearers of, reproved, 245; how to behave in hearing of, 253; negligent hearing of, condemned, 275; ministers to be constant in preaching, 279; requisites needful to a proper hearer of, 300; true comfort in, only, 324; the, Christ properly and significantly so-called, 325; learn to depend upon God's, 401; men to hear the, of God though they come with prejudiced thoughts, 407; captious hearers of the, condemned, 452; attention commanded and commended in hearing God's, 460; blessedness of the poor in spirit in hearing God's, 475; negligent hearing of God's, condemned, 476; to be diligent hearers of God's, 478; good and bad hearers of the, 496; wanton hearers of the, reproved, 603; danger of not keeping close to God's, 609; benefit of hearing God's 619; of God, keep close to, in seeking Christ, 625.

WORDS are vanity if not attended with deeds, 417; the vanity of using many, 510; men of few and men of many, 511.

WORK of repentance not to be deferred, 407.

WORKS of God in creation beyond admiration, 56; good, not the cause of, but the way to happiness, 82, 83; accompany justifying faith, 103.

WORLD, the, like a fisherman's net, 23; hard censure of the, on the godly, 134; opposition of the, no obstacle to a child of God, 171; the love of the, enmity to God, 228; this, no true cause of rejoicing in, 295; to be condemned in regard of heaven, 297; how it is the frame of, shall not be consumed at Christ's second coming, 337; the occurrences of, should be spiritualised, 342; things of this, vain and uncertain, 356; mind eternity amidst the enjoyments of the, 433; uncertainty of the, 451; deceitfulness and treachery of the, 468; things of the, not to be so highly prized, 485; how rightly to use the, 490; no true joy found in the things of the, 507; not to be trusted unto, 532; God alone more powerful than all the enemies of the, 548; no true content to be found in the things of this, 551; Christ voluntarily engaging Himself to take away the sins of the, 555; how the devil makes use of the, 578.

WORLDLING'S religion a cheap religion, 45; secure, the, sudden ruin, 262; woe of, and the just man's joy, at the time of death, 506.

WORLDLY-minded man, the, speaketh only of worldly things, 73; men look after worldly things, 114; mindedness, the danger of, 162; sorrow, the best improvement of, 192; minded man, the, not public-spirited, 216; men easily taken off from the service of God, 217; not heavenly minded, 224; sad condition of, at time of death, 314; sorrow and trouble, 354; crosses turned into blessings, 354; comforts are transitory, 355; difference between a, and spiritual man, 360; desires of worldly-minded men, 364; delights without Christ are emptiness, 383; enjoyments, 433; policy not to be prejudicial to the honour of God, 459; nor to the truth of a good conscience, 460; nor to commutative justice, 461; the wicked man's folly in his, choice, 470; purchasers, 484; honours and preferments, the inconstancy of them, 487; things, the uncertainty of, 518; vanity of same easily discerned, 518; moderate use in things, 545; honours, vanity of, to be considered, 558; minded man, the heart of, never satisfied, 558; professors of the Gospel reproved, 634; men little think of heaven, 644; enjoyments, the welfare of the soul to be preferred before, 649.

WORSHIP, public, not to be entered upon without due preparation, 315; of God to be done decently and orderly, 339; men hard to be drawn out of old customs and forms in, 342; reverence to be used in, 457.

WOTTON, village of, how situated, 134.

WRATH of God best appeased by Christ, 104.

WRITINGS, the Holy Scripture to be valued above all other, 429.

Y.

YOUNG raw ministers to be reproved, 502.

YOUTH, the folly of, discovered and reproved, 193; time of, should be given up to God, 254; catechising of an excellent way to instruct, 415; to be seasoned with grace, not giving the least way to the devil, 497.

Z.

ZEAL and knowledge must go hand in hand together, 16; in God's service, the world's derision, 54; anapoptistical, condemned, 186; preposterous, reprov'd, 203; the want of, in the cause of God, reprov'd, 255; danger of immoderate, 357; of heathens compared to that of Christians, 405.

ZEALOUS in preaching, 537.

ZENO the Emperor, his choice of a Chastity, 82.

ZEUXIS, the famous painter, how he worked, 118.

INDEX OF TEXTS

ILLUSTRATED, QUOTED, OR REFERRED TO IN THIS WORK.

GENESIS.			GENESIS—continued.			EXODUS—continued.			NUMBERS.
chap.	ver.	page	chap.	ver.	page	chap.	ver.	page	chap.	ver.	page
i	9	490	xxiv	—	341	ii	12	167	iii	8	457
i	26	493	xxiv	17	473	ii	15	458	iv	—	518
i	27	458	xxiv	58	434	ii	16	473	vi	3	194
ii	23	72	xxv	—	246	ii	17	503	vi	3, 4	519
iii	—	564	xxv	8	330	iii	5	138	vi	23	75
iii	7	358	xxv	21	291	iv	11	285	ix	22, 23	130
iii	7, 24	383	xxv	32	387	iv	25	36	x	25	402
iii	15	181	xxvi	5	486	v	2	447	xi	14	444
iii	16	319	xxvi	18	228	viii	8	138	xii	3	14
iii	16	487	xxvii	—	49	viii	19	488	xiii	—	6
iii	16	593	xxvii	27	41	viii	24	587	xiii	30	608
iii	19	278	xxvii	36	463	ix	26	21	xiv	44	130
iii	19	333	xxvii	46	464	x	16	507	xvi	3	502
iii	34	299	xxviii	12	93	x	22, 23	280	xvi	29	445
iv	—	290	xxviii	13	288	x	24, 26	315	xvi	32	210
iv	3	358	xxix	—	477	xi	11	177	xvii	10	261
iv	4	254	xxix	31	106	xii	2	261	xx	13	447
iv	4	287	xxx	15	180	xii	35	406	xxii	30	513
iv	17	343	xxxi	19	460	xiii	—	391	xxiii	10	448
vi	—	407	xxxi	40	503	xiii	2	254	xxiii	11	488
vi	1, 2	260	xxxii	10	190	xiv	2	487	xxiii	19	455
vi	2	85	xxxii	10	273	xv	1	368	xxiv	13	561
vi	14	384	xxxii	10	602	xv	11	196	xxv	15, 18	507
vi	16	19	xxxiii	13	139	xv	3	361	xxxii	—	12
vii	—	223	xxxiv	—	145	xv	23	303
vii	1	503	xxxiv	2	278	xvi	—	577	DEUTERONOMY.
viii	11	394	xxxv	18	354	xvi	—	657	i	17	138
x	11	529	xxxv	18	616	xvi	18	183	vi	7	312
xi	—	272	xxxvii	35	273	xvi	20	30	xiv	5	286
xi	2	382	xxxvii	37	401	xvi	20	366	xviii	15	285
xi	27	458	xxxviii	—	49	xvii	—	38	xxi	7	4
xii	19	406	xxxviii	18	347	xvii	—	116	xxi	10, 13	565
xiii	7	324	xxxviii	24	449	xix	—	139	xxii	5	294
xiii	7	382	xxxviii	26	261	xx	15	407	xxii	25	274
xiii	10	190	xl	10	198	xxi	15	451	xxiii	24	129
xiii	16	486	xli	14	138	xxv	21	500	xxvii	16	451
xiv	23	58	xli	16	290	xxvii	1	601	xxviii	—	97
xv	—	105	xli	49	435	xxviii	29	444	xxix	29	353
xv	—	291	xlii	7	390	xxviii	34	273	xxxii	29	167
xv	16	264	xlii	36	66	xxviii	36	151
xvii	1	15	xlii	36	416	xxx	13	543	JOSHUA.
xvii	1	657	xlii	36	268	xxx	23	549	i	5	595
xviii	—	83	xliii	10	177	xxxii	6	658	v	14	505
xviii	1	19	xliii	17	49	xxxii	17	516	v	17	305
xviii	19	521	xliv	2	176	xxxii	25	306	vi	20	538
xviii	27	133	xlv	3	540	xxxiv	6, 7	240	vi	26	219
xix	30	324	xlv	8	98	xxxiv	6	501	vii	21	41
xix	37	347	xlv	28	145	LEVITICUS.			vii	25	299
xxi	8	312	xlvii	—	312	vi	12	27	x	12	173
xxi	19	249	xlvii	12	451	xi	7	543	xv	16	68
xxi	19	615	xlvii	—	268	xiv	40	54	xxiv	15	637
xxii	1	167	xlvi	7	167	xxi	20	338	JUDGES.
xxii	2	261	xlvi	20	344	xxii	—	658	i	2	361
xxii	4, 5	178	xlvi	20	354	xxiv	11	127	i	15	102
xxii	5	148	xlvi	—	129	xxv	—	129	i	15	509
xxii	10	402	xlvi	9	486	xxvi	9	486	iv	19	117
xxii	12	14

JUDGES—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
v	8 ...	396
v	28 ...	521
vi	37 ...	497
vi	40 ...	280
vii	4 ...	475
vii	15 ...	248
vii	20 ...	584
viii	1, 3 ...	306
viii	2 ...	157
ix	45 ...	396
ix	49 ...	145
x	13 ...	504
xii	— ...	646
xiv	— ...	434
xiv	3 ...	464
xiv	7 ...	276
xvi	3 ...	298
xviii	3 ...	534
xviii	24 ...	405
xviii	24 ...	494
xviii	30 ...	345
xx	2 ...	640

RUTH.

i	16 ...	463
ii	15 ...	619
iv	2 ...	513

I SAMUEL.

i	8 ...	402
i	10 ...	291
ii	13 ...	502
ii	15 ...	453
ii	19 ...	520
ii	25 ...	103
iii	18 ...	290
iv	11 ...	264
iv	17 ...	412
vi	9 ...	288
viii	3 ...	331
ix	— ...	244
ix	20 ...	338
x	20, 21 ...	493
x	22 ...	208
xii	3 ...	331
xiii	— ...	278
xiii	19 ...	396
xiii	19 ...	406
xiv	4 ...	393
xiv	6 ...	657
xiv	43 ...	299
xv	1 ...	16
xv	32 ...	499
xv	32 ...	602
xv	35 ...	567
xvi	— ...	585
xvi	23 ...	279
xvii	33 ...	472
xvii	34 ...	503
xvii	34 ...	581
xvii	37 ...	248
xviii	1 ...	397
xix	20 ...	407
xxi	9 ...	15
xxi	9 ...	261
xxi	9 ...	640
xxi	13 ...	459
xxii	1 ...	426
xxii	3 ...	451
xxv	— ...	104
xxv	18-20 ...	339
xxv	32 ...	306
xxv	12 ...	644
xxviii	14 ...	564

2 SAMUEL.

i	21 ...	396
---	--------	-----

2 SAMUEL—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
ii	26 ...	26
ii	32 ...	273
iii	15 ...	544
v	3-7 ...	276
vii	— ...	182
vii	2 ...	506
ix	7 ...	443
xi	11 ...	417
xii	7 ...	266
xii	8 ...	125
xii	16 ...	354
xiii	4 ...	453
xiii	15 ...	588
xiii	18 ...	41
xiv	30 ...	148
xv	31 ...	606
xvi	— ...	406
xvi	11 ...	98
xvi	22 ...	657
xvi	23 ...	272
xviii	3 ...	630
xviii	5 ...	45
xviii	23 ...	64
xix	— ...	15
xix	30 ...	145
xxi	1 ...	288

I KINGS.

ii	12 ...	456
iii	— ...	49
iii	26 ...	10
iii	26 ...	310
iv	26 ...	434
vi	6, 7 ...	77
vii	— ...	116
viii	— ...	396
viii	39 ...	564
xii	— ...	180
xii	31 ...	29
xiii	24 ...	259
xiv	6 ...	269
xiv	6 ...	284
xv	5 ...	461
xvii	6 ...	276
xvii	6 ...	410
xvii	6 ...	411
xviii	43 ...	529
xviii	44, 45 ...	509
xix	4 ...	270
xix	5 ...	322
xix	8 ...	619
xix	17 ...	41
xix	20 ...	177
xxi	— ...	36
xxi	9-27 ...	358
xxii	— ...	57
xxii	27 ...	213

2 KINGS.

i	— ...	261
ii	24 ...	282
iv	13 ...	43
iv	20 ...	521
iv	34 ...	264
iv	40 ...	299
iv	40 ...	500
iv	40 ...	502
v	1 ...	585
v	3 ...	545
v	14 ...	438
v	26 ...	200
vi	— ...	563
vi	5 ...	596
vi	25 ...	82
vi	33 ...	398
vii	1 ...	608
vii	2 ...	131

2 KINGS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
ix	12 ...	15
ix	12 ...	493
ix	31 ...	554
xiii	15, 19 ...	322
xiii	21 ...	184
xx	11 ...	173
xxii	— ...	57
xxiii	25 ...	128
xxv	— ...	137
xxv	7 ...	487

I CHRONICLES.

xii	15 ...	190
xiv	11 ...	72
xxi	1, 8 ...	243
xxvi	30 ...	584
xxvii	9 ...	564
xxix	14 ...	333
xxix	24 ...	362

2 CHRONICLES.

iv	1 ...	601
ix	— ...	221
xiv	11 ...	657
xx	12 ...	607
xxv	9 ...	307
xxxii	26 ...	243
xxxiii	12 ...	547
xxxiii	13 ...	623
xxxv	15 ...	506
xxxvi	17 ...	444

EZRA.

iii	12 ...	612
-----	--------	-----

NEHEMIAH.

ix	17 ...	633
ix	25 ...	619
xiii	7 ...	167
xiii	16 ...	58

ESTHER.

i	3 ...	430
i	3 ...	465
i	20 ...	487
ii	4 ...	264
iv	14 ...	271
vi	— ...	319
vi	2 ...	215
vii	4 ...	405
vii	8 ...	377
viii	7 ...	174
viii	15 ...	276
ix	10 ...	486

JOB.

i	— ...	540
i	5 ...	460
i	9 ...	287
i	13 ...	511
i	14 ...	298
i	21 ...	7
i	21 ...	98
i	21 ...	258
i	21 ...	288
ii	7 ...	495
iv	14, 21 ...	224
iv	21 ...	469
v	23 ...	219
vi	— ...	389
vi	14 ...	598
vi	26 ...	514
vii	9 ...	651
viii	13, 14 ...	537
ix	9 ...	56
ix	30 ...	244
x	— ...	268

JOB—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
xii	21 ...	439
xiii	15 ...	398
xiii	15 ...	459
xiv	5 ...	264
xv	20 ...	466
xvii	14 ...	142
xix	9 ...	30
xix	25 ...	154
xix	25 ...	647
xx	15 ...	304
xxi	7 ...	520
xxi	10 ...	198
xxii	— ...	561
xxiii	16 ...	507
xxiv	12 ...	168
xxv	3 ...	505
xxvii	16 ...	304
xxvii	17 ...	71
xxviii	28 ...	360
xxix	— ...	40
xxx	1 ...	190
xxx	23 ...	423
xxx	29 ...	168
xxxii	24 ...	319
xxxii	29 ...	309
xxxiii	23 ...	286
xxxiv	11 ...	584
xxxviii	22 ...	355
xxxviii	31 ...	637
xxxix	13 ...	592
xxxix	14 ...	186
xxxix	16 ...	569
xli	1 ...	31
xli	2 ...	14
xlii	— ...	495
xlii	16 ...	486

PSALMS.

i	— ...	95
i	3 ...	326
i	3 ...	366
i	3 ...	384
ii	— ...	116
ii	2 ...	305
ii	4 ...	311
ii	7 ...	285
ii	12 ...	328
iii	8 ...	338
iv	2 ...	280
iv	6, 7 ...	240
iv	7 ...	85
iv	7 ...	385
iv	— ...	288
v	4 ...	584
v	12 ...	548
vi	5 ...	385
vi	8 ...	175
vii	12, 13 ...	127
vii	15 ...	164
vii	16 ...	409
viii	— ...	56
viii	6 ...	490
ix	17 ...	73
ix	17 ...	661
ix	18 ...	204
x	4 ...	280
xii	1 ...	596
xii	— ...	24
xii	1 ...	226
xii	5 ...	235
xiv	1 ...	304
xv	2 ...	143
xviii	— ...	585
xviii	25 ...	123
xix	1-7 ...	638
xix	5 ...	173
xix	5 ...	504

PSALMS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
xix	5	567
xix	7	20
xix	11	387
xix	12	61
xxi	3	550
xxii	4	459
xxii	6	31
xxii	12	548
xxii	16	193
xxiii	4	367
xxiv	—	338
xxiv	1	258
xxv	2	529
xxv	11	138
xxvi	—	369
xxvi	6	460
xxvi	8	258
xxvi	9	430
xxvii	4	249
xxvii	8	429
xxvii	13	125
xxvii	14	252
xxviii	1	162
xxix	1	197
xxx	5	545
xxx	6	91
xxxi	15	367
xxxi	—	24
xxxi	9	553
xxxi	3	540
xxxi	18	259
xxxi	10	276
xxxv	—	309
xxxvi	6	503
xxxvi	8	385
xxxvi	9	117
xxxvii	—	168
xxxvii	1, 2	348
xxxvii	1	528
xxxvii	35	103
xxxvii	35	302
xxxvii	37	596
xxxviii	—	387
xxxviii	13	319
xxxix	—	23
xxxix	1	366
xxxix	3	510
xxxix	4	264
xxxix	5	157
xxxix	5	602
xxxix	9	290
xxxix	10	400
xxxix	13	109
xl	—	378
xl	15	309
xlii	1	258
xliv	6	341
xlv	—	182
xlv	1	211
xlv	14	41
xlvi	4	595
xlvi	20	658
li	—	113
li	15	3
li	17	250
li	22	364
li	—	86
li	—	88
li	2	221
li	14	618
li	17	285
lii	2	437
lv	6	636
lv	23	10
lv	23	264
lvi	8	270
lvii	—	24

PSALMS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
lvii	4	640
lvii	7	367
lvii	7	492
lix	15	223
lxii	10	355
lxiii	1	253
lxiv	3	437
lxv	2	541
lxvi	16	441
lxvi	18	322
lxvi	18	405
lxviii	1	603
lxviii	13	263
lxviii	13	367
lxviii	13	394
lxviii	19	265
lxix	3	325
lxix	9	118
lxx	—	543
lxxii	—	192
lxxii	17	416
lxxiii	5	198
lxxiii	18	305
lxxiii	20	130
lxxiii	22	322
lxxiii	25	360
lxxvi	1	21
lxxvi	1	430
lxxvii	19	131
lxxviii	40	301
lxxviii	65	657
lxxix	—	54
lxxix	—	268
lxxix	10	595
lxxxiv	6	283
lxxxiv	6	429
lxxxiv	10	310
lxxxiv	10	316
lxxxv	5	325
lxxxvi	5	394
lxxxvi	8	55
lxxxvii	3	305
lxxxviii	—	379
lxxxviii	4	18
lxxxviii	5	606
lxxxviii	21	14
lxxxix	—	182
lxxxix	6	603
lxxxix	50	441
xc	11	328
xc	12	143
xc	15	650
xc	15	60
xc	11	164
xc	11	314
xc	5	520
xc	14	435
xc	14	619
xc	13-15	326
xc	3	441
xc	—	548
ci	—	63
ci	6, 7	474
ci	19	235
ci	26	337
civ	4	530
cvi	—	482
cvi	13	536
cvi	24	393
cvi	—	40
cvi	17	641
cvi	27	532
cvi	—	80
cvi	9	291
cvi	1	230
cvi	1	243
cvi	1	391

PSALMS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
cxv	3	173
cxvi	12	65
cxvii	—	430
cxviii	24	362
cxviii	24	366
cxviii	24	446
cxix	—	1
cxix	29	519
cxix	53	430
cxix	71	642
cxix	105	481
cxix	105	625
cxix	105	669
cxix	—	6
cxix	3	62
cxix	5	654
cxix	2	229
cxix	8	56
cxix	3	5
cxix	3	545
cxix	—	35
cxix	4	488
cxix	3	291
cxix	3	486
cxix	6	486
cxix	3	244
cxix	1	93
cxix	7	311
cxix	—	564
cxix	1, 2	49
cxix	6	29
cxix	7	134
cxix	22	218
cxix	2	488
cxix	2	2
cxix	2	459
cxix	3	319
cxix	10	341
cxix	—	142
cxix	15	142
cxix	15	28
cxix	15	491
cxix	15	578
cxix	15	607
cxix	—	407
cxix	13	288
cxix	—	603

PROVERBS.

i	10	...	471
iii	9, 10	...	302
iv	12	...	411
iv	18	...	435
iv	18	...	504
iv	23	...	319
iv	26	...	176
vi	6	...	222
vi	8	...	142
vii	9	...	589
vii	14	...	269
vii	22	...	253
vii	22	...	484
viii	11	...	401
ix	2	...	303
ix	12	...	384
x	15	...	395
x	23	...	60
xi	20	...	371
xi	24	...	370
xii	10	...	80
xii	10	...	466
xii	10	...	503
xiii	4	...	163
xiii	7	...	519
xiii	25	...	12
xiv	10	...	384
xiv	26	...	614

PROVERBS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
xv	1	306
xv	2	307
xv	2	651
xv	5	471
xv	3, 31	330
xvi	7	219
xvii	5	309
xviii	5	515
xviii	14	81
xviii	14	552
xix	7	517
xix	21	311
xx	9	244
xxii	1	562
xxii	3	18
xxii	3	252
xxii	3	434
xxii	13	579
xxii	29	145
xxiii	15	360
xxiii	23	619
xxiii	29	478
xxiii	32	484
xxiii	34	351
xxiii	35	84
xxiii	35	253
xxv	2	286
xxvi	28	432
xxvii	—	294
xxvii	4	180
xxvii	20	367
xxviii	21	369
xxviii	23	599
xxix	18	242
xxix	23	613
xxx	—	114
xxx	—	134
xxx	8	228
xxx	12	194
xxx	12	338
xxx	15	369
xxx	17	451
xxx	25	56
xxx	27	461
xxxi	1	521
xxxi	8	648
xxxi	13	473
xxxi	19	505

ECCLESIASTES.

i	2	...	627
i	10	...	313
i	12	...	388
ii	16	...	469
iv	6	...	508
iv	13	...	509
v	1	...	315
v	2	...	316
v	2, 3	...	510
v	4	...	321
v	15	...	197
vi	6	...	511
vii	1	...	562
vii	2	...	267
vii	5	...	512
vii	14	...	553
vii	15	...	421
vii	24	...	521
vii	29	...	265
viii	2	...	7
viii	5	...	513
viii	8	...	514
ix	1, 2	...	636
ix	2	...	123
x	7	...	183
xi	2	...	517
xi	8	...	125

ECCLESIASTES—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
xi	9	484
xii	5	113
xii	10, 11	286
xii	12	506

CANTICLES.

i	3	562
ii	4	481
iii	4	547
iii	6	450
iii	7	221
iv	—	326
v	4	181
v	9	292
vi	4	30
vi	4	457
vi	4	505
vi	10	504
viii	11	327

ISAIAH.

i	2	167
i	3	222
i	22	188
i	23	369
ii	22	641
iii	15	329
v	8	55
v	8	364
v	11	463
v	12	645
v	18	378
v	18	497
v	18	547
v	22	146
vi	13	501
viii	2	17
viii	17	398
viii	20	537
viii	20	609
ix	6	15
ix	6	308
ix	6	361
ix	6	381
ix	6	645
ix	7	182
ix	12	405
x	12	168
xi	8	17
xii	3	120
xvii	6	393
xx	—	406
xxii	23	206
xxiv	2	33
xxiv	10	124
xxvi	—	44
xxvi	8, 9	366
xxvi	9	308
xxvi	13	113
xxviii	21	293
xxviii	25	115
xxix	8	445
xxix	15	376
xxix	21	311
xxx	3	606
xxxii	15	100
xxxiii	16	471
xxxiii	24	349
xxxvii	—	268
xxxvii	24	319
xxxvii	29	14
xxxvii	36	640
xxxviii	8	504
xxxviii	12	65
xxxviii	14	394
xxxviii	20	338

ISAIAH—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
xxxix	—	83
xl	1, 2	262
xl	6	76
xl	22	608
xliv	1	285
xliv	2	548
xlvi	2	224
xlvi	8	499
xlvi	8, 9	486
xlvi	8	113
xlvi	22	55
xlvi	14	656
xlvi	10	366
li	15	490
lii	1	200
liv	—	591
lv	3	529
lv	8	585
lvii	2	548
lvii	7	398
lvii	21	33
lviii	1	599
lviii	8	529
lviii	9	379
lviii	12	262
lx	1	28
lx	6	447
lxi	3	115
lxii	2, 11	314
lxii	12	429
lxiii	—	268
lxiii	8	556
lxiii	16	325
lxv	5	2
lxv	8	501

JEREMIAH.

i	8, 17	63
ii	24	447
iii	25	613
iv	14	331
iv	14	504
iv	14	608
v	1	596
vii	4	606
viii	7	222
viii	7	423
viii	22	167
viii	22	262
viii	22	396
ix	23	37
x	11	642
xii	—	168
xii	5	118
xiii	17	567
xv	15	441
xv	16	619
xvii	5	606
xvii	11	314
xvii	9, 20	484
xviii	11	95
xix	—	406
xx	4	551
xxii	15	3
xxiii	21	459
xxiii	25	483
xxvi	23	562
xxviii	11	535
xxxi	—	268
xxxi	15	521
xxxiv	—	281
xxxvii	9	173
xl	8	455
xl	5	407
xliv	16	99
l	25	276

LAMENTATIONS.

chap.	ver.	page
i	21	309
iii	24	495
iii	29	554

EZEKIEL.

ii	6	168
iv	—	406
viii	5	99
viii	16	141
ix	2, 3, 4	567
xiii	9	331
xvi	—	83
xvii	—	281
xviii	20	461
xviii	31	378
xxii	30	262
xxiv	6	188
xxviii	4	319
xxviii	—	396
xxix	18	287
xxxiii	11	152
xxxiii	11, 18, 30, 31	209
xliv	8	189
xlvi	—	366
xlvi	4	550
xlvi	4	567

DANIEL.

i	4	254
i	8	422
i	13	619
ii	23	290
ii	35	311
ii	31-35	333
iii	6	378
iii	17	248
iii	18	458
iii	22	410
iii	25	412
iii	29	488
iv	31	495
v	3, 5	210
v	5	467
v	9	261
vi	10	19
vi	22	259
vi	26	638
vii	9	242
vii	10	637
ix	21	322
xii	3	159
xii	3	456

HOSEA.

i	—	406
ii	—	214
ii	18	101
ii	18	219
iv	11	26
iv	18	331
iv	18	369
vii	5	566
ix	7	460
ix	7	530
x	1	35
xi	8	390
xii	3	245
xii	1	378
xii	1	585
xiii	9	641
xiv	2	316
xiv	2	459
xiv	8	386

JOEL.

ii	10	526
ii	26	333

AMOS.

chap.	ver.	page
ii	6	311
iii	8	308
v	13	649
vii	13	213

OBADIAH.

i	21	159
---	----	-----

JONAH.

i	—	269
i	17	325
ii	9	338
iv	3	270
iv	6	306

MICAH.

i	7	144
ii	1	497
v	2	360
vi	9	366
vi	9	403
vii	3	331

HABAKKUK.

i	6, 7	319
i	16	74
i	16	113
i	16	120
i	16	281
ii	5	113
ii	6	247

ZEPHANIAH.

i	5	189
---	---	-----

HAGGAI.

ii	7	173
ii	9	392

ZECHARIAH.

i	—	533
v	—	281
xii	1	658
xii	10	402

MALACHI.

i	10	287
i	14	519
ii	7	231
iii	6	455
iii	8	65
iii	15	520
iii	17	263
iii	17	371
iv	2	507

ST. MATTHEW.

i	2	67
i	3, 5, 6	347
i	23	361
ii	9	223
ii	10, 11	362
iii	3	244
iii	16	361
iii	17	556
iv	4	97
iv	4	585
iv	6	60
iv	9	4
iv	9	58
iv	9	245
iv	10	130
v	3-8	185
v	9	371

ST. MATTHEW—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
v	11	443
v	16	97
v	17	298
v	29	539
v	48	550
vi	1	397
vi	1	592
vi	14	160
vi	24	569
vi	26	142
vi	26	222
vi	26	342
vi	29	625
vi	33	38
vii	12	170
vii	12	398
vii	12	474
vii	13	303
vii	13	411
vii	22	585
vii	27	463
viii	5	511
viii	9	69
viii	9	568
viii	34	357
ix	2	235
ix	9	597
ix	12	381
ix	36	292
x	—	102
x	14	467
x	16	394
x	16	575
x	16	577
x	16	598
x	23-39	531
x	28	308
x	30	288
x	37	588
x	42	427
xi	7	400
xi	8	41
xi	11	422
xi	12	347
xi	19	399
xi	28	39
xi	29	411
xi	29	557
xii	24	456
xii	25	210
xii	34	369
xii	43	13
xiii	46	401
xiii	47	23
xiii	47	430
xiii	52	115
xiv	10	213
xiv	15	33
xiv	17	28
xiv	25	325
xv	14	68
xv	19	604
xv	22	547
xvi	5	285
xvi	18	181
xvi	25	456
xvi	26	453
xvii	4	633
xvii	6	329
xviii	4	403
xix	20	250
xix	21	42
xix	24	448
xx	3	597
xx	16	591
xxi	9	362
xxi	12	275

ST. MATTHEW—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
xxi	13	242
xxi	16	644
xxii	11	283
xxiii	14	269
xxiii	15	554
xxiii	23	361
xxiii	37	167
xxiv	13	114
xxiv	26	121
xxiv	28	167
xxiv	29	516
xxv	4	584
xxv	11	647
xxv	14	504
xxv	15	528
xxv	25	364
xxv	35	167
xxvi	7	544
xxvi	39	189
xxvi	48	468
xxvi	49	358
xxvi	52	535
xxvi	62	535
xxvi	75	547
xxvii	—	658
xxvii	39	309
xxvii	46	525
xxviii	2	164

ST. MARK.

i	11	...	556
ii	4	...	286
ii	14	...	456
iii	24	...	9
iii	24	...	46
iv	5-8	...	449
iv	26, 28	...	522
iv	28	...	550
iv	28	...	567
iv	30	...	284
vi	6	...	261
vi	24	...	258
viii	24	...	158
viii	35	...	640
viii	36	...	4
viii	38	...	195
ix	50	...	605
x	14	...	544
x	50	...	138
xii	38	...	605
xiv	70	...	469
xv	21	...	287
xvi	2	...	253
xvi	3	...	164
xvi	19	...	605

ST. LUKE.

i	33	182
i	41, 47	362
i	52	492
i	53	475
ii	9-14	362
ii	13	505
ii	14	361
ii	14	446
ii	29	145
ii	34	472
iii	10	581
iv	23	474
v	5	23
v	30	399
vi	1	158
vi	22	456
vi	35	626
vi	38	255
vi	45	211
vii	38	623

ST. LUKE—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
vii	44	256
vii	48	225
viii	2	396
viii	13	45
viii	37	189
viii	48	325
ix	28	644
ix	48	37
ix	62	114
x	20	572
x	30	305
x	34	430
x	35	438
x	41	384
x	42	611
xi	5	304
xii	6	197
xii	14	275
xii	19	70
xii	20	484
xii	20	499
xii	49	609
xiii	7	366
xiii	24	161
xiii	25	647
xiii	27	412
xiv	10	564
xiv	10	567
xiv	10	626
xiv	18	484
xiv	23	39
xiv	23	597
xiv	24	612
xiv	30	653
xv	31	521
xvi	2, 12	311
xvi	8	102
xvi	8	399
xvi	9	485
xvi	13	85
xvi	24	651
xvii	13, 28	585
xvii	27	500
xvii	32	282
xviii	8	6
xviii	11	250
xviii	11	358
xviii	22	485
xix	5	306
xix	8	470
xix	9	85
xix	13	311
xix	14	39
xix	42	366
xix	42	499
xxii	18	303
xxii	32	165
xxii	42	341
xxiii	12	383
xxiii	28	593
xxiii	42	547
xxiii	43	306
xxiv	5	388
xxiv	16	249
xxiv	32	531
xxiv	49	67

ST. JOHN.

i	1	325
i	1	326
i	1	501
i	12	490
i	16	340
i	18	325
i	29	6
ii	1	650
iii	15	137

ST. JOHN—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
iii	16	339
iii	16	402
iii	18	369
iii	19	385
iii	19	561
iii	19	612
iv	7	33
iv	7	180
iv	17	349
iv	29	349
v	—	85
v	2	227
v	7	245
v	14	154
v	23	376
v	39	500
vi	5, 7, 48	381
vi	55	223
vi	60	549
vii	11, 15, 33	581
vii	46	407
vii	46	488
viii	32	574
viii	50	533
viii	51	45
ix	7	548
ix	10, 15, 24	264
x	7	303
x	10	366
x	41, 42	120
xi	4	496
xi	21, 32	229
xi	54	109
xi	54	168
xii	2	257
xii	13	38
xii	24	522
xiii	1	653
xiii	16	609
xiii	17	620
xiii	29	247
xiv	2	5
xiv	2	314
xiv	2	490
xiv	14	269
xiv	26	311
xiv	26	523
xv	5	326
xvii	12	350
xviii	—	72
xviii	8	523
xix	10	207
xix	26	451
xx	4	299
xx	11	547
xx	15	249
xx	15	636
xx	28	543
xxi	7, 20	644

ACTS OF APOSTLES.

i	8	440
i	24	636
ii	1-3	394
ii	37	597
iv	13	534
iv	32	138
iv	32	397
iv	36	262
v	1-10	210
v	2	280
v	2, 3	358
vii	22	519
vii	56	605
vii	59	258
viii	13	85

ACTS OF APOSTLES—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
viii	13	57
ix	7	403
ix	11	186
ix	18	476
ix	18	623
ix	31	51
ix	31	418
ix	31	599
x	3	151
x	4	71
x	11	430
xi	26	428
xii	20	301
xii	22, 23	210
xii	23	427
xiii	2	279
xiii	10	192
xiii	50	381
xiv	12	50
xiv	12	244
xiv	17	28
xiv	17	638
xiv	22	90
xiv	22	102
xv	—	277
xv	28	361
xvi	25	276
xvii	11	490
xvii	11	635
xvii	16	567
xvii	25	188
xvii	28	474
xviii	24	590
xix	19	297
xx	9, 10	185
xx	9, 10	501
xx	26	46
xx	38	6
xxi	13	177
xxi	13	256
xxi	13	565
xxii	8	261
xxiv	1	512
xxiv	5	612
xxiv	16	85
xxv	3	98
xxvii	—	187
xxvii	—	384
xxvii	14	514
xxvii	24	630
xxvii	44	145
xxviii	3	612

ROMANS.

i	16	165
i	16	251
i	16	545
i	20	638
ii	5	53
ii	7	23
ii	14	385
ii	15	525
vi	12	4
vii	15	244
vii	17	276
vii	18	128
vii	23	24
vii	24	133
vii	24	149
vii	24	448
vii	24	471
viii	2	586
viii	4	523
viii	8	355
viii	13	45
viii	17	604

ROMANS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
viii	18	477
viii	26	394
viii	28	246
viii	28	212
viii	29, 30	588
viii	30	265
viii	30	611
viii	34	616
ix	8	246
ix	17	473
ix	22	328
x	4	298
x	10	211
x	15	262
x	15	361
xi	33	318
xii	—	29
xii	1	242
xii	1	463
xii	4	88
xii	18	360
xii	21	491
xiii	—	30
xiii	3	448
xiii	13, 14	165
xiii	13	339
xiii	13	533
xiii	14	378
xiv	4	21
xiv	23	54
xv	—	36
xv	24	619
xvi	19	601

I CORINTHIANS.

i	—	320
i	12	99
i	24	325
i	26	172
i	30	326
ii	2	431
ii	5	97
ii	9	313
ii	9	457
ii	11	5
ii	14	615
iii	2	183
iii	4	388
iii	8	456
iii	9	363
iii	10, 11	361
iii	11	537
iii	13	432
iii	17	453
iii	22	152
iv	2	245
iv	7	291
iv	16	262
v	7	310
vi	7	574
vi	9, 10	175
vi	19	257
vi	19	352
vi	19	493
vii	—	106
vii	24	142
vii	23-31	310
vii	31	337
vii	31	355
viii	5	87
viii	24	142
ix	—	99
ix	15	30
ix	22	284
ix	22	399
ix	24	242
ix	24	504

I CORINTHIANS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
ix	27	422
x	—	577
x	13	538
x	25	503
x	31	15
xi	9	487
xii	—	106
xii	26	598
xii	29	363
xii	31	268
xiii	15	468
xiii	9	272
xiii	13	656
xiv	18	244
xiv	20	172
xiv	25	77
xiv	33	106
xiv	40	457
xv	9	93
xv	19	185
xv	31	13
xv	31	169
xv	54	483
xv	55	602
xv	57	478
xvi	2	485

2 CORINTHIANS.

i	3	500
i	12	46
ii	15	463
ii	16	369
ii	17	376
iii	8	545
iv	8	476
iv	18	456
v	17	312
v	17	378
v	19	326
v	20	231
vi	2	336
vi	16	310
ix	7	472
ix	7	655
x	3	504
x	4	408
x	18	281
xii	2	244
xii	7	270
xii	7	400
xv	41	456

GALATIANS.

i	8	46
ii	2	261
ii	9	206
ii	20	618
iii	3	114
iii	28	340
iv	—	182
iv	1	178
iv	4	556
iv	15	38
iv	16	38
iv	16	213
iv	16	250
iv	19	195
iv	26	490
iv	26	550
v	1	183
v	1	361
v	12	522
v	15	13
v	24	163
vi	2	259

EPHESIANS.

chap.	ver.	page
i	5	235
i	21	456
ii	1	357
ii	3	609
ii	6	312
ii	8	630
ii	12	328
ii	14	314
ii	14	361
ii	15	522
ii	19	550
ii	22	408
iii	17	257
iv	10	381
iv	13	121
iv	13	435
iv	14	366
iv	16	392
iv	19	253
iv	19	497
iv	25	12
iv	26	76
iv	26	172
iv	26	202
iv	28	407
iv	32	33
v	—	567
v	5	446
v	15	339
v	15	356
v	22	487
v	24	378
vi	1	311
vi	2	614
vi	12	456
vi	13	121
vi	16	590

PHILIPPIANS.

i	6	653
i	9	38
i	11	351
i	21	367
i	21	506
i	21	602
i	23	165
i	23	633
ii	5	420
ii	8	494
ii	9	320
ii	13	163
ii	15	300
ii	21	35
ii	21	136
ii	21	371
ii	21	428
iii	—	39
iii	6	381
iii	12	547
iii	13	550
iii	14	346
iii	14	435
iii	19	436
iii	20	142
iii	20	143
iii	20	318
iii	20	450
iv	2	459
iv	13	230

COLOSSIANS.

i	14	545
i	16	456
ii	7	442
ii	14	522
ii	14	556
ii	15	657

COLOSSIANS—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
ii	19	392
ii	22	356
iii	1, 2	300
iii	2	67
iii	4	366
iii	5	387
iii	5	396
iii	14	313
iv	6	605

1 THESSALONIANS.

i	3	623
iv	1	504
iv	9	396
iv	12	339
iv	16	456
v	2	102
v	12	506
v	17	27
v	19	19
v	19	618

2 THESSALONIANS.

ii	7	445
ii	11	609
iii	2	419

1 TIMOTHY.

i	15	328
i	15	370
i	15	638
i	17	47
i	17	150
i	19	55
ii	2	630
ii	8	322
iii	2	70
iii	6	502
iv	2	214
iv	8	220
iv	10	606
iv	16	284
v	19	383
v	21	138
v	23	465
vi	6, 7	445
vi	8	472
vi	8	491
vi	16	101

2 TIMOTHY.

i	5	563
i	7	214
i	9	280
i	13	283
i	14	352
ii	—	569
ii	3	505
ii	13	261
ii	19	350

2 TIMOTHY—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
iii	6	244
iii	15	590
iii	17	165
iv	2	279
iv	3, 4	141
iv	8	30
iv	7, 8	201
iv	8	246
iv	8	489
iv	10	216
iv	10	474

TITUS.

i	12	244
i	12	283
i	12	474
ii	14	371

PHILEMON.

18	562
----	-----

HEBREWS.

i	3	401
i	14	490
ii	2	490
ii	10	360
ii	10	381
ii	12	143
ii	16	457
iv	1	430
iv	13	504
vi	1	430
vi	1-8	603
vi	4	94
vi	4	351
vi	19	538
vii	7	75
x	20	314
x	37	125
xi	—	30
xi	6	265
xi	6	408
xi	21	42
xi	25	443
xi	26	118
xi	26	454
xi	26	485
xi	31	347
xii	1	138
xii	8	208
xii	29	17
xii	29	328
xiii	1	38
xiii	5	593
xiii	15	366
xiii	17	85

JAMES.

i	8	375
i	12	246
i	12	489

JAMES—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
i	13	167
i	13	593
i	15	641
i	26	24
ii	1	245
ii	10	539
ii	16	8
ii	16	71
iii	2	20
iii	5	582
iii	15	459
iv	—	320
iv	2	539
iv	8	504
iv	13	356
iv	14	76
v	3	466
v	16	256
v	16	344
v	16	522
v	20	159

1 PETER.

i	18	493
i	18, 19	604
ii	5	408
ii	9	371
ii	11	490
ii	12	260
ii	21	608
ii	23	535
iii	—	567
iii	7	36
iv	4	624
iv	10	34
v	6	323

2 PETER.

ii	1	614
ii	3	262
ii	8	567
ii	15	448
ii	20	300
iii	7	408
iii	13	337
iii	16	323
iii	17	282
iii	18	345
iii	18	504

1 JOHN.

i	3	137
i	7	40
i	7	629
i	9	657
ii	4	623
ii	8	314
ii	13	462
ii	14	644
ii	16	319
iii	8	408

1 JOHN—continued.

chap.	ver.	page
iii	8	568
iii	9	461
iii	14	328
iii	16	572
iii	20	5
iv	15	407
v	19	512

2 JOHN.

5, 6	505
10	530

3 JOHN.

9	474
---	-----

JUDE.

8	323
8	380
8	467
12	188
12	524

REVELATION.

i	—	62
i	3	533
i	8	1
i	15	657
ii	—	235
ii	7	203
ii	10	30
ii	10	489
ii	17	543
ii	21, 22	366
ii	24	445
ii	24	614
iii	7	636
iii	20	611
iv	6	270
iv	6	532
iv	11	643
v	5	361
vi	10	5
vii	—	345
vii	14	576
vii	17	542
ix	—	33
ix	14	174
x	6	208
xiv	7, 8	661
xiv	13	548
xv	3	467
xvii	6	445
xix	11	381
xix	4	398
xxi	2	378
xxi	8	195
xxii	2	74
xxii	2	366
xxii	12	570
xxii	16	369
xxii	20	270

A TREASURY,

OR

STOREHOUSE OF SIMILES,

Both Pleasant, Delightful, and Profitable, for all Estates of Men in general.

Newly Collected into Heads and Commonplaces.

BY

ROBERT CAWDRAY.

LONDON:

Printed by Thomas Creede.

MDCIX.

To the Right Worshipful and his singular Benefactors

Sir John Harington, Knight, as also to the Worshipful James Harington, Esq., his Brother,

Robert Cawdray wisheth in this life the abundant increase of all spiritual graces, and in the world to come life everlasting, through Christ Jesus our alone Saviour.

HIS book, right worshipfuls, containeth certain very pleasant, delightful, and profitable Similes—that is, when two things, or more than two, are so compared, resembled, and conferred together, that they in some one property seem alike—wherein not only sundry and very many most horrible and foul vices and dangerous sins of all sorts are so familiarly and so plainly laid open, ripped up, and displayed in their kinds, and so pointed at with the finger of God in His Sacred and Holy Scriptures, to signify His wrath and indignation belonging unto them, that such as are Christians indeed, being seasoned and endued with the Spirit of grace, and having God before their eyes, will be very fearful, even in love that they bear to God, to pollute and defile their hearts, their minds, their mouths, or hands, with any such forbidden things; as also many very notable virtues, with their due commendations, so lively and truly expressed, according to the plain meaning of the Word of God;—that the godly reader, being of a Christian inclination, will be mightily inflamed with an earnest liking and a love unto them. Over and besides, it containeth the explaining and plain opening of many grounds and principles of the Christian religion so manifestly deciphered out, that every one (even the very simplest and most ignorant reader) may easily and plainly understand the true and right meaning thereof, as may be for the increase of knowledge and godliness, even in all degrees of men and for their better understanding therein; for many times that thing which cannot be perceived or understood of readers of books and hearers of sermons by a simple precept, may yet by a similitude or plain example be attained unto: so that if any be desirous to compare a thing from the less to the greater, similitudes will help him greatly in this behalf, &c.

And that there is a necessary and profitable use of similes we may easily gather, for that the Holy Ghost hath so often used them, both in the Old and New Testaments, as, amongst many, these few quotations do show:—2 Sam. xii. 1—4; xiv. 6; xxiii. 4; Judges ix. 8; Ps. ciii. 12; cxxiii. 2; Job xv. 15, 33; Prov. xxvii. 8—10, 21; Isa. v. 7, 24; lv. 10, 11; lxi. 10, 11; Jer. ii. 26; xxxiii. 22; Matt. xiii. 4; xviii. 23; Mark iv. 29; Luke xv. 4; xvii. 7; John iii. 14; xv. 1; Rom. v. 12, 18, 19; vi. 4; vii. 2; 1 Cor. xii. 12; xiv. 11, 12; xv. 40, 41, 47; 2 Cor. xi. 3; Gal. iv. 1; Eph. v. 25.

So that this work, in my simple opinion, for the choice of the argument, variety of the matter, and profit of the circumstance, deserves to be advisedly read, attentively considered, effectually ruminated, and perfectly digested, because that it will breed and increase in all degrees no small skill in knowledge, wisdom, and virtue. For I know no estate of men for whom this book is not necessary : for princes it is pretty, for preachers profitable, for sage counsellors it is singular, meet for magistrates, laudable for lawyers, a jewel for gentlemen, a staff to lean on for students, good to further godliness, and therefore apt and profitable for all men.

The prophets of God were moved (as their writings do manifestly prove) to fetch from plants, herbs, and other natural things many right apt and fine similitudes and proper comparisons, to adorn their sermons and garnish their speeches withal, to make the same by such familiar means the easier to be conceived and the readier to be believed.

And although in every other kind of learning of human discipline and philosophy there be many singular ornaments and peculiar garnishments effectually to delight the mind, and to draw it, by example and admiration, to virtue and honesty, yet, for the true and perfect attaining and fuller bringing to pass these things, there be none of greater, nor yet of like force and efficacy, to those that are used by the holy prophets in their divine writings and prophecies : so that to him that is any whit reasonably seen (skilled), either in the works of nature or in heavenly contemplations, it may easily appear how that their writings and prophecies are not barren, rude, ignorant, and unartificial, but profitable, fruitful, learned, and eloquent. For the Holy Scripture, being given by inspiration from God, fully and sufficiently instructeth the mind and furnisheth the conscience and soul with most sweet food and wholesome nourishment. Which thing the writings both of the Prophets in the Old Testament and also of the Evangelists and Apostles in the New Testament do plentifully declare.

Now, for that the very fit similitudes, borrowed from many kinds and sundry natural things, both in the Old and New Testaments, diligently noted and found out, as well by ordinary practice and course of life, as also by observing of the nature, effect, and virtue of things, I have thought good at this time to take some pains and to bestow some labour in this book, to set down the same, with others, unto the view and consideration of the diligent and studious reader, whereby he may see what a rich treasure of knowledge and wisdom there is laid up in the Holy Scriptures, which affordeth unto the industrious and painful (painstaking) Christian store enough of matter, both pleasurable and profitable, delightful, wholesome, and comfortable. Neither is it possible for a man to reap any the like benefit of plentiful knowledge and store of learning, nor to taste such plenty of necessary food, both for soul and conscience, out of any works written by philosophers, orators, or poets, as he may out of the plentiful storehouse and everlasting fountain of divinity, and out of those books which were indited and penned by the Holy Ghost and written by heavenly inspiration. So that whosoever shall advisedly consider and attentively discuss the deep mysteries and profound knowledge laid up in the Scriptures, and therewithal, also, what surpassing wisdom lodged in their minds who left behind them such divine instructions and wholesome documents, cannot choose but most plainly perceive by how many degrees divine learning and sacred studies do incomparably surmount all profane skill and human knowledge, and how far things heavenly and eternal do excel things earthly and transitory.

That the holy prophets were not only most exactly seen (skilled) in the peerless skill of divinity, but most exquisitely also furnished with the entire knowledge of all things natural, and not ignorant of any kind of learning or discipline, may, by the discourse in this book, be sufficiently proved and manifestly gathered, for that in their writings they use many similitudes, and make so many comparisons of things, fetched off, and from the very secrets and bowels of nature—as, namely, from wild and tame beasts, fowls, worms, creeping and swimming creatures, herbs, trees, the elements—fire, water, earth, air—rivers, brooks, wells, cisterns, seas, stars, pearls, stones, lightning, thunder, rain, dew, heat, drought, cold, winds, blasts, hail, snow, frost, ice, corn, seed, salt, leaven, nets, snares, and likewise from the humours in a man's body—as blood—milk, women in travail, in child-birth, dross, iron, gold, silver, and innumerable other things, wherewith they learnedly beautify their matter, and, as it were, bravely garnish and deck out their terms, words, and sentences with trophies and figurative phrases, metaphors, translations, parables, comparisons, collations, examples, shows, and other ornaments of speech, giving thereby unto their matter a certain kind of lively gesture, and so consequently attiring it with light, perspicuity, easiness, estimation, and dignity, stirring up thereby men's drowsy minds, and awaking slothful, negligent, careless, sluggish, and reckless people to the consideration and acknowledgment of the truth, and to the following and embracing of virtue and godliness.

Hereby, as they do labour to deter and withdraw the wicked from their wicked ways, by laying down before them similitudes tending to such purpose, so do they no less stir them up to virtue, to true happiness, to perfect felicity, to sound assurance, to the fear of God and trust in His mercy; finally, they each way seek to win them to the knowledge of God and of themselves, and leave no way unattempted to allure and bring them to the truth and perfect blessedness.

And as touching the godly, who fear the Lord and frame their lives accordingly, they cease not to encourage, confirm, strengthen, and establish them in their virtuous doings, by earnest exhortations to persist in their well-begun exercise. They do (as the apostle St. Paul also willeth) “admonish all such as walk inordinately” and live out of course, being untractable and unruly, to remember their duty and to acknowledge their fault; they gently reprove them and mildly seek to recover them; they comfort the weak and cheer up the mournful; they strengthen the feeble and broken-hearted; they revive the sorrowful and heavy-spirited; they raise them up that are thrown down; they use lenity, mildness, and compassion towards all men in general; they are slow to anger, slow to revenge and violence; they heal the broken and bruised consciences; they preach deliverance to the captives, sight to the blind, liberty to the imprisoned, comfort to the afflicted, joy to the distressed, health to the sick, recovery to the diseased, and to the miserable releasement from the thralldom and tyranny of the devil,—all these and many others they notably and elegantly set forth in their writings by most apt parables, forcible comparisons, and effectuous similitudes.

Christ—“in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge”—spake all these things to the multitude by parables, saith the Evangelist, and without a parable spake He nothing unto them, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, who said, “I will open my mouth in parables,” &c. To the which Tertullian, in his fourth book against Marcion, doth very fitly agree, saying, “Neither is the form of Christ's speech new, when He objecteth (exhibiteth) similitudes.” Also Origen writeth in Matt. xiii., “that Christ spake nothing to the companies of common people without parables (which are a kind of similes);

2 Thess. iii. 11.

1 Thess. v. 11.

Matt. xiii. 34.

but to His disciples, to whom it was given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, He did not so." Therefore a simile is most fit for a preacher, because it reasoneth from things confessed, and very manifestly and wonderfully layeth the matter even before the eyes : so that the use of a simile reacheth very far ; for it is used for ornament, for delight, for plainness, and for gravity. Nothing bringeth more grace, pleasure, or dignity. Neither is it to be covered in silence that Chrysostom and the ancient Churchmen did commonly begin with a simile agreeing to their argument ; and the same in their exordiums—yea, in all parts of their speeches and writings—did the princes of wise eloquence and eloquent wisdom use—as Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Nazianzen, Basil, John Chrysostom, Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine. But of the great use of similitudes we may read more largely in the homily of John Chrysostom upon John xiii., and his homily upon Gen. xiii. ; and in Origen's homily upon Lev. x. ; and in Augustine, in the very beginning of his second book concerning Christian doctrine ; and Gregory, in his third Book of Morals, cap. xxxvi. ; and, to conclude, in Agricola's first Book of Logical Invention, cap. xxv.

Seeing, therefore, each one of the prophets (among whom many were kings and descended of royal blood) have discoursed of these things, and inserted and spoken of the same in their writings—seeing, likewise, our Saviour Jesus Christ and His disciples have practised the same, and showed forth the like kind of doctrine, as also the learned writers have done—I have thought my labour should be well employed and bestowed if I should in this treatise plainly show what store of excellent learning, profound wisdom, hidden knowledge, and exact skill of nature—what zeal, likewise, of advancing true religion and of banishing all idolatry and superstition—there rested in those men that, by Divine inspiration, have left and delivered unto us such worthy and wholesome matters, in such surpassing knowledge, by drawing into their books (for the greater ornament and setting out of their speech) the whole store and furniture of nature.

Now, calling to mind, right worshipfuls, not only the manifold courtesies and benefits which I found and received, now more than thirty years ago (when I taught the grammar school at Oakham, in Rutland, and sundry times since), of the religious and virtuous lady, Lucy Harington, your worships' mother and my especial friend in the Lord, but also the great kindness and favourable good will (during my long trouble and since) by both your worships towards me extended—in consideration whereof, lest I should seem altogether unthankful (which compriseth and containeth in itself all vices both towards God and men), I am therefore even provoked, in some small measure of duty, to show myself some ways thankful unto you ; and whereas at this time every grateful person doth not only in word, but also in deeds, with their presents and gifts, show some sign and token of this their thankfulness, even so I, also, out of my simple garden, have chosen and gleaned a handful of flowers, as it were a nosegay—the best present I have—to dedicate and offer unto you.

Thus humbly desiring your worships to accept this my simple present, most earnestly beseeching the Lord in mercy to bless you both, and all yours, with His Holy Spirit, with increase of long life, and much faith in Him, to His glory and the benefit of this our country, and in the world to come of His unspeakable mercy to crown you with everlasting glory, I most humbly take my leave,

Your worships' in the Lord much bounden and in Him to be commanded

ROBERT CAWDRAY.

To the Religious and Christian Reader,

Grace and peace be multiplied, with increase of all heavenly blessings in this life and in the life to come.

THOU hast here, beloved, a treatise of similitudes and comparisons gathered into heads and commonplaces, which, as it will be both pleasant and delightful for thee to read, so also it will be very profitable for the increase of thy knowledge and godliness; especially if the quotations and places of Scripture (for the proof of the head and commonplace there set down) be examined and turned unto; for so, many (or the most part of the commonplaces) will be in effect almost as good and profitable for instruction as some whole books written of that point and matter, and for that end and purpose; as, for example, this commonplace of faith, where you shall find—1. How faith and hope do differ. 2. General doctrine of faith itself. 3. Of a dead faith. 4. How faith is faith, though it be weak, small, or hidden. 5. Faith; how it is alone, and not alone, without works. 6. That faith, as God giveth us it, so He increaseth the same in us. 7. That faith, without a particular appliance, hath no comfort or commodity in it. 8. That faith is the only truth which receiveth the body of Christ crucified. 9. That faith is the only means of forgiveness of sins. 10. That faith and obedience are requisite in them that be baptized. 11. That faith hath need of continual increase, and yet is never perfect. 12. That faith is tied to no time, to no age nor qualities of life. 13. That faith is perfect in substance, but yet in quantity groweth greater by daily increase. 14. That faith and God's promises must be joined. 15. That faith must not waver in prayer. 16. That faith without works is vain. 17. Of faith's object. And so the like of many other commonplaces.

I am to request thee, gentle reader, that if I have failed (as I fear I have) in not applying and assigning some similes to so fit and right heads and commonplaces as, indeed, the matter and scope thereof requireth, or if otherwise I have failed, that thou wouldst bear with this oversight—which I protest was—for that I have been troubled and disquieted so many ways, that I could not have sufficient time and free liberty so to digest and place everything so well in its order and place as otherwise I would and might have done, &c. |

This also is to be remembered by the reader, that a similitude is not the same in every particular as that which was likened unto it, but it is sufficient if it be like in one. Again, similitudes are never set out to confirm or confute, but to adorn, and to make a matter more plain, and yet are ever more inferior to the matter in hand.

And further, the industrious and careful reader may receive great benefit and comfort by this work if (after his return home from the hearing of any godly lecture or sermon, where he hath either heard any principle of God's religion handled and spoken of, or else any virtue commended or vice condemned) he shall turn to that point, and first search it out in the table, and so then to read all such similes in the book as he shall there find touching the same point and matter.

R. CAWDRAY.

A TREASURY, OR STOREHOUSE OF SIMILES,

BOTH PLEASANT, DELIGHTFUL, AND PROFITABLE, ETC.

Accusation.

AS fire, cast into the water, is quickly quenched : so a false accusation against an honest life is soon extinguished.

Adam's disobedience.

As a physician, being in good health, doth know diseases only by speculation, but when he is sick he doth better know them, because he doth both know them and feel them : even so Adam, although he knew before what obedience and disobedience were, yet, after the eating of the fruit, he did not only know, but also felt what ill came by disobedience ; and therefore his tree is called "the tree of knowledge of good and evil," not because it giveth such knowledge of itself, but it is so called ab eventu, even as the tree of life is called "the tree of life" ab effectu, that is (as some divines write), that the fruit of this tree did conserve the integrity of man's health and the radical moisture, that he should never be stricken with age, with wrinkles, with hoar hairs, nor with any corruption, but should have remained in perpetual young age. Others there be, whose judgment is counted more true, who think that it is called "the tree of life," not because it gave life unto man, where-with he was endued before, but that it should be a symbol and a memorial of life received from God.

Adam's fall came not to pass without the decree and ordinance of God.

1. As a man may give a little child some small stripe with a rod without the parents' appointment, at which, notwithstanding, they would peradventure dissemble and wink, but none dare undertake to cut him of the stone or to cut off any limb without the father's good will and authority : even so, the greater the importance of Adam's transgression, in that it tended to destroy and overthrow so excellent a work of God, namely, man, created in His image, the more are we to believe that it was never done without His counsel or decree.

2. As a sparrow falleth not to the ground without the will of God : even so Adam, being so excellent a creature, created after the image of God, could not suffer so horrible a fall without His providence and decree.

1 Sam. ii. 6.
Amos iii. 6.
Lam. iii. 38.
Ps. civ. cv. cvi.
cvii., and cxcvii.
Isa.

Acts iv. 27. 28 ;
ii. 23.

Admonition, or wholesome precepts.

As unto him that is diseased with the king's evil honey is unpleasant and bitter, whereas unto others the same is very sweet : so good and profitable admonition and wholesome precepts to godly men are most delectable, whereas unto those that are corrupted with evil affections they be altogether sharp and unsavoury.

Affectionate Admonitions unfruitful.

LIKE as he that observeth the wind shall never sow : so likewise they which have an eye alway unto the affections of men, and will know what entertainment their admonitions and reproof shall have before they will bestow them, can never profit any thereby, for that in so doing they seek rather to please men and feed their humours, than that God should have His glory increased thereby.

How a man may be assured of his Adoption.

1. LIKE as fire is known to be not a painted but a true fire by two signs—by heat and by the flame—now, if the case fall out that the fire want a flame, it is still known to be fire by the heat : even so there be two witnesses of our adoption—God's Spirit and our spirit. Now, if it fall out that a man want the principal, which is the Spirit of adoption, he must then have recourse to the second witness, and search out in himself the signs and tokens of the sanctification of his own spirit, by which he may certainly assure himself of his adoption, as he may know fire to be fire by the heat, though it want a flame.

John xv. 19.

2. Like as when the angel showed unto the shepherds the nativity of Jesus Christ, saying, "I show unto you great joy, that this day is born to you a Saviour in the city of David, which is Christ the Lord;" he added, "You shall have these signs : ye shall find the Child wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger." Now, if these shepherds, being come to Bethlehem, had found the holy Virgin in an honourable palace, and the Child in a magnifical and royal cradle, they might have had just occasion to doubt of the tidings of the angel, this estate not agreeing with the sign that he had given ; but having found the Child in poor estate, in a manger, as the angel had foretold, they were confirmed to believe that it was the Messiah : even so God, having revealed unto us by His Word that He hath chosen us to be His children, having sealed it in us by the testimony and effects of the unction of the Holy Ghost, and having also given us the marks in this, that He hath made us the members of His Church, He hath foretold and hath given one sign more of our adoption, that we shall be reproached and persecuted. If, then, the world did make much of us, loved and honoured us, we might after some sort doubt the Word of God, and our election and adoption ; but seeing the accomplishment of that which was foretold us, we ought to be so much the more confirmed in this assurance, that we are not of the world, but appertain unto our good God.

Acts xiv. 22.
Matt. vii. 13.

3. Like as if we ask the way to go to any place, and that one tell us, for a sign of the right way, that it is at the beginning dirty and afterwards full of hills, we will leave the other ways, which seem straight, dry, fair, and easy, and finding in that way which we take the dirt and hills foretold and given us for a sign, we will be so much the more confirmed that we are in the right way : so, the Holy Ghost having foretold that through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of heaven, and that the way leading to eternal life is narrow and difficult, if we find the way of the Gospel narrow and full of troubles, let us acknowledge that we are in the right way to the kingdom of heaven, and that we ought, therefore, to be so much the more confirmed in assurance that we are the adopted children of God.

Of the inward marks of our Adoption.

As to the blind and deaf the opening of their eyes and ears is needful, clearly to see and to hear the voice of Him that speaketh : even so we, being of our own nature both blind and deaf as touching understanding, the Holy Spirit is He that openeth our eyes and ears to comprehend the revelation of our adoption, and to enable us to feel in our hearts the assurance of it, engendering in us faith, which is, as it were, the hand by which we apprehend this great benefit ; whereof also the fruits and effects, as well of the Holy Ghost dwelling in us as of the faith that is in us, are the principal and most assured marks to give us knowledge of our adoption.

Rom. viii. 16.
1 John iii. 24
iv. 13.
Rom. v. 1.
Eph. i. 13.

Sons by Adoption.

1. LIKE as if a king or nobleman should, of mere love and favour, take in a beggar—nay, a traitor—and make him his heir : even so God did with us ; and such favour did He freely show to so many of the sons of Adam as it pleased Him to adopt, and so to make them His children.

1 John iii.
John i. 12.
Rom. viii. 14.

2. As Jabal, the son of Adah, the wife of Lamech, is called “the father of such as dwell in tents,” for he was the first inventor of tents ; and Jubal, his brother, is also called “the father of such as play upon harps and upon organs or pipes ;” yet we may not therefore call the tents Jabal’s children, and the organs and pipes the sons of Jubal : even so God is called “the Father of the reprobate,” metaphorically, because He first created them ; but yet they can no more be called the adopted children of God, than the tents might be called the children of Jabal, or the harps and organs the children of his brother Jubal.

Gen. iv. 20-21.

3. As the sun, which sometimes shineth and sendeth forth his light, dispersing the clouds, and sometimes again is hidden under the clouds ; or as the sea is one while ebbing and another while flowing ; or as the moon is sometimes waxing and sometimes waning : even so the adopted children of God, by reason of their manifold corruptions, imperfections, and rebellious thoughts of their hearts, have not the Spirit of God always felt in themselves, nor perceived in them by others in a like measure ; but it is in them, sometimes in a greater measure, sometimes in a less.

4. Like as trees planted by the water-side, which do bring forth fruit in due season, yet the same trees have both a summering and wintering, a spring time and a fall of the leaf : when winter comes they seem as though they were dead, but in summer they shall wax fresh and green again : and yet the fruit of the same trees is first in the sap only, then it cometh into buds, and so into blossoms ; whereof some are smitten with blastings, some are nipped with frost and cold, and some are eaten with worms : but if they escape all these, then, from blossoms they come to be apples ; and at the first they are green and lively, and some do lust to eat them, but they are still hard and harsh, but in time they come to their full growth, and when they are ripe, then are they either shaken down with the wind and swine devour them, or, if they be fairly gathered, yet are they plucked from the tree that hath borne them ; then are they bought and sold, whereof some perish and are cast out of doors : the fairest and the sweetest are brought either to the fire to be roasted or to the table to be pared and cut in pieces, and so to be eaten : then the tree is naked and seemeth to be dead, but the next spring do fetch all again. So likewise is the fruit of the Spirit in the adopted children of God : first in the sap of faith only, which is hidden in the heart : then it cometh into good thoughts : then into good works by degrees ; but many times it is nipped and smitten in the bud or in the blossom—that is, either in thoughts or words—that it never comes to works. The works likewise of the sons of God are at the first fair and fresh, but yet hard and harsh, and when they are come to any perfection, they are either wind-shaken and devoured by beasts, or smitten with persecution ; then are they bought and sold, and every man handleth them as he lists—in a word, the fairest, the pleasantest, and the best of our works must be pared and picked for dainty mouths and queasy stomachs, and in the end consumed of all; and then are our labours come to their perfection, whether they be of the Church or commonwealth; and then do many of God's children think themselves naked and dead; and there is no cause why they should, for their fruits, whether they perish in the bud or in the blossom, or in the ripening, or howsoever they be handled, yet they prove that the sap of God's Spirit is in them, and the next spring of God's grace will fetch all again.

Ps. i. 3.

Luke xvii. 5.
Mark ix. 24.

5. As men say of fruit, "This is but little, but it is good: here be not many of them, but those that are of them are very dainty: they are right, of such and such a kind:" even so the adopted children of God may say, "My faith is but little and weak; my love is not so much as I would it were; my zeal is but little and my patience is but small; but it is true faith, and true love, and true zeal, and true patience, even from the very heart root, without dissembling. O Lord, increase it and strengthen it!"

Ps. xcii. 13, 14.
Rom. i. 17.

6. As the adopted sons of God are planted by the ministry of the Word and Spirit: even so they flourish and abound in fruit by the same means, as also by the Sacraments and prayer, &c.

7. Like as, if a king, prince, or nobleman should make a poor beggar-born his loving son and heir by adoption, he were greatly bound to love him and to be thankful unto him for ever: even so much more we ought to love the Son of God, Christ Jesus, who hath made us sons and heirs to His Father, by His death and redemption.

Adultery.

1. LIKE as tumblers' feats are called tricks, but it may be, by their sport, as it sometimes falleth out, they may break their necks: even so adultery, fornication, and such filthiness, howsoever it be counted a trick of youth, yet it is such a trick as they may thereby, without repentance, condemn themselves.

Matt. v. 28.

2. As a man, before God, killeth his neighbour if he hate him—yea, if he do not love him, and of love keep himself both from doing hurt and also be ready and prepared to help his brother at his need: even so the consent of the heart, with all other means that follow thereof, be as well adultery before God as the deed itself.

Adversity.

1. As a wise pilot and governor of a ship will, in calm and fair weather, look for a storm: even so every wise man, in time of peace and prosperity, will prepare his mind for adversity.

Ps. lxxix. 2.

2. As a man or beast that suddenly falleth into a deep quagmire, whereof he can find no bottom, must needs perish, except there be some at hand to draw him out: so he that falleth into extreme adversity, except God do help him out, must needs be overthrown therein and perish.

3. Even as, in winter, when it is exceedingly cold, and in summer, when too much heat inflameth all things, great thunder and lightnings are seldom heard and seen, but in the spring-time and harvest, when the air is clear and calm, then chiefly they burn and strike where they light: so great calamities and bitter troubles do lie in wait for prosperity; they seek not after them which in a low and mean estate do labour and take pains in heat and cold, and all storms else, but those do they most suddenly wound, overthrow, and consume, as it were, with fire which, in a calm spring-time and harvest of prosperity, are drunken with pride and too, too insolent with vain glory of the world, and are set upon the top of vanity itself.

4. As the seed is more fruitful that hath been covered with snow, and the fire burneth faster that hath been pressed down with the wind: so are the hearts and souls of true Christians bettered by adversity.

5. As mariners, who, if they be once in the haven, are the greatest drunkards, blasphemers, whoremasters, and licentious persons that may be, but if they be upon the sea, in any peril and danger of their lives, there was never hermit—no, not Paul nor Hilary—so holy in words, so austere in life, and devout in prayers as they are: even so we, in like manner, are never so humble and lowly-minded in prosperity as we are in adversity; for, if we be well and at our ease, we think of nothing but of sporting and playing; we spend the time in carding and dicing, in dancing and making merry; we study in the morning what new pastime we may have all the day following; and we are never so much afraid of anything as that we should want time and health, never thinking upon the shortness of our days and the small time we have to live here so long as we are in health and jollity.

JOSEPH L. 4, 8.

Adversity bettereth the godly, but maketh the wicked worse.

EVEN as full wheat in the ear falleth out with the least motion of the sheaf, but that which is somewhat shrunk more hardly leaveth the husk, while that which is altogether shrunk will rather go to the chaff than go out of the ear: so a sincere-hearted Christian, with the least affliction, leaveth his sin and flieth to God. The weaker Christian more hardly doth the same; but the apostate will rather burn with unquenchable fire than forsake his beloved sin, that so he may turn to God.

Adversity bridleth our wicked appetites and maketh us more obedient.

1. As wild and fierce horses are wont to be broken with the hardness of the bridle and sharpness of the bit: so our untamed lusts and unbridled appetites are hampered and brought within the compass of reason with the bridle of adversity, troubles, sorrows, and afflictions.

2. Even as the grape, that it may yield wine, is brought to the press that it may be thoroughly bruised: so man is brought to calamity, that, being pressed with sorrows and exercised with afflictions, he may bring forth the sweet and pleasant liquor of obedience and virtue, and so be advanced to true Christianity, which is the greatest and highest dignity in the world. Miseries, penuries, and tribulations do, for the most part, keep under and stay our unruly lusts and dangerous desires, and are means by which we lift up our hearts and minds unto God, and become strengthened and confirmed in true piety and unstained godliness; and on the other side, prosperity, worldly wealth, dignity, and honours, are oftentimes means to hinder us in holy exercises, and to puff us up with pride and vain-glory, and to draw us to disloyalty and rebellion against God.

Numb. xxi. 6, 7.
2 Chron. xxxiii.
11, 12.
Nah. ix. 27.

The Adversity of the faithful is not above the patience that God giveth.

As the Lord, our most good and merciful Father, doth, according to His infinite wisdom and endless compassion, prepare His people unto Himself, trying what they will bear for His name's sake: even so He doth not assay (try) them above what He makes them able to bear, but arms them beyond the thoughts of the heart of man, till He send them full deliverance from all evil and troubles.

Adversity ought to make us more faithful and godly.

LIKE as the more one forceth to take away a staff which I hold in my hand while I am awake, so much more the faster I shut it in and hold it the harder, that it may not be taken away from me: even so, the more the devil endeavoureth to take faith from us by tribulations, so much the more should we meditate on the promises of God to hold it fast; and the more he thrusteth at us to overcome us, so much the more strongly ought we lean upon the staff of faith, to overcome his assaults.

Why God Afflicteth His children.

Heb. xii. 6, 7.
Deut. xxxii. 39.
Amos iii. 2.
Ps. lxxxix. 31, 32.

As a godly and wise surgeon, purposing to cut the corrupted wounds of a sick body, and to take away, or to sear with a hot iron, the rotten flesh, in cutting or searing hath no pity of the weak man, to the end that, in curing his sore and healing his wound, by cutting and searing, he may show him pity: even so our most wise God, that celestial Physician and heavenly Surgeon, smiteth and afflicteth us, that He may heal us—cutteth and seareth us, that He may cure us.

Affliction.

1. LIKE as, if a sheep stray from his fellows, the shepherd sets his dog after it, not to devour it, but to bring it in again: even so our heavenly Shepherd, if any of us, His sheep, disobey Him, He sets His dog of affliction after us, not to hurt us, but to bring us home to consideration of our duty towards Him. Now, His dogs be poverty, banishment, sickness, evil rulers, dearth, death, war, loss of goods or friends, &c.

2. As a vessel, when it is foul, must be scoured and cleansed before any good liquor be put in it; or as he that would have his ground to be fruitful must first pull up the weeds before he sow good seed: even so the Lord our good God doth by afflictions, as it were by sharp medicines and chastisements, purge our bodies, to the end that our minds may bring forth their due fruit in fear and reverence.

Ps. xcii. 12.

3. Like as the palm-tree, when there is a great weight laid on it, spreadeth and flourisheth the broader; or as a camomile, with treading and walking on, waxes thicker: even so a faithful Christian, the more affliction and persecution he suffereth for his Christ, the more is his faith increased.

Hag. i. 5, 6.
Prov. xvi. 7, 17.
Deut. xxviii. 1-10.

4. Like as the schoolmaster corrects not his scholar, nor the father his child, but for some fault, and for their amendment: even so no more doth God send His plagues and chastisements upon His children but to put them in remembrance of their disobedience towards Him, and that they should turn to Him. But if the lewd scholar or unthrifty son do not regard the correction laid upon him, nor consider the greatness of his fault nor the displeasure of his father, there is no goodness to be hoped for of him. Even so it is with such as lightly, or else not at all, consider, their lives past, God's dealing with them, and how evil and untowardly things have prospered with them during the time that they have displeased God and been afflicted.

Rom. v. 3-5.

5. As the ashes cast upon a fire put it not out, but is a means to preserve the same in the night against the morning, which otherwise would be consumed; or as the barrenness of the trees in winter is a means to preserve the roots against summer, which then will send up their juice into the body and branches thereof, whereby they are greatly enlarged and made far more fruitful than ever they were before: even so are afflictions unto the children of God, which do not only keep them from the barrenness of sin, but also increase and multiply in them the life and fruitfulness of God's Holy Spirit, and exercise them in patience and hope.

Storehouse of Similes.

6. As frankincense, when it is put into the fire, giveth the greater perfume ; or as spice, if it be pounded and beaten, smelleth the sweeter ; as the earth, when it is torn up by the plough, becometh more fruitful ; the seed in the ground, after frost and snow and winter storms, springeth the ranker ; the nigher the vine is pruned to the stock, the greater grape it yieldeth ; the grape, when it is most pressed and beaten, maketh the sweetest wine, &c. ; linen, when it is bucked and washed, wrung and beaten, is so made fairer and whiter : even so the children of God receive great benefit by persecution, for by it God washeth and scoureth, schooleth and nurtureth them, that so, through many tribulations, they may enter into their rest.

7. Like as they that go about to make lions tame are wont to beat little whelps before them, and to make them to crouch, that so, the lions seeing, they may crouch also : even so oftentimes God chasteneth and correcteth His dear servants, that those that be stiff-necked and rebellious should, by their example, learn subjection and obedience.

8. Like as a physician, who goeth about to cure his sick patient, doth first promise him health (by the assistance and help of God), whereby he putteth him in great hope and comfort ; afterwards he beginneth to purge, to cleanse and strengthen, and such like things, which make to the recovering of his health : even so our good God also, when He hath remitted and pardoned our sins and received us into the bosom of grace, and promised us life, who were before sick to death in our sins, doth lay on us afflictions, and so doth scour and renew us from day to day in the knowledge and love of Him, until we become saved, pure, and renewed, which then at the last cometh to pass when this mortal body dieth.

9. As the precious stone called amiantus, being cast into the fire, is made clearer and purer : so the children of God, being cast into the fire of troubles and afflictions, do shine more clear and beautiful.

10. As the goldsmith putteth his gold into the fire, not to mar it, but to purge the dross out of it ; or as the husbandman, who, when his corn is somewhat too rank, either moweth it down or else putteth his sheep to eat it ; and as a gardener doth prune his vines, not to destroy them, but to make them bring forth more abundant fruit : even so the Lord doth try His children by laying His cross upon their necks, and purgeth them like gold in the fire ; He cutteth from them many occasions of evil, that He may bring them to the bearing of greater and more plentiful fruit.

John xvi. 20.
Act. xiv. 22.
2 Tim. iii. 12.
1 Pet. iv. 12, 13.

11. It fareth with God's children as it happeneth to the children of the household : all the while they are young and little they are, as the apostle saith, subject and under tutors and governors, and many times the servants beat them as though they were their masters and that the children were their subjects, because that the time is not yet come when the seniority of the children ought to be manifested. But when the children are great, they abide heirs of the house, and the varlets (servants) depart, and all the labour of the servants and that which they have gotten shall continue and abide with them. Even so we, all the while we are in this world, are in this state ; for that it doth not yet appear what we shall be. But it is with us as it was with David : before the death of Saul, David was anointed and ordained of God king of Israel ; yet, nevertheless, he could not enjoy peaceably his kingdom till after the death of Saul ; but he was as the most miserable which was in Israel, chased and persecuted on every side. But yet, in the end, he reigned king maugre his enemies ; and all that Saul and his adherents did unto David was turned to the good and profit of David.

1 Kings ii. 1, &c.
Ps. vii. 1.
1 Sam. xxvi. 1,
&c.

12. As a piece of brass being stricken with a hammer, upon the anvil or stithy, breaketh, and withal maketh a sharp and irksome noise : so, when a hypocrite cometh betwixt the anvil and the hammer of troubles and affliction, he breaketh with impatience—he murmureth, crieth out, and lamenteth in blasphemies against God.

13. As a piece of gold being smitten with the hammer, on the stithy, soundeth sweetly, and is pliable and may be beaten out in breadth and length as a man would have it : even so the child of God, in time of persecution, giveth Him thanks and submitteth himself, laying out his own heart willingly under the Lord's hand that striketh him.

14. As the sea, if it were not tossed with the winds, would stink : even so the godly man, if he were not exercised with troubles and afflictions, would be the worse.

15. As the moss called Ros solis, though the heat of the sun lie upon it all the day, yet the hotter the sun is upon it the moister it is : so the godly in affliction, &c.

John ix. 1, 2

16. As the father doth not only punish his child for his fault, but properly and chiefly respecteth his amendment, and to have him to leave his former lewd ways and to take a better course hereafter; but the child, for his part, when he is beaten, must first consider his fault, in saying, "This correction is for my lewd behaviour;" and so endeavour to amend and to do better afterwards: even so God, in correcting us, doth not only respect our sins, but our reformation; but we ourselves must find out a proper cause—that is, our sins; for although sin is the beginning even of all bodily diseases and chastisements, yet it does not follow that God always respecteth their sins whom He most sharply punisheth, as may appear by the answer of Christ to His disciples, &c.

17. As a painful and careful husbandman looketh diligently to all points of his business, and bestoweth his industry and labour in each respect, as the time and season affordeth, and as the nature and quality of every grain requireth, in hope thereby to receive a good increase and plentiful crop: even so God trieth each way by afflictions, to draw and bring all men, of all sorts and conditions in this theatre of the world, to acknowledgment of their duties and desire of their salvation.

Deut. viii. 2, 3.
Judges x. 13, 15;
16; xl. 31.

18. Like as the husbandman, after he hath ploughed up his land and sowed it, doth afterward harrow it and break the hard clods thereof; and after this reapeth, thresheth, fanneth, and searcheth the chaff from the corn; and as he cutteth, pruneth, and loppeth his trees, and keepeth them under, lest they should grow rugged or spread their boughs too far out of course and order; and, finally, as he grafteth, planteth, and teacheth his young scions to be naturalized in another stock than their own: so likewise doth God deal with men in this world, punishing and afflicting some with losses, hindrances, and other tokens of His hidden judgment, for the better trial of their patience and constancy; some (though evil and wicked persons) He tolerateth, spareth, and, as it were, winketh at, in hope of their conversion and amendment.

19. As children take patiently correction at their father's hand, though sometimes it be preposterous and otherwise than it should be: even so we ought to take that cross and affliction patiently which God layeth upon us, knowing that He always doth it for our good and comfort.

20. As it is a common thing to try gold and silver by fire: even so it should not seem strange to the children of God to be tried by afflictions.

Phil. iv. 5.
2 Tim. ii. 3.

21. Like as there is nothing in heaven that pleaseth God so well as that honourable obedience His saints do give Him in heaven: so there is nothing upon the earth so acceptable unto Him as when His saints upon earth are ready to suffer for His sake.

Math. xvi. 24.

22. As the Jews led our Saviour Christ to be crucified, they met one Simon of Cyrene, the father of Alexander and Rufus, and upon him they laid the cross: so likewise, if any affliction be laid upon us for Jesus Christ's sake, we must be well contented to carry the same, as Simon of Cyrene was to bear the cross.

23. As there were two crosses prepared for our Saviour Christ—the one of passion, as that wooden and material cross, whereon His body suffered outwardly; the other of compassion, whereby His soul suffered inwardly: so there is prepared a double cross for every faithful Christian—the one of the soul, the other of the body.

1 Cor. xi. 32.

24. As good Jesus was crucified by the bad Jews: so also hath God decreed that His children shall be afflicted in this world, lest they should be damned with this world.

25. As the ark of Noah rose higher and higher by the swelling of the waters of the flood: even so the minds of the righteous are brought nearer and nearer to God by persecution and affliction. Gen. vii. 7-14

26. As blowing seemeth to disperse the flames and trouble them, but yet maketh them burn more clear: even so affliction, though it be grievous to the flesh, yet it purgeth it of many sins, and maketh the godly far more excellent.

27. As there is no comparison of one little water-drop to the whole huge sea, or of one small grain of dust to the mountain Imaus: even so the light and short afflictions and troubles of this most short race are not worthy to be compared with the great and eternal glory of the life to come. 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18.
Rom. viii. 18.

28. As, in the fining pot, the goldsmith trieth the silver: so likewise doth God, by troubles and afflictions, try the hearts of men. Prov. xvii. 3;
xxvii. 21.

29. As a servant working abroad in the hot sun longeth for and is glad of the cool shade: so men in affliction and misery are glad of a little ease. Job vii. 2.

30. Like as, if two children should fight, and a man coming by should part them, and afterward beat the one and let the other go free, every man that seeth this will say that that child which he beats is his own son: even so, when God chastiseth us, He showeth Himself unto us as a Father, if we submit ourselves. Heb. xii. 7.

31. As great and mighty fishes are not bred and fed in small rivers and sweet waters, but in the salt and bitter waters of the seas: so men that are excellent and very famous, by reason of the notable and manifold virtues wherewith they be endued, are not delighted in the false and deceitful pleasures of this world, but are nourished, and, as it were, sweetly cherished and brought up in Christ, with very sour sorrows and bitter calamities, which they endure and most patiently bear for God's sake.

32. As to a valiant soldier, nothing is more noble and worthy of praise than to carry the armour and arms of his prince: so a true Christian man esteemeth nothing of greater value and more honourable than to bear the arms and badges of Christ's captain—that is, to be thoroughly touched with great crosses and many afflictions, and to be well armed with godly patience. Gal. vi. 17.
2 Tim. iii. 12.

33. As a physician doth minister to his sick patients sour and bitter potions to drink, that some hurtful humour of their bodies may be expelled: so God, our heavenly Father and Physician, willing to cure the maladies and to salve the sores of our souls, doth reach unto us many times the cup of afflictions, troubles, and miseries, that (our sins and iniquities being taken away) we may be restored to the former salvation of our souls.

34. As he that would mortify his greatest sins must begin to do it with small sins, which, when they are once reformed, a man shall be able more easily to overcome his master sins: so, likewise, he that would be able to bear afflictions and the cross of all crosses—namely, death itself—must first of all learn to bear small crosses, as sicknesses in body and troubles in mind, with losses of goods and of friends and of good name, which may fitly be termed little deaths and the beginnings of death itself; and so he must first of all acquaint himself with these little deaths before he can well be able to bear the great death of all.

35. Even as he that hath a son who is in good and perfect health, and a servant that is exceeding sick, dealeth more roughly and severely with his son than with his servant, not because he loveth his servant more than his son, but because he would (if it might be) restore his sick servant to his former health, but his son, whom he loveth most dearly, he reproveth, checketh, taunteth, and correcteth: even so our loving God sometimes afflicteth His dear children, whom He most tenderly loveth, and doth suffer them to be exercised with wants, with hunger and cold, with weepings and wailings, with sighs and sorrowful sobs, with nakedness and want of harbour, with heaviness of heart and vexation of soul, with sickness of body and want of liberty, and with a thousand other calamities and cares, and

Heb. xii. 6, 7.
Gal. vi. 14.
2 Tim. iii. 12.
Rom. v. 3.
Matt. v. 10.

in the meantime suffereth the wicked and ungodly ones of the world to want nothing. He giveth them health, wealth, and liberty, worldly honour and dignity, and what not, meaning and purposing by these means (if the fault be not in themselves) to bring them to know, to fear, to honour, and to serve Him, by whose providence and appointment they have and enjoy all those good blessings, and so be cured and healed of the sores and sickness of their souls.

36. As the skilful pearl-seller and cunning lapidary doth willingly suffer the Indian diamond or adamant to be smitten and stricken with great and weighty blows, because he knoweth well that the hammer and anvil will sooner be bruised than the diamond or adamant will be broken : so likewise our most wise God—yea, only Wisdom itself—suffereth men of excellent virtues, of unquenchable love and charity, and invincible constancy, to fall into divers temptations and great afflictions, and to be plunged deep into manifold miseries, because He will have their inward graces to break out and so shine before men, that they, seeing the constancy of His saints, may glorify God who is in heaven.

37. As a mother that weans her child layeth wormwood or some other bitter thing upon her breast to make the child loathe the milk : so likewise God makes us often feel the miseries and crosses of this life, that our love and liking might be turned from this world and fixed in heaven.

38. As raw flesh is loathsome to the stomach : so is every sinner and unmortified man loathsome unto God, till the Lord, by afflictions, mortify in him the corruptions of his nature, and specially the love of this world.

1 Cor. xii. 32.
2 Cor. i. 4.

39. As horses that are headstrong, and either keep not their right pace or turn out of the way, be reined and kept in with the bridle : so the Lord bringeth us back from our headiness by one affliction, calamity, or other.

Heb. xii. 6.

40. Like as, if any shrewd (troublesome) child purpose to fly from his schoolmaster, or refuseth to keep the school diligently, there are messengers straightway sent for him to bring him back : so likewise God dealeth with us, who sendeth His messengers—to wit, troubles, the pestilence, and other diseases—to bring us back to Himself.

Ps. v. 4, 5.

41. As a master can in nowise be said to hate his scholar when he fetcheth him into the school with his rod from playing the truant : even so, no more doth God hate us when He calleth us back from our lewd ways by His correction.

Ps. cxix. 67, 71.

42. As in a house where there are many children the rod is necessary ; or as in a city subject to divers diseases, and where there is an evil air, physicians are needful : so likewise in the house of God, where there are many children inclined to evil, the rod of affliction is many times more necessary than bread.

Job i. 21, 22.

43. As a mad man is angry with the physician, chaseth him away, and throweth away the medicine ; but a wise man that is sick of a corporal disease sendeth for the physician, taketh drink at his hand, thanketh him—yea, and giveth him a reward : so when God, the Sovereign Physician of our souls, visiteth us with afflictions, and giveth us wholesome medicines, we must not be like mad men, rejecting the hand of God ; but receiving the medicine, we must give Him thanks, and bless Him, after the example of Job.

44. As corn that is shut up and closed in the husk, and the chaff cometh not forth if the ear be not beaten, and also tarrieth still in the chaff if it be not fanned : even so the like happeneth to the children of God if they be not beaten and fanned by tribulations, to be separated from the chaff of the world and the pleasures and impediments that be in it.

Hos. ii. 6.

45. As the beasts that go by the way and see on the side of them fair fields, assaying to go to them, and running upon the hedges of thorns, if they feel the sharp pricks, they go back and return into the way : so likewise, when the children of God go out of the right way to heaven, to go into the fields of this world and of the flesh, God maketh them to come upon the thorns of afflictions, to the end that, by their prickings, they may turn back again.

46. As gold, by fire, is severed and parted from dross: so singleness of heart and true Christian simplicity is best seen and made most evident in troubles and afflictions. In prosperity every man will seem godly, but afflictions do draw out of the heart whatsoever is there, whether it be good or bad. Ps. xxvi. 2.

47. As the obedience of Christ in the cross was a grateful sacrifice to God: so our obedience in all afflictions and troubles pleaseth God, not for itself, but in respect of faith, whereby it is severed from the punishments of the ungodly, and is laid upon the altar of Christ, through touching of whom it is sanctified and accepted of God. Job xix. 25.

48. As myrrh, notwithstanding it be sharp and bitter, yet it healeth wounds and preserveth from putrifaction: so the cross and troubles of the saints, though they be irksome to the flesh and grievous, yet they destroy not, but heal rather.

49. Like as when a mother, willing to wean her child, shall say unto him, night and day, "My child, it is time to wean thee; thou art grown great enough, and I am with child; my milk is corrupt; it will make thee sick;" yet he is so fond of the breast, that he cannot forsake it; but if the mother put wormwood or mustard upon the breast, the child sucking it, and tasting the bitterness, he quite forsaketh it, without sucking any more: even so, though God's preachers preach unto us, and exhort us to forsake the corrupt milk of the world and of the flesh, yet we seem deaf still, and are always backward, until God put upon these cursed teats the mustard and wormwood of afflictions to wean us.

50. Like as when we see the carpenters strike with their axes upon pieces of wood, to square or plane them, and masons to polish stones with the strokes of a hammer, we gather that these are stones and timber which the master would employ in some building: even so let us conclude of ourselves, that if God lift up upon us the axes and hammers of afflictions to polish us, it is a manifest and sure testimony that He hath chosen us to put in the building of His temple, and that so we are His children both well beloved and happy. Heb. xii. 6.
1 Pet. iv. 17.

51. As he that despiseth the Word and Sacraments despiseth them not only, but the Lord, who is the Author of them: even so he that cannot away with afflictions and temptations, either of body or mind, but counteth them miserable and not to be suffered, despiseth them not only, but the Lord Himself, who hath appointed them as means to work in us that excellent virtue of patience. James i. 2, 3.

52. As the goldsmith knoweth how much dross he hath, and how much clean and fine gold, by the trying of it in the fire: even so we shall know what portion of faith the Lord hath given us by afflictions and troubles, and what dross and imperfections remain in us, as infidelity, which, when we know perfectly, we must learn by the Word of God, and so heartily and earnestly pray Him to redress it.

53. As myrrh doth keep men's bodies from corrupting, and preserveth them from putrifaction and rottenness: even so it is most true, in the children of God, that afflictions and calamities, taken and borne patiently, do profit and prevail much to keep their souls from the corruption and canker of grievous evils. John xvi. 20, 21.
2 Cor. i. 8.
Rev. vii. 14.

54. Even as a bitter potion is not said to be unprofitable, nor without hope, when health and soundness doth follow, although it be exceeding bitter to him that taketh it: so sharp and pinching afflictions, troubles, and calamities, wherewith the Lord doth exercise His children now and then, are not to be counted idle and in vain when some peace of conscience and comfort unto our souls do follow, that, when the justice of God is seen, many may be amended and the faith and patience of many may be tried; for nothing is more available for the advancing of the praise and commendation of true virtue than calamity itself, taken and borne patiently for Christ's sake.

55. As the entangled bird cannot escape out of the net that compasseth her: even so no more can we wind ourselves out of those afflictions that God layeth upon us. Lam. ii. 13.

56. Like as a man that hath two sons—the one an earnest lover of virtue, strong in body, and of a mighty courage; the other depraved and of crooked disposition, inclined to effeminate pleasures and wanton delights, weak in body, and of little or no courage: the first he sendeth out to wars and doth adventure him in perils and dangers of all sorts, that he may exercise and acquaint him with the labours, troubles, and toils of the world; the other he cockereth and maketh too much of him; he suffereth him to have all things at his will; he is kept at home, and, as it were, dandled upon his mother's lap; but at the last he that, in all his affairs and dangerous adventures, did in every point quit himself like a man of great valour and noble courage, received, together with great praise and deserved honour, a most high and noble reward, but he that was pampered and cockered at home had neither praise, reward, nor honour: even so our Heavenly Father doth lead men that are strong and constant in faith through divers and sundry perils and dangers, and doth draw them, as it were, with His own hand through bitter anguishes, great perplexities, and narrow straits of calamities, miseries, and temptations, and doth continually exercise them with fearful combats against the enemies of their souls, and through many and great labours, infinite sturdy storms, and bitter blasts; doth strengthen and confirm them in virtue and godliness; but the frail and wicked men of the world, such as are merely natural—without any delight or comfort in His Word, and who are no whit seasoned or cheered with the dews of His grace and His most blessed Spirit—He permitteth them to be in great prosperity and to have all things at their will and pleasure, without smarting, sighing, sobbing, and groaning for want and lack of anything that their hearts can devise or desire; but at the length, in the end of the day, they that have striven hard and fought manfully, and have in battle overcome the flesh, the world, and the devil, shall be received into endless salvation, everlasting life, and eternal glory; and they which have laid down their heads and slept in the bosoms of worldly pleasures, and have slumbered in foul and filthy idleness, never caring nor thinking what will follow, nor remembering the dreadful day of judgment, when the wicked shall hear their damnation announced by Christ, they then shall be utterly condemned, reprobated, and cast into everlasting and endless miseries. Then shall most plainly be seen and felt the loss that fleshly pleasures bring, and the profit of afflictions and crosses carried and borne for our Saviour Christ's sake.

2 Tim. ii. 3-5.
1 Cor. x. 13.

57. As wheat, or other corn and grain, laid up and kept in a garner, cellar, or chamber, if it be not stirred and dressed with a shovel or fan, will be full of corruption, lose the sweet savour, wax unwholesome for man's body, and will be consumed of weevils; or as apparel or garments, being laid up close in a press or other place, if they be not much shaken, beaten, and tossed, will be eaten and spoiled with moths: even so Christians, if they be not tried with temptations and thoroughly exercised with calamities and miseries, will be very quickly monstrously corrupted, and will grow to be so rotten in all manner of sin and iniquity, that they will shrink and fall quite from the Lord; but, being well proved, canvassed, and thoroughly tried with many crosses, afflictions, and troubles—one following on the neck of another—they become the firmer, stronger, and more constant in the faith, fear, and love of God, and so, manfully fighting and courageously overcoming the adversaries and enemies of their souls, they shall at the last be crowned with an everlasting crown of eternal glory.

Rev. iii. 19.
Matt. v. 10, 11.
Rom. iii. 4, 5.

58. As a father giveth unto his son whom he loveth dearly a breastplate or stomacher—very costly and curiously wrought, of silk, silver, or gold—to wear under some other garment, he doth suffer his uppermost garment, as doublet or coat, to be pinked and cut in divers places, that the under costly work may outwardly appear and be seen of all: even so our heavenly Father—a God of compassion and mercy, yea, the God of all comfort—doth sometimes suffer that man whom He most dearly loveth to be wounded of the wicked and to be smitten with calamities and miseries, to the end that the precious and golden breastplate of patience, wherewith the Lord hath inwardly endued him, should outwardly appear and be seen of all.

59. As the waters which were very bitter in Marah, after that the wood was thrown thereinto, became sweet : so there can no cross or affliction happen to the saints of God in this life, but it becometh most pleasant if the wood of the cross of Christ be added as a sauce, but if that be taken away the waters become bitter and unsavoury—that is, every trouble is very sour and intolerable unless it be tempered as it were with the cross of Christ.

60. As the bush that Moses saw was not consumed with fire : so neither do the weapons nor cruelty of enemies consume Christians, although they be mightily beset round about of the wicked. Exod. iii. 3.

61. Like as when trees are hewn down, much more imps (offshoots) do spring up than the boughs were that were cut off : so now, after the slaughter of many godly men, more did run unto the Gospel, and that day by day, than ever did ; yea, and the blood of the slain bodies was a certain watering of the new plants springing up in the Church ; so that a martyr in suffering doth not suffer for himself alone, but also for every man. For himself, he suffereth to be crowned ; for all men he suffereth, to give them an example ; for himself, to his rest ; for every man, to his welfare.

62. As the fluttering of the snared bird holdeth her faster than before : so likewise our struggling and murmuring against God in our afflictions availeth us nothing at all ; but rather we must take patiently whatsoever He doth lay upon us, and seek unto Him alone for release by earnest prayer, who only can deliver us.

63. As the grapes cannot fly from the treader of the winepress, even so no more can we escape God's hand in punishing and afflicting of us, because there is no place to fly from His presence. Lam. i. 15, 16.
Ps. cxxxix. 7, 8.

64. Like as salt preserveth flesh that it doth not putrify, and the drawing plaster searcheth and purgeth that part of the body which is sore, lest through corrupt matter it pine away ; or as the hot iron, being put thereunto, burneth out and consumeth whatsoever should hinder the recovery thereof : so likewise do affliction and tribulation (lest we should wax rotten in the filthiness of sin) draw us back from the renewing of sin, take away the delight of resting in evil, quench the fire of lust, and easily pluck out of a good heart whatsoever is an impediment to the good health of the mind.

65. Even as by long boiling of gold, which is thrown into the furnace, any other corrupt thing mixed therewith is tried out and taken from it : likewise so, through affliction and adversity, both the delight we have in creatures, the flattering we make of ourselves, the confidence we have in men, and whatsoever else is not pure, vanisheth away, and is put from us, and the mind thereby wholly bent upon God, of whom it waiteth to obtain a quietness.

66. As the courageous horse shows by his prancing and all other tokens of fierceness how unwillingly he abideth his rider—yea, he throws him off if he can, and yet, nevertheless, is brought under, will he or no—and as the gentler horse more quietly suffers his rider, turns what way soever he appoints him, and lets himself be tamed : even so the wicked, when God doth try them with affliction and misery, with pensiveness and with adversity, they spurn against it, although they nothing prevail, and, being impatient of their misfortune, make resistance all that ever they can ; but the godly sort stoop to God, suffer themselves to be ruled, and with all humbleness of mind yield to the will of God ; through which it comes to pass, that as the one sort reaps no fruit through their impatience, so the other, by their sufferance, depart with exceeding great profit and commodity.

67. As one and the same sun hardeneth myrrh, and yet melteth wax : even so, in a manner, doth affliction make good men become the better and evil men the worse.

68. Like as the musician straineth his strings, and yet he breaketh none of them, but maketh thereby a sweeter melody and better concord : so God, through affliction and trouble, destroys not those which be His own, but makes them better and more pliable unto the fruition and enjoying of the life to come.

69. As the mason heweth out stones which he maketh fit for building of his house, graves them and squares them before he lay and join them to the building: even so, through affliction, doth God turn, try, exercise, and prepare beforehand His elect, with whom, as with lively stones, he purposeth to build the habitation of God. He sifts them as corn with a fan, winnows them from the chaff, and puts them aside into His chest before He lays them up in His heavenly barn.

70. As the seed of the harvest, which is covered with frost, increaseth more fruitfully; and as the flame with blowing is kept under, to the intent it may increase and be made greater: so doth God, through affliction, trouble, and adversity, more vehemently ravish our minds, stir them up, and increase them, with a longing for Him.

71. Even as Christ (whom in baptism we put on) was baptized with the cross: so we also, as long as we remain in this world, must prepare ourselves for the cross and adversities.

72. Even as the conscience assenteth to the law, reproving sin: so also, by the cross, we are admonished to repent, that we may be saved.

73. As the goldsmith, intending to make precious and excellent vessels fit for the use of great kings, doth cast his gold into the fire, that so it may become pure from all dross: so, before that the faithful can be vessels of honour, fit for the service of God in the kingdom of heaven, they must be cast into the furnace of affliction, and there be weaned from the vain delights and pleasures of sin—yea, tried—that they may be found in the profession of the faith, and corrected for their former misdemeanor.

74. As a tree which, although it be removed out of one place unto another, yet flourisheth: so the afflictions of the godly turneth to their profit.

Affliction is profitable.

Gen. xxxvii.,
xxxix., xlii.

1. As the little bee gathereth the sweetest honey out of the most bitter blossoms and flowers: even so men of wisdom and understanding receive much utility and fruit of their present sorrow and afflictions.

2. Like as the Holy Scripture attributeth a certain reward unto our good works, which works, notwithstanding it is not we that work them, but the Lord, who useth us as instruments of His: even so is the cross an instrument of God, whereby He subdueth our flesh, keepeth us in the school of correction, and forceth us, as it were by violence, from evil to goodness.

3. As all the rain that falleth into the sea maketh it not the fresher: so all the afflictions that befall and happen to the godly make them not worse, but better.

4. Even as a father, knowing that mere wine is not wholesome for his child, minglet it with water: so the Lord, seeing that continual prosperity is not good for us, minglet it with affliction, crosses, and adversity.

5. Like as they which are delighted with hawking, if they love any hawk more than the other, do as well hood and leash her, lest she should fly away from them as feed her, that she may live: even so the Lord, as He doth bestow blessings upon His children, so He doth also lay afflictions on them, lest they, being puffed up with pride, should forsake Him and depart from Him.

6. As lightning is a glory to the heaven, but hurteth the earth: so afflictions are good for the divine and Christian soul, though they be very troublesome to the body.

7. As little children accustomably do desire sweetmeats, which do annoy and hurt them, and loathe and abhor bitter things, that would do them good : even so some Christians and Gospellers (such is their weakness and foolishness) do pursue and hunt after pleasure, ease, idleness, and prosperity, and shun and fly from affliction, crosses, and persecutions, than the which nothing is more requisite, necessary, and profitable for the confirmation of a Christian life ; for it is that sovereign tried balm that quencheth the deadly poison of self-love, worldly pleasure, fleshly felicity, and carnal security.

8. As it is not only the property of the plough to root up all briars, brambles, thistles, thorns, and weeds out of the arable land, but also to prepare and make the same apt and fit to receive the pure seed into it when it shall be sown upon it : so likewise it is the nature and quality of affliction, not only to root out of the earthly heart of man all the weeds of concupiscence and worldly delights, but also to prepare and make ready his heart and soul to receive the wholesome and most seasonable seed of Christ's doctrine, when it is by His faithful ministers preached.

9. As the hard hammer beateth off the rotten and cankered rust from the iron : so, in like manner, the cross and affliction beat off the rotten rust of covetousness, whoredom, extortion, drunkenness, uncleanness, licentiousness, gluttony, wrath, strife, sedition, sects, malice, and such other like wayward vices, from the excellent anchor of a Christian faith, preparing the same to all good exercises, which otherwise would consume away.

10. As the flaming furnace purifieth the good gold, in burning and wasting away all the dross thereof : so affliction burneth and consumeth the drowsy dross of man's deceivable lusts ; for by it the world is crucified unto us and we unto the world, and by it we are made like unto the image of the Son of God.

11. As the pruning knife, wherewith the rotten, dry, and withered branches are cut away : even so, by affliction, the putrified branches and vices of the tree and vine of a Christian life are done away, which by continuance would utterly waste, and make the same unfruitful ; so that by it our faith is increased, our patience exercised, and our hope augmented.

12. As the savoury salt consumeth away the corruption from the unsavoury meat : even so affliction consumeth and purgeth away the corruption of Christians, in seasoning their lives to all profitable uses, for by it we are known both within and without, to ourselves and to other men.

13. Like as the physician is necessary unto the sick, or the biting corrosive unto the festered sore, or the sharp lancet unto the mollified matter : so likewise, without all comparison, the cross and affliction is more necessary unto a Christian ; for by it the sickness of sin is removed, the fleshly lusts cured, and the superfluous humours of earthly pleasures are cut away.

14. Even as no man ever saw the head go into a place one way and the members another way, unless they were divided and cut off : so, in the like manner, Jesus Christ, our Head, entered into the kingdom of His Father by ignominy, reproof, shame, slander, railing, persecution, affliction, and the cross, and therefore we, His members (if we continue the members of His body), must enter in by the same way and none other.

Matt. x. 24, 25.
John xv. 18-20.

15. As the fiery bush that Moses saw in the Mount Horeb, which bush, for all that it was on a flaming fire, yet did it not consume ; or as the shining worm, that being cast into the fire, doth not perish nor consume, but, contrariwise, is thereby purged from filth and more beautiful than if it were washed with all the waters of the world : even so such Christians as are cast into the fire of affliction are not consumed, but purged, tried, and purified.

Exod. iii. 2, 3.

16. As the child is glad when the father smileth upon him and speaketh comfortably unto him, although he beats him : so let us be glad and rejoyce when our Heavenly Father doth smile upon us, in giving us the assurance of His love, although He doth afflict us.

17. As the physician or surgeon bindeth him fast that is vexed with a frenzy, stirs him up that is troubled with the disease of lethargy, putteth them both to vexation, and yet loveth them both, being not only desirous to restore health unto them both, but also applies very diligently his whole art and study in curing of these things : even so God, although He be sometimes sharp and severe in afflicting and punishing His, yet doth He most lovingly by such means procure salvation unto His elect.

Allegories.

As they are much deceived who think that the stories in the Scripture do signify no other thing but that which was done : so likewise they are too rash and bold that would draw all things to allegories.

Ambition.

1. As worms engender sooner in soft and tender wood than in other that is more hard and knotty ; and, likewise, as moths do breed sooner in fine wool than in coarse flocks (locks) : even so ambition sooner assaulteth an excellent and rare man in all kind of virtue than another which is not so virtuous.

2. As those that tug at the oar in the galley, a man would judge them, seeing their manner of doing and how they stretch their arms forward, that they would go on and sail forthright, when with all their might they enforce themselves to draw backwards : even so, some, being ambitious and vain-glorious, will yet nevertheless persuade us that they have nothing in greater detestation than ambition and vain-glory, when there is not anything whereof they are more desirous and greedy. Such in times past were the pharisees, as are yet at this day many that hunt for livings and preferments, who have their hearts swollen and puffed up with ambition, which they cloak and colour under the vizard and outward show of humility. These may be fitly resembled to Antisthenes, who, on a time, walked in the common place at Athens, with a cloak all torn and tattered, to the end that everyone beholding him so poorly apparelled might judge that he did it through humility and not for lack of goods, because he was a man well esteemed and of good reputation ; but Socrates, having discovered, by the readiness of his good understanding and judgment, the hypocrisy of this philosopher, said aloud, that he saw his ambition through the holes of his cloak. Diogenes also entering on a time into Plato's chamber, and seeing his bed very finely made, because, being of a civil and gentleman-like nature, he was neat and handsome in his movables, apparel, and gestures, and (to be short) in all his conversation, he went and wallowed himself, like a swine, upon it, saying that he trampled down Plato's pride ; but Plato answered readily, that this was done with greater pride. "For all is not gold that glistereth," as it is commonly said.

3. As Icarus, who, taking upon him to fly with wings made of wax, when he came near the sun, his wings melted with the heat thereof, and so he fell into the sea, which of his name is yet called the Icarian Sea : even so the ambitious, the higher they rise in glory, the more they approach the heat of God's wrath, and so do melt and fall into the gulf of eternal confusion.

4. As he that is condemned to be hanged hath no liking of the ladder, because he knoweth that the higher he climbeth the nearer he is to his death, and therefore could be content the ladder should be either broken or burned, if he might have his desire : even

3 John 9.
Mark ix. 34.
Matt. xx. 20.
Judges ix. 5.

Acts xii. 21.
1 Pet. v. 5.

Matt. xxiii. 12.
2 Sam. xviii. 9.
2 Kings xi. 1-15.

so ought we to detest ambition and pride, and endeavour to deny and mortify the same, as knowing that to desire greatness is to desire mishap, and that pride and arrogance is the highest step wherefrom man is cast headlong into utter ruin.

5. As a man hath no cause to boast of his wickedness and misery : so in his virtues doth his ambition and pride grow, take increase and nourishment, causing him many times, the more virtue he is endued with, the more to be proud.

6. As poison put into good and wholesome meat maketh it mortal : so ambition and pride, taking occasion of God's graces to boast itself, doth by such sacrilege turn us unto destruction.

7. As the peacock, so full of fair feathers, having only two foul feet, standing proudly in the circle and contemplation of his beautiful train, so soon as he seeth his feet, which he thinketh to be foul, straight humbleth himself, and abateth and seeketh to hide his feathers : even so much more ought every good Christian, by the feeling, sight, and apprehension of his many foul sins and vices, and corrupt and perverse passions that reign in him, to humble himself, and to abate his ambition and pride, engendered of a few feathers which have only some small beginning and appearance of beauty.

8. As the more directly that the sun lieth upon us, the less is the shadow of our body, 1 Cor. iv. 7. as at noon we may see by experience, and a little before and after : even so the less that we arrogate and ambitiously boast of ourselves, the greater gifts and graces of God are we endued withal.

9. Like as men would laugh at a poor man if, having precious garments lent him to act and play the part of some honourable personage upon a stage, when the play were at an end he should keep them as his own, and brag up and down in them : even so, such are they to whom God imparteth His gifts and graces, when, in lieu of yielding the praise and glory of the same to Him that is the Author and Giver of them, they ambitiously assume and take it to themselves.

10. As a tree, the higher it is, the greater force the wind hath of it, and every little blast will be puffing at it, so that the sooner and greater is the fall thereof : so the ambitious man, the higher he climbeth, the greater is his fall.

Amendment of Life necessary.

1. LIKE as, if a merchant seemeth willing to trust another that is ready to be bankrupt Matt. iii. 2; 1v. 7. with all his goods, one warning will be enough to reclaim him—ye shall not need to pray him to beware, or allege many reasons to withhold him—the fear only of apprehension of the loss of all his goods will be a reason and exhortation sufficient : even so then, when Jesus Christ saith, "Be ye better advised," that is, amend ; and note, that by offending God, and so taking the way to hell, we endanger ourselves, yea, we do even assure ourselves to lose both bodies and souls for ever. It is therefore mere madness and ungrateful rage to continue, and not to be wiser and better advised, that we may convert to God, and by amendment preserve our bodies and souls unto life everlasting.

2. As little children are nursed up to the end they may grow great and wax strong, and it were a wonder to see a child continue as little and weak as at the birth : even so, if we, who, being members of the Church of Christ, and consequently entered into the path that leadeth to the kingdom of heaven, and daily do receive the food of God's Word and Sacraments, should not increase in faith, working in love, and amendment of life, it were a great ingratitude and inexcusable obstinacy, which should not escape unpunished, to stand still in the way, and not to go forward.

Anger.Prov. xvi. 32.

1. As continual flogging doth much bruise and shake the body : so daily anger doth wound and mar the mind.

2. As a child, for want of experience, seeking with a sword to annoy others, woundeth himself : so anger, that intendeth to damage others, is most hurtful to itself.

Prov. xiv. 17.Eph. iv. 31.Col. iii. 8.

3. Like as, according to the mind of Hippocrates, that sickness is most perilous wherein the sick man altereth his countenance and hue : so, likewise, there is no disease of the mind more mischievous than anger, for it altereth the voice and going of man, that he seemeth sometimes strange and unlike to himself.

1 Cor. xiii. 5.

4. As the mariners, perceiving tempest at hand, do with anchors fasten their ship : so, before the tempest of immoderate anger doth invade us, we ought with reason to establish and fasten our mind.

Matt. v. 22.Rom. xii. 19.Prov. xv. 1—18.Eph. iv. 26.Col. iii. 8.

5. Like as, if a man blow a spark, he doth many times make a great star-fire ; but contrariwise, if he spit on it, he quencheth it clean out : even so, if one speak proud, boasting words to his enemy, he shall incense and provoke him to wrath ; but if he entreat him kindly, with fair speeches, he then shall pacify his anger before it break out.

6. Like as if a man join fire to fire, he maketh the flame the greater : even so, if a man think to suppress another man's anger by being angry himself, he shall both lose his labour, and rather increase the other man's anger.

7. As vinegar corrupteth a vessel if it be long in it : so anger doth corrupt the heart if it continue in it.

8. Like as we abhor drunkards, for that so long as they are drunken, they are without sense and understanding, differing nothing from brute beasts but in shape and portraiture only : so, in like manner, for the same cause, must we fly this choleric passion of anger, which, like a hot and fervent fever, so troubleth our minds, that so long as we are possessed therewith we cannot understand, much less speak, anything that savoureth of reason.

9. As we account him a mad and a furious man that would set fire on his own house : even so we may think of him that setteth his own heart on fire, and burneth himself through anger, malice, and revenge.

10. As vinegar spoileth the vessel wherein it is kept : so do anger and choler mar him in whom it aboundeth.

11. As every one abhorreth a wrangling and contentious person, and as every one looketh carefully to fire for fear of harm : so, likewise, we should take heed of this choleric passion of anger, which is as a dangerous flaming fire, wasting and consuming whatsoever it toucheth, and cannot be quenched but with great difficulty, being once but a little kindled.

12. As fire when it is covered with ashes, yet it is not quenched : even so anger or choler, though it be dissembled, covered, or retained in the heart awhile, yet it is not so quenched, but it hatcheth hatred, which by little and little so converteth itself into his substance, as in short time it becometh inseparable from his nature.

13. Like as, if we have but one child, we are loth he should be governed by a fool : so, likewise, we must consider that when we suffer ourselves to be transported by anger and choler, we commit ourselves, as it were, to be ruled by a furious person.

14. Like as, when our enemy invadeth us, we seek to repulse and drive him back by all means possible, lest he should set footing in our territories and land, and nestle himself near us ; and if he be entered, we are careful so to impeach and remove him, that he fortify not himself : even so, in like manner, we must make such bulwarks about our hearts, that anger and choler may no way enter ; but if it happen that it once entereth, and lieth secretly in the corners of our breasts, and that it surprise and set upon us on the sudden, or maketh way by force, we must forthwith devise all the ways we can to expel it as soon as we may.

15. If we have eaten poison, we seek forthwith to vomit it up again with all speed; and if we be fallen into any disease, we use the means we can to provide a remedy: so, likewise, when we feel any unruly motions of anger or choler, and the fiery flames thereof be once kindled in our hearts, we must be careful to repress and cool them, as we would be to quench the fire in our houses.

16. As wind in the body puffeth it up, and maketh it to swell and seem great: even so anger puffeth up a man and maketh him so proud and arrogant, that he thinketh no device so good as his own, neither will he take any counsel of himself during the heat of his fiery passion, nor yet receive any at other men's hands.

17. As they who, seeing their houses on fire, understand not what is said unto them, by reason of the noise about them and the troublesome cogitations of their own minds: even so angry and peevish persons are so senseless and void of reason, that they will not hearken to any good advice or counsel, so that if one speak gently unto them they do not regard it; if he reprove them roughly, they are the more exasperated, and become more wilful.

18. As many medicines do little profit if they be not applied after the fit be ended: so can we not comprehend any reason if, with the tumultuous and troublesome motions of anger, our minds be molested and vexed.

19. As we are wont to deal with fire, which with great earnest endeavour we seek to quench, when as it first beginneth to kindle, not expecting or tarrying till it hath taken the beams and rafters of the house, or any solid matter, whereby it may be increased and strengthened: so, in like manner, we must not stay till we burn and flame with anger, but as soon as ever we feel ourselves disposed thereunto, and that the pulse of our hearts beginneth to beat quicker than is convenient, for a right and wholesome temperature.

20. As Plato, having taken his man in a great fault, was of a sudden exceedingly moved, and having gotten a cudgel as though he would have beaten him, notwithstanding desisted, and used no further punishment; one of his friends standing by him, and seeing this thing, demanded of him why he had gotten such a cudgel; to whom he answered, that he had provided it to correct and chastise his own anger, which seemed to rebel against him, and would no longer be ruled by reason: in like manner should we do when we are troubled with this passion of anger, and get either a knife or a sword to cut the throat of it when it beginneth, and is as it were in its infancy; for we may easily at the first oppose ourselves against it, as against a tyrant, and not permit it to have rule over us; but if we suffer it to increase and to fortify itself, it will by little and little overrule us, and at length become invincible.

21. As they who have the falling sickness, to the end that others should not see them fall grovelling and lie foaming at the mouth, showing a most strange and ghastful countenance, do withdraw themselves from all company: even so we should get ourselves out of all company, that so we might the more easily tame this furious passion of anger, that so at length we might attain such a moderation and constancy of mind, that it cannot be altered with any occasion whatsoever.

22. Like as the Thebans thought at the first that the Lacedemonians were invincible, and therefore durst not meddle with them, but after that they had overcome them once or twice, then they thought they were able to conquer them, and that in set battles: so, in like manner, if we once take heart, and think that we are able (being well armed with reason) to meet anger in the field, and overcome it, we shall not need to encounter this enemy twice, for he will not be so hardy as to appear the second time, or if he do, it will be to his utter overthrow and confusion.

23. As the covetous man thinketh, that if he once obtaineth that he desireth, he will then rest contented: so we think and imagine. that if we have uttered our anger, our minds are satisfied. But as the desire of the one is nothing assuaged by the possession and increase of riches which he desireth, but rather augmenteth more than it was before: so likewise the poisoned stomach of the other is nothing eased by outrageous and furious speeches, but rather becomes more froward and perverse.

24. As fine gold doth suffer itself to be tried in the furnace six or seven times, and yet the heat of the fire doth never change its nature or colour; or as good corn is first threshed with the flail, and then winnowed in the wind, and yet is neither broken with the one nor carried away with the other: even so we should suffer ourselves to be tried by injuries, oppressions, and other hard dealing, and yet not by impatience, through anger or choler, change our nature, or yet our colour, or be carried away by any inconvenience.

25. As trees planted by running brooks do endure both winter and summer, which the first hurteth not by its frosts and cold, nor the second by its heat or drought; or as the sheep that be shorn every year, and in the end be led to the slaughter, do suffer their throats to be cut without gainsaying; or as incense doth permit itself to be cast into the fire: even so should we, through patience, being free from anger, suffer ourselves to be wrong and hardly dealt withal, that so we may the more manifest the faith which God hath given us.

Ps. cxxix, 2-4.

26. As the ship that is well made and sufficiently trimmed, neither the mighty winds, raging waves, nor stormy tempests do make it leak; or as the palm-tree, which, though it be mightily loaden, yet never bendeth; or as our Saviour Christ was whipped, mocked, and crowned with thorns, yea, and crucified too, and yet prayed for His enemies, who did Him all this harm: even so, in like manner, if we be once armed with this corslet of proof (I mean patience), not only words and injuries, which are but as the points of the thorns, should not pierce us to be angry, but also the sharp arrows of Satan, his lances and pikes, should never be able to touch or move us to the quick.

27. As, in eschewing evil, we follow that which is good, and, contrariwise, in running after vice, we flee from virtue: so, likewise, in estranging ourselves from pity and clemency, we by-and-by shake hands with anger, which is always attended by spite and envy.

God's Anger.

1. As the course of a stream, being stopped, it gathereth a great dam, and being let suddenly go, it overthroweth all in its way: even so God's anger, being stayed a time, the windows of heaven being opened, it will (shortly, it is to be feared) pour down on our heads plentifully for the manifold sins that reign in every estate throughout the whole land.

Ps. lxxv, 8, 9.

2. As wet wood, although it be long in burning, yet will burn faster at the last: so the anger of God, although it be long in coming, yet it will come the fiercer at the last.

3. As water is deepest where it is the stillest: so, where God is most silent in threatening and patient in sparing, there He is most inflamed with anger and purpose of revenge; and therefore, the fewer that the judgments be that are poured forth upon the wicked in this life, the more are reserved in store for them in the life to come.

4. Like as a man living in health, wealth, and all manner of pleasure, should have this of a sudden made known unto him, that he is condemned of treason committed against his prince and country, and that therefore he is forthwith to be deprived of life and of all those pleasures which he doth enjoy, there being no hope of pardon which cannot possibly be procured by himself or any other, it depending wholly on the gracious favour and free inclination of the prince, who, being wont to be greatly inflamed with anger against all such offenders, and not to spare one of a thousand of them—we cannot fully conceive in mind, or express in word, the greatness of his grief, sorrow, and fear: even so much more grievous and fearful a thing it will be to incur the displeasure and anger of God, the loss of eternal joy and happiness, together with those endless pains which are prepared for the wicked.

Of sumptuousness and excess in Apparel.

1. As those that build fair sepulchres for their dead corpses, whereas it should be a warning to them that they must die, and thereupon cause them to reject all ambition, pride, and vanity, yet, therefore, they take occasion to vaunt and boast: so, likewise, whereas our garments should be a continual memory of sin, to humble us, yet we, as if we would even spite God, do procure sumptuous and gorgeous apparel, to testify our ambition and pride.

2. As a thief, by law burned in the forehead for theft, ought, so oft as he looketh in a glass and perceiveth the scar thereof, to think upon and detest his inclination to that vice: so our garments, being as the scar in the forehead of our first parents and ourselves for their ambition, in that they sought to be like unto God, should, by the sight of them only, put us in mind to renounce all pride and ambition.

Gen. iii. 7, 21.
Isa. iiii. 18.

3. As every seed bringeth forth herbs or fruit according to its kind—as lettuce seed, lettuce; thistle seed, thistles: even so, if the heart be humble and modest, the garment for the body will be so also; but if the heart be proud and ambitious, it will show forth some kind of excess and pride in apparel, notwithstanding whatsoever law is to the contrary.

4. As the body, being of more value than the garment, we will sell or pawn forth the garment for to feed the body: even so ought we to leave all affection to beautify our bodies, the better to tend to the adorning of our souls.

1 Pet. iii. 3-5.
1 Tim. ii. 9.

5. Like as, if we dwell in a borrowed house, looking weekly when we must depart, we will never trouble ourselves with any cost or fitting of it, as we would do if we were sure to remain in it all the days of our lives: even so, for so much as the body is but a house lent unto the soul, from whence it looketh daily to depart, there is no reason, then, why we should be so careful to clothe this body with brave (gaudy) and costly apparel, which shortly must rot and perish, and so to neglect the soul, which is immortal.

6. As men commonly do care to be more honestly apparelled when they are to meet at some banquet or marriage, or to come before some honourable personages, than ordinarily, when they company with inferiors: even so, in like manner, we, as concerning our bodies, do accompany with men like unto ourselves; but as concerning our soul, with God and His angels, to whom it is lifted up now by faith, but at death really; therefore it is repugnant to all order and reason to care more for the beautifying of the body with sumptuous apparel than adorning of the soul.

7. Like as, if a tailor, when he hath made a garment a great deal too long and large, being reprov'd, shall have no excuse but that he had too much stuff—but this shift will not be accepted, for they would tell him that he should have made the garment after the measure of the body, but not according to the quantity of the stuff: even so they that have plenty of goods, and do not employ them after the measure of their vocation, and as beseemeth the profession of a reformed religion, but wasteth them in superfluity and excess, do expose and set themselves to the scorn and grievous reprehension both of God and His angels.

Luke xvi. 1, 2.

Application of God's Word.

1. As physicians do heal divers diseases with divers things, as necessity requireth: so the Word of God must be rightly applied, according to the quality of the sins of the people.

2 Sam. xii. 7.
Acts xlii. 38, 39;
xiv. 15, &c.

2. As a careful and skilful surgeon, who, having patients that are diseased with sundry grievous wounds and sores, and having provided drawing plasters and corrosives for the same, doth not commit them to his patients, that they should lay and apply them to their sores and wounds, lest they should withdraw and keep back the same plasters from their sores and wounds, and so seek to free themselves from the smart and grief which would ensue and follow upon the laying to of the said plasters and corrosives to their festered sores and wounds, and therefore he will not trust them therewith, but doth himself both lay and apply the same plasters and corrosives to their sores, and will himself cut out the corrupt and rotten flesh that groweth to their wounds: even so it is not enough that a preacher should deliver unto his auditors and parishioners a general doctrine, and so leave the application thereof to themselves, for (as it is commonly said) that which is spoken to all is spoken to none; but he ought so to apply his doctrine, that every one of his hearers may have his portion, and thereby well perceive that it is spoken to them—as the prophets and apostles have done.

3. As it is not possible that we can feed upon meat, except it be applied to our mouths: even so much less is it possible that our souls can be fed and nourished with the Word of God, except it be skilfully applied thereto.

2 Tim. ii. 15.

4. Like as, if the food and meat be applied to any other part but to the mouth, the application serveth not: even so it is in spiritual things. If they be not applied to the right parts and to the right diseases, the application may do them more harm than good.

Armies, or hosts of men.

As a mighty tempest and storm of great hailstones, where they fall, do beat down and destroy all the fruits of the earth: even so the armies and hosts of men which God stirreth up to plague any people withal do bear down and destroy all before them.

The complete Armour of Christians.

Eph. vi. 15-17.

1. As a soldier, if he be not shod, but barefooted, shall quickly be surbated and unable to travel: even so a Christian, not having the Gospel of peace, cannot endure.

2. As it is an absurdity for a soldier to put himself into the field naked, without armour and weapon, as well to strike the enemy as to defend himself: so, also, is it always necessary for a Christian to be armed at all points—especially to have the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

The chief cause of Atheism.

1 John ii. 15, 16.

As there is small hope to be conceived of that patient who, being grievously sick, will neither feel his disease nor believe that he is distempered, nor abide to hear of physick or physicians, nor accept of any counsel that should be offered, nor admit any talk or consultation about his curing: so, likewise, those men that inordinately love the world, which bringeth them to hate God, and to conceive enmity against Him, are in more dangerous estate than any other, for that they know not their own danger, but, persuading themselves to be wiser than their neighbours, do remove from their cogitations all things whereby their health and salvation may be procured.

The Authority of the Church not above the Word of God.

1. LIKE as it is not reason nor just that a wife should control or be superior and above her husband's word and commandment, having a wise and discreet husband to govern and command her: so, likewise, it is no reason or right (whatsoever the Papists say) that the authority of the Church, which is the wife, should be greater and of more force than the word and will of the husband Christ Jesus. Eph. v. 24.

2. As a man is not above God, nor the wife above the husband; for otherwise to say, the one is blasphemy and the other absurd: even so is it blasphemy and absurd to say that the authority of the Church is greater than the Word and Scriptures of God.

Reading of Authors.

1. As Ulysses, stopping his ears with wax, escaped the danger of the Sirens: so ought we to avoid such things as are found filthy in books and authors, though they seem pleasant, if we will avoid the danger ensuing such things.

2. As the like pleasure is not to him that goeth into a goodly garden garnished with divers kinds of herbs and flowers, and that there doth no more but behold them, of whom it may be said, that he went in for nothing and brought out nothing, and to him who, besides the corporal eye-pleasure, knoweth of every one the name and property: so verily much difference is there in reading of authors and in sundry sorts of men that do it; and much more pleasure and profit hath he who useth art and judgment than the other, who with great study, indeed, turneth them over, but, for lack of the knowledge of precepts, wanteth also the fruit and delectation that he more amply might obtain.

Baptism.

1. EVEN as they who were in the ark of Noah were preserved from the flood: so whosoever do earnestly stick to the covenant of their outward baptism are delivered from the everlasting flood—that is to say, from the pains and torments of hell—by Jesus Christ.

2. As the flood did preserve so many as were within the ark, but sunk the rest: so, likewise, is baptism available to so many as are baptized into the Church of Christ by faith, but helpeth the rest no more than it did Simon the sorcerer. Acts viii. 9, 10, &c.
Mark xvi. 16.
1 Pet. iii. 20, 21.

3. As, in the flood, both sin and sinners did perish: so, in the flood of baptism, sin sinketh, but the sinner is safe. Tit. iii. 5.
John iii. 12.

4. As the purse of a true man in the hand of a thief doth not make or prove him to be a true man: even so baptism, though it be in the assemblies of the churches of Rome, yet it doth not prove them to be the Church of God, neither doth it appertain unto them, but unto another hidden Church of God, which He hath in all ages gathered forth of the midst of them.

5. As the graft receiveth substance and nourishment of the root into which it is grafted: so they that receive baptism with such faith as they ought do truly feel the effectualness of the death of Christ in the mortifying of their flesh, and therewithal also they feel the effect of His resurrection in the quickening of the Spirit. Rom. ii. 3.
Col. ii. 12.

Baptism may not be denied to infants.

1. As circumcision was a sacrament of repentance, as Moses and the prophets do witness, and also a sacrament of faith, as the apostle teacheth, and yet God did not debar infants from receiving of the same: even so no more ought baptism to be denied to our little children. Rom. ii. 28; iv. 11.

Exod. xli. 48.
Acta xvi. 31-33.
1 Cor. i. 16.

2. Like as, in the old law, when any stranger, forsaking his idolatry, would be joined unto the people of God, and profess the same religion that they professed, both he and all his men-children were circumcised, were they never so young : even so, in the apostles' time, and many years after, when any were converted unto the faith of Christ, not only they, but all their whole households, both old and young, were sealed up with baptism, which is the seal of the people of God.

Baptized but once.

As the Israelites were but once circumcised : so we are but once baptized only, because we are but once born only. As circumcision was the first beginning of Judaism : so baptism is the first beginning of Christianity.

Baptizing by a midwife.

1. As a private man condemning or killing a murderer, because the lawful magistrate is not then at hand to do it, hath himself murdered and not executed justice, because he had no calling thereunto : even so the midwife or any other, who, without all calling, doth take in hand to baptize children, doth make a profane washing, and so administer no Sacrament of the Lord's.

2. Like as, if the will of a prince do ordain one certain man to confirm writings by his seal only which he hath appointed for that purpose, so that although another use another seal (made without or against his will) of the same matter and fashion, and in all things like it, yet it is treason to use it, and the same is none of his seal : even so by much more ought the will of God, which is, that only those who have a public calling thereunto, and have that authority given them from the Lord, should minister the Sacrament, and none other, although that other do it in the same order and with the same instruments.

3. As by the seal which the prince hath set apart to seal his grants and letters patent with, when it is stolen and set to by him that hath no authority, there groweth no assurance unto the party that hath it : so, if it were possible to be the seal of God which a woman should set to in baptizing infants, yet for that she hath stolen it, and put it to, not only without, but contrary to the commandment of God, we see not how any can take any assurance of the doing hereof ; for as well and as lawfully may she preach publicly in the Church, and minister the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper openly or otherwise, as to baptize in time of necessity, &c.

4. As a seal added to a deed or evidence by such as have no authority to put to the same hath no force to ratify or confirm the covenants and grants in the writing, which kind of seal hath been always deemed no better than a counterfeit and plain forgery : even so the outward seal of baptism added by women hath no force by God's institution to confirm any in the promises of salvation, because women have no warrant in the Word to baptize ; for every washing of the child in the name of the Trinity is not a Sacrament of baptism, neither can there be rendered any cause why the Lord's Supper ministered by them should not be counted as good a Sacrament as their baptism.

Beauty.

As a ring or jewel of gold is very unseemly and doth not become the filthy snout of a swine, that is always rooting in the dirt and mire : so uncomely is beauty to a woman that hath not wit or discretion to behave herself.

Benefits.

As the moon doth show her light to the world which she receiveth from the sun : so we ought to bestow the benefits received of God to the profit and commodity (advantage) of our neighbour.

Our second Birth.

LIKE as we see the natural body from the first birth to receive divers members. and every member divers offices and uses—as it is the use of the eye to see good or evil, and of the hand to take unto it that which is good, and to remove from the body that which is evil : even so, in the second birth, we receive new members, whereof every one hath its divers use and function, as knowledge of the will of God, hope, love, faith, which is, as it were, the hand, reaching unto us all the merciful promises of God in Christ, whereby we are so surely joined in affection to the Lord, that by nothing can we be separated.

Books.

1. As thieves be loth to assault a house where they know there be good armour and artillery : so wherever the books of the Holy Scriptures be well occupied and exercised, there neither the devil nor any of his angels dare come near.

2. Like as smiths, masons, carpenters, and other handicraftsmen, what need soever they be in, or what shift soever they make, will not sell or lay to pledge the tools of their occupation, for then they could not work or follow their trade, and so get their living : so, likewise, all good Christians ought to be like minded and affectioned towards the books of the prophets, apostles, and other holy writers inspired by the Holy Ghost, the instruments of their salvation, and therefore not to sell or pawn them away.

3. As unto those precious stones the greatest price is due which not only with their colours do delight the eyes, but also are of effect for medicines : so unto those books is the chiefest praise due which in them do not only contain pleasant speech and eloquent, but also do deliver the mind from all vice and corruption.

4. Like as one dish of meat well chewed and digested will comfort nature more than divers delicates (niceties) that lie raw and undigested in the stomach : even so one good book, often and thoroughly read, will do thy soul more good than the superficial sight and taste of a thousand.

5. Like as no wise man will receive a writing for the least plot of ground without the counsel of some learned lawyer, nor a medicine for his body without the advice of some learned physician : even so much more ought a Christian not to venture upon a book wherein may be some damnable error, which might convey from him his heavenly inheritance, or some deadly poison which might kill his soul, without the direction of some godly divine.

6. As unto men of divers complexions and affections God hath given choice of meats and variety of apparel : so, likewise, many books to one end are published and set forth by sundry men, in divers fashions and with a diverse gift, order, and facility, that he whom one book savoureth (pleaseth) not, might yet like the taste of another.

Bread and Wine in the Lord's Supper do no more change their substance and qualities than the water in Baptism.

1. As, in the sacrament of baptism, the substance of water remaineth still : so, likewise, in the Lord's Supper remaineth the substance of bread and wine.

Mark xvi. 19.
 Luke xxiv. 6, 51.
 Acts i. 9, 10.
 John xii. 8, 26.

2. As in baptism is given unto us the Holy Ghost and pardon of our sins, which lie not lurking or enclosed in the water : so in the Lord's Supper is given unto us the communion of Christ's body and blood—that is, grace, forgiveness of sins, innocency, life, immortality—without any transubstantiation or including of the same in the bread.

Gal. iii. 27.

3. As by baptism the old man is put off and the new man put on—yea, Christ is put on—but without transubstantiation or changing of the water : even so it is, in the Lord's Supper, we by faith spiritually in our souls do feed on Christ's body broken, do eat His flesh and drink His blood, do dwell in Him and He in us, but without transubstantiation.

Calamity.

1. EVEN as a cloud darkeneth the air and covereth the sun : so calamity and misery maketh cloudy the mind of man, and taking from him all his joy, it leaveth him bare and naked, without comfort and full of sorrow.

2. Like as lightnings do smite whatsoever they find in the earth except the laurel-tree, as Pliny affirmeth : even so great calamity is able to take away and to overthrow whatsoever is in man, or that he hath, save only firm and constant virtue ; for constant virtue is a goodly laurel-tree, ever flourishing and green, and will not be consumed, burnt up, nor destroyed with any fire that breaketh out of the clouds, be it never so fierce, nor with any violence of torments and troubles whatsoever.

Calling.

Rev. xvi. 1.

1. LIKE as a sword being committed into the hands of a soldier by the captain-general, he is not to smite before he be commanded to fight, and before the trumpet be sounded to battle : even so, though a man have excellences given him, yet he is not to execute any function—especially publicly—before he receive a particular warrant and calling from God.

2. As Samson, though he had strength given him that he was able to have defended the Israelites and revenged them of their enemies, yet he could not take upon him the government of the people until such time that the Lord had called him unto it : so, likewise, the ministers of the Word, albeit they have never so notable gifts of knowledge, utterance, &c., yet they are not in any case to intrude themselves into the ministry, unless they have a particular calling from the Lord.

3. As the ostrich hath wings and flieth not : so some men have a calling, but they answer it not ; they have knowledge, but they practise it not ; they have words, but they work not.

4. Like as, if a stranger should violently thrust himself in to be the shepherd of thy sheep, thou wouldst ask him who sent for him, what he had to do there, and thou wouldst rather think him to be a thief and a murderer of thy sheep than to be a faithful and trusty servant : so, surely, if thou come to take charge of God's people before He inwardly move thy conscience to pity His people, and outwardly, by order, call and place thee where He thinks good, He will judge thee a thief, a wolf, a devourer, and not a feeder.

The end of our Calling.

LIKE as, if Her Majesty (to show her puissance against a foreign power) should call forth one or two of her subjects, who are most beholden unto her, to joust and tourney in her presence for her honour, they would, no doubt, strain all their strength in this service—yea, and their lives, too : even so much more ought we that are Christians to perform this duty

Tit. ii. 13, 14.
 Ps. cxxx. 4.
 1 Pet. ii. 9.
 Cant. viii. 6.

to our God and Prince, who hath called us out by name to fight for His honour, to be a chosen and peculiar people unto Himself, to stand on His parts, to show forth His virtues, and to be zealous of good works—yea, and that we might the better perform this service, He hath furnished us with His own armour and weapons—yea, and His own holy hand is with us, too, though all men see it not; and therefore we must endeavour to do valiantly, and to do our best to answer the expectation of our heavenly King and Prince.

Distinction of Callings.

LIKE as the members in a man's body, although they live by one life and one soul, are, notwithstanding, distinct and diverse one from another in functions—as the foot seeth not, but the eye; the ear heareth, and not the hand, &c. : even so, also, the members of Christ, howsoever they live all by one and the same faith, are, notwithstanding, in their particular functions and callings, one to be distinguished from another.

Men must be fitted to their Callings, and the Callings to the men.

LIKE as a member of a man's body out of joint is dangerous, and hindereth his health and welfare: so, in like manner, the setting of children to callings unfitting their gifts and affections is dangerous and hurtful both to the Church and commonwealth.

Cards and dice.

1. As by lots the soldiers parted the garments of Jesus Christ: so may we well say that these games of cards and dice are the means to part between the world and the devil many of those who, professing the reformed religion, are addicted thereunto. Matt. xxvii. 35.
Prov. xvi. 33.
Eph. v. 16.
2. As the pleasure of gain and the sorrow for loss in play are mighty passions to move the hearts of men: so, also, a number of brawls, quarrels, and controversies do arise of carding and dicing, as swearing, cursing, and blaspheming of God, &c. Exod. xx. 7.
Matt. xii. 36.
1 Cor. x. 31.
3. As they that whet their knives upon a chalk stone do not sharpen them, but rather make them more dull and blunt: even so such as use dice and carding do not quicken their wits, but rather dull them.

Careless keepers of God's commandments.

As the Scribes and Pharisees that came from Jerusalem picked a quarrel against our Saviour Christ because His disciples did eat with unwashed hands, whereby they transgressed (as they said) the traditions of the elders, our Saviour Christ, in defence of His disciples, chargeth the Scribes and Pharisees, who were so zealous to maintain their own ceremonies, that they were careless to break the commandments of God: even so it cometh to pass always, that they who are most earnest in upholding and defending traditions and ceremonies invented by man are most forgetful in keeping the commandments of God. But this is the just judgment of God against those that invent a new worship of their own brain—that first they lose their labour, and secondly, that they are deprived of all right understanding, because they have presumed to be wiser than God—whom the word of God condemneth.

Isa. xxix. 13, 14.
vi. 9.
Matt. xxiii. 14.
Acts xxviii. 26.
Rom. xi. 8.
John xii. 40.

Careless men, who forbear to do well, because others will not do so.

Matt. xxiv. 45, 46,
&c.; xxv. 1, &c.
Luke xii. 45-47.

LIKE as, if a householder, having many servants, and much work for them abroad in the country, should give them a general commandment to work faithfully together in their common business, and that some of those servants would, in their master's absence, be idle and loiter; yet the rest of the servants ought not to be idle, because the others will in no wise consent unto them in the performance of that their appointed task: so, likewise, those careless Christians who, in a carnal security, neglecting the charge of the Lord, and imagining a delay in His coming, shall begin to eat and drink with the drunkards, and to be drunken themselves, and so, in playing the loiterers together, shall justly deserve to be plagued together; for as they have sinned together, so shall they receive their portion together.

Carelessness and negligence in good things.

1. As Tiberius the Emperor, who, being desirous to have canonized Christ among the number of saints, thought it expedient first to have therein the consent of the senate, but while he waited for their consent Christ was uncanonized, whereas Tiberius might very well have done it himself: so it is with careless Christians, who, in a matter so manifest, will yet wait for others' consent, to the hazard of their own salvation, and discovery also of their own obstinate folly.

2. Like as if many, consenting together to play the good fellows (as they call it), had played the unthrifths, and so had consumed their portions and inheritance, and were thereby become the most beggarly bankrupts on earth, and hereupon the prince, being moved with pity, should say to one of them, "If thou wilt now forsake the company of that unthrifty assembly, and attend wholly upon my pleasure, and become more honest and thrifty hereafter, I will freely bestow such a lordship upon thee;"—if hereupon this man should say to the prince, "I will none of your gift, unless these my companions shall give their consent to the same"—in thus doing he should show himself a wilful and an unwise man: even so is the case of all Christians. We are all become prodigal children, we have all run astray, we have wasted our portions, and are become utterly destitute of all goodness; the Lord notwithstanding, in his Word, doth freely offer unto us a kingdom, so that we will forsake this perverse and froward generation with whom we are linked, as in a cursed community. Shall, therefore, any good Christian who feelth the want, and findeth a desire in himself of the proffered possession, withhold himself from the same, for that other his former companions will not grant their consent? We hope not. And therefore such as are wise and fear God will not prolong to turn unto Him by true and unfeigned repentance until such time as all, both tag and rag, shall consent to the same, for fear the gate be shut; but rather will say with Joshua, "If it seem evil in your eyes," &c.; assuring themselves that if there be but eight souls in the whole world, one family in a tribe, one household in a city, yea, but two men among many thousands, when God shall begin to visit the disobedience of the wicked, and to hurl them headlong to hell, then such as hearken diligently to His voice shall be safe under His wings—His faithfulness and truth shall be their shield and buckler.

Matt. xxv. 10.
Josh. xxiv. 15.
Gen. vi. 18.

Gen. xix. 15.
Numb. xiv. 24-30.
Josh. xiv. 6.

Ps. xxxvi. 8; xci.
4-7.

Cares of the world hurtful.

As a clock can never stand still from running so long as the weights and plummets do hang thereat: even so a worldly man, having infinite cares, cogitations, and anxieties hanging upon his mind, as weights upon the clock, can never have rest or quiet day or night, but is enforced to be working his brains, when other men sleep, on the compassing of those trifles wherein he is encumbered.

Cares of this world cool the love and desire of heavenly things.

1. As the sea that the wind hath lain sore upon is yet tossed and troubled after the wind is laid and the tempest gone : even so a man's mind, lately come out of the business and cares of the world, still casteth and studieth the same things, and panteth after them and cannot after this come straight to itself, and so meditate on and exercise in spiritual matters.

Matth. xlv. 13
Lu'c' xviii. 29

2. Like as, when a river or fountain is troubled, there can no water be taken or drawn out of them but such as is full of mud : even so, when the mind is troubled and choked with the over-careful and unquiet savour of the mire and dirt of this peevish world, there can neither holy prayers nor any godly exercise be found there.

Carnal men.

1. As a child, born and brought up in a dungeon, will not believe (if his mother tell him) of the light of the sun, and such other pleasant commodities, that there are such things, or very hardly : even so no more will carnal men believe either the immortality of the soul or the mercy and judgment of the Lord, &c.

2. Like as in other matters it cometh daily to pass, that men, being in process of time brought by experience to see their own errors, wherein they have done amiss, are displeased with themselves for so doing, wish they had done otherwise, and so are said to repent of this or that action : so carnal men, having all their lives lived in vain and sinful pleasures, altogether careless of the service of God and of their own salvation, at length see the vanity of their lives past, are grieved for it, and wish (although too late) that they had taken another course.

3. As Adam, by coming out of the state of holiness into the state of sin, had his eyes opened to see the filthiness of sin and his own nakedness, whereupon he, being ashamed, desired to hide and cover himself : so, in like manner, carnal men, coming out of the state of senseless security, wherein they neither knew nor considered what sin is, into the state of repentance, wherein they conceive of sin as it is indeed, and judge themselves in regard of it the most abject men of all other, unworthy of their company or to come in their sight, and therefore they decline and shun it, wherein this shame doth consist.

Carnal-minded men.

As with a lewd and naughty companion, if we keep company we shall learn no good, but rather be ready to be infected with his sin and vice : even so, if we suffer ourselves to be acquainted with the flesh, and use it as a companion in all our dealings, and yield unto it, we shall then be sure to learn no good of it, for the flesh provoketh us to whoredom, to drunkenness, to wantonness, &c. Now, if we shall acquaint ourselves with the flesh, we shall learn those things which tend to our destruction.

Gal. vi. 8.
Rom. viii. 12-16,
Tit. ii. 12.

Catechising.

1. Like as a child that learneth the A, B, C, when he hath once learned his letters, is yet ready to learn the same again : even so many parishioners are so forgetful, that when they are past one principle and point of religion, they must yet be brought back again to the same.

Heb. v. 12-14.

1 Cor. iii. 2.

2. As weak and young infants must have milk given them, and not strong meat : even so many rude people must have the rudiments and first beginnings of religion rather taught them, than higher points which their capacity cannot yet digest.

3. As there is little hope that a child that cannot abide to take milk and other liquid and nourishing meat will live long, for he cannot, then, brook stronger meat : even so those people must needs perish that will not, nor cannot, abide to learn the principles and least points of Christianity, much less can they brook higher points.

4. As that schoolmaster who still commandeth his scholars, saying, "Learn this, learn this," and yet never calleth them to account how the same is learned, may assure himself that his scholars will have but a slender regard to be perfect in that which he commandeth, because they think they shall never be examined how they have profited : even so falleth it out with the minister towards his parishioners, that, although he be very diligent to preach unto them the principles of the Christian religion, yet, if he be not careful to catechise and examine them particularly therein, there will come and appear little profit, or none at all, by his labours, as experience proveth the same.

The Cause of God's Plagues to be diligently searched out.

LIKE as the physician seeing in a glass, by the water, the disease within the body, by skill and learning searches out the cause of the disease and ministers good things for the same : so we, in looking into the glass of God's Word, shall soon perceive the diseases and sins which are in us, and the cause thereof, and so wholesomely minister some profitable and comfortable remedies for the same.

The wonderful Change of Christians.

1 Pet. iv. 6.

As it is a great miracle for a dead man to be raised again : so, like wise, is the change that Christ hath made in those that be His wonderful.

Charity.

1 Cor. xiii. 1., &c.

1. As the fire in all work-houses is the instrument of all arts, and the means to make things well liked of amongst men : so, in the life of man, nothing is well done without love and charity.

1 Cor. xiii. 13.

2. As gold doth excel all metals, is rare and dear, and more fair and durable : even so charity doth excel all virtues, and ceaseth not, but is permanent.

3. As the body without the soul enjoyeth no life : so all other virtues without charity are cold and fruitless.

Disobedient Children.

Exod. xx. 12.

1 Sam. ii. 22.

1 Kings i. 25, &c.

Deut. xxi. 18, &c.

Prov. xx. 20.

Eph. vi. 2.

EVEN as a long and prosperous life is promised unto obedient sons : so, on the other side, all disobedient, unthankful, and obstinate children are assured of the punishment of infamy, joined with divers and great calamities and torments.

Children dying before they be baptized are not damned.

1. As by circumcision, which was a cutting off of the foreskin, the children of the Hebrews were brought unto God, were sealed up with the seal of His covenant, and received into His Church, to the great comfort and joy of the parents, who were certified by the same that God was not only their God, but also the God of their posterity and seed; and yet, if anything had happened unto them afore they could be circumcised, they mistrusted not but that God would, by the virtue of His Testament, save them: so, by baptism, the children of Christians are brought unto Christ, are sealed up with the seal of the people of God, and received into His Church as members of His Son Jesus Christ and fellow-heirs with Him of His heavenly kingdom, which thing unto the faithful parents must be a heavenly comfort; for by it they are certified and assured that their sins be not only washed away with the blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, but also the sins of their posterity and children. But if it be not the pleasure of God that the fathers and mothers should see their children alive, for to offer and present them unto Him by baptism, yet there is no cause why they should think that they shall be damned, because the grace of God is not bound to the Sacraments. For if there were some good man among the Turks, or else among the idolaters and infidels, who had the knowledge of the Gospel and a true faith in our Saviour Christ, and yet could by no manner of means come by the Sacrament of Baptism, or be baptized, yet no man ought so much as to think that such a one, for want of a little water, should be damned, seeing he hath the chief and principal—that is to say, a true, justifying faith—else the water would have more virtue and efficacy than the blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, or at least as much, and the minister that should minister the outward baptism would be of as much power as Jesus Christ Himself.

2. Like as the water and minister can do nothing without the Spirit and blood of our Saviour Christ: so it should follow (if children be damned that die before they be baptized) that Jesus Christ's Spirit and blood should be able to do nothing without the water and minister. And so, by this means, our Saviour Christ and His Spirit should be as subject unto the minister and water as the water and minister should be subject unto Christ and His Holy Spirit; and so, consequently, His grace and mercy should be alligated and bound unto corruptible elements, and made subject unto men, whereby it would come to pass that Jesus Christ should be no more true God nor yet true Saviour.

3. As the fleshly children of Abraham, and such as came of his flesh, who departed this life before the eighth day of circumcision were not damned, but, by the virtue of the promise and covenant of God, were saved: so, also, after the same manner, the spiritual children of Abraham—that is to say, the infants of all Christians—are not condemned if they de cease before baptism, but are saved by the efficacy of the promise of God, and by invisible baptism wherewith our Saviour Christ baptizeth them, who, by His death and precious blood, hath redeemed them.

Education of Children.

1. LIKE as fruitful fields, for lack of tillage, wax barren; or as trees, being neglected, either bring forth no fruit or else the same unsavoury without the diligence of grafting and pruning; or as dogs be unmeet to hunt with the horse, and oxen unapt to the plough, except man's diligence be put thereto: even so children would become wild and unprofitable except, by diligence and in due time, they should be fashioned and brought in order by good bringing up.

2. Like as planting and carefulness hath great power in all growing things: even so hath education greater virtue and strength—yea, and better fruit—in the diligent bringing up of children.

3. Like as noblemen and gentlemen are desirous to have a good and skilful horse-keeper that can keep their horse well, and they spare not to give great stipends to such: even so how much more ought Christian parents be desirous to have and maintain a good schoolmaster that might godlily bring up their children in virtue and wisdom.

4. Like as, if a horse be not well broken, or have any evil quality, the owner will be careful to see it remedied, and that he may be made gentle : so, likewise, godly parents, seeing their natural child evilly brought up, ought to be much more careful that he may be brought to some good order.

5. As there be some men who can easily see and spy a spavin, a sprent, a ringbone, or such other disease in a horse : even so much more ought a good father be as ready to look that there be no faults in his children, or in the teacher unto whom he committeth the charge to bring them up in learning and good manners.

Prov. xxii. 6.
Deut. iv. 9, 14;
xxii. 46.

6. As a vessel will long retain and keep the savour of that wherewith it is first seasoned : even so, if children be taught good things whilst they be young and tender, they will abide and stick the longer with them.

7. Even as a plant will sooner take nourishment and thrive better in the soil where it first grew and sprung up than in any other ground, because it liketh its own soil best : so, likewise, children will sooner take instruction and good nurture from their parents, whom they best like, and from whom they had their first being, than from any other.

Prov. xxii. 6.
Deut. iv. 9;
xi. 18, 19.

8. Like as our first parent Adam, and so all others after him, have been a means of falling to all their posterity in begetting children in their own image, which, according to the law of creation, should have been born in God's image : so, now, in lieu of this, all parents should lend their hands to their children, to lift them up again by good education, and never cease until they see, in some measure, the beauty of the first image and the virtue of the Second Adam.

Prov. xviii. 21

9. As life and death are in the power of the tongue : so also, we may well say, life and death are in the education of our children ; for if they be well brought up, it shall be life unto them, but if it be otherwise, they be trained up to everlasting death.

10. Even as a weed, if it grow in a rank soil, will wax out of measure noisome : so children coming of honourable parents, brought up in ease, and pampered with the delights of gentry, wax immeasurably vicious, whom neither laws, nor magistrates, nor any other good means can hardly keep under.

Lam. iii. 26.

11. As the brute ox and ass would never endure their hard labour except they were held in by their yoke, but would stray every way : so unbridled man, if he be not in his youth held in by the yoke of painful labour and virtuous education, he will never abide it when he is old, but will run out into every path of destruction.

12. As Alexander the Great attained to have such a puissant army, whereby he conquered the world, by having children born and brought up in his camp, whereby they became so well acquainted and exercised with weapons from their swaddling clothes, that they looked for no other wealth or country but to fight : even so, if thou wouldst have thy children either to do great matters, or to live honestly by their own virtuous endeavours, and not to gape unjustly for other men's goods, but to be content with the blessing of God upon their labours, thou must acquaint them with painstaking in their youth, and so to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

Prov. xi. 20;
xxix. 13.

13. As those who have experience in keeping and repairing of the sea-banks can easily tell us, that if the raging waves should be suffered to break over but one tide, they could hardly in many days recover it again : even so, if parents suffer their children's affections, through want of good education, to have the full swing and course—yea, but a small season—they shall hardly or never again win this breach.

14. Even as the fattest soil bringeth forth the rankest weeds : so pampered children, brought up without due government and discipline, thrust forth the greatest and most overgrown vices.

15. As young plants, being straightened while they be tender, and trimmed with pruning and other parts of husbandry, will grow very goodly to behold in their greatness, which being neglected are many times very crooked and unfit for divers uses: so, likewise, do young men and women, for the most part, prove as they are nurtured in their youth.

Children not to be clothed with over-costly apparel.

As soft flax soon catcheth hold on the fire: so, likewise, youthful nature will soon be inflamed with costly apparel and with new fashions, which is a great fault in parents, as lamentable experience too much teacheth us this day.

Isa. xlv. 7.
Zeph. ii. 6.

The Children of God.

1. LIKE as a heathen man, being asked why he did wear such a long bushy beard, answered, that so often as he beheld it, he might commit nothing unworthy the gravity of the same—he would not be like a tavern with a bush at the door and no wine within: so, likewise, if any man shall ask the children of God why they are called Christians, the Church of God, the Spouse of Christ, citizens of heaven, and by such like names of love and honour, they are to answer, that so often as they remember these names and titles, they ought not to commit anything unworthy the gravity and majesty of the same.

2. As many Papists, and some Protestants, too, who be superstitious and popishly affected, do not remember what titles they have, nor by what names they be called, and therefore they must have puppets and images in their churches and houses, to put them in mind of their duty to God: even so some men's religion and holiness is all in their titles of God's children, and in naked names of Christians, which only they hold, when, indeed, all Christianity is banished from them.

3. Like as it is counted a shame for a citizen to go like a courtier, or for a man to put on woman's apparel, or a woman to wear man's apparel, which is an abomination to the Lord: even so is it a greater shame for the children of God, who are citizens of heaven, to go after the fashion of the courtiers of hell, or after the manner of the world.

Rom. xli. 26.

4. As, when Christ the Lord of life was put to death, there was darkness upon the face of the earth, the veil of the temple rent, the graves opened, and the dead arose, &c., at the first sight whereof the very enemies of Christ who watched Him were afraid for that they had done unto Him, yea, they were constrained to confess and say, "Doubtless this man was the Son of God": so, likewise, the children of God, that be or ought to be dead with Christ their Head unto sin, as He died for our sins, then there will follow a wonderful alteration in their lives; there will appear such zeal in professing of the Gospel, such pity in relieving the poor, such patience in bearing the cross, such faithfulness in performing of promises, such charity in judging their brethren, such mercy in forgiving offences, such sincerity in worshipping of God, such constancy in defending of the truth, such watching over all their ways, and such wisdom in winning men to God, that their very enemies, who before did mock them, hate them, and persecute them, shall be constrained, with shame, to say, "These are, no doubt, the children of God; these are good men; these are true professors, indeed!" &c.

Matt. xxvii. 54.
Rom. vi. 4, 5, &c.

5. Like as worldly men, in their houses, in their apparel, in their feastings, in their furniture, and in everything, strive to have matches, and all their things suitable: so, likewise, the children of God must strive to have their titles and names, their lives and qualities, their profession and practice, suitable and answerable the one to the other, and so to depart from iniquity.

2 Tim. ii. 19.

6. As carnal men desire to be gorgeously apparelled: even so the children of God desire to be clothed with their house, which is from heaven.

2 Cor. v. 2.

7. Even as plants and trees do spread abroad their roots in the earth, from whence they have their nourishment : so, likewise, the children of God, because they be fed with delicacies and dainties from heaven, and are nourished with the grace and favour of God, they hold up their hands, they turn up their eyes, they lift up their hearts and minds to God that is in heaven, from whence their souls receive comfort, joy, salvation, and everlasting life.

Rude and wanton Children.

LIKE as when any are stung with the poisonous sting of serpents, forthwith they labour for remedy against the same, lest the wound rot and put them to further annoyance : even so such children as be infected and diseased with wanton idleness, being also destitute of good manners and learning, must be sent to the school to be cured by their master with the rod of correction and virtuous education:

Christ.

Heb. ii. 11.
Acts xvii. 28.

1. LIKE as our arms, hands, feet, and the rest of our members are nourished, not of and by themselves, but of and by the meat that is conveyed into our mouth and head : even so we are nourished, not of and by ourselves, but by the virtue that is poured from the head of Christ Jesus.

Ps. xix. 1, 4.

2. Like as the sun with his light beneficially comforteth all the world : so Christ, the Son of God, reacheth His benefits unto all men, so that they will receive them thankfully, and not refuse them disobediently.

3. As the sun is the well-spring of lively power : so Christ giveth life everlasting to all believers.

4. As the sun with his brightness driveth away clouds and foggy mists : so Christ, the Son of God, sitting at the right hand of His Father, is the Conqueror of tyrants and heretics.

5. As the sun in winter, when he is farthest off from the pole, is nearest the earth : so the Son of God is most near unto the godly ones in misery, and giveth them help and salvation.

6. As it is a most certain token of death to a sick man (as Hippocrates saith) if he dream that the visible sun is hidden, obscured, and darkened : so, likewise, a most certain death of the soul is nigh at hand if our Sun Christ be darkened by abolishing or corrupting the true doctrine.

1 Cor. i. 30.

7. As the sun gives light plentifully to the whole world, and yet keeps the self-same light within itself : even so our Saviour Christ, God and man, hath the perfect fullness of all goodness in Himself, and yet gives part to us, as He thinks good, not losing any piece of that He hath Himself, but lighting our darkness with that light which He hath within Himself.

John v. 26.

8. As the fountain from which all men do draw water, and from which the small creeks and arms do run and flow, is said to have water of itself, and yet cometh not as of itself, but from the spring which daily feedeth it, and from the flowing streams, and is sufficient for all men to draw out of : even so Jesus Christ hath life in Himself—to wit, the fullness of life wherewith He liveth, and quickeneth His ; and yet hath He it not as of Himself, for He witnesseth in another place that He liveth because of His Father.

Christ a king.

As King David, when he had reigned thirty-three years in Jerusalem, died with great victory: even so Christ Jesus our Lord and grand Captain, after He had preached the Kingdom of His Father, got this noble victory against death and all His enemies in the thirty-third year of His age, by suffering death, and triumphantly ascending into heaven, where He reigneth a glorious King for ever.

Christ a most wholesome medicine and salve to all poor sinners.

1. As the brazen serpent was elevated and lifted up in the desert by Moses to heal all those that did look upon it: so it was necessary that our Saviour Jesus Christ (as He Himself doth witness) should be hanged upon the cross, and lifted up on high, to heal all those that be deadly stung and wounded by the old serpent the devil.

Numb. xxi. 8.
John iii. 14; xii.
31-33.

2. As the brazen serpent had the figure, form, and shape of a serpent, and yet it was no serpent, no, nor yet had any venom or poison: so our Saviour Christ did take upon Him the shape of a sinner; and yet He was no sinner, but was and is a most wholesome medicine and sovereign salve unto all poor sinners that do behold and look upon Him by faith, and that seek for salvation nowhere else but in the only merits of His death and passion.

Heb. iv. 15.

3. As there was no physic, medicine, or salve that could heal those that were stung of the fiery serpents, but only the looking upon the brazen serpent that was erected and set up by the commandment of God: even so have we no manner of physic or salve against sin and everlasting death, or any other object or mark set before the eyes of our faith to behold, for to bring life, health, and salvation unto us, but only Jesus Christ, being crucified, who is given unto us of God. For it doth not belong unto us to choose the medicine or salve, but it pertaineth to God, our Sovereign Physician, who alone is able to heal us from this deadly sickness, who also alone knoweth what medicine or salve is necessary for us.

4. As it is not in our power to find the medicine of salvation, so can we not of ourselves find the manner and means how to use and apply the same; for, as in the sickness of the body, the sick person, when he is past all hope of health, and utterly despaireth, it is needful for the skilful physician, not only to find and prepare the medicine, but also dispose the sick person so as he will and may use this medicine, and that he may understand rightly how to use and apply it: so the sickness of the soul, which is most precious above all things, and in the which mankind is not only ignorant, but also enemies of their own salvation, then we must understand by our Saviour Christ, the Physician of the soul, what is the medicine, and then after what manner it must be used; yea, and in such wise, that the same our Physician Christ Jesus do prepare and make us apt and meet, that we both will and can use these remedies which He hath prepared and appointed for us, or else it will be no profit nor stand us in any stead.

Christ a sure rock.

As he that setteth the foundation of his house upon a firm rock may be sure that the foundation shall be able to bear the weight of that which shall be set upon it, and that no rain or flood shall wash it away: so he that buildeth his faith upon Christ as He is set out and preached unto us in the Gospel shall be sure that hell-gates—that is, all the power, force, and cunning of the devil—shall never be able to prevail against him.

Matt. vii. 24, 25.
xvi. 18.

Christ took upon Him our infirmities.

Heb. ii. 17; iv. 15.
Jsa. liii. 3, 4.

LIKE as, if a man be sick of some grievous disease, and if a friend come unto him that hath been troubled with the same disease, he will show more compassion than twenty others: even so Christ, having felt in His own soul and body the anguish and the manifold perplexities that we feel in our temptations and afflictions, hath His bowels, as it were, a-running towards us, evermore being pressed and ready to relieve us in all our miseries.

Christ and the Holy Ghost are of the Father.

As both the light and the heat are of the fire: so Christ and the Holy Ghost both are of the Father, the one begotten, the other proceeding; and the Father only is of Himself, and of no other.

Christ became poor to make us rich.

Matt. viii. 20.
2 Cor. viii. 9.

LIKE as the poor birds have their nests to fly unto and to rest themselves in: so, contrariwise, our Saviour Christ, being base and poor, had no place of His own on the earth to rest His head in, that so He might enrich us.

Christ betrayed and sold.

Mat. xxvi. 25; 26.

As Joseph was sold of his own brethren into the hands of strangers: even so was Christ our Saviour betrayed and sold of Judas, His own disciple, and delivered of His own nation into the hands of Pilate and the heathen.

Christ cometh of the Father.

As the sun remaineth the same, and is not lessened by the beams which it spreadeth abroad: so neither is the substance of the Father lessened nor changed though He have the Son, an image of Himself.

Christ comforteth His.

Ps. lxxiii. 6.

As the rain maketh the new-mown grass freshly to spring again, and showers so comfort the earth that it yieldeth the fruits thereof: even so shall Christ refresh, foster, nourish, and cherish His people.

Christ communicated to us by a spiritual manner.

2 Cor. x. 15.
Eph. v. 30.
John xvii. 21-23.
Col. ii. 12.

1. As we verily take and eat the bread and wine by a natural manner, the which incontinent (immediately) after, by digestion, turneth into our substance and nourishment of our corporal life: so, likewise, as verily (although by a spiritual and celestial manner, and not with mouth and teeth) is Jesus Christ Himself, who is now in heaven on the right hand of His Father, communicated unto us, that we may be flesh of His flesh—that is to say, being knit and incorporated with Him by faith, our souls and our bodies do attain to eternal life—yea, even whilst we be in this world, His Spirit doth sanctify and govern our bodies and souls, to dedicate and sacrifice all our life to His service and to the love of our neighbours, for the love of Him.

2. As no man will deny a man's wife to be with her husband one body and flesh, although he be at London and she at York : so, likewise, it cannot truly be denied that the coupling of Christ's body and blood to the Sacrament is a spiritual thing, and, therefore, there needs not any such carnal presence as the Papists do imagine.

Christ confounds His enemies.

As Joshua dealt with the five kings that were hid in the cave, he first makes a slaughter of their armies, then he brings them forth and makes the people to set their feet on their necks, and to hang them on five trees : even so Christ deals with His enemies. He treads them under His feet, and makes a slaughter not so much of their bodies as their souls. And this the Church of God finds to be true by experience, as well as it finds the love of Christ towards itself.

Josh. x. 24.
Luke xvii. 27.
Ps. ii. 9.
Ps. cx. 1.

Contempt of Christ.

As a strumpet loveth the tokens that her lover sendeth her better than her lover himself, and in time of poverty she will utterly forsake him : so Christ is our Lover, and man's soul is she whom He loveth. He hath given us tokens as pledges of His love—to wit, all kinds of riches and good things whatsoever we possess in this world. Now, if, for love of keeping these things in time of persecution, we forsake our Lover, we be abominable strumpets, unworthy to be beloved of Him.

Christ crucified healeth us.

As skilful and cunning physicians are wont sometimes, when a sick man is sore vexed with a numbness of his whole body, to cut a vein of his head, that the letting of blood may heal the body of that disease and sickness : even so Christ is our Head and we are His members ; a vein of our Head is cut that our whole body may be healed. Christ suffered, that mankind might be redeemed.

Col. i. 18.
Gal. iv. 4.

The right knowledge of Christ crucified.

1. As Elisha, when he would revive the child of the Shunammite, went up and lay upon him, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his hands upon his hands, and his eyes upon his eyes, and stretched himself upon him : even so, if thou wouldst be revived to everlasting life, thou must by faith, as it were, set thyself upon the cross of Christ, and apply thy hands to His hands, thy feet to His feet, and thy sinful heart to His bleeding heart, and content not thyself, with Thomas, to put thy finger into His side, but even dive and plunge thyself wholly, both body and soul, into the wounds and blood of Christ.

2. As the dead soldier tumbled into the grave of Elisha was made alive at the very touching of his body : even so shalt thou, by a spiritual touching of Christ dead and buried, be quickened to everlasting life.

2 Kings iv. 34.

2 Kings xiii. 21.

Christ's goodness considered, there was never any creature dealt so unkindly with Him as man doth.

As sometimes it falleth out that a hen sitteth upon a duck's eggs, and with her diligent sitting and the heat of her body she doth hatch and bring them forth ; and when they be able to follow her she clucks them, and, after her manner, as though they were her natural

Matt. xxv. 37.
Ps. xv. 2.
Prov. xxiii. 26.
Col. iii. 5.
Phil. iii. 20.

Ps. cxviii. 2.
 1 Tim. iv. 5-7.
 Matt. xxv. 41.

chickens, she doth call them about her ; but they being not of her, but the duck's kind, though by her they have been hatched and of her have received life, and though she hath a continual care to bring them up and to defend them from such enemies as seek to devour them, yet, nevertheless, they will follow and seek after that whereunto by nature they are inclined and given ; when she is scraping and scratching in the earth to find them food, they will be in the water, mire, or foul puddle, after their kind ; she may cluck and walk alone, they will not keep her company, unless, perhaps, in some danger ; when the kite is ready to catch them, for some succour, they will fly to her ; howbeit, at the length, when she perceiveth them to be unnatural and unkind to her, she doth forsake them and give them over : even so our sweet Saviour Christ Jesus, having taken great pains for us, and having humbled Himself, even in the lowest degree of all humility that can be named—as in coming down out of His Father's bosom, being most perfect, most holy, and omnipotent God, being every way equal and in nothing inferior to His Father, to take our weak, frail, and feeble nature upon Him, and (sin excepted) to have a perfect feeling of all our miseries and infirmities—as wearisomeness of body, hunger and thirst, and such others ; and, besides the enduring of these many years together, having suffered a most cruel death, and even at His death upon the cross having tasted and taken a full cup of His Father's fury and indignation, which was, indeed, filled and prepared for us as a just reward for our sins, and should have been our own cup and our own portion for ever and ever, had He not even then taken and supped it up, to clear and to free us from it. Again, after all these things, having still continued His humility in suffering death, by keeping His body three days in the grave, and even, as it were, to be trodden and trampled upon, and then, maugre death, hell, devil, and Jews, having risen again, and ascended and gone up to His Father, where now (until His coming again to judge the quick and the dead) He sitteth at the right hand of Majesty and Power, He speaketh and calleth unto us by His prophets, apostles, and ministers, and willet us to remember what case and estate we were in before He died, and suffered all these things for us ; and He would have us to know, to be sure and never to forget, that if He had not suffered death here upon earth as He did, we should never have found any way or entrance into heaven ; the celestial joys and pleasure of the Lord's saints, salvation, and eternal life should never have belonged unto us. We should have had no more to do with them than they that livewithout faith and die infidels. The horrors of hell and the stinking lakes of unspeakable shame, confusion, torments, endless death, and damnation should have been our inheritance, lot, and perpetual portion. Christ, therefore, doth daily put us in mind that we be not our own, but His, and that we be the greatest and dearest purchase that ever was made in heaven or in earth, and that the like price and cost was never bestowed upon any creatures as upon us. When the angels which were in heaven, in the presence of their Creator, did once offend, they were hurled out and cast into hell ; Christ would not bestow upon them one penny of all that great price and rich ransom which He paid for us ; He would not then become man, to shed one drop of blood for them ; but for our sakes He spared not one drop, but shed all. The hen, that Himself speaketh of, was never so diligent and careful to gather her chickens under her wings as He hath ever been to shroud and to protect us against all the enemies of our souls and bodies. Many mothers shall sooner forget the children of their own womb, and utterly forsake them, before Christ will forsake us—yea, He will never forget or forsake us unless we first forget and forsake Him. Now, therefore, we being His, so dearly bought and so truly paid for, He calleth upon us every day, He clucketh us, and looketh for us, that we should follow Him and tread in such steps as He hath appointed, and that we should not range at random, but keep ourselves within the hearing of His voice, and our lives within the limits of obedience unto the same. These things He looketh for at our hands. But we deal with this most kind, most loving, and most merciful Redeemer and Saviour of our souls and bodies even as the unnatural and unkind ducks deal with the hen, of whom they have received life. They regard not her clucking, neither we Christ's calling. When she is seeking and providing for them on the fair, dry, and wholesome earth, they will be in some foul water, filthy mire, or stinking puddle ; and when the Lord Jesus calleth us to integrity of life, to do the thing that is just and right in His own eye, and to speak the truth, according to the knowledge of our hearts, then will we with greediness pollute our souls and bodies with all wickedness and things that be abominable—then will we oppress our brethren, not caring who sink, if ourselves swim ; then will we not stick to speak lies, even to God's own face. And when the Lord calleth, and sendeth us to seek heavenly things, we presently return to the foul puddles of the world, carnal delights and vain—yea, vile—pleasures, so that we ever take the contrary way to that which Christ commandeth. Christ calleth for our hearts, to have them in truth and sincerity, with all diligence, to attend upon His pleasure and to wait on His will ; He would have us, not in part, but wholly to give them unto Him ; and without the heart He will receive and take in good part, at our hands and lips, nothing. But we, on the other side, give nothing less to God than our hearts. There is nothing that may and cannot command our hearts, and have them at pleasure, sooner than Christ Jesus, who, with the death of His own heart, gave life to our bodies and souls. If the world do but a little smile upon us, and give us but an alluring look and a fair word, we will by-and-by follow it, and bestow upon it all our attendance. If the devil himself can make us believe that we shall either have profit or pleasure by doing his will, our hearts, minds, wills, and all, are readier for him than for Jesus Christ. Oh, matchless—yea, monstrous madness ! they that seek our destruction can sooner, with a pleasant look, than Christ with the giving of His life for us, have us at commandment. Christ would have us to mortify our earthly members, as fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affections, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry ; but, alas ! we nourish, pamper, and cherish all these. The Lord would have our conversation in heaven, but we are altogether carnally and earthly minded. The Lord would have our feet to stand within the gates of Jerusalem, but we love rather to be trampling the streets of Egypt, Babylon, and Sodom. The Holy Ghost would have us to fight a good fight, to finish our course after the will of God, and to keep the faith, not only in words, but also in life and deeds ; indeed, we are apt and ready to fight and strive for worldly promotion, honour, dignity, revenues, and riches ; but for heaven and heavenly things we will never strive, take no pains, nor once trouble ourselves ; we will have it with ease and all manner of pleasures, or else not at all—farewell it. The courses we take here in this life are very bad, and the end, unless we repent, is like to be worst of all ; and whilst we have no care to keep good consciences, it is impossible for us to keep faith. If Christ and Satan should stand before us, the one pointing us to heaven and eternal felicity, but the way to it full of troubles, griefs, and sorrows ; the other pointing to hell, but the way to it full of delicacies, pleasures, and dainty delights ; then let God call and the devil call, yet the devil, it is to be feared, is like to have the greater number to follow him for those short pleasures, and Christ but a few to follow Him, because they must go loaded with crosses and afflictions. Daily experience doth teach us no less, seeing all our actions are carnal and have only but little outward show, and no taste at all of true godliness, nor so much as any relish of the Spirit and love of Christ. Some will abstain from the committing of any gross sins now and then, and yet not that in any true and sincere love to God, but either for fear of shame and punishment in this world, or else fear of vengeance in the world to come, both which are unprofitable ; for the Lord hath no pleasure in forced service. He will have it voluntary, with the heart and proceeding of love, not of a servile fear ; otherwise it shall be numbered with the rest of our sins. This doth greatly condemn us, that though we do not such things ourselves, yet we can, without trouble of conscience, grief of heart, or vexation of mind, see and hear the Lord's name blasphemed, His Sabbath unhallowed, idolatry committed, parents dishonoured, whoredom, theft, murder, and covetousness commonly used, and all the laws of God utterly condemned ; and it shall never offend the greatest number so much as a thorn in a foot, or a blain or push (pimple) upon a finger. This, undoubtedly, is even to forsake God in the plain field, and to be afraid to serve Him in truth and sincerity, lest we should thereby purchase man's displeasure. Unless, therefore, we learn to serve Him better, in more truth, with greater zeal, in singleness of heart, we have nothing else to look for but that He will forsake us, both in this world, leaving us destitute of His assistance that our enemies may prey upon us, and also in the world to come, in giving out against us His malediction, curse, woe, and sentence of death.

Death of Christ.

1. As the herb panax, or panacea, hath in it a remedy against all diseases: so is the death of Christ, against all sin, sufficient and effectual.

Jonah i. 15, &c.

2. Like as the storm and tempest of the sea was pacified, and ceased as soon as Jonah was cast into it: even so, by the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, the wrath of God was truly and indeed pacified, that calmness might be given unto the troubled consciences of sinners, and a most sure atonement and peace made betwixt God and us.

3. Like as a corrosive, which, being applied to the part infected, eateth out the venom and corruption: even so the death of Christ, by faith applied, fretteth out and consumeth the concupiscence and the corruption of the whole man.

Christ died to deliver us.

Judges xvi. 30.

1. As Samson himself died to deliver his people from the Philistines: so, likewise, Christ, to deliver us from the devils, died Himself.

2. Like as, if a man should go to prison for debt, or any such matter, and one of his friends should come in the mean season, and pacify the creditor by satisfying and paying the debt, then we may well say, that he hath delivered this man out of prison, although he came not there, but should have gone thither; or as when we say, such a man hath delivered his friend from the gallows, we mean not that he was already hanged, for then were the deliverance too late, but we mean, that he delivered him, that he should not be hanged: so, likewise, is it when the Scripture saith, that Christ died to deliver us out of hell, because He saveth and delivereth us that we come not there, who otherwise should surely have gone thither, and have been damned perpetually, except Christ, by His death, had delivered and loosed us.

Christ fisheth for men.

The devil's bait.

As the devil, that wicked and crafty fisher, with his great, large, long, and broad nets, taketh and draweth up great multitudes and infinite numbers of souls, who voluntarily give themselves unto him, and do suffer him most easily to take them by and with his baits—which are, voluptuousness, the foul pleasures and rotten delights of the flesh, worldly wealth at will, the vain glory of the world, innumerable riches of all sorts, power, authority, vanity, an insatiable desire to bear rule, and a thousand such others—the silly, poor fishes, being deceived by these baits, do never feel the hook until it stick so fast in their jaws that there is no escaping, but the devil maketh a full account of them as of his own: even so, contrariwise, Christ doth fish for men, that He may draw them out of the bitter waters of the dangerous sea, and that He may give unto them the water of grace, seeking to save their souls, and to bring them to everlasting happiness and celestial immortality (who yet fly from Him, and would not come near Him). He fisheth with a sharp and bitter bait, very unpleasant to the corrupted nature and appetite of a natural man—to wit, with much fasting, praying often; with watchings, honest labours in a man's calling, contempt of the world, spiritual poverty; bitter tears, deep sighs, and grievous groans, for sins committed against the Lord; with humility and lowliness of heart; with kindness, peace, patience, Christ's bait.

righteousness, and such other things; all which, although to those who are inclined with a right and true love of God they are pleasant and welcome, yet, nevertheless, to the will and desire of a mere natural man, who is a friend of flesh and blood, they are hard, and do seem very bitter to his corrupted taste.

Christ hath prepared a place for us in heaven.

LIKE as, if a man were assured that there were made for him a great purchase in Spain or Turkey, so, as if he would but come thither, he might enjoy it, he would not forbear to adventure the dangers of the sea, and of his enemies also, if need were, that so he might come to his own: even so, seeing that Christ Jesus hath made a purchase for us in heaven, and there is nothing required of us but that we will come and enjoy it, we ought to refuse no pains or fear in the way, but carefully strive to get in. Luke xiii. 14.

Illumination by Christ.

1. As the lights of heaven, which we see placed in the firmament for signs, and to distinguish times, days, and years, do give light unto them which are on earth: so Christ doth illuminate His Church, and giveth watchwords by His precepts, whereby it may know how to fly from the anger to come.

2. As the eyes of our body are not always illuminated by the sun alike, but the higher and nearer they come to it, the more they perceive the force of the brightness and heat thereof: even so our souls, the higher and nearer they approach to Christ, the more clearly they are illuminated by Him.

Christ is not a Redeemer but unto them who, being turned from iniquity, do lead a new life.

1. LIKE as, if the servant of some nobleman or gentleman were, for committing of treason, felony, or murder, condemned, and going to the place of execution, and his lord or master, of mere favour and good will, should not only, by earnest suit to Her Majesty, procure a pardon for his life, and so deliver him from that villainous death, but also should adopt and take him for his son and heir; if he, now, after this his deliverance, go and say, "I will take my pleasure, be idle, and follow my own phantasy," and never endeavour to please or pleasure his lord and master, but rather seek to hurt and displease him every way that he can, such a wretch deserveth to be punished most extremely: even so such as say that Christ hath redeemed us, and by His death hath purchased for us forgiveness of sins, righteousness, and life everlasting, and hath adopted us to be His sons and heirs, wherefore we will take our pleasure, be idle, and rather we will do more wickedness, doubtless Christ died not for such, nor satisfied for their offences—no, nor yet merited heaven for them—to the end that they should spend their days in idleness and heap sin upon sin, but rather to live Christianly and godlily. Rom. vi. 4.
Gal. v. 24.
Tit. ii. 11.
2 Tim. ii. 19.
Luke i. 75.
Eph. i. 4; ii. 13.
1 Pet. i. 15.

2. Like as, if an astrologer could or should tell an ambitious cardinal that he should be pope, although he did put an undoubted trust therein, yet for all that he would not be idle, but would use all the means he possibly could to attain and come to that dignity: even so the children of God, the surer they are that Christ hath redeemed them, so much the more they understand the great good will of God towards them, and therefore they are always forced more and more, by godly conversation of life, to make certain unto themselves the knowledge of their election and redemption by Christ. 2 Pet. i. 10.

3. If a miserable and wretched thief shall have committed many thefts and murders, and after that his wicked deeds were known the son of a king should be brought to be arraigned and condemned for the same, and so bear the punishment thereof, and this thief to be discharged and pardoned—if, hereupon, the thief should rejoice and make a scoff at him, when he seeth the son of a king to be put to death and suffer the punishment that he deserved, such a caitiff deserveth a most horrible death: even so at this present it fareth with us. Behold our Saviour Christ, the only Son of God, is imprisoned, and we delivered; He condemned, and we pardoned; He put to death, and to all shame, and we received to honour. It is not, therefore, for us to be drowsy-headed, and live securely, and to flatter ourselves in our sins and iniquities.

4. As the Israelites were never able to yield sufficient thanks to God for their bodily deliverance from the bondage which they were in in Egypt: so neither are we to Christ our Saviour for our redemption and spiritual deliverance from the tyranny of Satan and sin.

Christ is to be served and pleased before ourselves, or any others whatsoever.

As the master of those servants that are born in his house, or whom he purchaseth, doth claim that they do him wrong when they spend any time either to their own particular profit or in the service of others: so may Jesus Christ much more justly complain of us that are His twofold servants—namely, by birth and by purchase—if we employ even never so little of our lives to serve and please ourselves, the world, or the devil, our enemies.

Christ is less beholden to the most part of the world than Cæsar was to the Romans.

As Marcus Antonius, with an oration that he made upon the death of Cæsar, is said to have greatly delighted the people of Rome, and that he moved very many of them to shed great store of bitter tears when he put them in remembrance of the great benefits which they had from time to time received of Cæsar, and withal did show them Cæsar's garments, wherein his enemies, Cassius and Brutus, had slain him, all full of blood, whereat they werè so mightily moved, that they expelled the homicides and murderers out of the city, so that they durst not, if they would live any longer, come near it: and yet in these days of ours, though the preacher (never so good an heavenly orator) come with the oracles of God Himself in his mouth, and show most plainly what Christ the Redeemer of the world hath done for man, and prove that man hath received unspeakable and innumerable benefits by and through Christ, and declare what bitter tears, water, and blood, did trickle down His cheeks, and what deep and deadly sighs, with many fearful and grievous groans, did rise from His heart before He came to the cross; and though he rip up His passion stitch by stitch, as the Holy Book and Divine Word shall direct and lead Him, and though particularly he show how and where He was wounded, that He was beaten, spit upon, crowned with thorns—nay, led hand and foot to the cross, scorned and mocked of the Jews—and though He show most lively that the wicked and cruel Jews imbrued their hands in His blood, and gave Him vinegar and gall to drink—yea, and although the preacher declare and prove that, besides the death and passion of His body, He suffered in His soul the heavy wrath and indignation of His Father, and the extreme tortures and torments of hell, for a time, no less than the reprobates that be there already, and no less than all we by just desert should have suffered for ever, if Christ had not done it for us;—yet few or none, for all this, will shed one tear, give one groan, or sigh once from the bottom of his heart.

Exod. xiv. 30;
xx. 2.
Ps. lxxxi. 10.

1 Cor. vi. 10.
Matt. xvi. 24.
Luke ix. 23.
Rom. xii. 2.

Christ not to be denied in persecution.

As the serpent, when he seeth he shall come into man's hands, defendeth his head, either by gathering himself into a circle or thrusting his head into a hole, leaving the other parts open to the wounds: so, likewise, we must do in time of persecution, even keep Christ our Head from wounds, howsoever our bodies suffer.

Christ our grand Captain.

As soldiers are to resort to their standard: so faithful Christians are appointed to flock to Christ. Isa. xi. 10-12.

Christ our spiritual food.

As verily as bread doth serve for the nourishing and strength of the body and wine for the comfort thereof: so, and as certainly to the inward man, in faith, Christ is bread to the soul and wine to the mind, and we mystically (made one in Him and He in us) feed on Him, and He is our spiritual food.

Christ our Intercessor.

LIKE as he that would know whether the sun shine in the firmament must not climb up into the clouds to look, but search for the beams thereof upon the earth, which, when he sees, he may conclude that the sun shines in the firmament: even so, if we would know whether Christ in heaven makes intercession for us, let us ransack our own consciences, and there make search whether we feel the Spirit of Christ crying in us "Abba Father!" As for those that never feel this work of God's Spirit in them, their case is miserable, whatsoever they be. Rom. viii. 26.

Christ our Lord.

As, in former times, the custom hath been that, when one is taken prisoner in the fields, he that pays his ransom shall become always after his lord: even so, likewise, Christ, when we were bond-slaves under hell, death, and condemnation, paid the ransom of our redemption, and freed us from the bondage of sin and Satan, and therefore in that respect He is our Lord.

Christ our Mediator.

1. LIKE as Christ Jesus is our looking-glass, in which we behold the invisible and glorious God to be our loving and merciful Father, more ready to hear than we to pray: so the same, our Saviour Christ, is also our feet, by which we go to the Father; our mouth, by which we speak to the Father; and our hand, by which we offer our prayers and all our service—yea, our souls and bodies—as a lively, reasonable, and acceptable sacrifice to His Majesty.

2. As no man is able to behold the bright sun unless it be covered with a cloud: even so no man can abide the majesty of God but through the Lord Jesus Christ.

Christ our Prophet.

1. As the print of a seal is more plainly perceived in the soft wax than in the seal itself: so, likewise, the knowledge of God is more manifest to us in Christ, who is the lively image and engraven form of His Father.

2. As the moon doth naturally receive her light of the sun: so all the light, all the true wisdom and understanding or heavenly knowledge that the Church hath, it hath of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Christ our Righteousness.

1. LIKE as our sins appeared so horrible, so great, so monstrous, and ugly in the presence of God, that, being once but imputed to Christ, He could not, notwithstanding His unspeakable love, but even in justice most severely punish our said sins in His Son: so surely, such is the excellency of the righteousness of Christ, that being once but imputed unto us in the presence of our Heavenly Father, He cannot, notwithstanding all our former unrighteousness, but be thoroughly pleased with us, and accept such a discharge of our sins by His Son for our own discharge; none otherwise than the debt of a bankrupt, discharged by some special friend, is accounted and accepted with his creditor the discharge of the bankrupt himself.

2. As the soul of a man doth so quicken the body that, notwithstanding the members thereof in themselves be but weak, yet they are sure not to decay all the while they do hold any participation with the powers of the soul, but appear in the presence of men both lusty and strong: so, undoubtedly, our Saviour Christ, being that immortal soul of His mystical body, which inspireth spiritual life into all the members thereof, verily all those His said members are sure, so long as they continue incorporate with Christ, both to hold the substance of life, and withal to be accounted as lively members in the presence of God during their participation with that true life itself, whereof they take sure hold by a lively faith.

3. As Cochlearia, or spoonwort, the root of the water-lily, and likewise telephium and gentian, laid to the body, taketh away black spots: so Christ, applied to the conscience, purgeth it from dead works.

4. As Smilax aspera, or rough bindweed, serveth not only against venom received aforehand, but also against all poison taken after a man hath eaten it: so Christ, received by faith, profiteth not only against the sins which before hath been committed, but also done afterward.

5. So long as a man, stung with a scorpion, holdeth wild carthamus in his hand, he feeleth no pain, but, so soon as he letteth it go, the ache and pain take him afresh: so, as long as a man, stung with sin, holdeth Christ by faith, he feeleth no torment of conscience; but so soon as he letteth Him go, the terrors of death take him afresh.

6. As the people of Israel, passing through the wilderness, had to fight oftentimes against serpents, and, when they were stung and smitten by them, to be preserved from the venom and from death, they lifted up their eyes toward the brazen serpent that Moses had set up amidst their tents, by sight whereof they were healed: so we, in like manner, fighting against our concupiscences, if it come to pass at any time that they give us any blow, to the end that this stripe may not be deadly unto us, we must lift up our eyes towards Jesus Christ hanging upon the cross, and beseech Him that He would forgive us all our trespasses and be our righteousness.

7. As, in a natural body, the power that the eye hath to see serveth more to the use of the other members than for itself, because that, seeing and marking them all, it is watchful rightly to guide them and to direct their actions, not being able, in the meantime, to see themselves nor to serve itself: even so, the righteousness, innocence, and obedience of Christ Jesus stand us in more stead than Him, seeing that, notwithstanding He had all these things, and was in His nature, life, and whole conversation, absolute and perfect, yet, for all this, He was condemned and crucified. We, on the contrary part, albeit His righteousness, innocence, and obedience be only imputed unto us, yet, for all that, by means of this imputation, we are absolved, justified, and discharged of all our sins, and of all the accusations that all our enemies can bring against us.

John xiv. 6.
1 John v. 11, 12.

John iii. 14, 15.

8. As it is enough that we gather the fruit of a tree, and that it always remain in its place, and that we carry it not away with us: so, in like manner, we must content ourselves to be partakers of the fruits of Christ's righteousness, albeit it be not essentially in us, but only by imputation, and inasmuch as through His only mercy it is bestowed upon us.

9. Like as they do that go up into a high tower, who, looking downwards, and seeing the depth, are afraid to fall, and, that they may be the more sure, they lay hold of the rails: even so must we lean upon the righteousness and death of Christ Jesus, and strengthen ourselves in that, to the end we may be preserved from falling.

10. Like as, in winter, we no sooner go from the fire but we are cold, nor out of light but we enter into darkness: even so we no sooner be parted from Jesus Christ, who is our Righteousness and our Life, but straight we are in sin and in death; forasmuch as He is the Life that quickeneth us, the Sun that giveth us light, and the Fire that warmeth, comforteth, and refresheth all His members.

1 Cor. i. 30.
Rom. v. 19.
Isa. liii. 4, 5.
Col. i. 20.

11. As the moon hath no light but that which it hath from the sun, and as the light is little or great as it is near or far off the sun, in such sort, that if it depart from it, it remaineth altogether obscure and dark: even so, in like manner, the Church hath no light, righteousness, life, health, strength, and happiness, but that which it pleased her Husband, Christ Jesus, to give unto her, because of that union and fellowship which He hath with her; wherefore, if at any time she be separated from Him, and that there be a divorce between her and her Husband, there remaineth to her nothing but darkness, vice, and wretchedness.

2 Cor. v. 18, 19.
John xi. 25.

12. As merchants who are of one company, and become partners, are partakers of all the profits, losses, and damages which grow of their merchandise: even so Jesus Christ, by reason of that society we have together with Him, giveth us a part, and we, likewise, give Him of all that we have and possess. The difference that is in this is, that the gains and losses that come amongst men are equal and common amongst them all; but here we gather up all the fruits that arise of the righteousness of Jesus Christ. He, on the contrary part, taketh upon Him and chargeth Himself with all the damages and losses that come of our disobedience.

Rom. vi. 4, 8, 17.
Eph. ii. 22.

13. Like as, when a man looks upon things directly through the air, they appear in their proper forms and colours, as they are; but if they be looked upon through a green glass, they all appear green: so, likewise, if God behold us as we are in ourselves, we appear as vile and damnable sinners; but if He look upon us as we are presented before the throne in heaven, in the person of our Mediator Christ Jesus, willing that we should be approved for His merits, then we appear without all spot and wrinkle before Him.

Rom. viii. 34.

14. As Christ hath taken away our sins by His suffering: so, likewise, He hath also clothed us with His righteousness.

15. As it is not enough for a beggar to come before a king without his rags, unless he have convenient apparel: so, in like manner, it is not enough for us to have our filthiness done away, unless we be clothed with convenient righteousness.

Christ our second Husband by faith.

LIKE as, if a woman be discharged from her first husband, he being dead, and hath married another man, the first husband hath no power over her: even so we, now being espoused unto Christ, our second Husband, by faith, are freed utterly from our first husband, the law, and, as the apostle saith, "are no more under the law, but under grace;" that is, under perpetual remission of sins, committed, not only before our justification, but as well also after and during all our life long.

Christ is Possessor of heaven for us.

Rom. viii. 17.

1. As if, upon the confiscation of an inheritance coming to many brethren, when the prince afterwards makes a release, the eldest brother taketh the possession, for assurance that he himself and all his brethren are restored to their goods, and the same is an assurance to the co-heirs with the eldest that, in the person of their eldest brother, themselves are put in possession of the inheritance common to them all: even so Jesus Christ hath taken possession of heaven, not only for Himself, but also for us His co-heirs.

Eph. ii. 5.

2. As the high priest, entering into the holy sanctuary, upon his shoulders and breast carried the twelve names of the twelve tribes of Israel: so Jesus Christ entered not alone into heaven, but we also with Him.

Christ, after a sort, present with us in the body.

John xiv. 19; xvi. 28.
Acts vii. 55.
Col. iii. 1.
Heb. iv. 16; x. 18.

1. As the sun, which, though it remain still in the firmament, and therefore, in very deed, toucheth not the eye, yet the body of the sun is present to the sight, notwithstanding so great a distance between: so, likewise, the body of Christ, which, by His ascending, is taken up from us and hath left the world and is gone to His Father, is indeed absent from our senses, yet our faith is conversant in heaven, beholding that Sun of Righteousness, and is verily in presence with it there present, like as our sight is present with the body of the sun in the firmament, or as the sun is present with our sight on earth.

Eph. i. 23.
Col. i. 17-18.

2. As the sun, with his light, is present with all things: so is also Christ with His God-head, Spirit, and power present to all, and filleth all.

Christ received by faith.

Col. i. 18.
Eph. i. 22, 23.
John vi. 53-55.

1. As the natural body receiveth life from the head, and is dead without it; and as the branch, though it be never so near the vine-stock, yet, if it abide not in it, and grow not in it, hath no life therefrom, and therefore withereth; and if it abide in it, then it liketh and fructifieth; and as the hungry and thirsty man hath not the benefit of meat and drink to live by, by coming where it is, seeing it, and knowing it, but by eating and drinking thereof, and digesting it, so that, by force of nature, there grow a union betwixt him and his meat: even so it is as necessary that the faithful be united to their Head, Christ, spiritually, engrafted into Him, and grow in Him by faith, and that every one that would be saved eat Him and drink Him, and that so effectually, as that He may be their spiritual food. For if it be thus, they shall live for ever by Him; otherwise, they remain in death, wither, and must perish. Neither is it sufficient that we hear and read of Him and His merits and passion, but they must be received by faith.

2. As meat and drink, being set before us, is taken, by eating thereof, to our temporal nourishment: even so Christ is as surely apprehended of us by faith, to our spiritual maintenance, in the Word preached and Sacraments ministered, which are the dishes wherein one and the self-same Christ is offered unto us.

1 Pet. iv. 1.

3. As the soul, naturally joined to the body, bringeth forth her effects: so Christ, dwelling in us by faith and the Holy Ghost, after a spiritual manner, and by a spiritual virtue, doth show His power in us, to enable us to resist sin, and to bridle the corrupt desires of the flesh.

4. As there can be no eating without taking or receiving of meat : so no believing in Christ without a spiritual receiving and apprehending of Him.

Christ rejecteth not a weak faith.

LIKE as the wick or match of a candle, link, or torch, which, either wanting oil, tallow, wax, or rosin, or having thereof not sufficient, yieldeth forth at some time but a dark, blind snuff and imperfect light : even so Christ our Saviour rejecteth not a weak, slender, and wavering faith, which yet (notwithstanding so long as any spark of godliness appeareth) is not quite quenched and extinct, albeit at some time it be very near thereunto.

Isa. xlii. 3.
Matt. xii. 20.

Christ receiveth us again that were dead.

LIKE as the pelican, which, having brought forth her young ones dead, or being stung or killed by serpents, pecketh forth her heart-blood to revive them : even so we, being conceived and born in sin, and altogether dead in our trespasses and offences, stung of that old and fiery serpent the devil, who first beguiled our parents in Paradise, and so having the reward of sin, which is death, we, in this case, are revived and quickened again by the blood of the true Pelican, Jesus Christ, which He, from His heart, hath shed and poured out for us.

Col. ii. 13, 14.

Salvation only to be had in Christ, if men know how to find Him.

LIKE as, if a man knew certainly that in such a wood an infinite mass of money were hid, if the owner thereof would give it unto him, yet, if by no means he could find the same, what should the gift of such a treasure profit him, though it were of value to purchase a kingdom ? Nothing at all. Even so standeth the case between Christ and us. Though we knew never so well and certainly that salvation and all kinds of treasure are permanent, and to be found in Him, and do belong to such as can find Him, yet, if we can by no means find Him, what shall the understanding hereof profit us ? Nothing at all.

Matt. xiii. 44.
Isa. lv. 6.

Christ is sent of the Father.

As fire sendeth forth both heat and light, but neither heat nor light sendeth fire : so the Father sendeth both Christ and the all-knowing Comforter, yet the Father is unsent.

Christ, though amazed and confounded with sorrows and fears, yet remained still sinless.

LIKE as, if you set two glasses filled, the one with muddy water and the other with clear crystal water, and first let them stand till all the muddiness in one be settled at the bottom, then shake both these glasses, in the one the mud ariseth straightway, and defileth all the water there ; in the other, although you shake it never so much, yet the clear water, though troubled likewise, remaineth still all clear as crystal : even so, if any of us be shaken and disquieted with any trouble, our muddy affections arising, & presently defile us all over; but Christ (in whom was man's true nature, but not any the least defilement of nature) being likewise shaken, He remained still clear from any the least spot of sin at all.

How Christ sitteth at the right hand of God.

1 Kings ii. 19.
Ps. xlv. 9; cx. 1.
Matt. xx. 21.
Phil. ii. 9-11.
1 Pet. iii. 22.
Eph. i. 20, 21; iv.
15.

1. As it is the use and custom of kings and princes to have their deputies and substitutes, to whom they freely give all authority to rule and govern, and do cause that man to sit by them and at their right hand to whom they will give most honour, and unto whom they will give most authority and power: even so we understand by these words, "He sitteth at the right hand of God," that our Saviour Christ is exalted above all creatures, and that He hath dominion or governance in heaven and in earth, and that He reigneth with His Father, having equal power with Him.

2. As those on earth that are set at the right hand of kings do execute justice in courts or assizes, for the maintenance of the state and peace of the kingdom: even so Christ Jesus, sitting at the right hand of His Father—that is, being made sovereign Lord of all things, both in heaven and earth—is to hold a court or assize, in which He shall come to judge both the quick and the dead.

Christ suffered and died, as he was Man.

As the precious stone called the carbuncle, to look at, is like a hot burning coal of fire, shining exceeding brightly, the which feeleth no fire, neither is it molten, changed, or mollified therewith; if thou shalt take it, and close it fast in a ring of lead, and cast it into the fire, thou shalt see the lead molten and consumed before thy face, but the carbuncle remaining sound and perfect without blemish as before, for the fire worketh upon the lead, but upon the carbuncle it cannot work: even so Christ our Saviour, being in the hot scorching fire of His torments, suffered and died, as He was man, but as He was God, He neither suffered nor died. The fire of His afflictions wrought, then, upon His manhood, but His Divinity and Godhead continued perfect and utterly untouched.

Christ suffered in His soul for our salvation.

1 Cor. xvi. 5, &c.
Heb. xii. 10.
2 Cor. v. 21.
Heb. ii. 14.

1. As the holocaust, or whole burnt offering, the whole and every whit being chopped and cut into pieces, was altogether put into the fire and burnt, and so it was, by a special name, called "the whole burnt offering": even so, not the body only, but also the soul of Christ, even every whit of His humanity, was burnt and consumed in the fire of affliction, as a perfect holocaust and a whole burnt offering for our sins.

2. As we have sinned both in our bodies and souls: so, likewise, Christ was made our propitiation, who purposely and answerably did suffer both in body and soul.

3. As an army of soldiers doth altogether get the victory, and not any one of them asunder, and yet, for all that, each one singly is profitable in fight for the attainment of victory: even so the sufferings of Christ, as His death and bloodshed, His hatred, His shame, and ignominy, &c., both of His body and of His soul, altogether doth sufficiently merit, but each one severally is profitable, and helpeth thereunto.

Christ the Bread of Life.

1. As the bread that perisheth nourisheth us in this life for a small time: even so Christ, the Bread that perisheth not, but endureth for ever, nourisheth to everlasting life. John vi. 48, 51, 58.

2. As he that will be nourished by bread must eat it: so, likewise, he that will be benefited by Christ must believe in Him. John vi. 55.
1 Cor. x. 17.
John vi. 35, 40.

3. As the devil is the food of the wicked, whom he nourisheth in all iniquity, and bringeth up into everlasting damnation: so is Christ the very food of all them that be the lively members of His body, and them He nourisheth, feedeth, bringeth up, and cherisheth unto everlasting life.

Christ is the food of a Christian soul.

As every man is carnally fed and nourished in his body by meat and drink: even so is every good Christian man fed and nourished in his soul by the flesh and blood of our Saviour Christ.

Christ the only object of faith which justifieth.

LIKE as, when the children of Israel were bidden of Moses to look up to the brazen serpent, neither could the serpent have helped them except they had looked up, nor yet their looking upward have profited them unless they had directed their eyes upon the said serpent, as the only object set up to the same purpose for them to behold: so our faith, in like case, directed to the body of Jesus Christ our Saviour, is only the means whereby Christ's merits are applied unto us and we are now justified before God. Revel. x. 1.

Christ the appointed Reconciler.

LIKE as there was a certain person by whom sin entered into the world, and by sin death, and so he became, as it were, the cause and foundation of falling away from God and entering into league with the devil: so, also, must there be a certain person appointed of God that might be the foundation and cause of reconciliation, and of never breaking the same conjunction with God, the Fountain of all happiness.

Christ the Redeemer of mankind.

LIKE as the sun is said to be a general light to everything, although there be that receive no light at all from it: even so Christ is called the Light of the world, although a great number have no part of the grace of His light; yet His redemption is universal, because it is so appointed unto all men that, without it, none is or can be redeemed. John viii. 12; ix. 5.
1 Tim. ii. 6.

Christ the cause of our resurrection and life.

1. As the first Adam was the root of all mankind, and he conveyed sin, and by sin death, to all that sprang of him, Christ only excepted: so, likewise, Christ, the second Adam, who is the root of all the elect, conveyeth life both in body and soul to all that are united to Him; and, by the virtue of His resurrection, they shall rise again after this life.

2. Like as the power of the Godhead of Christ, when He was dead in the grave, raised His body the third day: so, also, shall the same power of Christ's Godhead convey itself unto all the faithful, who even in death remain united unto Him, and shall raise them up at the last day.

Christ the Resurrection and Life.

John v. 25; vi. 63.

1. LIKE as, in a perfect body, when the head hath sense and motion, the hand that is of the same body hath also sense and motion convenient for it: so, likewise, Christ, being the Resurrection and the Life, as there is spiritual life in Him, so every member of His shall feel in himself spiritual sense and motion, whereby he is raised up from sin and liveth unto God.

2. As the burgess of a town in the parliament-house beareth the person of the whole town, and whatsoever he saith that the whole town saith, and whatsoever is done to him is also done to all the town: so Christ upon the cross stood in our place, and bore our person, and what He suffered we suffered, and when He died all the faithful died in Him; and so, likewise, as He is risen again, so are all the faithful risen in Him.

Rom. iv. 25.
Ps. xvi. 10.

3. As Christ, by the merit of His death, wipeth out our iniquities, and by His blood cleanseth our consciences from all mortal sin: so, in like manner, by His resurrection from death, He declareth Himself to be righteous, and in all respects perfectly pure, according to the law of God.

*Christ the sovereign salve for our souls.*Luke xxiv. 46, 47.
Acts x. 43.

1. LIKE as, if the sick person should seek out such a physician as either could not or would not cure him, his labour were unprofitable, and all one as if the needy man should go to one for an alms that were as needy as himself: even so we, being sick of our sins in our souls, must be careful that we go and run to such a cunning physician as we are sure both can and will, for his ability and compassion, cure and heal our infirmities, and hath a salve for every sore and malady.

1 John v. 11, 12.
John viii. 24.

2. As it was in Egypt, in the great dearth and famine of corn, none could have any food of Pharaoh the king but by the hands of Joseph, whom he had made overseer and ruler of the land in his name (for when they cried to him for bread, he said, "Go ye to Joseph, and what he saith to you do ye"): so, likewise, it is now, in the famine and dearth of our souls for spiritual food, we can have nothing to feed our hungry souls from the King of Heaven but by the means of the true Joseph, Jesus Christ, who is ordained of His Father to rule and govern all things in His name; so that He sendeth us to His Son when we ask anything of Him, for in Him He is well pleased, and for His sake only, and for no man's else, doth He bestow this benefit upon us.

*Christ to be found by hearing the Word preached and read.*1 Chron xxviii. 10.
Prov. iiii. 13, 14, 20;
viii. 18, 19.
John iiii. 31.
Matt. vii. 7, 8.

LIKE as, if one have a mine of copper, tin, or lead, he useth great pains and diligence to come by the same; but if it prove a vein of silver or gold, then the owner thereof setteth pioneers on work, who, with great care, courage, and comfort, labour night and day, in hope to be greatly enriched thereby; and albeit the vein sink down very deep, and prove most hard and difficult to win, yet do they not cease or slacken their labour, but rather add so much the more diligence, in hope that their pains will double their gains when the mine is once won, for this they hold as a rule infallible, that the lower any metal doth lie in the earth, the better and more gainful it proves in substance: even so it is in the study of the Scriptures, and in hearing the same read and preached. The more pains and diligence one useth therein, the more increase of sound knowledge, wisdom, and comfort is gotten in the end, being that most rich and invaluable mine wherein all the treasures of wisdom and understanding are to be found, containing and comprehending all the counsels and commandments of the Lord, &c.

Christ is to be loved for saving of us.

1. LIKE as, if thou fallest into a deep river, being in apparent danger of drowning; if any man should cast thee a rope, or himself leap into the water to save thy life, thou canst not sufficiently confess and acknowledge thyself his debtor to do him pleasure and service all the days of thy life: so, likewise, we were not only in danger of falling into hell, but were already fallen, even from our infancy, and daily, through our sins, fell deeper and deeper; yet Christ cast us not in a rope to pull us up and save us, but threw Himself into our sea of woe, into our hell—to be short, into horrible death—wherein we were drowned, to pluck us forth; and therefore, with great zeal and affection, we are bound to say, “Lord, we are bound to love, honour, serve, please, and obey Thee in all that we may, with our whole hearts, all the days of our life!”

2. Like as, if thou wert upon a scaffold, ready to be beheaded for thy drunkenness or adultery, and thereupon shouldst have a pardon, and so thy life saved, upon condition that thou shouldst fall no more thereinto, thou wouldst, no doubt, willingly and heartily promise—yea, with thy hand subscribe, and with thy tongue swear—that thou wouldst never more commit adultery or drunkenness, but that thou wouldst abhor all taverns, alehouses, and drunkards, all whores and bawds, and so amend thy life: now, seeing Jesus Christ hath saved thee, not from an apparent danger of death, but even from death itself, and not from the death of the body, but from everlasting death, He requireth of thee to amend thy life, which thou art bound so to do—yea, thou oughtst cheerfully and earnestly promise and faithfully vow to reform and amend, and to shun all occasions that might procure thee to displease and offend Him.

Christ was in our person justly cursed of God and executed for us.

1. As the surety is, by the just sentence of the law, condemned to pay his debt for whom he hath willingly and advisedly undertaken: even so it is mere and true justice, and no wrong, that Christ, by the just sentence of the law, was hanged on a tree; and so He bear, indeed, the true curse of the law.

2. As the surety, although he be utterly clear, obnoxious and guilty to none, yet, by his suretyship, is a debtor and obnoxious to the creditor and the law: so, likewise, Christ took our nature on Him, and presented Himself therein before His Father, and so He became, by our sins, sinful, defiled, hateful, and accursed.

3. Like as, if a tender lady's only child should, by some casualty, be all tumbled in blood or mire and most stinking filth, the child so betrayed and loathsome would breed great abhorring and loathing in the eyes of the delicate lady, yet the child's own person should be none the less beloved of the mother, but rather the more if it may be: so such two persons or conditions are found in Christ. According to one, He was always beloved; according to the other, which He took upon Him whilst He had not finished that office, He was justly accursed.

Christ's Body is not enclosed or contained in the bread, under the bread, or with the bread; neither the Blood in the wine, under the wine, or with the wine.

As the blood of our Saviour doth cleanse us from all our sins, and yet we need not to have it really present with us to be washed or bathed in it: so Christ, our Saviour, according to His promise, doth daily, or whensoever we do come worthily to His holy Supper, feed both our bodies and souls with the wholesome and heavenly food of His precious body and blood; and this He doth by His eternal and mighty Spirit, so that He needeth not therefore to come down at the beck of every juggling Popish priest, and to be really present in their wafer cake, after they have, with gaping or blowing, spoken four or five words upon it.

1 John 1. 7.

Christ's natural and immortal Body can be but in one place at once, and not in many places.

1. LIKE as the soul of man, united to his body, cannot be a body, because it is a spirit : even so the like is true of the body and of the soul of Jesus Christ, and of His divine and human nature, of the which each of them holdeth so continually its properties, that the one cannot be what the other is ; for albeit they be united together by personal union, yet for all that they remain always distinct in their unity according to their properties, and not confused, so that the one cannot be the other ; wherefore we may not say at all that the Divinity is the humanity, or that the humanity is the Divinity, nor that the one is converted into the other ; for, if there were such a conversion, they should no more be that which they are, but should be changed into other natures, which thing cannot be ; for God can never be but God, wherefore He cannot be converted into man, but He may unite man to Himself, as He hath done in the person of His Son Jesus Christ. Likewise, man cannot be converted into God, for so much as he is a creature, and that God, who is the Creator of all, cannot be created, but is without beginning as He is without end and infinite, the which thing cannot agree with any creature ; from whence it followeth that the gods which are created are no gods at all, but are only creatures, or else vain illusions or imaginations. And as the substance of God cannot be converted into that of man, nor that of man into God—for, otherwise, God should not be God, nor man should not be man at all : even so neither the one nor the other may be without its convenient and natural properties. Belonging to the Divine nature, it is nevertheless not Divine nature, but human. In like sort, if the sacramental signs of the body and blood of Christ have the natural properties which do belong to the bread and to the wine, as they have indeed ; if they have their qualities and accidents and these same effects, then they are not really and substantially the body and blood of Him, but bread and wine, remaining always in their substance with their accidents.

Joⁿ xvi. 7.

2. As the body of the sun and the light of it are so jointly joined together, that the one cannot be separated from the other, yet it followeth not that wheresoever the light of the sun is there the body of the sun must be also ; for, as the sun, being still in the heaven, according to the order that God hath appointed among us His creatures, doth with his light refresh, comfort, and quicken all things here upon earth : so our Saviour Christ Jesus, who is the true Sun of Righteousness, being still (until the time that God hath appointed) on the right hand of His Father, touching His manhood—that is to say, above in heaven, in the place of beatitude, felicity, and joy—reigning there with the Father in equal glory and majesty, doth continually assist, aid, and comfort His Church by His Holy Spirit, being always present with His elect and chosen, by His Divine majesty, providence, and invisible grace, whom He doth not cease, through His almighty power, the Spirit being the Worker of it, to feed still with the wholesome food of His most precious flesh and blood. Now, as it were most noisome and hurtful unto the whole earth if we had here below the body of the sun : so it is not expedient that the Church and congregation of the faithful should have Christ still present here, touching His humanity and manhood ; for so He saith.

3. As no man can deny but that the eye and the sight of it be so jointly and inseparably joined together, that so long as the eye is whole and sound, the one cannot be separated from the other, yet the eye is not in all places that the sight doth reach unto ; and as we know that severity and mercy are in God so jointly joined together, that the one cannot be separated from the other, and yet they that feel His severity do not feel His mercy—that is to say, these whom He doth, according to His righteous judgment, punish everlastingly in hell fire, them doth He utterly banish and put away from His bounteous goodness and mercy : even so, although the Divinity and humanity of Christ be so linked and joined together that where-soever the one is, it doth not therefore follow that the other is there also ; for the Godhead of Christ can be everywhere and in more places than one at once, but His manhood cannot be everywhere, nor in more places than one at once.

Christ's care of His members, though absent.

EVEN as the eagle, having her young ones shut up in the nest, although she flieth exceeding high and pierceth the lofty air, yet she withdraweth not her eyes from her young ones, but still beholdeth them, and they also, crying after their manner, with their stretched-out necks, do look after her : even so the Lord Jesus, ascending into heaven, did behold His disciples, and they also, hungering and thirsting after Him, did fasten their eyes upon Him, and did not lose the sight of Him until He pierced and broke open the heavens and entered into the presence of His Father ; and although they were divided from Him in body, yet in heart and mind they followed Him still. Acts i. 9-11.

Christ will take compassion on us.

1. As the apple of the eye is so tender, that it may not be touched but with great grief : so, likewise, the conjunction between Christ and us is such, that He feeleth our afflictions, and therefore taketh great compassion. Zach. ii. 8.

2. As Alexander, the monarch of the world, whensoever he came to any city to besiege it, would, at the first, show forth and display his white flag or banner, in token of mercy if they would yield, but if they would not, then he would set forth and display his red flags and banners, in token of wrath and blood : so, in like manner, at the first, our Saviour Christ will show mercy unto us, hoping that we will turn and repent, but if we will not, then He will bring dreadful judgments upon us.

Christ never lost His confidence in God.

LIKE as those men do never lose their confidence and trust in God who, by some violence, are stricken into astonishment or naturally fall on sleep—their faith, patience, love, obedience, decreaseth not in them for all that : even so neither in Christ. His assurance in God could never decay, albeit His sinless nature might and did fear the pain, and, being astonished with excessive pain, might and did suddenly desire ease. Matt. xxvii. 46.
Mark xiv. 33, &c.

Death of Christ.

1. As the bands of matrimony are set free by the death of the married couple : so are we made dead to the Law by the death of Christ, and freed from the yoke, servitude, and bondage of it. Rom. vii. 3, 4;
v. 12.

2. As a strong corrosive, laid to a sore, eats out all the rotten and dead flesh : even so Christ's death, being applied to the heart of a penitent sinner by faith, weakens and consumes the sin that cleaves so fast unto our natures and dwells within us.

3. Like as, in the common destruction of the first-born in Egypt, they whose doors were sprinkled with the blood of the Passover were safe : so, likewise, if there shall come a common destruction upon any land for their sins, yet they that have their souls sprinkled with the blood of the Lamb Christ Jesus, by His death, shall be saved.

4. As the life of Christ is the life of life : so the death of Christ is the death of death.

Matt. xxviii. 7.
Hos. xiii. 7.

5. As the leopard useth a strange kind of policy to kill the ape—he lieth down upon the ground as though he were stark dead, which the apes seeing, come all together, and in despite skip upon him ; this the leopard beareth patiently till he thinks they have wearied themselves with their sporting ; then suddenly he likewise leaps up and catcheth one in his mouth, and in each foot one, all which immediately he killeth and devoureth : even so such was the policy of Christ. He was laid in the dust for dead, the devil then insulted over Him and trampled upon Him ; but He, like a lively leopard, starting up on Easter-day, astonished the soldiers set to keep Him, which were the devil's apes, and made them lie like dead men, even as He told them before by His prophet.

Job ii. 18, 21.

6. As the chameleon, when he espies a serpent taking shade under a tree, climbs up into that tree and lets down a thread breathed out of his mouth as small as a spider's thread, at the end whereof there is a little drop as clear as any pearl, which, falling upon the serpent's head, kills him : even so Christ climbs up into the tree of His cross and lets down a thread of blood issuing out of His side (like Rahab's red thread hanging out of her window), the least drop whereof, being so precious and so peerless, falling upon the serpent's head, kills him.

7. As the wild bull, of all things, cannot abide any red colour, therefore the hunter, for the nonce, standing before a tree, puts on a red garment, which when the bull sees, he runs at him as hard as he can drive, but the hunter slipping aside, the bull's horns stick fast in the tree—as, when David slipped aside, Saul's spear stuck fast in the wall : even so such a hunter is Christ, who, standing before the tree of His cross, puts on a red garment, dipped and dyed in His own blood (as one that cometh with red garments from Bozrah) ; therefore the devil and his angels, like wild bulls of Bashan, run at Him, but He shifting for Himself, their horns stick fast in His cross.

8. Like as when Mahomet, the second of that name, besieged Belgrade, in Servia, one of his captains at length got up upon the wall of the city with banner displayed ; another Bohemian, espying this, ran to the captain, and, clasping him fast about the middle, asked one Capistranus, standing beneath, whether it would be any danger of damnation to his soul if he should cast himself down headlong with that dog (so he termed the Turk) to be slain with him. Capistranus answering that it was no danger at all to his soul, the Bohemian forthwith tumbled himself down with the Turk in his arms, and so by his own death only saved the life of all the city : even such an exploit was this of Christ. The devil, like the great Turk, besieging not only one city, but even all mankind, Christ alone, like this noble Bohemian, encountered him, and seeing the case was so, that this dog, the devil, could not be killed stark dead, except He died also, therefore He made no reckoning of His life, but gave Himself to death for us, that He only dying for all the people, by His death our deadly enemy might for ever be destroyed.

9. As it was bootless for Goliath to brandish his spear against David : so it little availed the devil to shake his spear likewise in and by the hand of the soldier against the heart of Christ when He suffered death.

10. As David, having heard Goliath prate and talk his pleasure, when they came to the point, at the first stroke overthrew him : so Christ, with that very self-same spear, which at His death gave Him a little veny (push) in comparison, or (if it be lawful so to speak) but a fillip on the side, which was soon after re-cured, gave the devil a deadly wound in the forehead, which with all his paws he shall never be able to claw off.

11. As David only with his sling did vanquish and overcome Goliath : so Christ only by His death, and by the power of His cross, did conquer and subdue the devil. 1 Sam. xvii. 51, 54.

12. As pennyroyal, being hung up in the larder-house, yet buds its yellow flower ; or as Noah's olive-tree, being drowned under the water, yet keeps its green branch ; or as Aaron's rod, being clung and dry, yet brings forth ripe almonds ; or as Moses' bramble-bush, being set on fire, yet burns and is not consumed ; or as the palm-tree, though it have weights at the top and many snakes at the root, yet still it says, "I am neither oppressed with the weights nor distressed with the snakes" : so Christ, the right pennyroyal, the true Noah's olive-tree, the right Aaron's rod, the true Moses' bramble-bush, and the true palm-tree, though all the judgments of God and all the sins of the world, like unsupportable weights, were laid upon Him—yea, though the cursed Jews stood beneath like venomous snakes hissing and biting at Him—yet He was neither so oppressed with them, nor so distressed with these, but that even upon His cross He did most flourish when He was most afflicted.

13. As Epaminondas, being sore wounded in fight, demanded of his soldiers standing by whether his enemies were overthrown or no, they answered "Yea ;" then whether his buckler were whole or no, they answered all, "Aye"—"Nay, then," said he, "all is well. This is not the end of my life, but the beginning of my glory ; for now your dear Epaminondas, dying thus gloriously, shall rather be born again than buried : " so Christ, likewise, was sore wounded, but His enemies, death and the devil, were overthrown and spoiled ; His buckler, which was His Godhead, was whole and untouched, therefore there was no harm done ; His death was no death, but an exaltation unto greater glory. John xii. 32.

14. As Gideon's fleece, when it was moist, the earth was dry, but when it was dry, the earth was moist : so when Christ's fleece was moist as a green tree, then were all we dry like rotten sticks ; but when His fleece was dry, all the blood and water being wrung out of His precious side, then were we moistened with His grace. Judges vi. 37-39.

15. As a lamb is much more nimble and lively for shearing : so was Christ, the Lamb of God, by this shearing of His death, which was a kind of quickening to Him, and only a trimming to Him before He ascended to His Father, like as Joseph was trimmed and polled before He appeared to Pharaoh.

16. When Adam slept, his side was opened : so, when Christ died, His side was opened.

17. As Adam's side, being opened, flesh and bone were taken out : so, likewise, Christ's side, being opened, water and blood were taken out.

18. As of Adam's flesh and bone the woman was built : so of Christ's water and blood the Church was built ; so that the death of Christ is nothing but the sleep of Adam.

19. As Jacob, travelling towards Haran, when he had laid a heap of stones under his head and taken a nap by the way, was much revived with it after his tedious journey : so Christ, travelling towards heaven, when He had slept a little in that stony sepulchre, which was hewn out of a rock, lived then most princely after His painful passion. Gen. xxviii. 10, &c.
Matt. xxvii. 60.

20. Even as when many birds are caught in a net, if a pelican, or any other great bird that is among them, get out, all the rest that are little ones follow after : so, likewise, Christ, by His death, as a great bird having broken through the net of death, all we escape with Him.

21. As honey, being found in a dead lion, the death of the lion was the sustenance of Samson : so Christ's gall is our honey, and the bitter death of Christ, by reason of His righteousness, is the sweet life of man. Judges xiv. 8, 9.

22. As Deborah rejoiced when Barak put Sisera to flight : even so we have great cause to rejoice, seeing Christ, by His death, hath put death to flight. Judges v. 1, &c.

23. Even as a noble champion, having already had a leg and an arm slashed off, when all the stage, in admiration of his valour and manhood, cries, "Save the man! save the man!" yet puts out himself, and, standing up on one leg and striking with one arm, fights still as stoutly as if he had never been hurt at all: so Christ, having been scorned and scourged already, when the whole theatre of heaven and earth wept for Him—yea, when the powers above the heaven came down, and the dead under the earth rose up to moan and pity Him—only He Himself would neither ask any favour of others, nor yet show any favour to Himself, but was very angry, and called him Satan that gave Him such counsel; yea, though all the saints in heaven and earth did bleed at the very heart, in a manner as much as Himself did upon the cross, to see so good a man so shamefully despised, yet nothing could stay Him, but still He went on forward as pleasantly and as cheerfully as to any banquet or feast to this most rueful and dreadful death.

Wisd. vi. 3, 4, &c.

24. As, when the heart of a man hath received a deadly wound, he is accounted for dead, because he cannot escape death: so sin, in the death of Christ, hath received a deadly wound; so that, by reason of that near conjunction which, by faith, we have with Christ, we are said to be dead with Him.

The growth of grace by Christ's death.

John xii. 24.

As wheat, except it be sown in the ground, and there die, doth not spring again, and so multiply: even so the knowledge of those benefits which we have by Christ are increased, grow, and multiplied throughout the whole world by His death.

Christ's human nature.

As the plant called mistletoe, having no root of its own, both grows and lives in the stock or body of the oak, or some other tree: so our Saviour Christ's human nature is, as it were, engrafted into the person of Himself, and is wholly supported and sustained by it, so as it should not be at all if it were not sustained in that manner.

Christ's merits.

2 Sam. v. 5-9.
Josh. xxiii. 7-13.

1. As the Jebusites, God's enemies, could not fully be conquered until David came: even so no more could the kingdom of Satan be clean overthrown until Christ Jesus, the King of glory, was born of the seed of David, who conquered sin, hell, and the devil, and possessed the holy hill Sion, and made His people citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem.

Ps. cxxxiii. 2.

2. Even as the ointment that was poured upon the head of Aaron rested not there, but went down also upon his beard—yea, to the skirts of his clothing: so, likewise, the righteousness of Christ and His merit are given and attributed to every one that be His members.

3. As Christ's righteousness is made ours really, by imputation, to make us righteous: even so we, by the merit of His righteousness imputed to us, do merit and deserve life everlasting.

Christ's person consisteth of two natures.

1 LIKE as there must be both these two natures, true and sound, the properties of either being kept in one person of Christ, to reconcile man to God, and to strike this covenant: so also, to keep this covenant, that, according to the promise and oath of God, it may be everlasting, both natures must remain for ever sound with their properties, unless we will have the covenant in the pillar and foundation to be shaken.

2. Like as, when the root of a tree is hurt, the branches also do wither, and there can be no fruit hoped for : even so, the doctrine being corrupt concerning the person of Christ, and the two natures in the same person, together with their distinct properties, the doctrine also of the priestly and kingly office of Christ remaineth corrupt, which is, as it were, the fruits of the doctrine concerning His person.

The personal union of Christ.

As a certain soul, being joined to a certain body, maketh one certain person, as Peter, Paul, and John : so the Eternal Word of the Father took unto it—that flesh of the Virgin—that is to say, made the same so proper unto itself—that from hence cometh and proceedeth that Person which is called Christ.

Christ's second coming to judgment.

1. So quickly as the lightning in the east is seen unto the west : even so suddenly shall Christ appear unto the whole world at His second coming.

2. As a thief (so near as he can) cometh closely to rob a house when men think least of him : so, likewise, upon a like sudden, when men least think of it, shall Christ come again to judgment.

Matt. xxiv. 43, 44.
1 Thess. v. 4.
2 Pet. iii. 10.

3. Like as, when the sun is up, which is the most excellent light, although the moon and the stars do remain still in the element (heaven), yet are they not seen, but are even as though they were all fallen down from heaven : even so the coming of Christ to judgment shall be so glorious and so bright, that, in comparison of it, the light of the sun then, the moon, and the stars, shall be as though they were not at all.

Matt. xxiv. 29.
Isa. xlii. 10.
Ezek. xxxii. 7.
Joel ii. 31 ; iii. 15.

4. Like as men wax cunning to foresee what weather will shortly happen by the standing of the wind, by the gathering of the clouds, and by other tokens, which, as it did condemn the carelessness of them who lived in the time of Christ, because they were not careful and diligent to mark the tokens whereby they should have known the coming of Christ : so also it will condemn us if we mark not, neither observe, the tokens of the second coming of Christ.

5. As a guilty man, whose conscience doth accuse him, would never see the judge, and a traitor would never willingly be espied of his prince, nor a disloyal person of one that knoweth him ; and, on the other side, a true and faithful subject, that hath done dutiful service, desireth the presence of the prince, in hope to be well rewarded : so the wicked and ungodly ones of the world are grieved to hear of Christ's coming to judge the quick and the dead, but they that have lived with good consciences do groan for His coming.

Christ's victory over Satan.

LIKE as, if two enemies fight together, and the one let the other choose his weapon himself, and appoint the other what weapon he is to use, if he who is dealt so withal doth vanquish and overcome the other, the greater is his glory who doth so overcome : so, likewise, Christ and Satan fighting, Satan did choose to fight with Him in the flesh (the weakest of many weapons), yet even with that weapon did Christ overcome him, which got Christ the greater glory, and gave Satan the greater shame.

Christian a general name for all that are baptized.

Acts xi. 26; xxi. 28.
1 Pet. iv. 16.

LIKE as every man and woman hath a several and proper name, whereby he or she is discerned and known from another: even so there is one name that is generally appertaining unto all men—namely, Christian—which is derived unto us from Christ our Saviour. as the Author in whom we believe, in whom we are baptized, whose word we esteem, whose redemption and righteousness we do reverence, by whose Spirit we, being anointed with holy oil, by Him are made joyful and glad.

It is impossible to know who is a true Christian before he dies.

LIKE as, in a ground sown with divers seeds, no man can certainly know one seed for another, which shall bring forth fruit and which shall not; yea, though it have already put forth—yea, and what is more, though it be eared: even so no one man can know another man thoroughly to be a Christian (which is the greatest felicity that is) before the end of his race, because no man is to be counted happy before his death's day, by reason of many miseries and calamities which may befall him.

Christian service.

As, in a man's body, one part is very ready to do service to another—the foot to the eye, and the eye to the foot: even so every Christian man, as part of the mystical body of Christ, must be willing and ready to do service one to another, not envying those which be in greater calling, nor scorning his inferiors.

Christianity.

LIKE as everything which striketh a hard stone is broken in pieces, the stone remaining whole: even so every man who striketh against Christianity hurteth himself, and cannot prevail against the same.

Christians.

1. As wholesome herbs are in some countries growing plentifully, in others sparingly, in some in every highway, in others only in private gardens, and somewhere again they cannot grow at all: so godly Christians are in some places many, in others few, somewhere mewed up in close houses, and somewhere again not to be found at all.

2. As some herbs will prosper and grow in the mountains, some in low grounds, some in shadowy places, some in sunny places, some in the corn-field, some on the dry heath, some by the salt sea-coast, some by the sweet rivers: so godly Christians grow up, some in high places, some in mean estate, some where they have defence, and some where they are persecuted, &c.

3. As the bastard narcissus or yellow daffodil flowereth in February, and is in flower under the snow: so true Christians show forth their zeal in the coldest time and age—as Wickliffe, &c., in popery.

4. As woodrow, a herb of a most pleasant smell, yet loveth dark, shadowy places: so many godly Christians of great gifts love to live obscurely.

5. As some herbs last but a short time, and yet wholesome herbs, and virtuous for all that, as mousetaile, adder's-tongue, &c.: so many Christians live but a while, and die in the flower of their time, and yet good Christians for all that.

6. As southernwood will not flower in every country that it will grow in: so the godly oftentimes profess not, or cannot be suffered to profess openly, where they have been called.

7. As Apelles the painter much lamented if he should escape but one day without drawing some picture or line: so ought a Christian man to be sorry if any day should pass without some good work or exercise.

8. As the care of an evil Christian, when he is sick, is to desire to be whole, only to live and enjoy the pleasures of the world: even so the desire of a good Christian, when he is diseased, is to be whole, not so much to live, as to glorify God and to reform his life.

9. Like as sheep do know the voice of their own shepherd, and flee from a stranger: even so godly Christians acknowledge Christ only their Teacher, and will hear only those that preach His Word soundly, and not credit any that preach false doctrine, how great in authority soever they be—yea, though it were an angel from heaven.

Gal. i. 9.
John xiii. 27.

10. As sheep follow their own shepherd whithersoever he goeth: even so must faithful Christians follow Christ in life, in persecution, and in glory, beholding His life as a pattern to lead their lives by, by suffering troubles patiently so often as it shall please God to lay them upon them, and so afterwards to become partakers of His glory.

Matt. xi. 29.
Matt. xx. 28.
2 Cor. viii. 9.
Phil. ii. 5-7.
2 Tim. iii. 12;
ii. 11, 12.
1 Pet. ii. 21;
iv. 1, 13.
2 Tim. ii. 12.
Lam. v. 10.

11. As in infidels living honestly the Spirit of God brideth the force of sin and the corrupt nature that it break not out, as it doth in many others: so also in Christians that are indeed godly, the same Spirit not only represseth the corruption of nature outwardly, but also mortifieth it within at the root, and regenerateth the whole man into a new creature.

12. Like as, when a man hath a journey to go, his mind is to dispatch it in all haste, yet when he is in his travel he goes but slowly, by reason of some lameness in his joints: even so, likewise, many good Christians who have an earnest desire and purpose to proceed in virtue and godliness all their life long are yet now and then, by means of their corrupt nature, so hindered that they cannot perform that duty so fully and exactly as they purposed to have done.

Rom. vii. 15, 23.

13. As a candle lighteth every man in the house: so, likewise, should the good behaviour, wise dealing, and upright conversation of Christians shine bright before men, that God by them may be glorified.

Matt. v. 15, 16.
1 Pet. ii. 12.

14. As doves are innocent, simple, and harmless: even so Christians ought to be simple and plain in their callings and behaviour one towards another, seeing they be professors of the Gospel.

15. As buildings cannot stand except they be borne up by their foundation: so, likewise, Christians are in an unstable state except they stay themselves upon Christ.

1 Cor. iii. 11.

16. Like as good ground, which, when it is tilled and sown, bringeth forth fruit plentifully: even so those who receive the Word preached gladly, believe it steadfastly, and express it in life accordingly, are good Christians.

Matt. xiii. 23.

17. As nothing is judged fruitful but that which bringeth forth fruit plentifully: even so it is not one or two good things whereby Christians are judged to be good; they should rather be filled with the fruit of righteousness.

Phil. i. 11

18. Like as vines, being let to grow out at large, in small time become wild and fruitless: even so Christians, being given over of God, to run whither flesh and blood would easily be allured, their case is desperate and their life fruitless.

John xv. 5.

19. As vines, being pruned and dressed in such sort as their nature requireth, are fruitful in yielding both bigger and sweeter grapes: so godly Christians, the branches of Christ, the true Vine, so long as they abide in Him, shall be pruned and dressed by God the Father, that careful Husbandman, that their fruit shall be both in quantity more abundant and in quality more pleasant unto Him.

20. Like as every man that trieth masteries, whether it be in running, wrestling, or buffeting, doth with great weariness and diligence forbear the meats, pleasures, and all other things that weaken the powers of the body, or which may abate their nimbleness, and either hinder or disappoint them of the victory : even so every Christian, sustaining a continual encounter and wrestling with the devil, and their own sinful lusts and outward enticements, must, throughout the whole race of their life, abstain from all things that offend either God or godly and weak persons.

Matt. xxiv. 43.
James v. 7, 8.

21. As the householder that feareth thieves will cause his house to be diligently watched and looked unto, lest the thieves come upon him unawares : so, likewise, Christians should be wary and watchful, and be prepared for the coming of our Lord and Saviour, who will come in an hour wherein we least look for Him.

Rom. xv. 1.

22. As bones in man's body, being the stronger, bear up the skin and flesh, which are the weaker : so, likewise, Christians, whom God hath endued with greater strength, should learn to bear with many infirmities in others.

23. As a tree bringeth forth, first leaves, then blossoms, and then fruit : so a good Christian ought first to bring forth good thoughts, then good speeches, and after a godly life, to the honour of God, the good of His children, and the salvation of his own soul.

Rom. xv. 1.
1 Cor. ix. 22.
Gal. vi. 1, 2.

24. As our Saviour Christ did not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax—that is, did bear with many infirmities in those who were His disciples, lest He should break off or quench those good things which began to appear in them : even so such as are sound and strong Christians ought also to bear and forbear, to cherish and foster such good things as they shall perceive to begin to live and grow in their weak brethren.

Ps. cxxiii. 2.
Matt. viii. 9.

25. Like as men-servants and maid-servants attend upon their master and mistress, and yield their duties unto them upon hope of finding help and friendship at their hands : even so every good Christian ought to be diligent and careful to please God, and be well content to tarry His leisure for those graces and mercies which he looketh for at His hands.

26. As the child which as yet can use no reason is for all that a reasonable creature, and as the man in a swoon feels no power of life, and yet he is not dead : so, likewise, the Christian man hath many qualms come over his heart, and he falls into many a swoon, so that none almost would look for any more life of Christ in him ; yet for all that he may be a true Christian.

1 Pet. ii. 11.

27. As strangers and travellers abstain, in countries where they are strangers, from many things which would hinder them in their voyage : so good Christians, in their passage through this world, should abstain from the lusts of the flesh, which hinder their souls from life everlasting.

Matt. xxv. 30.

28. As that unprofitable servant was grievously punished who had received a talent of his master, and went and digged in the earth and hid it : even so such Christians as have received any gifts of God, and do not employ them to the common use, benefit, and profit of the Church and people of God, shall receive heavy and grievous punishments of God for so doing.

1 Pet. iv. 15, 16.

29. As thieves and such other malefactors are executed, and suffer due punishment according to their deservings : so all Christians are to take heed that they deserve not to suffer as murderers, thieves, evil-doers, or busy-bodies ; but if they suffer for a good conscience, then they are not to be ashamed.

John xv. 1-6.

30. As branches cannot bring forth fruit except they abide in the vine : so, likewise, Christians cannot bring forth fruits of righteousness except they abide in Christ.

1 Cor. ix. 25.

31. Like as those who run or wrestle for the best game do, of their own accord, abstain from all things which may either make them short-winded or hinder their lightness, strength, or nimbleness : even so much more ought Christians cast off and abstain from all those things which may hinder them in the way and course of everlasting life.

32. As an owl peeps at the sun out of a barn, but dares not come near it : so, likewise, some Christians peep at religion, and will not come to it, but stand aloof, pinking and winking, as though they were more afraid of God than the devil.

33. Even as a candle, that it may give light unto others, itself is burned and consumed ; or as salt itself is bruised and molten, that it may give good season and a sweet savour unto meat : so a true Christian, especially one advanced to dignity and placed in authority, should spare no labour, but even break himself with study and care, and undergo any pains to do good, to profit many, and win some souls to God.

Matt. v. 13, 14.

34. Like as, in a great and sore disease, all the best remedies that can be devised are wont to be applied with all speed : even so, the more that Christians see wickedness and ungodliness to abound, the more ought they to consider by what means they may be remedied, that some may be saved among so many thousands who are hard-hearted and enemies to all good warnings.

35. Even as the children of this world do witness themselves to be all one with the world, by following their worldly lusts, ambition, covetousness, and pleasures : so, in like case, Christians show themselves to be made one with Christ by His Holy Spirit, when they follow Christ step by step, and make His life to serve them as a most perfect rule to lead their life by.

36. Even as the sailors' gnomon, or rule, which is commonly called the mariners' needle, doth always look towards the North Pole, and will ever turn towards the same howsoever it be placed, which is marvellous in that instrument and needle, whereby the mariners do know the course of the winds : even so every Christian man ought to direct the eyes of his mind and the ways of his heart to Christ, who is our North Pole, and that fixed and constant North Star whereby we ought all to be governed ; for He is our hope and our trust ; He is all our strength, whereupon we must still rely.

37. Like as the gnomon doth ever behold the North Star, whether it be closed and shut up in a coffer of gold, silver, or wood, never losing its nature : so a faithful Christian man, whether he abound in wealth or be pinched with poverty, whether he be of high or low degree in this world, ought continually to have his faith and hope surely built and grounded upon Christ, and to have his heart and mind fast fixed and settled in Him, and to follow Him through thick and thin, through fire and water, through wars and peace, through hunger and cold, through friends and foes, through a thousand perils and dangers, through the surges and waves of envy, malice, hatred, evil speeches, railing sentences, contempt of the world, flesh, and devil, and even in death itself, be it never so bitter, cruel, and tyrannical, yet never to lose the sight and view of Christ, never to give over our faith, hope, and trust in Him.

Cant. viii. 6.
Ps. xvi. 8, 9.
Heb. xii. 2.

38. As all rivers of water go into the sea because they came out of it, and so return to the place whence they came : so, likewise, every good Christian ought to go and press towards God with all his heart, strength, and power, because he came out from Him, and was created of Him. He ought, therefore, to look upon Him with the eyes of a steadfast and constant faith, grounded upon His Word.

Eccles. i. 7.

39. Even as in the midst of the sphere is the centre, from which all lines being drawn do tend towards their circumference : so a good Christian man hath God for his circumference ; for whatsoever he thinketh, speaketh, or doth, it tendeth to Christ, of whom he is compassed round about.

Ps. xxxii. 10 ; xcl
4, &c. ; cxxv. 2,

40. As some infidels that know not Christ, but are mere strangers unto Him, do think it better to lose their lives than to violate their promises and oaths made to their enemies : even so much more Christians, in such cases, ought to be true and constant.

Ezek. xvii. 18, 19.
Josh. ix. 14-18.

41. Even as men's hands were made that the one might help the other, and the feet also, because they be members of one and the same body : so is it the duty of all Christians

1 Cor. xii. 16, 27.
Eph. v. 30.

to succour and to relieve one another in afflictions and troubles, seeing the Church of God is a certain body whereof we are members.

Gal. vi. 2

42. As it would be against nature that one foot should hinder or smite another : so it is very unreasonable and ungodly that one Christian should not comfort and relieve another in their tribulations and wants.

43. Like as, if herbs watered do still continue dry, we justly say they are dead : so, likewise, we cannot avow or assure ourselves to be Christians, watered with the Spirit of Christ, so long as, instead of bearing fruit by amendment of life, we continue dry and withered.

1 Cor. viii. 1.

44. As he is not rightly called a rich man that can tell how and by what means a man may be exceeding rich, but he that hath riches of his own and doth possess them : so he is not a good and right Christian man that can, according to knowledge, dispute and reason of virtue and godliness, and can describe and define the same ; but he that is endued with virtue and possessed with true godliness, and doth most willingly practise the same in the whole course of his life, both with his friends and with his foes, that man and such a woman is rightly called, and is, indeed, a true Christian, in whom the Lord hath great delight.

Gal. vi. 9, 10.

45. As burning candles do give light until they be consumed : so, likewise, godly Christians must be occupied in doing of good so long as they shall live.

46. As unto the ungodly man God said, " Why dost thou preach My laws, and takest My covenant in thy mouth, whereas thou hatest to be reformed and hast cast My words behind thee ? " so we may be well assured that it is not enough for Christians to have the Gospel in their mouths, but they must express the truth thereof in their lives ; for it is not enough to have the name of a Christian, but to be found a Christian indeed.

47. As nature helped not Abraham's own children, but because they lacked Abraham's works they are called the " devil's sons " : so, likewise, the bare and naked name of a Christian, without virtue, is a bare title without verity, and profiteth not any at all.

Exo. xii. 8.

48. As the paschal lamb was eaten with sour herbs and unleavened bread : so the faithful Christian ought to repent him of his evil life past, and to give himself to purity of life.

49. Even as a man that passeth through a strong flood or stream on foot, lest he stumble and fall down, setteth his eye steadily upon the firm land which he mindeth to attain unto, and marketh not the swift course of the water, and so goeth over safely and is nothing dismayed : so, likewise, a sound and good Christian, passing the raging waves of present troubles, turneth away his sight, his thought, and all apprehension that he might otherwise have of the misery of them, and, lifting up his eyes to heaven, beholdeth there, with a spiritual regard, the inestimable treasures of the heavenly inheritance which he striveth unto, and by this means easily surmounteth all horror and fear of torments and griefs, which commonly make alterations in men's heads, and casteth them headlong into desperation.

Ps. lxxviii. 34, 35.

50. Even as every beast that is stricken with lightning turneth his face toward the lightning : so, likewise, if Christians will have regard to God, when He pleaseth them, He will compel them also to have an eye to Him when He strikes them.

Micah v. 7.

51. Like as the dewy drops after great heat do cherish the grass : even so good Christians do bring forth works of mercy, pity, comfort, and refreshing to the people amongst whom they do live and are conversant.

False Christians.

LIKE AS, among a great many who are stricken with extreme sickness and diseases, some do always escape, as it pleaseth God : so it is to be hoped that, among an infinite number of false Christians, God will touch some, to bring them back from the filthiness and corruptions of the world, and to lead them to the fearing of Himself.

Christians in great misery if God forsake them.

As women travailing in child-birth, who have not strength to bring forth their fruit, are in great misery : so, likewise, are the children of God in great distress in the days of trouble and affliction if God leave them and forsake them therein. Isa. xxxvii. 3.

Good Christians are much grieved when God is dishonoured.

As a water-pot, or a vial full of liquor, if suddenly it be overthrown, doth shed and scatter the liquor : so a devout and godly Christian, abounding with tears, being moved and troubled with sorrow, because of the injuries, dishonour, wrongs, and blasphemies committed against the Lord, doth presently pour out great abundance, and, as it were, mighty streams of salt and bitter tears. Luke xix. 47.
Ps. cxix. 136.
Matt. xxvi. 75.

Christians are to pray chiefly for spiritual graces.

As Achsah begged of Caleb, her father, a blessing to her dowry, and springs of water to her dry soil : so must all Christians entreat Almighty God to give them the grace of His Holy Spirit, with the gift of His heavenly Word, that they may pay unto Him the tribute of honour. Josh. xv. 19.

Church.

1. As a ship, in the midst of the sea, goeth not toward the haven, unless it have a prosperous gale of wind : even so the Church of God goeth not to its wished haven—to wit, the kingdom of heaven—unless it be blown with the Spirit of God, and directed and set on by the same Spirit.

2. As a woman that is barren, yet after a long time childeth (beareth a child) : even so it is with the people of God. Though they be never so few, and the Church never so small, yet God will multiply and increase it.

3. As the flowers of water betony, with the leaves and sprigs, though they die often, and yearly, yet the root is aye-lasting from which they come and to which they belong : so, though discipline and the outward beauty of the Church change and often die, yet the Church is aye-lasting and of all continuance.

4. As in the blue lysimachus, cow-wheat, and winter savoury, and likewise the affodil, the lower parts and branches of them begin to flower : so, in many Churches and families, the inferior persons begin to profess God first, and show forth themselves by a holy profession.

5. As the herb sophia groweth especially and best where there hath been in times any building, now laid waste : so many cannot grow well and wax rich enough without the Church be laid waste. Many grow best where they have pulled down all, but the Church groweth best where Popery is utterly defaced and pulled down.

6. As the flowers of goat's-beard and sanspurge do always bend toward the sun : so the Church bendeth always to Christ.

7. As, by the description of the facon and nature of the true meum, the common used is found counterfeit : so, by the description of the true Church, the common reputed is found false.

8. As the diseases of the body are of two sorts, some curable, and some incurable, which are to death : so the Church, though it be subject to sundry falls, cannot err in foundation to death, for the errors of God's children are curable.

9. As, where the dead carcase is, thither resort the eagles : even so, where there are men that truly believe in Christ, there is the Church.

10. As false and counterfeit coiners, who would not have men to know and discern their money by the fineness of gold and silver, and by the touchstone, but by the weight, by the sound, by the stamp, and by the colour, which they may easily falsify : even so our adversaries, the Papists, would make us believe that the true Church cannot be known by these two marks—to wit, the sincere preaching of the Word and the administration of the Sacraments according to the institution of Christ—but rather by certain outward marks—to wit, by antiquity, multitude, succession of places and persons, by miracles, and revelations—which marks, in very deed, are common both to the pure and sound Church, and also to the impure and corrupt Church.

11. Like as, if one should tie or fasten to the body of a man some piece of flesh, bone, or sinew, were it done never so cunningly, yet that would not be counted or called any part or member of that body, seeing it receiveth neither life nor motion from the soul thereof, but doth wholly depend upon the cunning and workmanship thereof : so we confess that here upon earth is a Church, a fellowship and communion of saints—that is to say, the congregation of the faithful—not gathered together by the will of man, human reason, or worldly invention, but through the Holy Ghost ; not tied or limited to any one place, but distributed according to God's good will and pleasure ; to the which Church hypocrites and such-like are joined and tied, but not united or participating like as members thereof.

12. As a heap of wheat, though it have chaff in it, is yet called wheat ; or as a tun of wine, though it have lees in it, is yet called wine ; or as a field wherein tares appear with the wheat is called a corn-field : even so the visible Church is the Church. Though it consisteth of good and bad, and be mixed of the elect and reprobate, yet are they called God's Church for the elect's sake, and have their denomination from the better, not the bigger part.

13. Like as a wife is a wife, although she obey not her husband, as long as she keepeth the faith she plighted in marriage, and defileth not herself with another's bed : even so is it in the Church, that, although she be manifoldly undutiful towards her husband, Christ Jesus, either by atheism or by idolatry, yet she remaineth still the wife of Christ.

14. As a wife that hath broken her faith and promise made in wedlock is not forthwith out of the account of a wife until she, being convicted thereof, be for that cause divorced from her husband : even so the Church, notwithstanding her spiritual adulteries, is not unchurched, nor ceaseth to be reputed a Church, until such time as the Lord, by taking away from her the ministry of the Word and the administration of the Sacraments, hath, as it were, by bill of divorce, disavowed her, by taking away from her all her jewels and ornaments wherewith He beautified her when first He contracted with her.

15. Like as a garden or vine decayeth with overmuch heat and drought, except, after the planting thereof, it be by showers watered : even so the Church, with overmuch heat of afflictions, withereth away, except afterwards it be moistened by the water of the Holy Ghost, which is the sincere preaching of the Gospel.

16. As there be three forms in one and the self-same school, not all alike taught, and yet they make not sundry schools, but contain sundry scholars and learners in one self-same school : so, likewise, is the Church not made many, neither by alteration of times, neither by difference of places, nor by changes of orders and dispensations.

17. As there be in one school divers ushers and divers teaching, but yet all tending to one end—to wit, to attain learning—and so to come to the university : even so, in the true Church of Christ before the law, and under the law, and since, in the time of the Gospel,

Matt. xvi. 17.
1 Cor. xii. 3.

Matt. xxv. 32 ; iii.
12 ; xiii. 47.
2 Tim. ii. 20.

have been divers instructors, as prophets, apostles, pastors, and teachers, but yet all aiming at one mark, and labouring to bring the people to the glorious kingdom of heaven.

18. Like as it is not in the power of any man to dispense, minister, or distribute any part of that nourishment which he receiveth in at his mouth unto any member which either is mortified and dead in his body, or that is cut off from the same: even so it is undoubtedly to be believed, that neither the death, passion, and blood-shedding of our Saviour Christ, nor His Sacraments, nor any of the graces of the Holy Ghost, nor any good work in the world, doth or can anything profit to remission and forgiveness of sins or salvation to any person who is out of the Catholic Church, as long as he shall so stand and continue out of the same.

19. Like as, if a subject, knowing the letters of his prince, and also his seal, should, because that he knoweth them well, and alloweth them to be his, presume and take upon him to counterfeit his prince's letters or seal, he should be no true subject, but a felon and a traitor: even so, if the Church, because that she knoweth the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the true and infallible Word of her Lord and Saviour, and the Sacraments to be His seals, should presume or take upon her to alter God's Word—I mean the Scriptures that be contained in the canonical books of the Old and New Testaments—or to counterfeit the Sacraments—that is to say, to minister them otherwise than her Lord and Master hath instituted and appointed in His Word—she ought not to be called the true Church, but the most traitorous harlot of Antichrist.

20. As it is a great folly for a man that hath a mote in his eye to grow into such a chafe or dislike with it that he should be unthankful for his eye: even so it is much greater folly for men to separate themselves from our Church and wholly to condemn it, by reason that there be some imperfections and wants in it, which is a means to breed unthankfulness, by forgetting the manifold blessings we have received and do still enjoy, and the ready way to provoke God rather, in His justice, to take away these good benefits that we enjoy already, than, in mercy, to provoke Him to increase them more.

21. As the glory of God is showed most herein, that He defendeth His Spouse, and hath beautified her with gifts from above, that she might be a pure and undefiled Spouse, chaste and holy unto Himself: even so this is our greatest glory, of what state or condition soever we be, to be members of this Church, by the communion whereof we are His members.

22. As a man will not wittingly bestow a diamond upon him that thinks it to be but a piece of glass, or a pearl on him that esteemeth it to be but a grain of salt: even so the Lord will not bestow His blessings but upon those that, by His Spirit, shall know and feel what they are; for if they feel them not, and know not what they are, then they are not yet of God's House or Church. Heb. iii. 6.

23. As it is not enough to set or sow a garden with good herbs and seeds and then let it alone, but there must be a gardener, to oversee it, and often to weed it: even so it is not sufficient for a Church to have the Word planted and sown in it, but there must be diligent and painful (laborious) preachers and pastors continually to water and govern it, or else it will grow barren and fruitless.

24. Like as, if the land be not often tilled, but lie barren, it will bring forth nothing but briars, thistles, and nettles: even so, if Churches be not continually laboured by preaching and catechising, they will wax secure, and so bring forth nothing but ignorance, atheism, superstition, idolatry, and all wickedness of life.

25. As the army of heaven is innumerable and the sand of the sea immeasurable: even so God will multiply His Church. Jer. xxxiii. 22

26. As the bride pertaineth to none but to the bridegroom: so, likewise, the Church pertaineth to Christ alone. Hos. ii. 19.
2. Cor. xi. 2.
Jehn iii. 29.

27. As every true friend to the bridegroom rejoiceth to see the bridegroom's voice obeyed: even so every godly man is glad to see every member of the Church frame himself to the obedience of the Word of Christ.

Isa. xlii. 13.

28. As a giant is too strong for mean men of middle size, and as his voice and look are fearful to his enemies: so, likewise, will God be to all such as rise up against Him and His Church.

Isa. xxxiii. 1, 2.

29. As a waste ground, broken up and rid of those things wherewith it was overgrown and the fruitfulness thereof hindered, is by good husbandry brought to flourish and to be fruitful: even so such is the state of the Church when, after persecution, it pleaseth God to send peace and prosperity thereto.

30. As men hedge their grounds round about to keep them from being spoiled with cattle: even so God doth fence His Church and those who fear Him round about, that they may be defended against all evils.

31. As the grounds are eaten, wasted, devoured, and rooted up when the hedges and fences thereof are neglected and suffered to lie open: even so it fareth with the Church and with them that profess the name of God when He is provoked with their sins, in withdrawing His friendly defence and Fatherly protection from them.

32. As the shipmasters are such as have cunning to guide the ship wherein both themselves and other men do sail: so Almighty God maketh choice of such to guide His Church as can govern themselves and so many as are committed to their charge.

Exod. iii. 2.

33. As that bush which Moses saw was burning, but not consumed: even so the Church of God must be tried in the fire of affliction, but not destroyed.

34. As the moon is sometimes eclipsed and sometimes in the full: so, likewise, the Church of God is subject to darkness, as in the time of popery and superstition.

35. As the moon doth borrow her light of the sun, because of herself she hath little or none at all: even so the Church of God, having no light of herself, doth take her light of the Son of God, Christ Jesus.

Exod. xx. 4, 5.
Deut. vi. 13.
Matt. iv. 10.

36. As jealousy cannot abide that the wife should show any sign of love to another man: even so Almighty God cannot brook that the Church, His spouse, should take the least part of His glory from Him, and bestow it upon a strange god that is both hopeless and helpless.

Ps. lxxii. 8.
Gen. vi. 14, 15.

37. As the ark was long and broad: so the Church and kingdom of Christ is long and large.

Luke xii. 32.
Matt. xxii. 74;
xxiv. 22; vii. 14.

38. As the ark was great and large, and yet small in comparison of the flood: even so the elect are many, no doubt, but few in respect of the reprobate.

39. As the ark was made of many pieces of wood and joined together in one: so the Church consisteth of many members knit together in one faith; for in Jesus Christ we are all one, without difference of man or woman.

40. As the ark was made of incorruptible wood: even so the Church consisteth of immortal souls.

Acts xiv. 22.

41. As the ark did float in the flood: even so the Church is, in this world, as in a sea of troubles.

42. As one billow in the sea pusheth forward another: so, likewise, troubles do come upon the Church by troops.

43. As the moon is not always visible, being in her change: so, likewise, the Church of God, to the eye of man, is not always in a visible show as the proud Church of Rome is, but hath sometimes war and adversity, sometimes peace and prosperity.

44. As a ship upon the seas is tossed with the wind and the waves from one place to another: even so is the Church often tossed hither and thither in the sea of this world, but yet never drowned, because Jesus Christ is in it, and holdeth the stern with His hand.

45. As the hand cut off from the body dieth and lacketh life : even so is it in the mystical body of the Church—no life or salvation without the body of Christ. Ezek. xiii. 9.
Joel ii. 32.
Acts ii. 47.

46. As trees in winter, which, for that they are naked and void both of leaves and of fruit, do seem, for the time, little to differ from dead and starved trees, and yet have secretly hid in them their juice, which maketh them spring again, and, as it were, revive again in summer : even so such is the state of the Church of God, which, though in bitter persecution, seemeth to be, as it were, quenched and extinguished, yet, when God giveth some peace and rest, it flourisheth and springeth again.

47. As a vine, when the fences thereof are broken, lieth open to the waste and is spoiled of every beast of the field : even so the Church and people of God, when, for their sins, He seemeth, for a time, to withdraw His protection and defence, is subject to the injuries and violence of all sorts of the wicked.

48. As ground and soil that hath long lain waste, by good husbandry, is rid of weeds and often brought to flourish with corn or grass : even so the Church of God, after long persecution, is, by the power and goodness of God, brought again to a flourishing estate.

49. Like as, if a man should have both his hands and his arms cut off, his eyes put out, &c., yet, as long as his head standeth, and other vital parts, he is to be counted a man, although a maimed man : even so it is in the Church or assembly. As long as it holdeth the head, how defective it is otherwise, it hath the due and right of the Church of God. And although a man should have six fingers on one hand, and but three on the other, and albeit they should stand where the mouth doth, yet all this deformity should not hinder from being truly holden to be a man, although it would be a great deformity in him ; on the other hand, if he had no head at all, or there were no natural conjunction of the parts one with the other, but a whole thorough displacing of every part from its proper seat, then verily could he not be deemed to have either the proportion of a man or his life : so, likewise, if an assembly hold not the Head, which is Jesus Christ, or be nothing else but a confused multitude, without any part of the order which the Son of God hath appointed, the same is justly crossed out of the account of God's Church.

50. As he that entereth into a fair and goodly goldsmith's shop, richly furnished with precious pearls and costly jewels of all sorts, ought not to mislike those excellent things and costly treasures, because he seeth among them a black furnace, dusty coals, and sundry instruments of base metal, for these instruments, coals, and furnace must needs be had to make those jewels—as chains, earrings, and bracelets of gold withal : so, in the Church of God, where are innumerable men, some famous for their wisdom, some renowned for their godliness, some forward and fervent in Christian love and charity, many excelling in all kinds of virtues, if a man see there some unlearned, some deceivers, some wicked ones, some tyrants, and many ungodly ones, he ought not, therefore, to pick a quarrel against the Church of Christ, nor yet to think of the ruin and destruction of the same.

51. As the lawyer, who hath no further power but to expound the law, is under the law : so the Church, which hath authority only to publish and expound the Scriptures, cannot authorize them unto us, but must submit herself unto them.

52. As the ocean, which is but one, is divided into parts, according to the regions and countries against which it lieth—as into the English, Spanish, Italian Sea, &c. : even so the Church, dispersed over the face of the whole earth, is divided into other particular Churches, according as the countries are several in which it is seated—as into the Church of England and Ireland, the Church of France, the Church of Germany, &c.

53. As the superfluous humours in the veins are no parts of the body : even so the ungodly, though they be in the Church, yet, indeed, they are no parts of it. Matt. xiii. 45, 47.

54. As the carcase of a dead man that weareth a living man's garment is not a living man, though he look never so like him : even so the Church of Rome now, at this day, is, of a spouse of Christ, become an harlot, and in very deed is no true Church of Christ.

Acts iv. 32.
Isa. xl. 6, 7.

55. As a family of children are for the most part one like another, and brought up alike : even so it is in God's family, which is His Church. The members thereof are all alike in heart and affection ; and the reason is, because they have one Spirit to guide them all.

56. Even as in the field there groweth up not only sound corn, but also tares, cockle, and darnel ; or as in the floor, there is not only pure wheat, but also chaff ; and as in the net, there is not only good things, but bad—as filth and such like : so in the militant and visible Church, the field, floor, and net of the Lord, there are not only sincere and faithful, but also hypocritical and faithless worshippers of God ; not only constant and upright doers of the Word, but also vain and idle talkers of the same—yea, not only such as with good consciences, pure hearts, and faith unfeigned do serve the Lord and His Church, but such also as be reprobate to every good work, whose end is to be cast eternally from the presence of God, and to be burned as chaff in the fearful furnace of God's wrath and everlasting indignation.

Cant. v. 6.

57. As the appetite of a woman ought to be to her husband : so the appetite of the Church ought to be to Christ.

58. As a woman bringing forth her children in sorrow and pain : even so the Church bringeth forth in grief of members and loss of limbs.

59. As a woman must be obedient to the voice of her husband, and learn of her husband at home : even so the Church that is good must be ruled by Christ, and not rule Christ—Christ's scholar, and not Christ's schoolmaster.

60. Even as John, that bare witness of Christ, did confess that he was not worthy to loose Christ's shoe-latchet : even so the Church, though it bear witness of Christ in respect of credit and authority, is not worthy to loose Christ's shoe-latchet.

61. Like as, when Christ put forth Himself, and began to be known to the people, John said, " It behoveth me to wax less, and Him to wax greater " : so, when the Church hath given a man to understand of Christ, and that Christ beginneth to appear unto us, the Church decreaseth in authority and estimation like John, and Christ increaseth and waxeth greater in authority and credit.

Eph. ii. 19.
Rom. v. 10.

62. As the light of the sun availeth not him that lieth in a dark and close dungeon, where is always night and never day : even so the graces of God do nothing help those that lie in darkness and shadow of death until they have access unto the Church of Christ, and so to be of the number of the faithful.

63. As a builder or chief master of any works doth not offend in building, but because it happeneth sometimes that, being occupied with other thoughts and phantasies not pertaining to the building, he doth sometimes slide and fail in his work : even so it cannot be gathered by the force of the promise made to the Church that all things always are rightly defined in the Church, for the greater part overcometh the lesser, and the worst the better.

Esther viii. 17.

64. Like as, when Esther had procured safety for the Jews, and liberty to revenge themselves upon their enemies, it is said that many of the people of the land became Jews : even so, considering Christ hath procured freedom from hell, death, and damnation for all that believe in Him, we should labour, above all things, to become new creatures, joining ourselves always to the true Church of God.

65. As the body is blind that wanteth eyes to see withal, and lame, maimed, or deformed, whereof the shoulders, arms, hands, or other principal parts are wanting, or displaced and disordered : so, in like manner, that body of a Church cannot be said to be perfect and entire wherein there are not ministers of the Word who, by the light thereof, may direct the people in the ways of God, or elders that may discover and descry every matter that may threaten any danger to the body, or deacons who may distribute liberally according to that which is in their hands for the relief of the poor.

66. As Christ Himself, when He was railed upon, gave no evil words again: even so the true Church of Christ is known in this, that it suffereth persecution and doth not persecute again.

67. As wise King Solomon judged her to be the true mother of the child who had such compassion on it, that she had rather forego the whole than have it divided and dismembered, and the other to be the harlot that had overlain her child, who had consented to the death of the other child: even so, in like manner, we may discern evidently the Romish Church of Antichrist, by her bloody persecutions, from the true Church and Spouse of Christ—the one with sword and fire seeketh always to quench the truth, the other through the spirit of lenity to win men to the same; the one by compulsion and violent oppression, the other by persuasion and meek intercession; the one by the sword, the other by the Word; the one goeth about to pervert and deprave, the other seeketh all means to convert and save.

68. As a king is established in his kingdom when his godly laws are taught and kept, and that realm is strongly built and blessed of God where good order is maintained: so is God's Church and congregation well and surely built where God's Word and religion is purely taught, sin punished, and virtue embraced.

69. Like as whatsoever is in the body, receiving no life or power from the body, is not properly a part of the body, howsoever it seem to be joined to the body: so the wicked, although they be in the outward face of the Church, yet, because they are not partakers of the spiritual life thereof by Christ, are not truly to be judged members of it.

70. As, in every well-ordered kingdom, the whole realm should be of more authority than the king: so the Church ought to be of more authority than the Pope, though he were prince thereof.

71. As the ark was carried from place to place, and never rested in one certain place: so, likewise, the militant Church here on earth hath no certain place, but is removed from pillar to post. Josh. iii. 24, 17.
1 Sam. iv. 3, 4, &c.

72. As, in the body of a man, there is a full furniture of all members needful to the discharge of their several duties, which are known, both how many they are and what they are: even so, likewise, is it in the Church.

73. As the want of a member—as one eye, or a hand—breedeth grief: so, in like manner, the want of a member in the Church—as a faithful minister, which is the eye, or of a deacon, which is the hand—must needs be grievous.

74. As the disorder of a member in the body—as to have an eye where a nose should be, or a foot for the hand, &c.—causeth both horror and grief: so the like disorder in the Church of God must needs be horrible and grievous.

75. Like as, in the body of man, every member hath its several functions to discharge, and no one member can discharge the duty of another: so, also, it ought to be in the Church of God.

76. As the several members in the body of man are knit together and united to the head: so all the several members of the Church are knit and united unto the Head Christ.

77. As, in the natural body, every several member is, as it were, the member of every other in serving to their good—as the eye will see, the hand will take, the mouth will speak, all for the good of any weak member: even so it is in the Church of God.

78. As the natural members take spirit and sense from the head: so the Church hath all her spiritual feeling and life from Christ, who is able to quicken and give life.

Ps. xli. 12.
Eph. i. 23.

79. As the husband that loveth his wife thinketh himself not well till she hath his company and he her presence: so God loveth the Church His Spouse, that He cannot abide to be without her company, and thinks her not safe except she be in His presence; therefore it pleaseth the Lord Jesus, not only to call Himself the Head of His Church, and the Church His body, but also to term His Church the fullness of Himself, although He filleth all in all things, as though He were imperfect without His Church.

Isa. xlv. 15, 16.

80. Even as the father or mother will have that infant in their sight which they love most dearly: so God will have His Church in His sight, which He loveth most tenderly.

He that speaketh in the Church.

LIKE as, if the harp make a confused noise, and give no distinct sound, it delighteth not, it recreateth not, because no man can tell what it is that is played: so he that speaketh in the Church in a language which other men understand not cannot edify, because men understand not what he speaketh.

The Church's variable estate upon earth.

LIKE as the day and night do follow one another: so, likewise, in the administration of the Church here upon earth, Christ suffereth a continual intercourse between peace and persecution.

Cities and countries.

Ezek. xxiv. 6.

As a pot of meat seething on the fire, which nobody skimmeth, must needs be full of loathsome filth: so cities and countries, continuing in bloody violence, without repentance and amendment, must needs be loathsome and abominable in the eyes of God.

Comfort from God's Spirit.

Isa. xlv. 3.

As water refresheth the thirsty, and as floods do moisten the dry land and make it fruitful: so God, by His Spirit, rejoiceth the people of the Church, and poureth out abundance of His blessings upon them.

What Comfort we receive by the name of Christ, or Anointed.

Col. i. 13.
Luke xvii. 21; ii.
10, 11.

1. LIKE as the anointing, whereby, at God's commandment, prophets, priests, and kings were appointed amongst His people with an outward and visible oil, was a public testimony that God would govern and defend His people by this person, and also keep and uphold His divine worship, and likewise teach His people, and this person had commandment of this thing, that they might suffer themselves to be governed, cleansed, and taught: even so the Son of God, manifested in the flesh, concerning His manhood, is anointed with the Holy Ghost without measure (which is the truth of that outward anointing), and so is ordained and given of the Father to be the Prophet, Priest, and King of His Church.

2. As it must needs be that all they be made sad that doubt under what Lord they are in this life, whether under Christ or Satan: so, on the contrary, it cannot be but all they must be filled with joy who, by the inward testimony of the anointing of faith, and by the outward washing of holy baptism, are assured that they are under Christ, the King of Righteousness.

3. Like as, in time past, when Solomon, by the commandment of God, was anointed, there was public joy among the people of God, because they knew that God would do them good, and defend them by the hand of a king : even so we, when we hear out of the Word of God that our Lord Jesus is Christ—that is, that same anointed of the Lord—we ought with the angels to be filled with an exceeding joy of mind, being surely persuaded that even in this very thing which the Heavenly Father hath appointed, and in very deed given His own Son Christ—that is, anointed—to be our King, He doth openly from heaven declare, that He, by His Son, will become the everlasting Restorer and Defender of His Church.

Comforts for the afflicted.

1. LIKE as a father, having a young infant sick of some sore disease, though the child can speak never a word, is ready to help it ; and if it can speak, yet, being full of pain, cannot call for things as it ought, yet, if the mother can but by any signs guess at the meaning of it, she will accept as much of it as if it had spoken very plentifully—yea, though it should say one thing and mean another, she would give it according to the meaning of it : even so the Lord, who is filled with the bowels of compassion towards us in Christ, far above any father or mother, though He delighteth to hear us pray unto Him, yet when, as by the extremity of our miseries, we are oppressed or distracted, so that we cannot in any orderly manner pray unto Him as we ought, he alloweth of the sighs and sobs that we offer up unto Him, and granteth not so much our words (which are none or few) as the meaning of His Spirit, which is plentiful in us.

Ps. ciii. 8-14.
Rom. viii. 26.
2 Cor. i. 3-5.
Isa. xxxviii. 14.

2. Like as, if one in a burning fever should, in the midst of his fit, ask for cold water, and his friend the physician should, instead of that, give him a wholesome medicine, and in denying that particular thing demanded grant unto his general meaning, which was, that he might have that which might do him most good, though now, being distempered, he was not able to judge of it, but did take one thing for another : so, whatsoever we ask in our distress, our meaning must needs be, if it be ruled by God's Spirit, that we would have that which might procure our best good ; therefore, if the Lord turn our crosses to our good, though we prayed for the clean taking away of them, He fulfilleth both these promises at once.

Rom. viii. 28.
2 Cor. xii. 8, 9.

3. Like as, if the physician through his skill can cure a man by taking away his blood and humours, by cutting and searing his flesh, which of themselves are hurtful ; if he can by art so temper that which is poison (as the viper's flesh) with other wholesome things, and correct it with those that be cordial, that of it he will make a sovereign treacle, even that which shall expel poison, and so make that which could cause death to be a preserver of life : even so shall not the Lord, by His infinite wisdom and almighty power, who bringeth light out of darkness and good out of evil, and calleth the things that be not as though they were—shall not He be much more able, by the most grievous crosses that can befall us, to work the greatest good for us that may be ? so that when we would hope for good by our afflictions, and be comforted in them, we are not so much to look to the things themselves, how they are like to work upon us, as the promise which the Lord hath made unto us concerning this matter, and so to be sure that the Lord Himself will work our good hereby, because He hath said it.

4. As it is all one if the fearing patient should have not one, but a whole company of physicians saying unto him, that "Undoubtedly this medicine is likely to do you good. We know the working of it well, and have had great experience of it in many ; you need not to fear it. Take it upon our credit ;"—this would much move him : so, no doubt, this should correct the too much fear that is in us of being hurt by the cross, that we hear so many excellent and famous men very skilful therein to speak so boldly unto us of the benefit of it—even those whom we are most ready to believe in all other things. Why, then, should we not do so in this?

5. As the mother, by some unpleasant thing, weaneth the child from the breast, upon which it would otherwise always linger to the hurt of it, now when stronger meat is more fit for it: even so the Lord weaneth us by affliction from the love of this world, and thus turneth it unto our good.

6. As the fire doth not hurt the gold in consuming the dross, and the file in taking away the rust, and the purgative in expelling ill humours: so afflictions, causing us to abhor and leave some sin or other which, if we continued in, would destroy us, may truly be said to work our good.

7. As physic serveth not only to cure us of the diseases we have fallen into, but to preserve us from them in some tolerable health: even so the cross both recovereth us out of sin when we have fallen into it, and preventeth many that otherwise might creep upon us.

8. As some sickly bodies are driven to diet themselves, and are continually under physic to prevent that which their corrupt estate would otherwise necessarily pull upon them: so, likewise, some are always, or the greatest part of their lives, in the diet of affliction, not so much to bring them from gross and grievous sins, which they are not yet fallen into, as to keep them from falling, which the Lord knoweth they are ready to do, in respect of their ages, callings, and places that they live in.

Ps. cxix. 67, 71.

9. As untamed heifers, which are kept from straying out of their pastures with hedges and ditches: even so the Lord puts thorns and briars in our ways, as Hosea saith (ii. 6) —that is, layeth affliction upon us—and so, as it were, stoppeth the way, that we might not break forth by disobedience, to our hurt.

10. As a father spareth not the rod till his child be thereby humbled to the confession and amendment of his fault, because his purpose is to do him good, whereas, notwithstanding, he letteth his servant go when he seeth that he will not profit by words or a few stripes, as not caring for him: so the Lord, when He spareth the wicked in their sins, and reserveth them to further judgment, correcteth His own children again and again, thus showing that His purpose is to do them good.

11. As a wise and careful physician, who, purposing not so much to give physic unto his sick patient as to cure him thereby, if the first medicine will do it, there he leaves him; if not, he applieth one medicine after another, because he hath a diligent care of him; and if at any time he maketh intermission it is because of the patient's weakness, whom he would by that means allow to gather some strength, not that he meaneth to leave him: even so the Lord, purposing, according to His Word, by affliction, to do us good, when, by the first cross, we profit not as we ought, then either he letteth it lie the longer upon us, or, removing it, sendeth another instead of it, though not presently, because we could not bear it, yet afterwards, when it seemeth best unto Him.

12. Like as, when a man's body is distempered, and some members putrified, then it is best for him to have his blood taken away from him, to be lanced and seared, yea, to have a part cut off: even so, when any affliction or calamity doth befall us, let us not be discontented therewith, or be impatient, but, submitting our judgments and wills to the judgment and will of God, let us quietly endure, seeing the Lord giveth us that, not which we fondly desire as the best, but which He knoweth to be, and is indeed, the best.

13. As the sick patient cannot, as he is man, but feel the lancing and searing of his flesh, and so complain of it with great grief, yea, cry out for the extremity of pain, though he knoweth it to be best for him, and therefore doth, after a sort, most willingly suffer it: even so some are so full of complaints in their afflictions, because they are not persuaded at that time that the very thing is sent for their most special good, and therefore such are to meditate upon this heretofore set down concerning this matter.

14. As, in worldly matters, we will bear many things at the hands of those whom we love—as the child at the mother's, the husband at the wife's, and one friend at another's : even so, how much more ought we to bear all things at the hands of God, who we know so loveth us in Christ ; and, therefore, we ought so to love Him again as to bear all things, and, no doubt, would bear, if there were that love in us which ought to be.

15. Like as, when the child hath offended his father, if he should say to his servant in his anger, "Take him out of my sight, and punish him!" it would be more grievous than if he should correct him himself : even so it may minister unto us some comfort, that in afflictions we know we are under our Father's hand, and that He hath not delivered us unto any other to be tormented, Ps. lxxvi. 10.

16. As, in a family, great is the privilege of the eldest brother, and none must look to go beyond him—nay, every one cannot be like unto him ; and if any would come to as great an inheritance as he by doing those things which he did, they must not refuse the condition, unless they would prefer themselves before him : so, likewise, seeing it hath pleased the Lord to consecrate the Prince of our peace through affliction, and He came unto glory no other way than this, we must think it good for us to go the same way, that we might be like unto Him, and so, by our practice, show that we acknowledge Him to be the Prince of our peace and our eldest Brother, Heb. ii. 10.

17. Even as he is the chief and principal in the commonwealth, in the Church, in a private family, and in any place, that all desire to be like unto : so, when we are contented to be like unto Christ in anything, even in the cross, then shall we declare that we hold Him to be the Chief and Principal, and, as it is said, "the First-begotten among many brethren." Rom. viii. 29.

18. Although there is great difference between the head and the rest of the members, yet there is a certain conformity between the members of the same body and the head, and all of them are inferior unto it : even so, although there is no comparison betwixt Christ and us, yet we must be like Him in this, that we must not be above Him, and, therefore, not refuse any condition that He hath undergone before, unless we would preposterously prefer ourselves, the members, before Him, our Head, which were to darken the glory of Him that is the First-born, and to stain the honour of Him that is the Prince of our peace.

19. As it were a disorder if the subjects would refuse to do that which the prince had done before, or if the younger brethren should think it hard to be brought up the way that the heir hath been before : even so, when we refuse to bear the cross which our Saviour Christ, by the appointment of His Father, hath borne in greater measure than we shall, or can, it is nothing else but to lift up ourselves above Him, and to say that we will not be conformable unto Him, as to our prince, or eldest brother.

20. As Joseph did not repent that he, first enduring the prison, was afterwards made ruler in Egypt ; or Jacob, that he came to inherit his father's blessing at the last, by a long exile and tedious bondage ; or as the Israelites did not repent that, by passing through a forlorn wilderness forty years, they came to the Land of Promise in the end : even so we must not prescribe to the Lord anything in the matter of our salvation, but think ourselves happy that we are saved any way—yea, if we went to heaven by hell, when we come thither, we shall find the joys so far to surpass all troubles and adversities whatsoever, that we shall never repent us of the hardness of the way.

21. Like as if one bleed at the nose, so that he be in some danger of life, the best way to remedy the same is to change the course of the blood by letting him bleed in another place : even so, seeing there is no comfort in worldly poverty, but we think ourselves most miserable, we must turn our eyes to our spiritual poverty, and so we shall, ere it be long, find comfort.

22. Like as, if one who is blind should be suddenly taken and carried to some punishment he knew not by whom, he might greatly fear what would be the end or measure of it; or if one should be dealt withal as is the manner of the Spanish inquisitors, to put the poor soul in the greater fear, if he should have a tormentor sent unto him very ugly disguised, who should carry him into a dark place, he knew not whither, that might increase the grief of his affliction the more, but if, when in the midst of it, he should hear the voice of his father, and so perceive it was his father that corrected him, though so disguised, it might somewhat diminish his fear: even so, howsoever it be true that every cross is so much the more uncomfortable unto us, because we look not up unto Him that sendeth it, or we are so blind that we consider not who striketh us, yet, when we hear out of the Word the voice of our Father speaking unto us, and telling us that it is He that dealeth with us, how strange and deformed soever the tormentor may seem to be, let us not be too much discouraged, because even when He striketh us the bowels of compassion in Him do yearn unto us more than in a mother towards her children, and He seeketh thereby to do us good.

23. As a nobleman will have all his servants to wear one livery, that they might be known: so the Lord would have all His children known by one badge—even the badge that he put upon His eldest Son Christ, which was the cross; therefore none of us, the younger brethren, must refuse it.

The last Commandment explained.

Gen. vi. 5.
Matt. v. 28.
Rom. vi. 12; vii. 7.
James i. 14.

1. As the Lord, by the former commandments of the second table, doth utterly condemn and forbid all wicked deeds, words, and counsels that be hurtful to our neighbour, and which go with deliberation and consent with all full purposes and conclusions to evil: even so, in the last commandment, to the end that He might touch us the nearer, whereby we might the better perceive our own imperfections and weakness, He most straitly chargeth that our hearts should be so pure and clean that no evil thoughts, motions, desires, concupiscences, lusts, delights, inclinations, or natural infections of original sin should once creep into our hearts.

Gen. xii. 15, &c.; xx. 2, 3, &c.

2. Like as, if a woman were by unlawful act defiled, it were not simple fornication, but adultery, though the defiler knew not that she was married: so we must judge also of lust and concupiscence. When one is coveted, not as though she were married, but as one unmarried, and free in respect of a married woman, whosoever coveteth her coveteth his neighbour's wife, whether he do it wittingly or ignorantly—as Pharaoh and Abimelech did.

3. Like as that man is desperate of his salvation, and provoketh the anger of God towards him, that saith, "If I shall be culpable in the sight of God for the concupiscence of my heart, as well as though I do commit the fact, therefore I will add unto my lust and concupiscence the fact which it desireth, that I may carry away some pleasure of my sin, and not be damned for nothing": so, likewise, it is the part of a faithful Christian man to acknowledge and bewail the sin and uncleanness of his heart, to lament for it, and to fly unto the mercy of God, by faith in Christ our Saviour, and to withstand with all his power the mighty desires and motions of the heart, that so he may, for Christ's sake, be made partaker of the grace of God, and true health and salvation.

4. As in the commandment is forbidden all evil desires: so also, by the same, is commanded all good desires, good affections, good inclinations to godly things, and the perfect obedience of our hearts unto God's will, and to wish and desire that our neighbour may quietly possess and enjoy all that which God hath sent him, be it more or less.

5. As the Lord, by the former commandment, doth command that the rule of charity should govern our wills, studies, and works: so He now commandeth the conceptions of our minds to be directed to the same rule, that there be none of them crooked and writhen (awry), that may provoke our mind another way,

6. As God hath forbidden our minds to be bowed, and led into wrath, hatred, fornication, robbery, and lying: so He doth now forbid us to be moved thereunto by any lust or desire.

7. Like as a man, purposing to destroy a tree, yet doth no more than lop and shred off certain boughs and twigs, leaving the stump and root behind, deceiveth himself: even so, likewise, so long as lust and concupiscence doth live in men. They may well seem in the eyes of men to be very great converts if, of ignorant idiots, they are become such as have gotten some skill and knowledge; or as if, of drunkards, ruffians, adulterers, and such like, they have become sober and modest and of good behaviour—as this may be done before men, and yet the heart nothing altered before God; for there be many causes which may move men to seem outwardly to be godly, when the heart within is fraught and laden with loathsome lusts and full of rotten corruptions, which make them still altogether abominable before God, and thus they have hereby gained nothing.

8. As the Lord our God requireth account of every idle word: so, likewise, requireth He tribute and account of wicked lusts and thoughts, arraigneth them, maketh them hold up their hand at the bar, keepeth a court for them, and setteth fines and amercements upon the heads of them. Matt. xii. 36.

Whosoever breaketh one Commandment is guilty of the breach of all.

1. LIKE as, if a father should say unto his son, "Do such and such things, and I will take thee for an obedient child, and give thee all my possessions;" now the son breaketh somewhat of that which his father charged him withal, and is therefore accounted disobedient and deserveth to lose whatsoever was promised; or as if one man bestow upon another house or land, or some such thing, and in consideration thereof bindeth him to fulfil many conditions, whereof, if he break but the least, the gift is void, and it is all one as if he had never given anything: even so, likewise, we may not marvel when we hear that, by the breaking of one point of one commandment, we fail of perfect righteousness, and are made the heirs of everlasting damnation, if God should measure out unto us the due reward of His damnation.

Deut. xxvii. 26;
xxviii. 58, 59.
James ii. 10.

2. Even as, if a rule be broken in some part, or the link of a round chain, although we may rightly and truly say that they are not wholly and altogether broken: so, likewise, if but one commandment be broken, yet all are broken in the sight of God, for the justice of God is indivisible.

The breach of God's Commandments.

1. As many worldly men deal with their debtors, who will hardly let slip one hour or day, but will take the advantage and forfeiture of their bonds and obligations without any more delay: even so, if our good God and merciful Father should deal as precisely and strictly with us, in taking advantage of the bonds, forfeitures, and penalties whereinto we daily fall by breach of His commandments many ways, then our estate should be most miserable.

Job ix. 2, 3.

2. As evil debtors, when their day of payment draweth near, and when their creditors are at hand to demand the same, do seek to hide themselves and to shun their creditors' presence: so, likewise, the most part of the world be so careless in keeping that covenant, vow, and promise which they made to God at their baptism, that even wilfully they throw themselves indebted unto God, and thrall unto Satan, some by one sin and some by another, through violating and breaking of God's commandments, that when, by sickness or death, they are summoned to render an account of their bailiwick (stewardship), then they wish that the mountains would fall upon them, to hide them from the presence of God, but all in vain.

Isa. li. 19.
Hos. x. 8.
Luke xxiii. 30.
Rev. vi. 16.
Luke xvi. 2.

How the two tables of the Ten Commandments be alike.

Matt. xxii. 39.

As one man may be like another in nature and quality, although the one exceed the other in greatness, degree, and dignity, &c. : even so the second table of the ten commandments is like in quality and condition unto the first ; yet they are not equal, for the first is in degree of more dignity and excellency higher than the second.

Common People.

As they who frequent and haunt the school of defence do live, strive, contend, and fight one with another : so, of the common people, one loveth, the other spoileth each other.

Commonwealth.

1. As they who do learn music at the first do leese (hurt), break, and mar sundry instruments, as gitterns (guitars) and lutes : so the commonwealth sustaineth great detriment and loss wherein magistrates rude and unskilful do rule.

2. As it is a thing most hard and dangerous to root up old trees and to plant them anew : so, without great tumult and uproar, you cannot alter the old custom and usage of the commonwealth.

3. As water mingled with wine maketh it more moderate : so old men joined with young men, in the administration of the commonwealth, is most necessary.

4. Even as a body without a soul is dead, because it useth not the sinews, joints, or members : so that commonwealth or that city may well and truly be said to be dead where good laws, godly statutes, and holy ordinances are not used and put in practice, which are the sure binding bands of man's society and the principal parts of a commonwealth.

Communion with Christ.

1. As the head giveth sense and motion to the members, and the members feel themselves to have sense and to move by the means of the head : even so doth Christ Jesus receive and quicken every true member, and by His heavenly power maketh him to do the good which he doth.

Rom. vi. 4, 5.
John xv. 1, 2.
Eph. iv. 16.

2. Like as from the stock sap is derived to the graft, that it may live and grow and bring forth fruit in its kind : so, likewise, do all the faithful that are grafted into Christ the true Vine.

Acts xv. 9.

3. Like as the graft loseth its wild nature and is changed into the nature of the stock, and bringeth forth good fruit : even so, in like manner, it is with those who are in Christ, who by little and little are wholly renewed from evil to good.

Company changeth nature.

Ps. ci. 1, 2, &c.

As the chameleon is sometimes black and sometimes green, sometimes pale and sometimes blue (for he ever taketh his colour of the thing which he seeth to be next unto him, and doth show and represent the colour of what thing is set before him) : so men of all degrees are wont very much to imitate the nature, disposition, and manners of those whose counsel they follow and whose familiarity they use.

Evil Company hurtful.

1. As whole and sound eyes, with beholding and looking on sore eyes, be annoyed and hurt: so good and honest folks be oftentimes stained and hurt with the company of wicked men.

2. Like as a natural father will not willingly suffer his child to come into a place where he may be in danger to take hurt of his body, either by infection of the plague or otherwise: even so much more a Christian father is bound in conscience to keep his child and the rest of his family from lewd and wicked company, where even their souls should be hurt and poisoned.

3. As it is a folly or madness to open our doors to those who bring the plague, which infecteth only our bodies: so, likewise, it is a much greater folly and madness to set open our doors to swearers, blasphemers, ribald talkers, and ungodly livers, who infect both soul and body.

4. As sweet waters are corrupted and spoiled when they run into waters which are salt, bitter, or unwholesome: even so that man who joineth himself in friendship, and doth couple himself in familiarity with wicked and ungodly men, becometh wicked and ungodly himself, and is stained and blemished with their vices, although heretofore he had been inclined to virtue and godliness. 1 Cor. v. 6.

5. Even as the river Hypanis, which is very famous and much spoken of, because of the clearness and sweetness of the water of the same, after that it receiveth into it the bitter and troubled waters of the fountain Erampes, is poisoned and made unprofitable: so, likewise, many men of great and excellent wits, which did flow with the pure and pleasant waters of virtues, when they have fallen into the society and familiarity of ungracious, lewd, and godless men, have been poisoned with the lewdness of their lives and the looseness of their conditions.

6. As rotten apples corrupt those sound ones that do touch them and lie close to them: even so the evil manners and bad conditions of the ungodly do infect those that keep them company. Ps. i. 1; xxvi. 4, 5
Mark xiv. 67.
1 Cor. xv. 33.

7. As a looking-glass, though it be most clear and clean, with the foul breath of those that blow upon it is obscured and dimmed: even so a man that is honest, virtuous, and godly, with continual custom, acquaintance, and familiarity of dishonest, ungodly, and graceless men, is oftentimes corrupted, infected, and blemished. Eccles. x. 1.
Deut. xvii. 1, 2.

8. Like as, if it do happen that a planet, otherwise very benevolent and wholesome, shall be joined to other stars or planets which are malevolent and of bad influence, it also will send forth influence that is evil and unwholesome: even so a man that is virtuously given, and well bent to godliness, if he take and join unto him profane, wicked, and ungodly men into much acquaintance and familiarity, he also at length will become profane and ungodly as they be.

9. As one scabbed sheep infecteth many others; or as a little poison spoileth a great deal of meat and drink; or as some few infected with the plague may infect a whole house, town, or country: even so the familiarity and company of the wicked infecteth and hurteth the godly, because there can be no true concord betwixt the sons of wisdom and the sons of folly. 2 Cor. vi. 14.
Prov. xxix. 27.

10. As men are wont, in their own bodies, if any part thereof be festered with an incurable disease, to cut off the same, not because they neglect or hate their bodies, but that they may preserve their other parts from infection: so, also, ought we to deal—we must cut and shake off wicked and obstinate sinners from our society and company, that we be not infected by them.

11. As some little creatures do bite us, and we scarcely feel it, but afterwards we shall well perceive that they have bitten us: so, in like manner, though we perceive not the hurt that cometh by ill company at the first, yet we shall find it afterwards.

Acts ii. 40.
Matt. xxiv. 12.

12. As, in a general distemperature and corruption of the air, it is hard even for him that hath an healthful and strong constitution of body to avoid sickness: so, likewise, it is in evil company, in corrupt ages and places, very hard to live unspotted in the world.

2 Cor. vi. 14-17.
Eph. v. 11.

13. As one that walketh in the sun shall be sunburnt, though the end of his walking in it be not to be sunburnt: so, likewise, will it be with those that keep company with the wicked.

A brief Comparison of the sins that reigned in the people in the time of the Prophet Zephaniah with the like sins in the people of our time.

1. As, in the time of the prophet, there were many and foul sins and vices then reigning and overflowing amongst the people: even so, likewise, are there now many grievous sins and offences amongst us.

2. As the people then presumed upon their blind and dead faith, and counterfeit repentance, and hypocritical and feigned prayers: so, also, the common people now presume upon their idle faith, thinking themselves as good Christians as the best, if so be they can say by heart the Articles of their Belief, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments; and think that they repent very well if they come to the church on the Sabbath days and other holy days, and say the confession after their minister, although they be never touched with any remorse or feeling of any one sin; yet they suppose they have repented sufficiently. And so, likewise, of prayer.

3. Like-as, in the prophet's time, when the people were thus overwhelmed with their blind faith, counterfeit repentance, and hypocritical prayers, then the Lord, in mercy, sent His prophets vehemently and sharply to reprove them, and to denounce the judgment of God against them: even so the Lord, of His unspeakable goodness, hath raised up many famous and zealous preachers in our days to exclaim and cry out against the manifold wickedness now reigning amongst us, and to threaten us with the vengeance of God for the same.

4. As there were always some good prophets that would reprove sin and iniquity in all estates, without respect of persons, so there were also some false and fawning prophets and preachers that would soothe up the people with sweet and flattering words, and daub them up with untempered mortar, telling them that there was peace, and all was well, and that they were in a very good case, when, indeed, destruction was even at hand: even so, in like manner, as we have many faithful preachers that will boldly reprove sin in all estates, so, also, we have many such clawbacks and flattering ministers who do soothe up their parishioners, making them believe that they are as good Christians as the best, and that they may be partakers of the Lord's Supper if so be that they can say the Lord's Prayer, the Articles of their Belief, and the Ten Commandments; yea, though they understand not what the Sacraments mean, neither wherefore nor to what end they were ordained, nor what profit they should have by worthily receiving the same; and if so be that they come to the church at times appointed and hear the service read, although they return home again as wise as they came, and have profited no more in knowledge than the seats that they sat on, yet these are good people, say they, and obedient and dutiful subjects.

1 John iv. 1.

5. Even as, in the prophet's time, the people then excused themselves for not coming to hear his sermons, because there were some priests and false prophets that did bend and set themselves with all their force to contrary and gainsay that doctrine which the true prophets did deliver unto the people, whereupon the people said that they could not agree amongst themselves, and therefore they would not hear them : so, likewise, a number of people do now say after the like sort, and go about to excuse themselves, saying, " We will not hear them, because they cannot agree among themselves ; for one (say they) preacheth of this thing to-day, and another against it the next day ; some allow of one thing to-day, some others disallow of the same ; so that (say they) we cannot tell which to follow, or whom to believe ;"—but such as would be accounted good Christians ought to grow to such knowledge and judgment in the Word of God, that they may be able to discern and judge who preacheth sound doctrine and who teacheth corrupt, and so to try the spirits, &c.

Concord.

As the stone called tyrrhenus, being whole, swimmeth, but, being broken, every piece doth sink : so, by concord, we be sustained and held up, but by discord and strife we come to decay and ruin.

Acts ii. 44-46.
Rom. xiii. 13.

The Condition of man's creation.

As a merchant factor, when he has arrived in a strange country, or as a captain sent by his prince on some great exploit, is accustomed, when he cometh to the place appointed, advisedly to consider wherefore he was sent, to what end, what to attempt, what to prosecute, what to perform, what shall be expected and required at his hands upon his return by him that sent him thither ; these cogitations, no doubt, shall stir him up to attend to that which he came for, and not to employ himself in impertinent affairs : so, likewise, every Christian desirous of salvation ought to ask of himself why and to what end he was created of God and sent into this world, what to do, wherein to bestow his days. Thus doing, he shall find that it was for no other cause but only to serve God in a right manner in this life.

Deut. vi. 13.
Luke i. 74, 75.

Confessing of secret faults.

LIKE as he is unwise that openeth his disease and committeth himself unto an unskilful physician, who will rather make him worse than cure him : even so as unwise is he that revealeth his secret faults and scapes to them whose mouths are ready, with the Pharisees, to say, " See thou to that !" or to blab abroad their brethren's infirmities, so making the matter rather worse than better.

A fruitless Confession.

As it is bootless for a man that is very hungry to know and believe there is meat in the world except he knew the place and the man that had it for him, that he might resort unto him ; or as it is in vain for one to confess his disease and sickness unless he knows some good and skilful physician who might help him : so, likewise, it shall profit us nothing at all to know or confess our sins if we be ignorant of the Mediator that should take them away.

John i. 20.
1 Tim. ii. 5.
Matt. x. 28.

Confession of our evil deeds to God.

1. LIKE as beggars, if they have any good thing, do conceal and hide it, and do only show their rags and their sores, whereby they may move and stir the compassion of the beholders to pity them : even so it behoveth us not to boast our good deeds before God, as the Pharisee did, but to profess and confess our evil deeds, if we will provoke the Lord's mercy towards us, as the publican did.

Luke xviii. 9-11,
&c.

Ps. xcl. 1, 2, &c.

2. As a man that hath money to pay, whilst he hath it in his hand, is loth to part with it, but when he hath once paid it, he is glad that it is discharged, and would not for anything it were to pay again: even so men, before they have confessed their sins, are unwilling to disburthen themselves of them; but when confession is once made, they have eased their hearts and discharged their consciences, conceiving such comfort as they would not for all the world it were to do again.

3. As they who have in their stomachs meat undigested, or store of ill-humours, are eased if they vomit them up: so, if sinners and evil-doers do confess their sins to God, they shall find ease in their souls and consciences.

Our Conformity with Christ by a certain kind of imitation.

Ps. xl. 7, 8.

1. As Christ, in the garden and upon the cross, by prayer, made with strong cries and tears, presented and resigned Himself up to be a sacrifice and propitiation to the justice of His Father for man's sin: so must we also, in prayer, present and resign ourselves, our souls, our bodies, our understanding, will, memory, affections, and all we have, to the service of God, in the general calling of a Christian, and in the particular callings in which He hath placed us.

John xix. 17.
Matt. x. 38.

2. As Christ bore His own cross to the place of execution: so must we, as good disciples of Christ, deny ourselves, take up all the crosses and afflictions that the hand of God shall lay upon us, if it be every day, and follow Him.

3. As our Saviour Christ, when He apprehended the wrath of God, and the very pangs of hell were upon Him, wholly stayed Himself upon the aid, help, protection, and good pleasure of His Father, even to the last: so must we, by a true and lively faith, depend on God's mercy in Christ, as it were with both our hands, in peace, in trouble, in life, and in the very pangs of death; and we must not in any wise let our hold go—no, though we should feel ourselves descend to hell.

Conscience, good or evil.

Acts xxiv. 16.
Prov. xv. 15.
2 Cor. 1. 12.
1 Tim. 1. 5.
2 Tim. 1. 3.
Heb. xiii. 18.
1 Pet. iii. 16, 17.

1. LIKE as the body, when it is in good health, is strong, and able to bear the great storms and cold of winter, and likewise the excessive and intemperate heat of the summer: even so a conscience that is whole, and fully resolved, can bear stoutly all accidents without yielding or shrinking under the burthen and weight of anything, whatsoever may happen unto it.

1 Tim. iv. 2.
Tit. 1. 15.

2. As a good conscience is as sugar, to sweeten and mollify all our affections: even so the other is as sharp vinegar, which soureth and troubleth all our joys and consolations. And, as the one is sufficient to resist all temptations, even so the other is soft, cowardly, and vanquished, as soon as it is assailed.

3. As we are curious in looking to the health of our bodies, observing for that purpose the diet and government that is delivered and appointed by the physician unto us, and, contrariwise, abstaining from all those meats and excesses which may offend and alter our health: even so, to the end that we may have the same desire and care to preserve that health for our souls, it is convenient that we mark diligently all the rules and ordinances of good life which God, the most high and sovereign Physician, hath appointed us, and, on the contrary side, to take heed to avoid and shun all that which He hath prohibited and forbidden us.

4. Like as it is a great pleasure and joy for a man who, returning home after a long and wearisome journey unto his own house, findeth there his wife, who cometh to take him about the neck, and embraceth him, kissing and making much of him, this courteous entertainment maketh him by-and-by to forget all his travail which he hath endured in his journey; and, contrariwise, if he find his wife, after his return, brawling, riotous, froward, and who, instead of comforting him, would all manner of ways vex and torment him, this doing, no doubt, would increase and double his pains and torments which he hath endured in his long journey: even such is the estate of the conscience. Although our enemies commit a thousand outrages, violences, and villainies against us, yet if we, returning from ourselves, and entering into our own conscience, find there one with a cheerful and merry countenance, which doth comfort and content us, it maketh us in a moment to forget all our enemies; but, on the other side, if we have an evil conscience, it wearieth us in such sort, that we shall not find any house worse than our own, nor any place where we may worse quiet ourselves than with ourselves.

5. Like as an evil conscience is as a strait bed, in which a man cannot stretch himself nor turn himself at pleasure, because it is a hard thing for a man there to sleep well and rest quietly: even so, likewise, a man who hath a festered conscience, he cannot find any place or condition to content him and which is not altogether too strait for him.

6. As there is no other means to answer to the judgment of God and that can pacify our consciences but the righteousness and innocency of Jesus Christ, and not our own: even so is it He alone who can stand us instead to satisfy the judgment of our consciences.

7. Even as untamed horses, set to a chariot, do overturn the same: so unbridled and unmortified affections, overruling the understanding, do clean overthrow a good conscience.

8. Even as our first parents, Adam and Eve, were cast out of Paradise for tasting the forbidden fruit: so our Paradise is a good conscience; the forbidden fruit are riches, honour, and pleasure; and, therefore, if we set our affections upon riches, honour, and pleasures, we must needs be cast from the fruition of our Paradise, a good conscience.

9. Even as two turtle doves, when one eateth the other eateth; they sleep together—yea, and die together: even so a good conscience and the graces of God in us, they increase together and die together.

10. As a fair and beautiful countenance is pleasant and gracious in a man's eyes: even so a good and purified conscience is acceptable and delightsome in the sight of God.

11. As overmuch fullness of the stomach and superfluity of meats growtheth that obstruction which the physicians do call oppilation, or stopping, whereupon breedeth a continual headache and that frenzy which bringeth men to a madness: even so, of a depraved and dishonest love of this life, of the corruption of manners, of gluttony and excess in eating, doth spring an unbridled and untamed lust, whereof ariseth that phrenetical madness of heretics, and a corruption of their understanding in matters of faith; so that they who care not to keep a good conscience do at length fall to an incurable contempt of faith. 1 Tim. i. 5, 19

12. Like as, if we have a child that, by crying, is grievous unto us, we seek to appease and still him either by threats or promises, by gifts or stripes, but if he will not be so stilled, either we send him away from us or we ourselves go from him, that we may not be troubled with his crying: but our conscience, once feeling or apprehending the wrath of God even but a little, will never suffer us to be quiet. Promise, threaten, give, strike, what ever you do, still it crieth louder and louder, and still it tormenteth—yea, when you seek to send it away, it sticketh closer unto you; neither can you depart from it, for, being in you, it is always at hand.

13. Even as he who is troubled with a burning fever is hotter than he who is parched with the sun: so is that man more troubled who hath a guilty conscience than a good man by all outward afflictions

14. As the sick man, when he seems to sleep and take his rest, is inwardly full of troubles : so the benumbed and drowsy conscience wants not secret pangs and terrors ; but when it shall be roused and wakened by the judgment of God, it waxeth cruel and fierce like a wild beast.

15. Even as all renewed wounds are hardly or never cured : so, likewise, when a man sins against his conscience, as much as in him lieth, he plungeth himself into the gulf of desperation ; for every wound of the conscience, though the smart of it be little felt, is a deadly wound ; and he that goes on to sin against his conscience cannot call upon the name of God, for a guilty conscience makes a man fly from God.

16. As a notary or a registrar hath always the pen in his hand, to note and record whatsoever is said or done, who also, because he keeps the rolls and records of the court, can tell what hath been said and done many hundred years past : even so the conscience observes and takes notice of all things that we do, and inwardly and secretly within the heart doth tell us of them all.

17. Like as the master of a prison is known by this, to have care over his prisoners, if he send keepers with them to watch them, and to bring them home again in time convenient : even so God's care to man is manifest in this, that when He created man and placed him in the world, He gave him conscience to be his keeper, to follow him always at the heels, and to dog him (as we say) and to pry into his actions, and to bear witness of them all.

18. Even as a man, about to make an unknown journey, should find one that would go with him and show him the way, with all the turnings thereof, he could not but take it for a great point of courtesy : so, likewise, seeing we are pilgrims in this world, our life is our journey, and God also hath appointed our conscience to be our companion and guide, to show us what course we may take and what we may not.

Gen., xlii. 21.

19. As a wild beast, which, so long as he lieth asleep, seems very tame and gentle, and hurts no man ; but when he is roused, he then awakes and flies in a man's face, and offers to pull out his throat : so, likewise, is it the manner of a dead and benumbed conscience to lie still and quiet, even through the course of a man's life ; and hereupon a man would think (as most do) that it were a good conscience, indeed ; but when sickness or death approacheth and cometh, it being awaked by the hand of God, begins to stand up on its legs, and shows its fierce eyes, and offers to rend out even the very throat of the soul.

20. As all the virtues of natural men are, indeed, beautiful sins, and their righteousness but a carnal righteousness : so the conscience, also, of a carnal man, though it excuse him for well doing, is but a carnal conscience.

21. Like as, when a man enters into his house at midnight, he finds or sees nothing out of order ; but let him come in the day time, when the sun shineth, and he shall then espy many faults in the house, and the very moths that fly up and down : even so, let a man search his heart in the ignorance and blindness of his mind, he will straightway think all is well ; but let him once begin to search himself with the light and lantern of the law, and he shall find many foul corners in his heart and conscience, and many heaps of sins in his life.

22. As some men seek day and night, from year to year, for honours, riches, and pleasures, which they must leave behind them : so much more ought we to seek for renewed and reformed consciences, considering that conscience will be with us in this life, in death, at the last judgment, and for ever.

23. As a man arrayed and apparelled in cloth of tissue, set in a chair of state, having before him a table furnished with all dainty delicacies ; his servants, monarchs, and princes, his riches, the chiefest treasures and kingdoms of the world ; but withal, suppose there were one standing by with a naked sword to cut his throat, or a wild beast ready ever and anon to pull him in pieces, we cannot otherwise say but that this man's estate, and all his happiness, is yet nothing but woe and misery : even so such is the estate and condition of all men, that, abounding with riches, honours, and pleasures, carry about them an evil conscience, which is a sword to slay the soul, or as a ravenous beast, ready to suck the blood of the soul and to rend it in pieces.

24. Like as, in governing the ship on the sea, the pilot, holding the helm in his hand, hath always an eye to the compass : so we, likewise, in the ordering of our lives and conversations, must always have a special regard to the conscience.

25. As God gives to the eye certain lids of flesh, to defend and cover it from outward injuries : even so must we use means to avoid whatsoever may offend or annoy conscience.

26. Even as a pair of turtle doves, when the one feeds, the other feedeth ; when one likes not, the other likes not ; when the one dies, the other dies : so, where good conscience is maintained, there are many excellent gifts of God flourishing, and where conscience decays, they also decay.

27. As diseases, if they be long neglected, become incurable : so the conscience, much and often wounded, admits no comfort ; neither will it always boot a man, after many years, to say, at the last cast, " Lord, be merciful unto me—I have sinned ! " Though some be received to mercy in time of death, yet far more perish in desperation, that lived in their sins wittingly and willingly against their own conscience. Pharaoh, Saul, and Judas cried all, " Peccavi—I have sinned against God ! " yet Pharaoh is hardened more and more and perisheth, Saul goeth on in his sins and despaireth, Judas maketh away himself ; and no marvel, for the multitude of sins oppress the conscience, and make the heart to overflow with such a measure of grief that it can fasten no affiance in the mercy of God.

28. As a ship on the sea, if it be not well governed, or if there be a breach made into it, it draws water and sinks, and so both men and wares, in all likelihood, are cast away : so we are all as passengers. The world is a huge sea through which we must pass, our ship is the conscience of every man, the wares are our religion and salvation, and all other gifts of God ; therefore it stands us in hand to be always at the helm, and to carry our ship with as even a course as possibly we can to the intended port of happiness, which is the salvation of our souls.

1 Tim. i. 19; iii. 12.

The benumbed Conscience is senseless of spiritual graces.

As the sick man, lying upon his bed, is not able to go to the physician to seek for his health, but the physician is to be entreated to come to minister to him : even so such people as are ignorant and sick of sin unto death are not able to go to the spiritual physician, the preacher, nor have any mind so to do, because they neither understand their disease nor the danger they are in, nor yet feel the grief thereof ; so that oftentimes, when the godly preacher cometh unto them, and ministereth wholesome medicines and consolations, yet are they not able to receive the same.

Eph. ii. 12.
2 Tim. ii. 25, 26.

Conscience touched.

1. LIKE as they who have diseased bodies are contented with no one physician, but do commit themselves to every man that will promise them help : so, also, it fareth oftentimes with them that have their consciences overpressed with the burden of their sins, that they can be content to yield themselves to every heretic that will promise them liberty.

2. As, after great storms, the air is clear : so, after the floods of repentant tears, the conscience is at quiet.

3. As a sick man, who is pained diversely, complaineth of divers places : even so a man, troubled in conscience, useth many phrases according to the diversity of his afflictions.

Ps. li. 8-11.

Consideration and earnest meditation of our estate needful.

1. LIKE as a man that hath a journey to make but from England to Constantinople, although he had made the same once or twice before, yet would he not pass it over without great and often consideration, especially whether he were right and in the way or no, what pace he held, how near he was to his way's end, and the like : even so every Christian hath far more need of due consideration, who must pass from earth to heaven, being subject to the paths and manifold dangers, as every pleasure of this world, every lust, every dissolute thought, every alluring sight and tempting sound, every devil upon the earth, or instrument of his, which are innumerable, being a thief, and lying in wait to spoil him upon his way towards heaven.

2. As thieves seem mad unto wise men, who, seeing so many hanged daily for theft before their eyes, will yet notwithstanding steal again, and all for want of due consideration : even so the very same cause maketh the wisest men of the world to seem very fools, and worse than frantics (madmen) unto God and good men, that, knowing the vanities of the world and the danger of sinful life, do follow so much the one and fear so little the other.

3. Like as, if a law were made by the authority of man, that whosoever should adventure to drink wine should without delay hold his hand half an hour in the fire, or in boiling lead, for a punishment, many no doubt would forbear wine, albeit naturally they loved the same : and yet, a law being made by the eternal Majesty of God, that whosoever committeth sin shall burn in the fire of hell without ease or end, many, for lack of consideration, commit sin upon sin with as little fear as they do eat or drink.

4. As he may be thought to be but a foolish merchant that, for quietness' sake, would never look to his own account-book, whether he were behind hand or before ; or as a shipmaster were greatly to be laughed at that, for avoiding of care, would sit down and make good cheer, and let the ship go whither she would : even so much more, in the business of our soul, it is madness and folly to fly consideration for eschewing of trouble, seeing in the end this negligence must needs turn upon us more trouble and irremediable calamity.

Contemners of the truth.

1. As swine will muzzle up and down in the mire whatsoever precious thing shall be offered them : so wicked contemners and despisers of the Word do, as it were, tread under their feet whatsoever promise is offered or in judgment threatened to them out of the Word.

2. As they who are displeased with all things that profit them not ; or as a deaf man, who, seeing the lips of speakers to move, thinketh them too lavish of their tongues ; or as a blind man, who, groping by the walls and windows of a fair house, doth find fault with the windows, because they are not so smooth as the walls : even so such are they that find fault with the Scriptures, because they show the spots as well as the beauty, the vice as well as the virtue.

Contemplation of heavenly things.

As they who come out of the clear sun into the shadow have their eyes dim and dark : so he who cometh from the contemplation of things divine into things human cometh from clear light to great clouds, mist, and darkness.

Contempt of the minister.

As husbandmen who misuse their landlord, and his servants whom he sendeth to them for the rents and profits of his land, are worthily and justly thrust out, and others planted

Matt. vii.
Luke xii.
Rom. ii.
1 Cor. i, ii, iii.
Gal. iii.

Matt. vii. 6.

in their room : so, likewise, were the Jews cut off from being the people and Church of God, for misusing of Christ, His apostles, and prophets ; and so, assuredly, shall all they be that despise, and set nought by, and cruelly misuse and entreat the ministers of the Gospel and the preachers of God's Word who are sent unto them.

Content.

As they that be bound do judge those at liberty to be most happy ; or as the countrymen do judge the citizens happy and rich ; the rich men, again, do say the lords are happy, the lords the kings, and the kings, again, do judge the people in most pleasure : so are such never with their own state contented who will behold by how much they are inferior to others.

Phil. iv. 11.
1 Tim. vi. 6.

Contentious men.

1. As we see one coal kindle another, and wood to be apt matter to make a fire : even so those that be disposed to contention and brawling be apt to kindle strife, and to set men together by the ears.

2. As a little spark many times setteth a whole house on fire : even so a contentious and froward person, of a little matter of nought, maketh much debate and division among lovers and friends.

Contentious spirits are dangerous.

As we are to take heed of dogs when they are fighting and brawling for a bone, that we be not too busy in kicking them, lest we be caught by the shins : even so are we to take great heed of such as be unquiet and troublesome spirits, that are ready to wrangle and disquiet the Church about every trifle.

Phil. iii. 2.

Continuance in sin.

LIKE as, if a man's foot, leg, or arm be broken, with how great pain the same is restored to its former estate all men know ; but if any member of our body should be broken twice or thrice, or more often, in one and the self-same place, every man can then judge how hard a thing it were for that part to recover its perfect strength and health again : even so fareth it in the ruptures and wounds of our soul. If a man do commit sin once or twice, and do unfeignedly, without dissimulation, make his refuge to the medicine of repentance, he doth out of hand obtain health again, and that sometimes without any scar or blemish of the disease past ; but if he begin to add sins upon sins in such sort that the wounds of the soul do rather putrify within him, by covering and defending them, than heal, by repentance and confession, it is to be feared such a one shall not find repentance at commandment when he wisheth for it.

Rom. ii. 3, 4.

Our Conversation is carefully to be looked unto.

1. As it behoveth him that walketh upon cords, strained and fastened on high, diligently to look to his footing, that he may not totter or decline this way or that way : even so it standeth us upon to be wary and careful to look about us, and to take good heed where we set our feet—that is, our affections and the delights of our hearts—lest we fall down headlong into the bottomless gulf of God's displeasure ; for if we will fix our affections and bend our wills with a deliberate consent to do the thing that is evil, unjust, and ungodly, making no conscience of anything that we do, be it never so opposite and contrary to the will of God, it cannot be but, falling from the state of grace, we shall fall most suddenly and shamefully into the infernal pit of hell, death, and damnation.

2. As a wheel, although it turn about on the ground, yet the greatest part of it is always from the earth, and but little of it toucheth the ground : so, although our body be on earth, yet the conversation of the soul, which is the greater part of us, must be in heaven.

Correction.

Prov. xlii. 24; xix.
18; xxii. 15; xxiii.
3.

1. As salves at the beginning do smart, and yet at length do heal the wound : so the correction of the father or schoolmaster, though it seem rigorous and sharp, yet it saveth the child from the sink of vices and vanities.

Prov. xlii. 24; xxii.
25.

2. As the skilful physician will not give his strong and bitter pill before his preparative, lest the working of it should be hindered by the stubborn and indurate obstructions : even so the wise parent, in curing his son's vices, must not strike before he hath reprehended or premonished, lest he be too much cast down and discouraged, or wax obstinate.

Prov. xix. 18;
xxiii. 18; xxix.
15, 17.

3. As physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries are necessary in a town, for the cure of sickness and bodily wounds : even so are rods and chastisement for the correction of the corruptions of the soul.

Col. iii. 21.

4. Like as plants, reasonably watered, do take heart and grow, but too much moisture doth drown and choke them : even so is it with the minds of children. Moderate exercise and labour advanceth them to goodness, but too much correction and oppression dulbeth and spoileth them.

5. As we are wont to slack the strings of our bows and lutes to make them the stiffer, and to hold the better when we list to shoot or play : so, likewise, it is needful that parents and schoolmasters should require no more of their children and scholars than they are able to do, lest they discourage them and make them to hate their study or any other thing whereto they would bring them.

6. Like as, if we should see a madman run unto a steep, dangerous place, it were much better to stay him, and cause him to be bound and corrected, than to let him go and break his neck : even so it is in correcting and punishing of offenders and wicked livers.

Zeph. iii. 1, 2.

7. As doctrine is cold without reprehension : so are threatenings without correction.

Corrupters of princes are most severely to be punished.

1. LIKE as they do most grievously offend who do infect with poison a common well or conduit where all men do draw water : so, likewise, they deserve worst of a commonwealth who corrupt the mind of a prince with pernicious and wicked counsels.

2. As he ought to suffer the greater punishment who throweth poison, not into one cup, but into the whole vessel whereof every one should drink : so offend they the most, and are therefore with all extremity to be tormented, who do corrupt the nature and disposition of princes.

Corruption of truth by man's traditions.

Matt. xlii. 33, xvi.
6.

As sweet dough is made sour by a little leaven : so is the sweetness and comfort of the doctrine of truth corrupted if it be never so little intermeddled with human doctrine or man's tradition.

Original Corruption.

1. As children take of their parents their original and natural qualities and conditions : even so they receive with the same original corruption of nature, which cometh by original sin.

2. Like as corn, although it be never so clean winnowed and purged from chaff, yet, when it is sown, the same seed will be full of chaff again, until it be winnowed and made clean : even so children are born full of chaff and corruption of original sin, until that, by baptism in the blood of Christ, through the wonderful operation of the Holy Ghost, they be drawn from the love of themselves and of worldly things unto the pure love of God, as their parents were.

Original Corruption is the root of all sin.

As the cause of trees and plants, of their roots, stocks, stems, and boughs, is in the seed : so the cause of our transgressions, foul sins, and most dangerous iniquities is our own corruption, wherewith we are moved and inclined to all evil, and to ignorance and not knowing of ourselves, wherewith we are greatly hindered in the knowledge of our God, and do also most sharply censure those things in others which we do love and cherish in ourselves.

Counsel.

EVEN as out of an apothecary's shop, where very wholesome medicines, precious ointments, and most pleasant perfumes are sold, sometimes cometh most rank and deadly poison : so, very often, from men greatly experienced and deeply learned, do come very pestilent, pernicious, and treacherous counsels.

Good Counsel not to be refused of the wisest.

LIKE as they that are given to gather wealth, although they have great store of wealth at home, yet, if gold and silver be brought to them from other places, they do not refuse it, and the richer they be the more they desire : so wise magistrates, whose treasure consists rather in the wisdom and faithfulness of good men than in the hugest mass of money that can be, though they be most wise and rich that way, yet they ought not to refuse the wise advice of any, but be willing and glad to hear it, whosoever it be.

Men who can keep no Counsel are very dangerous.

1. As the sea called the Dead Sea, which is a lake in Judea called Asphaltites, whereof Aristotle, Pliny, Justin, and divers others do make mention, wherein is neither fish nor any living creature found in it, whereupon it hath the name "Dead," and in it nothing is covered, neither doth anything that is in it sink to the bottom thereof, but all things do swim, and are in sight and do continue on the top of the water : even so such are they that will keep no counsel nor secrets whatsoever, but will reveal and bewray all things that they know, whether they be good or bad.

2. Even as Hypanis, a river in Scythia, which hath a marvellous sweetness until a little bitter spring, which Herodotus calleth Erampes, be mingled with it, and then it is corrupted with a wonderful bitterness : so those men who are like torn vessels, that will hold no water, and so full of chinks, that they neither can nor will keep any secrets or counsel, are very bitter and intolerable men, and do much harm in every place where they come; neither can any counsel or secret be committed unto such without great danger to the commonwealth wherein they dwell, and especially to all those that repose any trust in them. Such men, seem they never so wise, learned, and full of counsel, are not to come near godly princes, neither to be made acquainted with matters of state and the affairs of the commonwealth, lest they do great hurt, both with giving counsel themselves and also by discovering such weighty secrets as shall, in trust, be committed unto them.

Wise Counsel of a friend.

Prov. xxvii. 9.

As the scent and savour of a sweet ointment or perfume is comfortable to the brain and heart : so is the wise and hearty counsel of a man's assured friend.

Courtesy.

1. As the tree is known by its fruit, the gold by the touch, and the bell by the sound : so is a man's birth by his benevolence, his honour by his humility, and his calling by his courtesy.
2. As the peg straineth the lute strings : so courtesy stretcheth the heart strings.
3. As it belongeth unto the sun to lighten the earth with his beams : so it pertaineth to the virtue of a prince to have compassion and be courteous to the miserable.

Courts of princes.

As it was a saying formerly of Asia, that it was no praise never to have seen it, but to have lived soberly and temperately in Asia was praiseworthy : even so it were no great matter never to have seen the courts of princes, but to have lived Christianly in those courts is a special work of God in His children.

The Covenant of God.

As it is the chief and principal part in the law of wedlock, and before all required of the wife, that she keep this faith to her husband, that she admit no other man in his sight, unless she will be refused as an adulteress : so, likewise, this is the chief point in the covenant of God, that we stick unto Him only and alone, or else be put out from the covenant.

Covetousness.

1. As the subtle, fawning spaniel oftentimes fetcheth his master's glove in hope to change it for a better morsel : even so many men show great kindness and give rewards, to the end to reap them double gain.
2. Like as the infected member of a man vexed with an itch is always clawing and rubbing : even so the covetous mind is restless in seeking and gathering together.
3. As fire is never sufficed with wood, nor the earth with water : even so the covetous man is never satisfied with money.
4. As the grave is ever open to receive dead carcasses, or as hell is never full : even so the coffer of the covetous cormorant is never contented.

5. As the stiller the water runneth the deeper is the river, and the more deep the more dangerous : even so the longer Almighty God suffereth the covetous man to sin uncontrolled the greater is his sin, and the more grievous is the punishment that attendeth thereon in the day of account. Hab. ii. 9.

6. As covetousness is evil, yea, the evil of all evils : so, likewise, it maketh those men as bad as it is who are infected with the same, and as hateful in God's sight as that sin itself, for that the effect is like the cause. 1 Tim. vi. 10.
Ps. x. 3.
Exod. xviii. 21.
Luke xii. 15.
Mark x. 22.

7. As cattle do keep the pastures bare with continual grazing upon them : so doth the covetous man overawe the poor by endless oppression and merciless dealing. Jer. vi. 13-15.
Amos viii. 4, &c.

8. Like as, if a sick man be laid in a bed of ivory, or gold, or of wood, his disease forsaketh him never the sooner : even so, whether you entreat the covetous by those sweet promises made by Almighty God in His holy Gospel, or threaten them by His dreadful judgments pronounced in His fearful law, they make never the more haste to repentance. Ezek. viii. 1, &c.

9. As the wax is pliable to every print : even so the covetous man's hand is ready to receive every bribe.

10. As the ass that, notwithstanding he carrieth the meat for his master's belly and the clothes for his back, yet himself doth feed upon grass, and contenteth himself with one hair skin : even so the covetous man, whose chests are stuffed with money and his wardrobe with apparel, such misery hath assaulted his soul, that he can hardly afford his belly a good meal's meat or cover his back with a good coat.

11. As the bee bringeth sweet honey in his mouth and a sharp sting in his tail : even so covetousness hath pleasure in this life and pain in the life to come.

12. Like as they that will tame wild bulls must wear no red garments : so, likewise, they that will no evil do through covetousness must do nothing that belongeth thereto.

13. As God punished both Eli the priest and his two sons, the father for not correcting them and the sons for sinning so grossly : so, likewise, will He plague both the covetous man for the evil-getting of his money, and his children for possessing that which is none of their own. 1 Sam. ii. 12, &c.;
iii. 11, &c.; iv. 14,
15, &c.

14. As the glutton who overchargeth his stomach with meat is compelled to spew and cast it up again : so the greedy, covetous cormorant, that gathereth great riches and devoureth and swalloweth up great substance, shall lose it again ; for God shall even draw it out of his belly. Ps. xxxviii. 16;
xxviii. 6.

15. As a river whose spring is small, yet, by receiving other brooks and streams, groweth strong and violent ; or as they that are sick of the dropsy, who, by drinking, are never satisfied, but still increase in thirst ; or as a flame which is never abated with quantity of wood, how much soever a man layeth on, but though it for a while be suppressed and yield forth nothing but smoke, yet, breaking out, it waxeth greater, according to the abundance of wood : so, likewise, the heart of a covetous man never regardeth that it hath therewith to be content, but what it hath not to covet thereafter. Isa. lvi. 11.
Jer. vi. 13 ; viii. 10.
2 Tim. iii. 2.
2 Pet. ii. 3.

16. As the fish, swallowing the hook, together with the bait, is taken and killed : so, in like manner, covetous men do pierce themselves through with a thousand sorrows, which do entangle them in death everlasting. 2 Kings v. 27.
1 Sam. viii. 3.
John xviii. 6.
Acts xvi. 16-19 ;
xix. 24, &c.
Jer. xxii. 17.
Eccles. iv. 7 ; vi. 1,
2.
Eph. v. 3.
Matt. xiii. 22.

17. As the Indian ants or emmets, who gather the gold and keep it, yet neither can use it, nor will suffer men to have it, so far as they may : even so covetousness, which, with care and labour, slayeth the man that is subject thereto. It draweth him through fields and woods, sea and land, in the cold of winter and in the heat of summer, night and day, in rain, wind, and danger, admitting no rest, and all to seek and hunt after goods ; yet doth it grant him only the sight, but not the use of them.

18. As the good corn of God's Word is a sanctified seed of salvation and life : so the falsehood and deceit of covetousness and riches do in such sort draw men to abundance, Luke xvi. 9.

and, withal, to the perverse use of the same, that thereby this seed of salvation and life everlasting is choked up.

Rom. i. 28, 29.
1 Cor. v. 11; vi. 10.
James v. 1.

19. As charity is the gift of God proceeding from His favour and grace; so, contrariwise, covetousness is a vengeance which He poureth upon those whom, for their sins, He hath given over into a reprobate sense.

Prov. xv. 27;
xxviii. 16.

20. As Æsop's dog, who, swimming with a piece of flesh in his mouth, and seeing the shadow thereof, taking that to be another piece of flesh, opening his mouth to catch that also, lost the same which he before had: so, likewise, the covetous man, being insatiable, and every way seeking to increase what he hath, doth many times lose that which is in his hand.

Heb. xiii. 5.
Col. iii. 5.
Matt. vi. 26.

21. As gold of itself can neither feed nor clothe us: so that which the covetous man buyeth with gold or silver proceedeth not out of the gold or silver, but from God's providence; neither can it minister any help without God's grace and blessing.

James v. 3.
Luke xii. 15.

22. As the remedy to quench his thirst that is vexed with a hot fever cometh not of giving him drink, but of taking away his fever, which causeth his thirst: even so the way to grow rich is not by heaping of riches, but by diminishing the covetousness and unlawful desire of the same.

23. As, when the spleen increaseth, the other members, joints, and parts of the body do consume and pine away: so covetousness and the great treasures and riches of covetous tyrants increasing, the wealth of subjects and inferior persons is weakened and diminished, whilst they peel and poll away their substance and goods to enrich themselves withal.

24. As the spleen increasing, the other members do decrease: so, likewise, covetousness, growing greater and greater, all virtues do utterly decay and vanish away; bountifulness, liberality, charity, truth, righteousness, and all such excellent qualities are no more found in those men who are strangled and poisoned with a great and greedy desire of worldly riches.

Matt. v. 7.
Isa. lviii. 7.

25. As floods, which send their waters into the sea, and leave the dry land, which is very thirsty, unwatered: even so some covetous men do now and then bestow great cost and much of their riches upon those that need them not—not drawn thereunto with either love or mercy, but carried with vain-glory, and with vanity itself, so to do.

26. Like as the sea is seldom or never seen without tempestuous waves: so, also, we can never see a covetous man's mind free from carefulness, fear, trouble, and vexations.

27. As a pot hath a wide open mouth: so covetousness gapeth evermore after worldly goods, riches, and honour.

28. As the owls and night crows see better by night than by day: so the eyes of covetous men are blind to see how to come to heaven, but to get worldly goods and riches they can see well enough.

29. As we see some men who naturally are so inclined to mischief, so seditious, so contrary to peace and tranquillity, that they are no sooner entered into a house or commonwealth, but presently they sow discord and dissension, troubling the common quietness and peaceable estate which was before: so, also, the cursed desire of covetousness is no sooner entered into our heart, but forthwith we perceive a great confusion of tumultuous and dissentious appetites to boil and rise up within us, which do straightway entangle us in the nets and snares of the devil, and at length bring us to miserable death and destruction.

30. As the covetous man would not like those servants and hirelings who, by their negligence and carelessness, have suffered his houses to fall to ruin and have left his lands and vineyards untilld, neither would he be pleased with that man or maid-servant in his house who serveth him to no purpose: so, likewise, if he himself make no use of his riches and treasures, but keep them altogether unprofitably, he may not think that he is the servant of God, holding of Him whatsoever he hath, with commandment to make use of them, and that he is accountable for the damages and loss which happen by his want of traffic—that is to say, for that he hath not used them as the Lord hath commanded.

31. Even as fire is extinguished and quenched, not only by throwing on of water, but also by taking away of the wood and other matter whereby it is fed and nourished : so, also, a covetous man destroyeth and taketh away the life of a man, not only by offering him violence, but also in refusing to give or lend that unto him which is necessary for his preservation.

32. As a flood, which at the beginning being but a little river, by little and little, as it runneth, increaseth in such sort that, in the end, it beareth with it whatsoever resisteth : even so, if a covetous man have once gotten one hundred pounds, he straightway desireth two hundred ; from two hundred, he cometh to a thousand ; from a thousand to a million ; and from millions to an infinite sum.

33. As one that climbeth up a ladder useth the first step as a means to come to the second, and the second to come to the third, continually climbing until he come to the top : so, likewise, there is no difference between the covetous man and him that climbeth up the ladder, but that the one findeth an end of his ladder, the other findeth none at all—neither of the care nor sorrows which necessarily follow riches, neither yet of his earnest desires in the attaining and keeping of them.

34. As the ape that is tied to the clog thinketh that he keepeth the clog, and not the clog him, is greatly deceived : so, likewise, is the covetous man who thinketh that he keepeth his riches, when, indeed, his riches keep him.

35. As Dinah, when she wandered to see fashions, and thought to feed her fancy upon the daughters of a strange country, lost her virginity amongst the sons of the country : so some men, while they seek to feed and fill their greedy worm of covetousness and ambition with divers pleasures and profits of the world, lose their sincerity amongst them, and so make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience.

36. Even as Tamar went out of her brother Amnon's chamber with her maiden's garment of divers colours rent, because she was enforced to leave her maidenhead behind her : so some covetous worldlings, who sometimes, with Demas, followed Paul, but now, with Demas, embrace this present world, are enforced to go away with their garment of divers colours rent and torn ; for while they will venture through the bushes and thorns of worldly cares to get worldly promotions, it is no marvel if they come out with their zeal quenched, their courage abated, their faith blasted, their love cooled, their knowledge withered, their humility defaced, their sincerity decreased, and the whole garment of piety and religion scratched, torn, and rent in pieces.

Covetousness in old men.

As wayfaring men, the less way they have to go, the less careful need they to be either of spending their money or victuals : even so for old men, who have, as it were, one foot in the grave, to be covetous is a very absurd thing.

Creature.

1. EVEN as a brittle glass, being filled with some extremely strong liquor, cannot but burst in sunder, not because of any antipathy which is betwixt them, but because the glass is not of sufficient strength to contain the liquor : so it is with the creature when God doth appear in perfect glory ; in regard whereof the angels themselves are said to cover their faces, lest they should behold it. How much more, then, hath man, who is but dust and ashes, and whose life is in his nostrils, just cause of fear !

Isa. vi. 2.
Ps. xxix. 3, &c.

Deut. v. 6, 7.

2. As the adulterous woman hath no more to do with her husband, nor with anything of his, because of her transgression of this principal law and covenant and her breach of the faith of wedlock : even so they have no more to do in the covenant of God who, by worship of other gods, have broken the chief point thereof, and lost the faith due unto one God alone.

Josh. xxiv. 14.

3. Like as, if a man would take to wife a common woman out of the open stews, and would first of all prescribe unto her in this sort, "If thou wilt abide in this fellowship of our wedlock, first, it is necessary that thou abstain from all other men, and keep the faith and covenant of marriage whole and unbroken only to me, else thou canst not be my wife, nor I thy husband, if thou do with me take others, and return unto thy accustomed filthiness of whoredom : " so, likewise, the Lord dealt with the Israelites, who were used before in Egypt to the worshipping of other gods. He charged them first to cast away the gods which their fathers served in Mesopotamia and in Egypt, and to serve and worship Him only ; otherwise He would be no God to them, nor they a people for Him. And so the case is now betwixt God and us.

God's Creatures admirable.

Rev. iv. 11.

As when men behold any curious work of a cunning and skilful craftsman, straightway they will leave the work and inquire after him that made it, that they may praise his skill : even so it is the duty of Christians in this case, when they come abroad, and behold everywhere in all the creatures the admirable and unspeakable wisdom, goodness, and power of God, then they must make haste from the creature and go forward to the Creator, to praise and glorify Him.

The Creature may not control his Creator.

Job x. 9.
Ps. ciii. 14.
Rom. ix. 20, 21.
Isa. lxiv. 8.

As it is unreasonable for a piece of clay to challenge the potter for the form, shape, or use that it is made for : even so it is an intolerable presumption of man to reason against his Maker, for the end that he is made for, whether it be to honour or dishonour.

The Cross maketh peace.

As, in a civil government and commonwealth, nothing is more occasion of war than overmuch peace : so in the Church, and among ministers of the Church, as nothing is more pernicious than too much quietness, so nothing more ceaseth (endeth) private contentions oftentimes arising amongst them than the public cross of persecution.

Crosses are the badge of a Christian.

Gal. vi. 17.

EVEN as it is a thing very commendable and worthy praise that a soldier do ever bear about him the signs and badges of his captain, that it may appear to whom he belongeth : so is it no little honour to a true Christian man to pass through many dangers, and to be experienced in many troubles, and to endure many afflictions for his Captain Christ's sake ; for sorrows, vexations, and tribulations are the armour and badges of Christ.

The Cup of God's wrath.

Isa. li. 21, 22.
Jer. li. 7.
Ezek. xxxiii. 31-34.

LIKE as we see men take the cup at one another's hands and drink in course : even so we, when we have tasted of the cup of God's wrath for our sins, if we repent, we are to comfort ourselves that it shall be taken out of our hands and given to our enemies, even to those who hitherto have made a spoil of us, and they shall suck out the dregs thereof.

Curiosity.

1. As the physicians do speak of the members of a man's body, that they are composed of form, substance, strength, and greatness, and placed and disposed very conveniently, to show their effects and operations : so, likewise, in every commonwealth God hath raised up some men, either civilians or divines, and furnished them with such graces and gifts as are necessary to effect such things as He hath before determined. Now, if the foot will take upon him to execute the office of the hand, or the hand will needs walk as the foot, if the ear will strive to see, and the eye to hear, it would be a very vain and foolish thing for them to enterprise (attempt) such things, seeing they have not been made and framed thereto. In like manner we strive in vain when we endeavour to effect such things whereto by nature we are not appointed and ordained.

2. As men, having heard a report of the fertility, pleasure, and abundance of any strange country, are never quiet until they have seen it ; but they have not been there a year, till they are in great dislike with it, as ever they were with their own native soil ; for though they change their air, they never alter their nature ; their minds are as full of fancies and their heads of toys as ever they were : even so such as are possessed with wandering and straying cogitations, who will needs occupy every trade, and be of all occupations, and change their opinions as often as they do their garments, having one foot in the court and another in the country, they do no sooner undertake anything, but they are presently weary of it ; and they have not so soon given it over, but forthwith they would take it in hand again.

3. As we see the diseases of man's body do bring such unquietness and irksomeness with them, that the poor patient disliketh everything whatsoever—yea, such, oftentimes, as in his health and prosperity were most pleasing unto him, as his wife and children, his bed, his meat and drink, and such like : so, likewise, it is apparent in the affections of the mind, which, being once distempered, we cannot long live contentedly in any condition of life whatsoever.

4. As the Egyptian, who carried somewhat wound up in his napkin, answered unto him that demanded what it was, that he had covered it to the end that no man should see it : so, likewise, must we learn, that if there be anything hidden and laid up in the works of God it is of purpose kept from us, to the end that we should not be too curious to inquire after it, that it is far better to be utterly ignorant herein than to have all the knowledge thereof that may be.

5. Like as coursers and hunters who, leading their dogs into the fields, do not let them slip at all adventures at whatsoever cometh next to hand, but hold them until their game be found, to the end they may be the more fresh and lusty to maintain their course : so, likewise, must we hold and keep in our curiosity, and not suffer it to follow after whatsoever it lusteth, but only that which, being once attained unto, bringeth with it both pleasure and profit.

6. As they who, in reading over a book, do note nothing but the faults and errors therein contained ; or as such who take much more pleasure in beholding a monster than a body which is perfectly made ; or to view an antic picture, or some old counterfeit, wherein there are strange devices : even so, let one speak to us of the wisdom, justice, liberality, modesty, and temperance of another, and we will scarcely give any ear thereto ; but let one tell us that some young wench hath lived incontinently, or that some woman is taken in adultery, or that there is strife and contention among brethren, or some discord among friends, we are waking enough, and but too, too curious and ready to hear.

Deut. xix. 29.
1 Tim. iv. 7 ; vi. 20.
Tit. iii. 9.

7. As we see serpents nourished by venom and live in filthy, stinking, and darksome caves : so curious men do nourish themselves with woeful and sorrowful discourses, and never take pleasure in anything but in that which deserveth pity and commiseration.

8. As surgeons search and seek out the disease with intention to heal it, and if it be a sore that should be kept secret they are both wise and faithful enough to conceal and hide it : so, contrariwise, curious men are desirous to know every malady, to the end they may make it known and publish it wheresoever they come.

9. As backbiters take pleasure to hear evil of their neighbours : so these curious men take delight to report the worst to the next company they meet with, so that they are exceeding envious, and rejoice in nothing but in other men's wants, imperfections, and mischiefs.

10. As it were a foolish and intemperate humour for a man that hath a fair, beautiful, amiable, and virtuous wife, with whom he might very lawfully enjoy his pleasures and delights, to reject her and cast her off, and to buy at a very great rate, with pain, sorrow, and shame, the love of another, a most foul and filthy slut : so, in like manner, it is a most sottish and foolish thing to despise so many godly histories and beautiful discourses of this life, so many learned books, so many excellent treatises and worthy examples, whereby we may reap such exceeding profit and pleasure, curiously to busy ourselves in inquiring after our neighbours' matters, to open sealed letters, to hearken under men's windows, or to whisper in women's ears, and such like absurdities, whereto curious men are most commonly addicted.

11. As old Lamia (so much spoken of in ancient stories), who had eyes like unto spectacles, which she might take out and put in at her pleasure, so soon as she came home into her lodging, used to lock them up in her coffer, and sat her down to spinning as blind as a beetle, and never saw what she did in her own house, but she went no sooner abroad but she put them in her head again, and would very curiously behold what other men did : in like manner we, through a foolish and sottish self-love, do never view our own imperfections, although they be as clear as the sun and as big as a millstone, but, on the contrary, we can quickly espy other men's vices, though it be at midnight, and that, peradventure, they be not so big as a pebble stone.

12. As it is reported of Democritus, that, walking abroad, he was wont to shut his eyes, lest, by wandering regards, his mind should be turned from the contemplation of honest things : so, likewise, must we, with all our endeavours, bar and shut up this curious humour, to the end to keep it in, that thereby we may search after nothing, whether it be touching God, nature, or our neighbours, but that which may profit us and tend to our edification ; rejecting all unprofitable, impossible, and superfluous things, about the knowledge whereof we consume our bodies, mis-spend our time, and lose our labours ; all which should be carefully and diligently employed in the study and seeking after of more commodious and more necessary matters.

Phil. iii. 14.

13. As Rebekah's two twins did struggle and wrestle before they were born for hatred and malice, but Elisabeth's one child did spring and skip before he was born for joy and gladness : so he that is curious and busieth himself about more things than one shall never prove singular in anything—nay, he shall find that strife and resistance in his head which Rebekah did in her womb ; but he that labours and travails only about one thing shall bring it to good perfection and be as well delivered of it as Elisabeth was of John Baptist.

Custom another nature.

Ier. xlii. 23.

As impossible as it is for a blackamoor to cast away his skin and to become white, and for a leopard to put away his spots : so impossible it is for them that noosell (ensnare) themselves, and accustom themselves continually with evil doing, to change their custom and to endeavour to do well.

Dances.

As apothecaries do cover their pills with some sweet substance, whereby to make them go down the easier : so the devil, under the sport and pleasure of dances, maketh men to swallow lustful desires ; and albeit they proceed to no greater iniquity, yet is this a mortal wound to the soul, considering that we know that such lusts are accursed in the sight of God.

Exod. xxxii. 6 ;
xviii. 18, 19.
1 Cor. x. 7.
1 Pet. iv. 3, 4 ; v. 8.
Rom. xii. 2.
2 Tim. ii. 22.
Judges xxi. 21.
Eph. v. 3, 4, 16, 18.

Day of Judgment terrible to the wicked.

1. As Cornelius, being a just man and one who feared God, was yet afraid when he saw the angel : even so much more shall the wicked be astonished and confounded at the presence of God at the Day of Judgment.

Acts x. 2-4.
2 Thess. i. 9, 10.

2. Like as when the boughs of the fig-tree be tender and that it beginneth to bring forth leaves, it is a certain token that summer is near : even so treasons, pestilence, wars, famine, earthquakes, &c., are the prefaces or prologues to sorrows, and show that the Day of Judgment is near—even at the doors.

Matt. xxiv. 32.
Matt. xiii. 28.

Dead in sin.

1. As dead men can do nothing that living men should do : so, when we are dead in sin, we can do none of those things which declare and show forth our life in Christ.

Eph. ii. 1.
Col. ii. 13.

2. As a dead man in his grave cannot stir the least finger, because he wants the very power of life, sense, and motion : so, likewise, no more can he that is dead in sin will the least good ; nay, if he could either will or do any good, he could not be dead in sin.

3. Even as a dead man in the grave cannot rise but by the power of God : so no more can he that is dead in sin rise but by the power of God's grace alone, without any power of his own.

John iii. 1.
Eph. ii. 10 ; iv. 24.
Phil. ii. 13.

Death.

1. LIKE as he that is to pass over some great and deep river must not look downward to the stream of the water, but if he would prevent fear he must set his foot sure and cast his eye to the bank on the further side : even so he that draws near death must, as it were, look over the waves of death, and directly fix the eye of his faith upon eternal life.

2. Like as if a poor man should be commanded by a prince to put off his torn and beggarly garments, and, instead thereof, to put on royal and costly robes, it would be a great rejoicing in his heart : even so much more joyful news must this be unto all repentant and sorrowful sinners, when the King of heaven and earth comes unto them by death, and bids them lay down their bodies as ragged and patched garments, and prepare themselves to put on the princely robe of immortality. No tongue can be able to express the excellency of this most blessed and happy estate.

3. Liven when a man was to offer a bullock or lamb in sacrifice to God, he must leave his offering at the altar, and first go and be reconciled to his brethren, if they had aught against him : so much more must this be done when men are in death, to offer up themselves, their bodies and souls, as an acceptable sacrifice unto God.

Rom. xii. 1.

1 Cor. xvi. 13.

4. As travellers, not thinking of the sun setting, are overtaken with darkness before they be aware : so doth death suddenly come upon many that never thought of it, neither have learned to die, nor asked what shall become of them when they be dead ; so that it behoveth all Christians that will be saved to watch, to stand steadfast in the faith of Christ, to quit themselves like men, and to be strong, and to do all that they do in love.

5. As earthen vessels are alike subject to danger and breaking, whether they be new or old made : so, likewise, all men are open and subject to death alike, whether they be young men, and in their lusty and flourishing age, or they be old men, and well stricken in years.

Ps. ii. 9.
Isa. xxx. 14.
Rev. ii. 27.

6. Like as, if a man shall come into a potter's warehouse, where he shall see a large table set full of pots, some old and some new, some little and some great, and shall demand of the potter which of them all shall first be broken, he may well say for answer, " That which shall fall first to the ground " : even so, among men, he dieth not first that is elder, but he that first falleth to the ground—that is, cometh first to his grave.

2 Cor. v. 1, 2.

7. Like as, if a beggar should be commanded to put off his old rags, that he might be clothed with rich and costly garments, he would not be sorry, though he should stand naked awhile till he were wholly bestripped of his rags : so, likewise, when God calls a man to death, and bids him put off his old rags of sin and corruption, and be clothed with the glorious robe of Christ's righteousness, there is no cause why he should be loth to die, seeing his abode in the grave is but for a space while corruption be put off.

8. As bread, of all other nourishment, doth sustain the body : so, above all things, a continual thought of death is wholesome for the soul.

Matt. xxv. 21, 34,
36.

9. As young scholars who, having spent their time diligently at their books, return from the universities to their friends, and are welcomed home both of father and mother, brother and sister, every one pressing forward with great desire to kiss them and to make the greatest demonstration of joy and gladness that may be for their happy return : so, in like manner, when true Christians die and depart out of this world, where they are, as it were, at school, to return to their Father's house, God Himself is the first that biddeth them welcome, and willet them to enter into the joy of their Lord and Father ; Jesus Christ is the next, who taketh and leadeth them into the palace of the King, and saith, " Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world ! " Then come the angels, who carry them like Lazarus into Abraham's bosom, to rejoice for ever with them and with the other holy fathers.

10. Like as some pleasant companions and merrily disposed will often say that God favoureth a man when He taketh away his wife by death, especially if she be evil and of bad condition : so, likewise, if this be true, we may safely say that God bestoweth a marvellous grace upon us, and doth us the greatest pleasure that may be, when, as by death, he delivereth us from our flesh, which is the most treacherous and disloyal wife that can be, and which doth so torment the poor mind, with whom she is married, that she vexeth and disquieteth her silly husband with the greatest and most intolerable grief that may be.

Exod. ii. 2, 3, &c.
Dan. iii. 16, 17, 18, 19,
&c.

11. As we see, in the seasons of the year, that from the beginning to the end they are appointed of God, and that in such sort that all the men in the world, though they should employ all their whole force, counsels, and endeavours to the contrary, were not able to alter them : even so, likewise, may we be assured that our lives are so limited and bounded by God, that neither king nor prince, power nor potentate, can any manner of ways shorten or prolong them ; yea, and that which may wonderfully comfort us, so often as we remember it, that God doth oftentimes prolong our days by the means of wicked tyrants, who would cut them off by death. Thus it was with Moses and Daniel.

12. As the brazen serpent was so far from hurting the Israelites, that, contrariwise, it healed them : so, after the same sort, death is now so far from hurting any godly Christian, that, on the other side, if affliction, as a fiery serpent, sting us, or if anything else hurt us, presently it is helped and redressed by death.

13. Even as a bee, stinging a dead body, takes no hurt, but, by stinging a live body, many times loseth both sting and life together: so, likewise, death, so long as it stung mortal men who were dead in sin, was never a whit the worse, but when it stung Christ once, who is life itself, by-and-by it lost both sting and strength.

14. As they who will needs play the hobgoblins, or the night-walking spirits, as we call them, all the while they speak under a hollow vault, or leap forth with an ugly vizard upon their faces, they are so terrible, that he who thinks himself no small man may perhaps be affrighted with them; but if some lusty fellow chance to step into one of these, and cudgel him well-favouredly, and pull the vizard from his face, then every boy laughs him to scorn: so it is with death, who was a terrible bullbeggar (bugbear), and every man afraid of him a great while; but Christ, dying, buckled with this bullbeggar, and conjured him, as we may say, out of his hollow vault, when the dead coming out of their graves were seen in Jerusalem, and pulled the vizard from his face, when as He himself, rising, left the linen clothes, which were the vizard of death, behind Him.

Matt. xxvii. 52, 53
John xx. 6.

15. As that ass called "Cumanus asinus," jetting up and down in a lion's skin, did for a time terrify his master, but afterwards, being descried, did benefit him very much: so, in like manner, death stands now like a silly ass, having his lion's skin pulled over his ears, and is so far from terrifying any, that it benefits all true Christians, because by it they rest from their labours, and if they be oppressed with troubles or cares, when they come to death, they are discharged—death, as an ass, doth bear these burdens for them.

16. As he that felleth a tree upon which the sun shineth may well cut the tree, but cannot hurt the sun; or as he that poureth water upon iron which is red hot may well quench the heat, but he cannot hurt the iron: even so Christ, the Son of Righteousness, did drive away the shadow of death, and, as glowing iron, was too hot and too hard a morsel for death to digest.

17. Like as, all the while that Adam did eat any other fruit which God gave him leave to eat he was nourished by it, but when he had tasted of the forbidden tree he perished: so death had free leave to devour any other man, Christ only excepted; but when it went about to destroy Christ, then it was destroyed itself.

18. Even as those barbarous people called cannibals, who feed only upon raw flesh, especially of men, if they happen to eat a piece of roasted meat, commonly they surfeit of it and die: so, likewise, the right cannibal, the only devourer of all mankind—death, I mean—tasting of Christ's flesh, and finding it not to be raw, such as it was used to eat, but wholesome and heavenly meat indeed, presently took a surfeit of it, and within three days died.

19. Even as, when Judas had received a sop at Christ's hand, anon after his bowels gushed out: so, likewise, death, being so saucy as to snatch a sop, as it were, of Christ's flesh and a little bit of His body, was, by-and-by, like Judas, choked and strangled with it, and fain to yield it up again, when Christ, on Easter-day, revived.

20. As a fire goeth out when all the fuel is spent, but burneth as long as that lasteth: so death dies when sin ceases, but where sin aboundeth there death rageth.

21. As the little worm that groweth out of the tree gnaweth and consumeth the tree, of which it hath its beginning: so death groweth and waxeth out of sin, and consumeth sin and the body it cometh from.

22. Like as, if one that is about to shoot a gun be unsteady at the letting of it go, he misseth altogether, and all that he prepared for it before is in vain: even so, at the end of this life, are the devils most busy to turn us from the right mark, that our former travail and labour may be lost, forasmuch as they know that there remaineth but a very small time of life, so that if the soul escape them now, they shall afterward go without it for ever.

23. Even as mighty enemies do besiege and lay assault to a city : so the devils compass the soul of man at the hour of death with violence and subtlety, to take possession of the poor soul, to apprehend it, and bring it to hell.

24. Like as, if an old silver goblet be melted and new-fashioned after a beautiful manner, then is it better than before, and neither spoilt nor destroyed : even so have we no just cause to complain of death, whereby the body, being delivered from all filthiness, shall in due time be perfectly renewed.

25. As the egg-shell, though it be goodly and fair-fashioned, must be opened and broken, that the young chicken may slip out of it : even so no otherwise doth death dissolve and break up our body but to the intent that we may attain unto the life of heaven.

John xvi. 21.

26. As the mother's womb carrieth the child seven or nine months, and prepareth it not for itself, but for the world wherein we are born : even so this present time, over all upon earth, serveth not to this end, that we must ever be here, but that we should be brought forth and born out of the body of this world by death into another and everlasting life.

27. Like as a child, out of the small habitation of his mother's womb, with danger and anguish is born into the wide world : even so goeth a man, through the narrow gate of death, with distress and trouble, out of the earth into the heavenly life ; for to die is not to perish, but to be first of all born aright.

28. As the brazen serpent, which, having the form and proportion of a serpent, was yet without biting, without moving, without poisoning : even so, though death be not utterly taken away, yet, through the grace of God, it is so weakened and made void, that only the bare proportion remaineth.

29. Even as, when the master of the ship perceiveth that he is not wide from the haven and place where he must land and discharge, he saileth on the more cheerfully and gladly : so, likewise, the nearer we draw unto death, where we must land, the more stoutly ought we to fight and withstand our ghostly enemies.

*Ps. xxxix. 5, 6.
1 Pet. ii. 11.
2 Cor. v. 1, 2.
Phil. iii. 20.
Heb. xiii. 14.*

30. Like as he that goeth a far journey hath uncertain lodging, travel, and labour, and desireth to return home to his own country, to his father and mother, wife, children, and friends, among whom he is surest and at most quiet, by means whereof he forceth (layeth stress on) the less for any rough careful path or way homeward : even so all we are strangers and pilgrims upon earth ; our home is Paradise in heaven ; our heavenly Father is God ; the earthly father of all men is Adam ; our spiritual fathers are the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, who altogether wait and long for us.

Ps. cxlii. 7.

31. Like as, if a man live in a dark, miserable prison, with this condition, that he should not come forth till the walls of the tower were fallen down, undoubtedly he would be right glad to see the walls begin to fall : even so our soul is kept within the body upon earth, as in captivity and bonds. Now, as soon as the body is at a point that it must needs fall, we ought not to be sorry therefore, for by this approacheth our deliverance, when we, out of the prison of misery, shall be brought before the most amiable countenance of God into the joyful freedom of heaven.

32. Like as it is no grief for a man to go to sleep, nor when he seeth his parents and friends lay them down to rest (for he knoweth that such as are asleep do soon awake and rise again) : so, when we or our friends depart away by death, we ought to erect (encourage) and comfort ourselves with hope of the resurrection.

33. As a good householder maketh provision for himself and his family, and buyeth aforehand fuel and victuals, and such things as he hath need of, for a month or for a whole year, &c., according as he is able: even so much more ought a Christian to provide before his death that which concerneth, not only one month or one year, but an eternity that hath no end.

34. Like as faithful servants wait for their master: so, in like manner, we ought to look for the coming of Christ, when He shall call us out of this wretched world by death.

Luke xii. 36-40.
Matt. xxiv. 42, &c.

Death.

1. As no man may marvel at a thing burnt that might be burned, or a thing molten that was to be melted: so it is not to be marvelled at that man, who is mortal and was born to die, dieth.

2. Like as a man who walketh over a field covered with snow and sees not his way, but, when he thinketh to run on, suddenly falls into a pit: even so they who have all things at will and swim on pleasures, which, as snow, covereth their way and dazzleth their sight, while they think to live on and rejoice still, suddenly rush upon death, and make shipwreck in the calm sea.

How to encounter with Death.

1. LIKE AS, if a man were to fight with a dragon, his best way to deal with him is to pull out his venomous sting: even so the dragon with which every Christian man is to encounter is death, whose sting is sin; therefore, that we may not be foiled by death, we are all our life to labour to bereave him of this his sting.

1 Cor. xv. 56.

2. As the Philistines, that they might the better deal with Samson, cut off his hair, where his strength lay: so, also, every one of us, that we may the better deal with death, should cut off our sins, which are the strength of death.

Judges xvi. 5, &c.

Death of the body not to be feared.

1. LIKE AS a traveller who, having passed many dangers, rejoiceth greatly when he approacheth near unto his own country or home; or as a man who willingly departeth out of a ruinous house ready to fall upon his head: even so a godly Christian can take no pleasure in this transitory world, seeing each day he draweth nearer to an end than another, where the pleasures that he receiveth are nothing to the pains he suffereth and his delights do cost him so dear.

Phil. i. 23.

2. As men lock up their best apparel in a chest, meaning to wear it again: even so are the dead bodies of the faithful buried in sure and certain hope of rising again to life everlasting; and therefore none ought to fear death or be unwilling to die.

3. As money borrowed is to be paid again with thanks and goodwill: so the life that we have borrowed of God is to be yielded up with cheerful countenance and thanks.

The time of our Death unknown.

LIKE AS Christ would have His last coming to be hidden from men: so, also, He would have the time of their death, for the very same cause, to be unknown unto them, unless He openeth the same unto some either by particular revelation or by probable conjectures.

Matt. xxiv. 36.

The Deceits of the world are dangerous.

1. As they who walk in a mist do not see it so well as they who stand upon a hill from it: even so it fareth in discerning the deceits and dissimulations of the world, the property of which is to blind them that come to it, to the end they may not see their own estate—even as a raven first of all striketh out the poor sheep's eyes, and so bringeth to pass, that she may not see the way to escape from his tyranny.

2. Like as a man's naked body, tossed and tumbled among many thorns, cannot but be much rent and torn, and made bloody with the pricks thereof: so a worldly man's soul, beaten with the cares and cogitations of this life, cannot but be vexed with restless pricking of the same, and wounded also with many temptations of sin which follow upon it.

Decrease of renewed holiness.

As, when a thief goeth about to spoil any man of his goods, if he offer to break in at the broadside of his house, he is straightway espied and receiveth the repulse; but if he undermine the house, he may be within it, and on the dweller, before he be aware: so when Satan cometh, as it were, bluntly to a Christian, and doth at the first dash move him to forsake and renounce God by infidelity, his malicious purpose is soon espied and, for the most, so carefully resisted, that he hath not any hope ever to prevail by that means to rob the regenerate man of his renewed holiness; so that he is driven to take another way by the end (for he will never give over), and to go more closely to work.

Decree, or purpose of God.

1774. xxv. 30.

As no man is able—neither king, prince, nor potentate—to stay, stop, or hinder the course of the sun, moon, or stars: so, likewise, can no man stay, let, or hinder the decree, purpose, determination, or counsel of God.

Deferring of repentance.

1. LIKE as we would esteem and judge a man not to be wise or well in his wits that, travelling on the way, and having great choice of lusty, strong horses, should let them all go empty, and lay all the carriage upon some one poor beast that could scarce bear itself, or much less stand under so great a weight laid upon it: even so, surely, no less unreasonable is that man who, passing over idly and carelessly the lusty days and times of this life, without amendment and reformation of his wicked life, reserveth and deferreth the same unto feeble old age.

Mal. i. 8.
Lev. iii. 1, 6.
Numb. xviii. 12.
Eccles. xii. 2.

2. Like as the Holy Ghost accounteth them accursed who, having whole and sound cattle, do yet offer to God the lame, the blind, the sick, or that which they would be ashamed to give to a mortal man: even so how much more are they accursed before God who, having so many days of youth, strength, and health, do yet dedicate and appoint unto His service only their limping old age, allotting to God a little, short, maimed, and uncertain time, and unto His enemy the greatest, the fairest, and the surest part thereof.

Prov. xx. 4.

3. Like as, if a captain, accompanied with other soldiers, did enter into a rich city to take the spoil thereof, and one soldier should say, "I will stay, and come in the next day after, when all the spoil is gone!" might not he be well reckoned to be both a coward and unwise: even so, is it not great folly and perverseness in some men, who pass over their youthful days in not serving of God, but living dissolutely, and will not take time whilst time is, seeing that now is the time of fight for the obtaining of our crown, now is the day of spoil to seize on our booty, now is the market to buy the kingdom of heaven, now is the time of running to gain the goal and prize, now is the day of sowing to provide us corn ?

4. Like as a prince sometimes pardoneth a malefactor when he is come to the very place of execution, yet were it not for every malefactor to trust thereupon, for that this is but an extraordinary act of the prince's favour, and neither shown nor promised to all men : even so no man ought to flatter and deceive himself in deferring his conversion and reforming his life by alleging the example of the penitent thief, saved even at the last hour upon the cross, and carried to Paradise that same day with Christ, for this act was a special miracle, reserved for the manifestation of Christ's power and glory at that hour upon the cross ; and, besides, this act was upon a most rare confession made by the thief at that instant, when almost all the world forsook Christ.

Luke xxiii. 40-43.

5. As, before the destruction of Jerusalem (for that God desired to spare His people and the place of His habitation), He sent His messengers betimes in the morning, who ceased not to call them back, saying, " Return, ye wandering children ; confess your iniquity, and your starting aside will I heal again " : even so did the godly preachers in the last year of King Edward VI., before the sudden change of state, never more often, more earnestly, more boldly, more vehemently cry out and preach repentance than then, to affright the people from their sins ; but, nevertheless, for all their threatening, they could not make their stony hearts to relent. They would not turn to the Lord with all their hearts, with weeping, fasting, and lamenting ; but, being past shame, with stiff necks and uncircumcised hearts and ears, continued still in their sins, till desolation and confusion fell upon them.

2 Kings xxi. 12-15 :
xxiii. 27.
Ezek. xxi. 2.
2 Chron. xxxvi.
6, 19.
Matt. xxiv. 16, &c.
Luke xiii. 34, 35.

6. Like as the Jews, who scorned the messengers of God, mocked His prophets and derided their sermons until such time as the wrath of God was kindled against them, and no redress or amendment could be had : so, likewise, a great number with us in England do most shamefully scoff and deride the Word of God, despise the ministers of Christ, and account of them as madmen, and most wickedly esteem their preaching, being the true oracles of God, to be but vain fables and lies.

2 Chron. xxxvi.
15, 16.

Delight.

THEY that seek in Plato, Demosthenes, and especially in sacred Scripture, nothing but utterance and eloquence, are like unto those that delight only in the colour and savour of salves and medicines.

God Delighteth in the conversion of a sinner.

As a father taketh great joy and comfort when his son, who was wild, unthrift, and ungodly, becometh modest, thrifty, and religious : even so it is a delightful and acceptable thing to God when any sinner is converted from his wicked and lewd course and liveth Christianly.

Luke xv. 21, 24.

Desertion of God's Spirit.

LIKE as God did not lead the children of Israel the directest way into the promised land of Canaan : so, likewise, we go not directly to heaven, but are carried about through the wilderness of this world, for the trying of our patience and exercising of other graces given us of God.

Numb. xxxii. 1,
&c.

Desires of heaven.

Phil. i. 22.
Rom. vii. 24.

As they that are strangers in a foreign country, and have parents and great wealth in their native soil, being hardly entreated where they sojourn, and upon the point to return home into their country, are, undoubtedly, very glad thereof—even already they seem to see their houses, lands, and possessions, and in their conceits do talk with their parents, and feel a fervent desire to be soon there: even so we, if we remember that we have treasures of eternal riches, an undefiled inheritance, immortal and incorruptible, which is reserved for us, a heavenly Father that loveth us in His well-beloved Son, our Elder Brother Jesus Christ in glory, the angels and holy spirits in joy, and that we, their fellow-burgesses, have our portion in all these goods, and are even upon the point to be really in heaven with them, we ought, then, to be ravished with a fervent desire to be lifted up thither.

Desires of the flesh ; how they are quenched.

LIKE as the dropsical man desires and longeth after drink, and drink greatly increases his disease: even so evil desires and corrupt affections, if they be followed, do much increase, but, being refrained, they decrease.

The Devil fearful and envious.

Eph. vi. 11, 12.

1. LIKE as, if an enemy of great might, having also an advantage of us, by reason of the ground whereon he hath planted himself, be dreadful to us, so as we have good cause to fear him: even so much more we ought to be afraid of the devil having the like or greater advantages of us.

Rev. xii. 2, 3.

2. As a good midwife is careful to help the woman in travail and save the child: even so the devil, contrariwise, is ready to hinder and hurt the Church and to destroy her seed.

Devices of the wicked.

1st. lix. 5.

As the eggs of the cockatrice hatched are full of poison: even so are the devices of the wicked and the execution of their enterprises hurtful.

The Diet of the soul.

1. As it is not sufficient for the good estate of man's body that it be brought into the world in the natural perfection of it, which consisteth in the equal temperature and just proportion of the several parts of it, for that it being left here would soon perish and come to nought, and therefore it must, of necessity, be continually both nourished with meat and drink, and also preserved from all hurtful things—yea, carefully restored to the former state of health, if by any inward or outward means it fall into sickness or be any way hurt, wounded, or distempered: even so no more will it serve for the good estate of the soul that it be prepared by repentance for regeneration—yea, actually regenerated by the Spirit of God; but it likewise must continually be tended, fed, right dieted, and cherished—yea, healed of all those maladies which by any means happen unto it.

2. As the body, being neglected for a small time, cometh weak and distempered—yea, soon falleth into sickness and doth perish: so it is with the soul, the which, being neglected but a little, a decrease of holiness will be plainly felt—yea, perhaps seen by others.

3. As the body must continually be repaired with nourishment, because it is continually consumed by our natural heat: so must the soul, by a good diet daily used, be preserved.

4. As it is impossible to order the body aright, either in sickness or in health, without the certain knowledge of our complexion, age, and strength, and unless we mark in what parts it is most weak or strong, that accordingly choice may be made both of meats in health and remedies in sickness: so the foundation of the right ordering of the soul consisteth in this, that we know our age and strength in Christ, whether we be ripe and strong men, able to digest solid meats, or but babes and weaklings, who must be fed with milk, and also our infirmities, what sins we are most subject unto, that so we may avoid all occasions of them.

5. As most men living are said to have their health, although that exact temperature, ad pondus, whereof physicians dispute, cannot be found in any man or in any age: so absolute perfection of holiness is not required to spiritual health.

6. As it is sufficient for bodily health that the distemperature be not so great and manifest as that it hinder any of the natural faculties from their functions: so, likewise, if the corruption of sin be so bridled as that it hinder not the performance of any Christian duty, there is spiritual health—yea, although this corruption of sin be so strong that it doth sometimes bring forth some sin and hinder in part the performance of some Christian duty, yet if, for the general course of life, the grace of God's Spirit do prevail, so that it represseth that sin and performeth all duties, sometimes faintly and imperfectly, at other times fully and courageously, yet here is health.

7. As the natural life of man may, if no outward violence come, be preserved with the least care, cost, and pains that can be; but if a man desire to keep his body in vigour and strength, there must choice of diet be made and care used, and most of all, if he go about to augment either his stature in his young years, or afterwards his strength or flesh, he must be yet more careful—yea, curious—in his diet, bestowing all his time, yea, great care and cost on it: so it is in spiritual life, the which, being put into the soul of man by the hand of God, will continue there ever by itself, although, as it cometh often to pass, the owner of it be negligent in maintaining it—yea, in a manner careless of it; whereas he that desireth to continue a strong man in Christ, without any sickness or decrease of grace, must make account to bestow great care in this work, and far greater if, as he ought, he desire to increase in grace.

8. As it is the part of a wise man not to walk too near the brink of a deep river, whereinto, if he chance to slip, there is danger of drowning, but rather to keep aloof, and so to be in safety: so a good dictary of the soul must carefully avoid licentiousness and the too free use of worldly pleasures.

9. As it is not sufficient for the feeding of the body that meat be received into the stomach, for that, if by any infirmity thereof it be straightway voided, it doth not any whit nourish the body: even so no more will it serve for the feeding and dieting of our souls that we hear the Word with great joy and delight—yea, with care and attention—unless also we remember and keep it in our souls.

10. As the body, the which, although it be fed to the full and daily fed with meat, yet it cannot be preserved, much less increased in health, strength, and vigour, unless it be exercised, that so the meat received into the belly may be drawn and fastened to the other parts of the body, otherwise it would not nourish, but soon pass away without any profit: so, for the preservation of spiritual health and strength, exercise is no less needful than food. The truth hereof appeareth in many, who, although they feed their souls with all care and diligence, being continually conversant in studying, hearing, reading, meditating, and regarding the Word, yet their souls are not nourished by this food, because they do not join exercise unto it, as prayer and invocation of the name of God, public and also private conference, &c.

Luke xxi. 34.
1 Cor. vi. 12; in.
27.

1 Thess. v. 17.
Luke xviii. 1.
Eph. vi. 18.

11. Like as men, feeling their bodies any way heavy, distempered, and out of course, straightway they fly to this remedy of exercise, not doubting but that it will soon put it away : so, whensoever we feel ourselves prone to sin and untoward and sluggish in the service of God, if we give ourselves to the exercise of prayer and stretch out the joints of our souls before God, we shall no doubt feel a great change in our souls, and that now they are light and able to lift up themselves to heaven.

12. As it cometh to pass in our bodies, both in the whole and also in the several parts and members of them, that the more they are exercised, the more they are both confirmed in strength and augmented in quantity, and, contrarily, the more they cease from performing their natural functions, the less able they are to perform them—yea, by this means it cometh to pass that they are little and weak : even so it cometh to pass in the dieting of the soul, the graces whereof, as they are more or less, put in practice in the doing of good works and the performance of Christian duties, so they do either increase or decay.

Eph. iv. 15.
2 Pet. iii. 18.

13. As when the bodies of men, or rather of children, do not grow up to their full and natural stature, it argueth some secret distemperature and some natural infirmity in them : so when Christians do not grow on from one measure of grace to a greater, it doth of necessity infer an evil diet and constitution of the soul.

14. As the holiness of the soul is nourished by the same thing by which it is begotten : so it is increased by the same diet by which it is nourished.

15. As there is required a greater virtue and force both of nature and of diet to augment the body in stature than to keep and continue it in life and health : so he that desireth to go on in grace must, indeed, use his conservative diet of spiritual food and exercise—that is, to cleave to God, to His service, and to all spiritual exercises—without separation or intermission—to wit, to the hearing, reading, and studying of the Word of God ; to the considering of His works and observing of His actions ; to prayer, singing of psalms, to the exhorting and instructing of others in the ways of godliness ; and, lastly and summarily, to the daily performance of all Christian duties and the exercising of all those graces which he hath received.

16. As we know, by daily experience, that many notable physicians have fallen into dangerous and mortal sicknesses, and by them been brought to untimely death : so it is not sufficient for our spiritual welfare that we know only how to diet and order our souls as long as they are in health and strength, it being also required that we know how, by a convenient and meet diet, to recover them out of sicknesses and to heal all the maladies happening unto them.

Discipline.

Matt. xviii. 15-17.

1. LIKE AS, if there were never so fair a garden or orchard planted, and yet the same were left without a fence, or with a bad fence, so that something, ere long, should get in, and root up the herbs and mar the plants : even so is it in the Church where discipline is wanting. Although there be never so sound and good preaching, with catechising against sin and wickedness, yet the edge thereof is so dulled, that it is fruitless and of little force.

2. Like as, when a man goeth astray and wandereth in some forest, not knowing in what great danger, it would, no doubt, be a great comfort to him to be told of his error and taught the right way : even so the principal end of discipline tendeth, that every member of the Church should walk in the fear of God, and that, if any one go astray, he should be brought back into the way of salvation.

3. Even as, when a man falleth into a ditch or deep pit, ready to be drowned, he hath good cause to thank him who pulleth him out and saveth his life : so, likewise, we are to account ourselves much bound and beholden to the ecclesiastical discipline of God's Church, when we, through wickedness and lewdness of life, are ready to be drowned in hell—then, I say, we are, by good documents (instructions), exhortations, reprehensions, and public admonitions, hauled and drawn out of the same.

4. As no city, town, house, or family, can maintain their estate and prosper without policy and government: even so the Church of God, which requireth more purely to be governed than any city or family, cannot, without spiritual policy and ecclesiastical discipline, continue, increase, and flourish.

5. As the Word of God is the life and soul of the Church: so a godly order of discipline is, as it were, sinews in the body, which knit and join the members together with decent order and comeliness;—it is a bridle to stay the wicked from their mischiefs; it is a spur to prick forward such as be slow and negligent; yea, and for all men, it is the Father's rod, ever in readiness to chastise gently the faults committed, and to cause them afterward to live in more godly fear and reverence.

Discord.

As music, if the harmony of the strings be not consonantly fitted, the sound is not sweet or acceptable to any good and tuneable ear: even so, if Christians do disagree amongst themselves, they are unacceptable to God.

Diseases of the mind.

As the wounds of the body, with often rubbing and chafing, are made sometimes incurable: even so the diseases of the mind, if they be exasperated and stirred up, will more and more rebel and draw the party in whom they are to sin more greedily than ever he did before.

Displeasure foreseen.

As a man doth receive more at will, and with less danger, the stroke which he foreseeth: so a displeasure foreseen and provided for, or if only before perceived, doth less annoy him.

Dissensions.

As bees, when they strive together, and are stirred up through some vehement motion, with throwing of dust are brought into order and appeased: even so men, when they are tossed and tormented with troublesome broils, perturbations, and passions, if they would remember dust, whereunto of necessity they must be turned, and never forget death, which they shall never be able to escape, they would easily be stayed, pacified, and quieted, and would repress and keep within compass their straggling lusts and unruly appetites, which cannot endure to be tamed and ruled by reason.

Men Distressed do seek after God.

As they who have great need of water do make haste to come to the fountain or well where water is to be had, but, having drawn the water and filled their vessels, do depart, and turn their backs on the fountain which hath supplied their want and satisfied their

Jer. ii. 13.
Luke ix. 61.
Ps. lxxiv. 7.

desires : so very many, when they be compassed round with perils and dangers, and are beset on every side with afflictions and troubles, then they fly apace to the Fountain of grace and mercy ; but when they have obtained the water of comfort, then they do despise that flowing spring of living water.

Diversity of wills and opinions.

As, amongst many thousands of men, there are not two faces alike, nor one voice agreeable with the other : so will every man have his own mind, use his own way, wit, and fashion.

No Divinity (except it be against God) is prescribed to the minister.

As there is no law by the which a preacher for his doctrine may be punished, if he speak not against the prince : so there is no divinity by the which a preacher is particularly prescribed or generally ordered, if he speak not against God, the mighty Prince of Peace.

Students in Divinity.

LIKE as he who would behold the light of the sun doth rub and purge his eyes, that he may behold it the better : so he who would attain to the knowledge of divinity must first wash his soul and his life, that he may the better understand those things which God hath revealed in the Scriptures.

False Doctrine.

1. As the herb blattaria, wheresoever it be strewn or laid, the moths and bats continually find it out and come unto it : so with corrupt doctrine, wheresoever it be dispersed, by-and-by such people as are corrupt will flock unto it.

2. As a drachm of the root of Solanum somniferum causeth idle imaginations, two drachms causeth madness, and four drachms killeth one : so a little false doctrine maketh an idle head.

Sound Doctrine doth cheer the spirits.

Isa xxiv. 7, 13.

As ripe grapes do relish savourily, and with their pleasant and toothsome juice do singularly refresh the palate and delight the throat : even so sound doctrine, wholesome admonition, and gracious speeches do cheer the spirits and comfort the minds of Christians.

Spiritual Doctrine of our souls.

Matt. ix. 13.

As God works in His creatures, that after winter comes summer, and after a storm comes fair weather : so, in the spiritual doctrine of our souls, first, He teacheth repentance, preacheth the law, threateneth vengeance for sin, casts down man in his own sight, and lets him look even into hell, with fear of conscience for his disobedience ; but afterwards He comforts him, raiseth him up, and heals him.

False Doctrines, and inventions of men.

1. LIKE as hay, wood, and stubble, put to the fire, are brought to sudden consuming: 1 Cor. iii. 12-15 even so the doctrines and inventions of men, not established by the Word of God, cannot bear the trial of the Holy Ghost, but they by-and-by fall away and perish.

2. As there is no food more wholesome than the food of the Word of God, if it be received sincerely as it is: so there is none more noisome and hurtful, when it is marred with mixture of other things, or hath mingled with it the false doctrine of men.

3. As smoke hurteth the eyes, and suffereth them not to see clearly: so, also, doth perverse doctrine—it dazzleth the eyes, taketh away judgment, and blindeth with error.

4. As it is great foolishness to forsake the clear fountains and to drink puddle water: so it is great folly to leave the sweet doctrine of the evangelists and to study the dreams of men's imaginations.

How to Draw near unto God.

LIKE as he is said to depart from God who doth abandon and give himself to the lusts of the world, by which he draweth near unto the devil: so, likewise, he who departeth from these is said to draw near unto God, and so cleaveth unto Him by faith and true obedience. James iv. 8.

Drunkards and Drunkenness.

1. As Lot, in seeking to make himself merry with wine, did incur thereby a perpetual heaviness: even so all those that do practise the like are in great danger of getting dishonesty and shame. Gen. xix. 32.

2. Like as immoderate drinking of wine was the only cause of Lot's abominable and vile incest: even so the like excess in all other drunkards is the only cause why they do many things whereof, being come to themselves again, they are then both sorry and sore ashamed. Prov. xxxi. 4.
1 Tim. iii. 3, 8.
Tit. i. 7.
Lev. x. 9.
Numb. vi. 3.
Isa. v. 11.

3. As a man, by reason, is discerned from a brute breast: so, when wine or strong drink depriveth him of his understanding and reason, it depriveth man of manhood, and placeth him in the degree of beasts. Prov. xx. 1.
1 Cor. vi. 10; v. 11, 22.

4. As there is no exercise more profitable for the children of God for their salvation, or wherein God is greater glorified, than in prayer, thanksgivings, and praises to the Lord: so is there nothing that sooner quencheth the use of the same than drunkenness. 2 Kings xvi. 9.
Luke xxi. 34, 35.
Eph. v. 18.
Rom. xiii. 13.

5. As long and sore rain moisteneth the earth, and so converteth it into mire, that it cannot be tilled to bring forth fruit: even so our bodies, distempered with too much drink, cannot receive the spiritual husbandry, neither yield any fruit becoming the immortal soul. Prov. xxiii. 29, 30.
1 Pet. iv. 3.
Mic. ii. 11.

6. As all men do desire to have sufficient and competent showers of rain in their fields and closes, so that they may be able both to exercise tillage and to enjoy the plenty of their fruits and increase: even so, in this field, men should drink but so much as behoveth, lest, by excess and drunkenness, the very earth of their body (being, as it were, turned into a very fen and quagmire) may better serve to breed worms and serpents of vice and sin than it should be able to bring forth the fruits of charity.

7. As whatsoever groweth in fens and marshes bringeth forth no fruit, for therein do breed serpents and sundry kinds of worms, which do bring more horror and dread than increase of victual: even so such are drunkards, being fit for no profit or commodity; for oftentimes, in their drunkenness, they know neither themselves nor anybody else, neither can they go, stand, nor speak anything that pertaineth unto reason. Isa. xix. 14; xxviii. 1; xxiii. 7.
Amos ii. 5-15.

8. As, when there is too much rain, the ground is unfit for tillage and turned to mire : so, when one is drunken, the spiritual tillage can take no force, nor the soul bring forth her fruits of Christianity.

9. As a ship on the sea without a guide, leaning now on one side, now on the other, is often in danger : so, in like manner, it often happeneth to the drunkard, who, lacking the guide of reason, stumbleth at every stone, and sometimes falleth in the mire.

Drunken men.

As one overladen with wine can very hardly hide or keep any meat in his stomach : so, also, the drunken man may keep or contain in him no secrets.

Dunsical writers.

As the savour of the beast panther seemeth sweet to none other than unto brute beasts : so is Duns-Scotus and other writers of the Dunsical school, to sharp, quick, and good wits, most foolish ; whereas, unto dolts and jackdaws, they are as dear as any darling.

The Duty of parishioners to their ministers.

1 Thess. v. 12.
Phil. ii. 29.
2 Cor. vii. 15.
Heb. xiii. 17.

1. As they that sit at a table do eat, chew, and digest their food : so they that be parishioners, and hear the Word of God, ought to listen unto it, meditate upon it, and digest it in their hearts, that so they may receive the nourishment signified by the Word, and duty to feed, commended to the shepherds of Christ's flock.

2. As in meat we are not so much to seek liquorishness (dainties) as health : so must it be in the preaching of the Word, for ecclesiastical assemblies be not like to common plays, whereto men resort for pleasure ; but in sermons we are to look for that which is healthsome for the soul.

1 Cor. ii. 4, 5.

3. As in a banquet, if any dish chance to be over-salted, or otherwise it is not well dressed, the same doth not so offend us that, therefore, we can eat but little of the rest that is well seasoned : so, likewise, if in sermons we hear any sentence or word not so fitly applied as it were to be wished, we must not, for that, refuse to make our profit of the rest that is well and devoutly spoken.

2 Cor. iv. 7.

4. Like as, when a man filleth out but a little wine into an excellent wrought and graven cup, men regard more the cup than the wine ; when, contrariwise, if most excellent wine be brought in a simple cup, they consider and commend the wine rather than the cup : even so is it with the treasure of the Gospel, presented in a cup either of earth or of gold, because man's curiosity hath more respect to the pot, the mouth, or the eloquence, than to the treasure.

5. As we see, by experience, that the sucking of the child bringeth milk into the mother's breast : even so such as show themselves desirous to hear the Word of their pastors are a great encouragement to them to proceed the more cheerfully, and do even, as it were, bring words into their mouths.

6. As it is in vain to call the physician and to hear his counsel when we list not to take the medicine that he doth prescribe : so, in like manner, the people that hear the sermons and do not put the words in practice, instead of reaping profit, shall incur the greater damnation.

Amos. iii. 17.

7. Even as he that, having been two or three years at school, and hath not profited, is worthy to be taken away : so those parishioners that have been many years in the school of Christ, and hear His Word, yet do not amend, neither increase in faith and love, do worthily deserve to be deprived of such a benefit of God, and, according to the threatening of Amos, to endure such a famine, not of bread, but of the Word, that the strongest and most lusty, seeking after it, but not finding it, may perish.

8. As the Church is the house of God and the kingdom of Christ : so those parishioners that bestow their goods upon the maintenance of the holy ministry, without the which this house and kingdom cannot subsist, do offer a sacrifice of most excellent sweet savour in the presence of the Lord.

1 Cor. ix. 7, &c.
Gal. vi. 6, &c.

9. As Christ commandeth us to pray to the Lord of the harvest to send workmen into His harvest : so is it the duty of parishioners, when He hath given them faithful pastors to pray unto Him—first, to preserve them in health and long life, for the good and edification of His Church ; secondly, by His Holy Spirit to guide them, that they may faithfully, and with fruit, employ themselves in their ministry.

Matt. ix. 38.
Eph. vi. 18, 19.
Col. iv. 3.
2 Thess. iii. 1.
Rom. xv. 30-32.

Overmuch Ease and pampering of the belly is a great provocation to sin.

As, with a pile or stack of small and dry wood, the fire is quickly kindled, and caused mightily to flame out : even so the outrageousness of carnal and fleshly lust is greatly provoked, moved, and stirred up through rioting, dancing, banqueting, quaffing, gulling, swilling, and continual feeding and pampering of the belly, and by taking the body from good, lawful, and honest exercises, and giving it to idleness, slothfulness, and overmuch ease and rest from labours.

Edifying of others.

LIKE as they that carry musk or other sweet odours about them cannot be hid, but must needs be made known to all, and that others must needs smell them : even so godly and faithful men, that carry in their hearts the Gospel of Christ, must needs make others partakers of the same.

Our Elders and ancestors, in times of ignorance, had yet good consciences in civil causes.

As the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah, and the Jews did not at the preaching of Christ, who was greater than Jonah : even so the good and faithful dealing which our elders and ancestors had in times past, in civil causes, doth reprove our iniquities and show what they would have been if they had had the preaching of the Gospel so plainly as we have. And, therefore, well saith a godly father : “ Men had better consciences then and less knowledge ; now have they more knowledge and worse consciences.”

Matt. xii. 41.

Beza, Ep. l.

The Elect cannot finally perish.

As an elm or an oak casts its leaves in the winter, yet their sap abideth still in them : even so shall the holy seed continue in the elect. So that though there appear no fruits outwardly to our gross senses, yet the sure ground and substance, which He hath there planted, remaineth ; and though it have no outward seal in our sight, yet hath it a sure seal in God's sight, for the Lord knoweth it to be there, which is sufficient.

Isa. vi. 13.

God's love to His Elect.

Gen. xliii. 34.
Ps. civ. 24; xli. 12.

As Joseph loved all his brethren, but Benjamin he loved with a more special love, and therefore he gave messes of meat to them all, but Benjamin's mess was five times as much as the rest: so God giveth liberty to all His creatures as a good and loving God, in so much that the earth is full of His mercies; but His love to His elect children by Christ is a thousand times more than the rest, for them He upholdeth in their integrity, and doth set them before His face for ever.

The Elect are ordained to lead a godly life.

Eph. i. 4; ii. 10.
2 Thess. ii. 13.
2 Tim. ii. 21.

As the sun was ordained to shine in the day, and the moon in the night, and that order they keep—yea, every creature in its kind observeth the course appointed unto it by creation, as the grass to grow and trees to bring forth fruit: so, likewise, the elect were ordained to this end, to lead a godly life, and therefore, if we would either persuade ourselves or the world that we are, indeed, chosen to salvation, we must be plentiful in all good works, and make conscience of every evil way.

Those Elected or predestinated to life everlasting are elected to all the means of attaining unto it.

Rom. viii. 29, 30.
Tit. i. 1.
1 Pet. i. 2.
Eph. ii. 10.

LIKE as a man appointed to go to a place must go the direct way unto it: even so must men appointed to salvation go in the way to it—that is, to be called, justified, sanctified, and glorified.

Election of God.

Eph. iv. 9, 13, 14

1. LIKE as, if one, to see the better, should fix his eyes upon the globe of the sun, it is not to be doubted but his eyes would wax dim, and yet, if he looked upon that light in the sunbeams, he might have use of it, and see all things offered to his sight, and how and what way to direct his steps: even so, likewise, the eternal election of God, while it is considered in Christ, in whom we are chosen, and we seek in ourselves the testimony that the Holy Ghost yieldeth us by our effectual calling, then it affordeth us especial comfort, and assureth us of our salvation; but otherwise it bringeth trouble of mind and vexation of conscience.

Rom. ix. 12, &c.

2. Like as all men would account him a fool that should take upon him to lead (fathom) the sea, and because he is not able to do it should say there is no water in it; or if he should say there is no world, because a child cannot measure it with his span; or that there is no light in the sun, because his bleared eyes cannot abide the light of it: so when man, with his short wit, hath come to the deepness of God's wisdom in election, and because he cannot with his little dish of wit take up all, should say there is no election or predestination at all, he were greatly deceived.

3. Even as, if a man have two debtors, and he forgiveth the one, and follows the law in exacting his own of the other, he cannot truly be said to be unjust or an acceptor of persons: so it is with God, in electing and calling some to salvation, and in condemning others.

John viii. 47.

4. As there is not a more evident testimony or a surer argument that a man is in the state of condemnation who hath no mind to hear the Word of God, nor to lead his life according unto the doctrine thereof: so, likewise, is there not a more certain sign that any man is elected and predestinated to be saved than when he hath a mind to hear the Word of God truly preached.

5. As the clay lieth before the potter to be used and handled, disposed of, and formed as shall please him : so were all men at the first, before the Lord in His eternal counsel, to receive an end or use, according to His will—to life or death, to honour or dishonour, to salvation or damnation, to heaven or hell.

Rom. viii. 30; ix. 22, 23.

We must give diligence to make our Election sure.

As men are careful in the world, and painstaking enough, to make assurance of lands and goods to themselves and their posterity : even so we ought to be more careful and diligent to make ourselves sure of the election of God, which is more worth than all the world beside.

2 Pet. i. 10.

Election to salvation doth not abolish, but establish the second causes.

1. As God hath limited to every man the term of his life, but withal He hath ordained and appointed that, for the preserving thereof, he shall both eat and drink : even so God hath ordained, necessarily, that the elect must be saved, yet by such means as He hath appointed in His wisdom for the bringing of them to it—to wit, by hearing the Gospel preached, by believing in Christ, by amending their lives, by praying to God, &c.

2. As he that should abstain from food, and say that he needs it not to live by, would directly fight and strive against the will and pleasure of God, and so tempt Him : so, likewise, they that say that, being elect, they need not believe the Gospel nor amend their lives for the attaining to the kingdom of heaven, do tempt God, reverse His providence, strive against His will, and, so far as in them lieth, abolish the means and way to life and salvation, and do draw on to death and damnation ; and, therefore, they that be elected to life eternal are also elected to have faith, and consequently to amend their lives.

Rom. viii. 1, &c.
Eph. i. 4; ii. 16.
Col. iii. 12.
1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.

3. Like as a poor maiden, who, hearing that some king had among all others chosen her to be his son's wife, and withal ordained that, to that end, she, forsaking her parents and kinsfolk, should come to him on foot in the midst of winter, no doubt she would willingly and readily leave all, and even in winter and on foot come to the king to finish this great marriage, as the like we read of in David's life : even so we, understanding and having witness that God hath chosen us to be the spouse of His Son Jesus Christ, and co-heirs of His kingdom, and also that it is His will that, forsaking the world and the flesh, we should walk through the path of good works, in amendment of life, to come to heaven, there to accomplish this happy marriage, we ought fervently to renounce the world, the flesh, and everything that contrarieth His will, that we may the more speedily and cheerfully proceed in amendment of life, and so perform this blessed marriage.

1 Sam. xviii. 17, &c.

4. Like as, if the sun in its force, shining upon a stone, can so heat the same stone that a man shall not be able to touch it with his hands : even so much more shall we, if we meditate upon the love of God towards us, in our election, albeit we were as cold as marble, be warmed and kindled to love with all our hearts, with all our strength, and with all our minds.

1 John. iv. 19.
Luke xiv. 15.

Eloquence in sermons forbidden.

EVEN as those sheep which, in the presence of their shepherds, vomit and cast out again the grass they have eaten, do not profitably show how much and how well they have fed, but those rather which do inwardly digest and concoct their meat, and do give abundance of milk, and do bear the softest, weightiest, and finest wool, and do show themselves to be fat, fair, and well-looking, for by these things they show and plainly prove that their pasture is exceeding good : even so, not those pastors, ministers, and preachers of

2 Tim. iv. 1, 2, 5.
Tit. ii. 7.
Matt. v. 19.

the Word who do deliver words and stuff their sermons with eloquent and brave phrases do fruitfully and thoroughly declare unto the people that religion's pasture is excellent, good, and wholesome, and to be desired of all; but they, rather, who do inwardly concoct virtue and do observe it, and bending themselves to the actions and performance thereof, do flow with the sweet milk of mercy, and do clothe themselves and others with the fine fleeces of Christian love and charity, these do evidently declare how much they have profited in the doctrine of Christ, and how much also others ought to profit in the same, and do stir up the hearts and minds of their hearers to virtue and godliness, both with their doctrine and living.

Enemies of the Gospel.

Ps. li. 2, 5.

As archers do aim their arrows unto a certain mark: so the enemies of the Gospel bend and bestow all their endeavours unto the subversion of the true doctrine and of the true Church of God.

Enemy.

1. As Linceus, the man of whom Verro did write, could see through a wall: even so our enemy seeth through our servant and friend oftentimes what we do.

Luke xxi. 19; xxiii.
34.
Acts vii. 60.

2. As the bees, although they sometimes sting the hands and face of the owner and master of them, yet they be profitable in providing for him the sweet honey and wax: even so an enemy, although he persecute, injure, and wrong a good Christian, yet is he very profitable unto him, in furthering him to heavenward, if so be that by patience he possess his soul and do pray for him, as our Saviour Christ and Stephen did.

Gen. xv. 1.
Jes. xli. 10.
Matt. x. 28

3. Like as, if one had a great enemy and the queen, who yet is but a mortal woman, had promised to protect and defend him from the same his enemy, he would not fear him: even so much more we ought not to fear our enemies, seeing that God, who only is Almighty and of power to preserve, doth say, "Fear not, for I am thy Protector, thy Defence; and thy reward shall be exceeding great!"

Rom. xii. 20.

4. As there is no such grief to a jester or a juggler as when he doth see that with all his jests and fooleries he cannot move mirth nor change the countenances of them that hear him and see him: so there can be no greater torment to a wicked and malicious enemy than to see thee no whit grieved nor moved at his malice against thee, but that thou do so bear his injuries as if they were none at all; for thy adversary's purpose is to anger thee and to drive thee into the dumps, which, if he cannot bring to pass, then he is chafed and vexed ten times more than he was.

Envy.

Acts vii. 9; xvii. 5.

1. ALTHOUGH there be some countries (as Candia) which wanteth poison: yet is there no commonwealth, country, or court which is void of envy.

Gen. xxxi. 1.
1 Kings. xxi. 1, &c.

2. There are persons, as some dream, that will bewitch a man with their looks: so an envious man seeketh by all means to destroy the prosperous estate of his neighbour. Neither is the eye of a mighty man much for thy profit if thou have anything that excelleth in fairness or that he thirsteth after, as Ahab did for Naboth's vineyard.

3. As those that be runners are nothing grieved or vexed with the victory of the wrestlers, but very glad of their own: so ought we not to envy the prosperous estate of others, but rejoice at our own:

4. Like as a gun that is always charged and waiteth when it may best shoot off: even so the envious man is stuffed full of malicious poison, and seeketh opportunity and convenient time to put the same in practice. Gen. iv. 5, 6.

5. As the snake, the adder, and the toad have deadly poison in them, wherewith they hurt others and yet hurt not themselves: so envy is so poisonous a thing, that it both killeth him that hath it and hurteth others; for the envious man fretteth with himself, he fumes, he pines away to see others do well, he eateth not nor sleepeth quietly, nor can be merry until he see some mischief fall on the person he envies.

6. As the rust eateth and consumeth hard iron and brass: even so malicious envy, with fretting, consumeth our envious stomachs.

7. As the viper doth kill her dam by gnawing through her belly, and afterwards doth sting and poison others: even so envy doth consume him in whom it is bred, and afterwards hurteth others.

8. As malice drinketh the most part of her own poison: even so envy hurteth more the envious themselves than those they be envious of. Rom. i. 29.
1 Cor. xiii. 4.
Gal. v. 21.
Tit. iii. 3.
1 Pet. ii. 1.

9. As of necessity a shadow doth accompany those that walk in the sun: so is envy a continual companion to those that in good and honest things do excel others, and are advanced and renowned with the best.

10. As there is no shadow where there is no sun: so, where there is no prosperity, there is no envy.

11. As they that are tender sighted do find themselves grieved with every light and bright object: so is it with the envious in every prosperity of others.

12. As cantharides, a certain green and venomous worm or fly, usually feedeth upon wheat when it waxeth ripe and on roses in their pride: so, likewise, doth the envious man. He taketh against those that be honest, and grieveth at the increase of other men's virtue; so that it is more easy for a poor man to shun contempt than for a rich man to avoid envy. Gen. iv. 5; xxx. 1, xxxvii. 4.

13. Even as the sun beating directly upon the crown of the head yieldeth but a small shadow: so those that are in eminency and authority far above us do purchase but small envy against them. 1 Sam. xvii. 8.

14. As smoke, which, so long as the fire is but small, maketh a great show, but so soon as it flameth, vanisheth away, or at the last appeareth nothing like so plainly as at the first: even so envy is often extinguished by the greatness and excellency of other men's prosperity.

15. Like as self-love is such a plague that all the children of Adam are therewith poisoned: so the envy that groweth thereof is but over common and too deeply rooted, even in those that profess themselves to be the children of God.

16. As rust consumeth the iron: so doth envy waste the man that is possessed therewith; for it is a moth to the heart, a canker to the thought, and a rust to the soul.

17. Even as a viper, by devouring the womb of her dam, maketh her passage forth: so envy eateth and consumeth the soul of that man who in his heart hath conceived her. Job v. 2.

18. As the joys of the happy do increase: so do the sorrows of the envious multiply.

19. As the poison of serpents hurteth others, but not themselves: so, contrariwise, the poison of the envious hurteth themselves before others; for the envious man converteth the good of another to his own hurt, and so tormenteth himself at the felicity of others. Matt. xx. 15.

20. Like as the dore, or black-clock, who, naturally lurking in dung, taketh her food thereof: so doth the envious man grow fat on other men's calamities, because hatred and envy are directly opposite to love, which rejoiceth in other men's felicity. 1 John iii. 15.
James iii. 18. 6.
Matt. xxvii. 18.
Gal. v. 26.

21. Even as smoke preaseth (presseth) and flieth up on high, as though it would cover and darken the sky : so envy and calamity do aim at those especially who are advanced and placed in high degree, so that many times they are cast down headlong from their dignity very suddenly and with much ignominy and disgrace, especially when their honour has changed and corrupted their manners.

22. Even as a moth or worm doth not breed in the cedar, being a goodly and odoriferous tree, always fresh and flourishing, the wood whereof doth not rot : so envy is not bred in the heart of a wise and virtuous man, but in the mind of a man that is wicked and ungodly, and is grieved and tormented at the happiness and welfare of other men, and repining and envying those especially that in any gift or quality are before him.

23. As a ship that is tossed with continual waves is in danger : so is an envious man, who is always in trouble of mind, pining and repining at the good success of others.

24. As we see, among beasts, some feed upon venom and some others upon carrion : so, likewise, doth the envious man fat himself in the loss, poverty, misery, death, or destruction of his brother.

25. As flies leave the sound parts of the body, and light upon the corrupted and putrified parts thereof, and take such delight in the matter and filth, that it is hard to keep them from it : so, likewise, an envious man taketh no pleasure in all the other parts of a man's life, but only in that which is diseased and corrupted.

26. As the enmity which is between eagles and dragons, or that between the crows and the owls, the cock and the lion, the boar and the elephant, between whom, it is reported, there is such discord and hatred, that even when they are dead their blood will in no wise mingle together : so, likewise, envy and virtue can in nowise agree ; for he that will be in favour with the envious man must needs be vicious.

27. As the moth in the garment, the worm in the tree, or the rust on the iron, which first consumes those things that have engendered them : so, likewise, envy consumeth itself ; for envious men (as the old saying is) are not only like unto vipers, in that they are always full of poison, but also for that neither the one nor the other can bring forth their young ones without killing themselves. And they differ in nothing but in this, that, whereas as soon as the young vipers are hatched, the old presently die ; malicious men consume by little and little, as men pine in prison or waste with long sickness.

28. As darnel springeth up among good wheat, and nettles among roses : even so envy groweth up among virtues.

Epicurism the fountain of sin.

As moist and waterish grounds bring forth nothing but frogs and toads : so the belly and watery stomach that is stuffed like a tun bringeth forth nothing but a drowsy mind, foggy thoughts, filthy speeches, and corrupt affections.

Equality in marriage.

1. As two palfreys or two oxen of unequal stature cannot be coupled under one yoke : so a noble woman matching with a man of base estate, or, contrarily, a gentleman with a beggar, cannot be comforted or coupled under the bands of wedlock.

2. As the Lord commanded that an ox and an ass should not be yoked together, because the match is unequal : even so it is an unlawful thing for the faithful to marry with infidels, or to have anything else to do with them.

A great Error for a man to think he shall be saved when he is dying, if he say, "Lord, have mercy upon me!"

1. LIKE as, if an arrant thief should thus reason with himself and say, "I will spend my days in robbing and stealing; I fear neither arraignment nor execution; for at the very time when I am to be turned off from the ladder, if I do but call upon the judge, I know I shall have my pardon," behold a most dangerous and desperate course: even so the very same is the practice of careless men in the matter of their salvation; for a man may die with "Lord, have mercy!" in his mouth, and perish eternally, except in this world he enters into the first degree of eternal life.

Matt. vii. 21.
John v. 24.

2. As every wound killeth not the man: so every error depriveth not man of salvation.

3. As the natural parts, being wounded or infected, will cause death: so those errors that destroy the fundamental heads of the truth bring everlasting destruction, unless the Lord prevent them with repentance.

The fearful Estate of many people.

1. As the smith's stithy, the more it is beaten, the harder it is made: even so, commonly, the hearts of men, the more they are beaten with the hammer of God's Word, the more dull, secure, and senseless they are.

2. Like as, when a malefactor, on the day of assize, is brought forth from the jail with bolts and fetters to come before the judge, as he is going all men pity him and speak comfortably unto him; but why so? because he is now to be arraigned at the bar of an earthly judge: even so such is the estate and case of all impenitent sinners, which is far more miserable than the case of this man; for they are fettered in bondage under sin and Satan, and this short life is the way in which they are going every hour to the bar of God's justice, who is the King of kings and Lord of lords, there to be arraigned, and to have sentence of condemnation given against them.

Evil speakers.

As slouching and cowardly dogs do bark at all men whom they know not: so the rude and barbarous people do carp at and reproach what thing soever they understand not.

Examining of a man's own self.

LIKE as no man will ever seek the physician except he knows himself to be diseased, or acknowledge the excellency and necessity of the physician, and how much he is bound unto him, except he knows his own disease to be pestilent and deadly: even so no man acknowledgeth Jesus Christ to be the only Physician of our souls (who died for our sins and rose again for our justification), except he knows first his own soul to be diseased. Neither can he perceive the excellency of Christ crucified, nor how much he is bound unto Him, except he first enter into the consideration and knowledge of his own outrageous sins and the incurable infirmity which we have received through the infection of our first parents, Adam and Eve.

Rom. iv. 25.

Example.

1. As they who do deck themselves have then the looking-glass before their eyes: so they who go about any worthy thing must have of worthy men the example in mind, and do it in that manner that others may not scorn to make them their example in such a matter.

2. Even as the lambs which the sheep conceived as they beheld Jacob's rods were of the same colour as the rods were of : so such religion and actions as princes, peers of realms, and countries, ministers, parents, and governors be of, such, for the most part, is the religion, and such are the actions of subjects and inferior persons.

2 Sam. iii. 35, 36.
Ezek. xvi. 44.

3. As examples are very dangerous in evil things, so are they of great force and virtue in good and holy things; for if princes would have godly, virtuous, loyal, and obedient subjects, they must deal with them as Jacob did with his sheep : they must lay before them the rods of true religion, justice, holiness, righteousness, and integrity of life and manners; and then, no doubt, they will conceive in their hearts thoughts that be pure, righteous, chaste, sound, and holy, and bring forth great plenty of fruits of the same colour that the rods are of—to wit, not words only, but works also of faith and obedience to God and man. Parents with their natural children, ministers of the Word with their spiritual children, and masters with their servants must do the like.

Exod. xxiii. 2.

4. As, when many birds flicker and flock together, they fall upon the net without any fear, but one or two alone will be afraid : even so the example of many, and many sinful companions, do embolden men to run into the snares of Satan without any mistrust.

Heb. xii. 1.

5. As the cloud did guide the Israelites through the wilderness to the land of Canaan : so the faithful now are to be guided to the heavenly Canaan by the examples of good men that have believed in God before us, and have walked the straight way to life everlasting.

Excess taketh away pleasures.

As too bright a light dazzleth our sight, and too great a noise hindereth our hearing : so, likewise, too great curiosity in devising our pleasures taketh away a great part of the fruition of our delights ; neither is there anything that maketh our meat more savoury than hunger and health.

Expectation of reward.

Gen xl., xli., xliii.,
xxx. 1 ; xxxvii. 4 ;
1 Sam. xviii. 8.

As two that should pass together towards their country, the one to receive honour for his good service done abroad, the other as a prisoner, to be arraigned of treasons committed in former dominions against his sovereign, could not be like merry in their inn upon the way (as it seemeth to me) ; and though he that stood in danger should sing or make show of courage and innocency and set a good face upon the matter, yet the other might well think that his heart had many a cold pull within him—as, no doubt, but all wicked men have when they think with themselves of the life to come ; or as, if Joseph and Pharaoh's baker had known both their distinct lots in prison—to wit, that on such a day the one should be called forth to be made lord of Egypt, and the other to be hanged on a gallows—they could hardly have been equally merry whilst they lived together in time of their imprisonment : even so the like may be said, and much more truly, of virtuous and wicked men in this world ; for when the one do but think upon the day of death, which is to be the day of their deliverance from their prison, their hearts cannot but leap for very joy, considering what is to ensue unto them after ; but the others are afflicted and fall into melancholy as often as mention or remembrance of death is offered, for they are sure that it bringeth with it their ban.

Eyes and ears.

LIKE as hunters in nowise will suffer their hounds to bite of every beast, but will keep them fresh for the wild beasts : so ought we not to suffer our eyes and ears to be busied about every trifle, but rather reserve them for things necessary.

Ps. cxix. 17.
Job xxx. 1.

God's Face is fearful to the wicked.

As the face of an earthly judge, who can but kill the body, is most fearful and terrible unto that party who is brought before him for his wicked fact : even so the face and sentence of the eternal and heavenly Judge of judges will be most terrible against the wicked, who, after He hath killed, can cast both body and soul into hell fire, and from whose countenance both the heavens and the earth flee away.

Matt. x. 28.
Rev. xx. 11.

Fall of a man through his own pride.

As we see a child who, whilst he runneth up and down to show his new clothes, he stumbleth even upon his clothes and catcheth a fall, and, seeing himself down and his clothes soiled and arrayed in the dust, he crieth louder at his fall than he crowed before at his new coat : so God hath put many excellent graces upon thee. Thou crowest at the sight of them, as Nebuchadnezzar did at the sight of his palace, and, like a fool, thou art in admiration of thyself, till thou stumblest even upon thine own gifts, and when thou art down, thou, who before didst crow like a fool, dost then cry like a child, especially because thou seest thy excellent graces, even thy coat of divers colours, stained and soiled with thy fall.

Ps. lxxv. 6, 7.

The Famine of the soul.

LIKE as, when God sendeth a famine, that we hardly find wherewithal to sustain our lives, then our condition is miserable : even so much more dangerous and greater is the famine of the soul when God taketh away from any people the sincere preachers of His Word.

Amos viii. 11, 12.

Faith.

1. LIKE as the sun, which, although it remain still in the firmament, and therefore, in very deed, toucheth not the eye, yet the resemblance of the body of the sun is present and reacheth to the sight, notwithstanding so great a distance between : so the body of Christ, which, by His ascending, is taken up from us, hath left the world and gone to His Father, is, indeed, absent from our senses, yet our faith is conversant in heaven, and beholdeth the Sun of righteousness, and is verily in presence with it there present, like as the sun is perceived by our sight on earth.

John xiv. 19;
xvi. 10, 28.
Acts vii. 55.
Col. iii. 1.
Heb. iv. 16,
1 Pet. i. 8.

2. As the sun with his light is present to all things : so is also Christ, with His Godhead, Spirit, and power, by faith present to all and filleth all.

Eph. i. 23.
Col. i. 17, 18.

3. Like as, when a man hath liberty to go into the treasure-house of a king, there to enrich himself, he will first of all seek to have the keys wherewith he may open the doors and so enter, for otherwise it will nothing profit him : even so we, if we desire to be enriched with God's graces, must first of all labour to have faith, which is the only key of God's treasure-house, and doth bring upon us from God all graces needful, both for soul and body.

Mab. li. 4.

4. Like as no man may live a corporal life by means of the soul of another man, but only by his own soul : even so no man may live a spiritual life by the faith of another, but only by his own faith.

5. As no man may entertain and conserve the life which he received by means of his soul, by the food and nourishment which another doth take, nor by that which he eateth and drinketh, but only by that which he himself doth take, and by the meats and drinks which he receiveth by his own person : even so is it of the nourishment of the faith of every man by the Word of God, for the entertainment and conservation of the spiritual life.

*Ezek. xviii.
Matt. viii. 5 ; ix. 2.
Mark ii. 3-5.
Luke v. 18.*

6. Like as no wicked and ungodly son is made better for and in respect of the faith and virtue of his godly father, neither yet any godly son is worse in respect of the ungodliness of his wicked father : so no man is saved by another man's faith, but by his own ; and yet it cannot be denied but that both temporal and spiritual benefits are obtained and gotten for and through the faith of other men. Even as one man by his wisdom may make another man prove wise : so he that believeth may, by his faith and prayer, obtain faith for other men ; yet, notwithstanding, like as no man is wise by another man's wisdom, but by his own : so no man is saved by another man's faith, but by his own.

7. As the leaves, flowers, and sprigs of water betony or brown-wort have their yearly course and change, yet the root from which they spring is everlasting : so, though the outward fruits of faith are changeable and decay many times, yet faith continueth ever.

8. As dictam or tragium received causeth darts sticking in the flesh to fall out : so the promises of God in Christ, apprehended by faith, cause the fiery darts of the devil to vanish and fall away.

9. As the smell of trefoil is often stronger in a moist and cloudy dark season than in fair weather : so the strength of faith uttereth itself more in adversity and affliction than in pleasure or time of prosperity.

*1 Thess. ii. 11.
2 Kings ii. 12 ;
xiii. 14.
Phil. 10.*

10. As the parents are a means to beget the bodily form of their children : even so the preachers, who are called fathers, beget the form of a Christian mind, which is faith, or the confidence of the heart, which layeth hold upon Christ and cleaveth to Him alone, and none else.

11. Faith is compared unto gold, but faith is much more noble than gold ; for as gold is the most precious metal in things mortal, so faith doth most excel in things spiritual.

12. As a house is made to keep us from cold in winter and from heat in summer, and to defend us from thieves and violences that may be offered us, which house, if it be always in building, doth not save us from any one of those harms : even so our spiritual house of faith, if it be once built, it saveth us from heat of persecution and coldness of all kinds of adversities, from the devil, and from all kinds of temptations wherewith he assaileth us ; but being always in building, it saveth us from none of these.

13. As those birds that fly highest in the firmament are not so quickly snared by the fowlers' gins as others are : so, likewise, those men that have always an eye through faith unto Jesus Christ, whose minds do mount above the skies, are not so soon snared by the flesh, the world, and the devil as others be.

14. Like as fire, if fuel or wood be not always added to it, will at length go out : even so faith, if we let it alone and never stir up the same by hearing the Word preached, by repentance, and invocation, it will clean be extinguished.

Rom. i. 17.

15. As a plaster, if it be not laid to the wound, will never heal the sore : even so faith and belief will not profit any man unless he truly apply it to himself.

16. As the mighty oak, whose root as far stretcheth downwards as its boughs upwards, may be shaken but yet not plucked up quite : even so they that have fixed their faith firmly in Christ, and have cast the anchor of their hope in His lap, though they be tossed to and fro divers ways, cannot finally fall away from God.

17. Like as an emplaster or cataplasm made of the bruised seed of mustard is known to have singular virtue and effect, being applied to them that have their members benumbed and that are fallen into lethargy or drowsy evil, or that be troubled with swimming and giddiness in the head, or that have the apoplexy, palsy, falling sickness—and, to be short, for all colds, griefs, and diseases—because it warmeth and bringeth heat, motion, and sense again into the affected parts, and is also good to help leprous, scurvy, scabby, and ulcerous persons: so, likewise, faith, being upholden, shored up, and surely anchored unto the Word of God, reviveth, erecteth, cheereth up, and restoreth the dull spirits and appalled conscience of man, making it ready and prompt to execute, achieve, and exercise the offices and functions of godliness.

18. As a labourer, in serving a mason or slater, as he goeth up the ladder, stayeth himself with one of his hands and serveth the mason or slater with the other: even so every good Christian in this world is, as it were, upon a ladder; his two hands are faith, whereby he stayeth himself in his calling, depending on the commandment and promise of God, and the other love, whereby he performeth the works of his calling to the good and benefit of others.

19. Like as a man with a palsied hand can stretch it out as well to receive a gift at the hand of a king as he that is more sound, though it be not so firmly and steadfastly: even so we must know that a weak faith will as truly apprehend God's merciful promises for the pardon of sin as a strong faith, though not so soundly.

20. Even as it little profiteth the wounded man to have the best medicine lying by him, except he had a hand to lay the plaster upon the sore: even so the mercies of God can do us small good, except we have faith to apply them unto our sinful souls.

Hab. ii. 4.
2 Cor. i. 24; iii. 7.

21. As our hand is to our mouth, and the mouth to the stomach, and the windpipe to the heart, so that, if thou hast not a hand to feed thy mouth and a mouth to feed thy stomach, thy body must needs soon perish; and again, if the windpipe should be cut asunder, presently thy heart dieth and all thy members fall down, because they want the breath of life: even so, if thy faith, which is the only means whereby thou receivest the breath of Christ's Spirit into thy soul, and whereby thou livest that new life in Christ Jesus of which the prophet Habakkuk speaketh, "The just shall live by his faith;" if this pipe and conduit be perished or broken in thee by thine own negligence, or cut off by thine adversary the devil, who seeketh nothing else night or day but thy everlasting spoil, then, certainly, both thy soul and body must needs perish too.

22. As the fig-tree that bare no fruit was threatened to be cut down; or as a sun without light is but a painted sun; or as a coal without heat is dead; or as a body without motion liveth not: even so faith without works is dead; and the Christian that bringeth not forth the fruits of the Spirit of Christ belongeth not to Christ, and so is no Christian.

Luke xiii. 6.
James ii. 17.

23. As infidelity is the head-spring of all wickedness and vice: so, on the contrary side, faith is the original well and fountain of all virtue and godliness, which faith is declared not only by words, but by such deeds and works as God hath commanded us in His holy and sacred Scriptures; and where no such works be, speak they never so godly, there is no true lively faith.

Tit. i. 13-16.

24. As beggars, who, not being worth one farthing, will yet boast of great wealth: so many brag of great faith and holiness, but have little or none, even as though they could remove mountains out of their places, and yet know not what true faith is.

Luke xvi. 8.

25. As the sun, except it shine and beat upon the face of the earth, there will no fruit spring, increase, or ripen: even so, except faith shine in the souls of men, they shall never be acceptable to God.

Gal. ii. 20.
John iii. 6, etc.

26. As the sun, shining in the firmament, availeth him not that hath no eyes to see the same, neither him that winketh with his eyes and will not see, but only him that doth behold the light thereof: so doth the death of Christ profit him nothing who lacketh true faith to lay hold upon the same, but only such as, by a lively and fruitful faith, apply the same unto themselves.

27. As some kinds of medicines are so composed that they will serve for a general help for all diseases: so catholic faith doth serve against all diseases of the soul.

28. As a traveller, who, journeying into a country where he might live delightfully and profitably, doth leave the right and straight way, and follows by-paths which will lead him into dangerous places, to the loss of his life, is unwise: so every one that thinketh to please God without faith taketh a wrong course, and deceiveth himself, to the destruction and loss of his soul.

Ps. i. 16.

29. As a shield or buckler is the chief defence of a soldier, whereby he beateth back his enemies' weapons: so, likewise, faith, in time of spiritual conflict, repelleth the devil's weapons or instruments.

Exod. xxv. 40.

30. As the superstitious pagans thought that an idol, which they termed Vibilia, kept them from erring out of their way: so faith, which is our Vibilia, will not suffer us to wander out of the way, so long as we do all things according to that pattern which was shown us in the mount.

31. As the argument is always good for the substance of any subject unto the natural property of the same; and, contrariwise, the property being set, the subject of necessity must be seen: so faith, which justifieth man, being set, good works, which are the properties of the spirit of faith, are necessarily set.

1 Tim. i. 18, 19.
Matt. xxv. 24.

32. Even as good works being set, faith, from which they do spring, must needs be set: so whosoever faith is not, good works are not, and where good works be not, there is not faith, the cause of good works.

33. Even as without eyes no man seeth, without ears no man heareth, without smelling no man smelleth, without tasting no man discerneth tastes, without touching no man toucheth anything: so, without faith, can no man see, hear, smell, taste, eat, and finally touch Christ.

Gen. xvii. 10.
Exod. xii. 13.
Matt. xxv. 26, 27.
1 Cor. xi. 23.
Gal. iii. 14.

34. As, by the preaching of the Gospel, the Holy Ghost doth kindle faith in us: so He increaseth, feedeth, cherisheth, and confirmeth the same by the use of the Sacraments.

35. As the body hath its hand, mouth, and stomach, whereby it taketh, receiveth, and digesteth meat for the nourishment of every part: so, likewise, in the soul, there is a faith which is both hand, mouth, and stomach, to apprehend, receive, and apply Christ and all His merits for the nourishment of the soul.

Isa. xlii. 3.
Matt. vi. 6.

36. As in the little and tender bud is enfolded the leaf, the blossom, and the fruit: so where men are displeased with themselves for their offences, and do withal constantly from the heart desire to believe and to be reconciled to God, there is faith and many other graces of God enfolded.

37. Even as in a child, when he grows to be a man, remains the same substance that was in the child before, but now is made stronger by age, and casts away all childish toys: so in the same faith which we profess in our baptism must we grow and learn the full understanding of it, that it may be felt sweeter unto us daily more and more while we live, even to our last end, and by which faith we also grow in the fear of God, and by which we be saved.

A dead Faith.

James ii. 14, &c.
Gal. v. 6.
James i. 22.

1. LIKE as he that falleth into a river, if he neither move hands, arms, nor legs, is quickly drowned, and sinketh down dead to the bottom, but if he swim escapeth alive: so he that trusteth to a dead faith, which, because it hath no good effects, and bringeth forth no lively fruits—as a holy love to God and man, piety, patience, pity, mercy, compassion, and such like virtues—he must needs be drowned in utter destruction, and sink down into the bottomless gulf and pit of hell; but he that moveth his hands and his feet to do the deeds of a true and right faith, who worketh by love, and shall be a doer of the Word, and not a hearer only, he shall escape safe out of all dangers, and shall arrive at the happy haven of eternal blessedness and everlasting life through Christ Jesus.

2. Like as, if a man say to one that is hungry, “Fill thy belly,” and yet giveth him nothing, this shall not be true charity: so, likewise, if a man say he believeth, and bringeth forth no works of faith, this shall not be true faith, but a certain dead thing set out with the name of faith, whereof no man hath to brag unless he will openly incur reprehension, seeing that the cause is understood by the effects.

Faith and hope do differ.

1. As faith apprehendeth a present benefit: so, likewise, hope looketh for one to come.
2. As faith alone apprehendeth the promise made by Christ: so this neither hope nor other things can do.
3. As faith is a knowledge in the mind and trust in the will: so hope is a knowledge in the will and in the heart.

Faith and obedience requisite in them that be baptized.

LIKE as there be in the doctrine of Christ two parts, one concerning faith, the other obedience: even so they are both also required of them that be baptized; for baptism is added to the doctrine of Christ; so that a man may say aright in this case, as the apostle saith unto the Galatians concerning circumcision, “I do testify to every man that is baptized, that he is a debtor, to accomplish and keep the whole doctrine of Christ.”

Faith, as God giveth us it, so He increaseth the same in us.

As it is the part of a natural father to nourish and set forth the child which he hath begotten: even so, no doubt, God is so faithful, that, as He giveth faith unto His dear children, so He doth further, feed, and conserve the same also in them.

Faith hath need of continual increase, and yet is never perfect in this life.

1. LIKE as, in every man's body, it is necessary there be increase of the body according to the measure and quantity of every one, until it cometh to the perfect measure: even so it fareth with the case of faith for the bringing of it to a just measure, saving that the increase thereof cannot be made up in any certain number of years, as the body may, but needeth to have continual increase as long as we have our being here upon earth, by continual preaching, catechising, by the right use of the Sacraments, by true and earnest prayer, and by discipline.
2. Even as a candle or lamp, unless it be nourished with a supply of new tallow or oil, is soon extinguished: so also the word of our faith utterly decayeth unless it be preferred (advanced) by new doctrines and meditations of Scripture.

Faith ; how it is alone, and not alone without works.

1. As the Queen's majesty, though in her state and office she be alone, yet she goeth not without her maids of honour after her ; or as the office of the eye alone is in the head to see, yet the eye is not without other members of the body, which have also their offices to them assigned and appropriated : even so it is with faith ; for most true it is that by faith alone, in respect of works of the law, we are justified ; and yet the same faith being alone, she is not alone—in her office alone, but in practice not alone ; so that as every thing must stand in its proper charge and office, so also must every thing need in some respect the society and help of other things.

2. Like as the root sucketh of the ground, the body receiveth of the root, the branches take of the body, the fruit shooteth out of the branches, these successively go together : even so is faith grounded upon Christ's passion. Faith giveth the sap of love, love blossometh forth in good works ; and, therefore, in faith we must be constant, in love fervent, in works diligent, and in doctrine we must keep order ; we may not let the effect presume before the cause, nor the daughter before the mother.

3. As works without faith make but a pharisaical hypocrite : even so faith without works maketh but a carnal gosseller.

4. Like as the flame of fire burneth the wood without the help of the light, and yet the flame cannot be without the light : even so is it assuredly true that faith alone consumeth and burneth away sin without the help of works, and yet that the same faith cannot be without good works ; and, therefore, if we see a flame that giveth no light, we know by-and-by that it is but vain and painted : even so, when we see not some light of good works in a man, it is a token that he hath not the true inspired faith which God giveth to His chosen, to justify and glorify them withal ; so that most certain it is that the love of God and a man's neighbour do of necessity go jointly together with faith.

5. Like as with the rising of the sun there goeth jointly, of necessity, the spreading forth of his beams and his light : even so, of necessity, love and good works follow faith in those that are justified, insomuch as he that loveth not and liveth well abideth in death.

6. Like as that body wherein there remaineth no feeling or moving liveth not, and yet it followeth not thereupon that feeling and moving are the cause of life, but life is the cause of moving : even so the efficient cause of our justification is God, for the obedience, passion, and death of Christ only, and faith is the instrument whereby we take hold of Christ our Righteousness. So, then, the love of God and a man's neighbour must of necessity follow faith in him that is justified, like as moving and feeling do of necessity follow life ; but love and good works cannot proceed but of faith, like as there can grow no good fruits but of a good tree.

James ii. 18.

7. As we commonly say that white hairs make an old man, and yet our meaning only is that they declare him to be an old man : even so, when we say that works do justify, it is yet meant that works do but declare who is justified.

8. Like as in the fire the light and heat are joined together for man's use, yet the heat only warmeth : so, likewise, faith and works go together in man's life and conversation, but it is faith alone, without works, that saveth.

9. As the hand hath a property to reach out itself to lay hold of anything and to receive a gift, but the hand hath no property to cut a piece of wood of itself without a saw or knife or some such like instrument, and yet by the help of them it can either divide or cut : even so is the nature of faith to go out of itself and to receive Christ into the heart ; as for the duties of the first and second table, faith cannot of itself bring them forth, no more than the hand can divide or cut, yet, join love to faith, and then can it practise duties commanded concerning God and man.

10. As, in regard of substance, although the eye be never alone, yet, in regard of seeing, it is alone: even so, though faith subsist not without hope and love and other graces of God, yet, in the act of justification, it is alone without them all.

11. Like as, when any one of the Israelites was stung to death by fiery serpents, his cure was not by any physic or surgery, but only by casting of his eye up to the brazen serpent which Moses had received by God's commandment: even so, in the cure of our souls, when we are stung to death by sin, there is nothing required within us for our recovery but only that we cast up and fix the eye of our faith on Christ and His righteousness. John 14, 14.

Faith is faith, though it be weak, or small, or lie hidden.

1. LIKE as a little child, with his little hands, or as a poor man with his rugged and scabby hands, will not refuse to take bread and other alms that men will bestow upon them, as well as if their hands were greater and whole; and like as diseases that are universal throughout the whole body (as a burning ague), though they weaken all the parts of the same, and specially the stomach more than all the rest, yet, nevertheless, hinder not but that it may take a medicine—yea, rather, the disease is an occasion unto it, to provoke it unto it: even so, also, it ought to be that the weakness of our faith should not keep us from embracing righteousness and the other benefits of Jesus Christ, but should prepare us to the contrary. Luke v. 31, 32.

2. Like as our diseases and infirmities let (hinder) not, but that our faith, be it never so weak, is yet capable of the grace of God and of all the righteousness of His Son: even so the littleness of faith maketh it not less capable to be able to apprehend and embrace the righteousness of Christ, &c.

3. Like as the apple of the eye, which is so little, and yet, for all that, can apprehend the light of the sun, which is spread over all the horizon—yea, and the sun itself, which is far greater and more ample than all the earth: even so the eye of faith, albeit that it be very small, yet it ceaseth not to lay hold of the Sun of Righteousness, together with His light and other gifts, which are as great and as many in number.

4. Like as a woman with child, though she feel not the child always stir, yet, because she hath sometimes felt it, she comforteth herself that she is with child; and as she is with child a good while before she can sensibly feel it move, and at the first feeleth it but weakly—yea, after she hath felt it strongly, sometimes she feeleth it not again a good while; and when she doth, in much weakness sometimes in comparison of the former; and yet for all this hath, in the end, a happy travail: even so faith is not felt to move strongly as soon as it is bred, and when it beginneth once it continueth not always alike motions; so that it is with faith and all other graces of the Spirit as it is with the sun, which sometimes setteth, sometimes riseth, sometimes shineth, sometimes is covered with clouds, or shadowed from us by thick and foggy mists arising out of the earth: even so faith and other virtues sometimes seem to be set and gone down in us, but when the morning comes they arise again; sometimes they are covered from our eyes by such mists and clouds that arise out of the flesh that we cannot espy them; but yet, for all this, as he reasoneth ill-favouredly and untruly that saith, "The sun cannot be seen now for clouds, therefore it is not in the firmament," so he that saith, "I cannot see and perceive faith and the Spirit in me now, for the fruits of the flesh, therefore they be not in me."

5. Like as it doth not follow that a little child hath no reasonable soul because he hath not the use of it; or that the trees be dead in winter because they bear no fruit; or that there is no fire because there is no flame: even so whosoever hath a certain testimony of his faith and salvation in his life may be assured that it is there still, and shall be unto the end, although for a time he feel it not, nor perceive the working of it, &c.

John xlii. v.
Phil. i. 6.
Rom. xi. 19.

6. Like as, when fire is raked under the ashes, it sheweth not its brightness or heat outwardly until it be unraked and kindled in a flame : even so it oftentimes falleth out with our faith, which is hidden and covered with many vices, which the most holy saints of God do many times themselves commit (even as to fall into diseases), the which continueth till it please God to stir us up anew by His Spirit, and to kindle us again, even like as when a candle is put out.

7. Like as Rebekah, when she felt the twins strive in her womb, though it pained her, yet she knew both that she had conceived and that the children were quick in her : even so they who have these motions and holy affections in them—to wit, that their sins are pardonable, desiring mercy and pardon of God in Christ, by hearty prayer for them—may assure themselves that the Spirit of God dwelleth in them, and, consequently, that they have faith, though a weak faith.

8. As a poor diseased beggar with a lame hand, having the palsy also, is able, nevertheless, to reach out the same and receive an alms of a king : even so a weak and languishing faith is sufficiently able to reach out itself, and to apprehend the infinite mercies of our heavenly King, offered unto us in Christ.

Matt. xvii. 20.

9. As an infant taketh and holdeth with his little hand a whole apple, though he doth it not so strongly or surely as a man : even so faith, how little soever it be, taketh hold on Christ, and receiveth Him not by halves, but whole.

John iii. 16.

10. As by the apple of our eye, though marvellously little, we see very great mountains, and the very body of the sun, much greater than the whole earth : so, likewise, our faith, though very little, taketh and receiveth all Jesus Christ the Sun of righteousness.

Mark ix. 24.

11. As a little child doth as truly hold a precious ring with his finger as a giant with all the force of his hand and fist, being one and the self-same ring : so our faith, whether it be weak or strong, apprehendeth and taketh hold upon the merits of Christ Jesus the Son of God.

Faith must not waver in prayer.

James i. 6, 7.

As the wave of the sea is driven sometimes upon this coast, sometimes upon that, according to the wind and the raging of the sea : so, likewise, a man doubting ; now he thinketh this thing, but shortly after, his mind being changed, he thinketh another thing, even as he is driven on with erroneous doctrine and blind affections. Such a man praiseth in vain, because he is destitute of true faith.

Faith perfect in substance, but in quantity groweth greater by daily increase.

Mark ix. 24.

1. As a child when it is new born is a perfect man, and a man full grown is a perfect man : so also standeth the case with faith. That faith is perfect which receiveth and taketh hold upon Christ ; but it hath need of daily increasements, to the end it may become full in all parts.

2. Like as a child, though he be a perfect man, yet hath need of daily food and nourishment, to the intent he may come to his full growth and making : even so he that believeth hath need to mind God's Word continually, and to hear the same preached often, with other like helps, to the end that he may from day to day take new increase.

3. Like as the power of reason, which we received at the first birth of our flesh, must always be nourished, helped, and exercised to the necessary uses of our life : so, likewise, faith, which is, as it were, a certain reason of our second birth and new man, must be fed and furthered like an infant, to the spiritual life.

Faith the only means of forgiveness of sins.

1. As no man can be said to enjoy and possess riches who is himself uncertain whether he hath riches or no ; or as he cannot be said to enjoy regal honours and princely dignities who doubteth whether he shall ever obtain them : so, in like manner, neither must we think that there is any felicity in remission of sins if this certain and undoubted trust of forgiveness of sins be wanting.

2. Like as we apprehend colours by the sight, and sounds by the ear : even so we apprehend by faith God's promises, in which He offereth life unto us and all other graces.

Ps. li. 12; ciii. 12.
Matt. ix. 2.
Mark ii. 5.
Rom. v. 1; iv. 7;
viii. 38.
Isa. i. 18; xlii. 22.
Mic. vii. 19.
1 John ii. 12.
Job xiii. 14.

Rom. v. 1.
Hab. ii. 4.
John iii. 15.

Faith the only truth which receiveth the body of Christ crucified.

1. As the sustenance of bread and drink being holden only in the hand or gazed upon with the eye nourisheth not, except the same be inwardly received and conveyed into the stomach, and yet neither, again, the receiving of everything sustaineth man's body, except it be meat and drink, which have their condition properly to nourish : so, in the like sort, it is with faith ; for as the believing of every truth and faith of every object saveth not, but that faith only which is in Christ's blood ; so neither, again, doth the same blood of Christ profit us, except by faith it be inwardly received.

Matt. xi. 28.
John iii. 15, 16,
18; xiv. 1, 11, 12;
xv. 4, 5, 7.
Acts x. 44.

2. As the sun, the fountain of all light, shineth not but only to such who have eyes to see, nor yet to them unless they open their eyes to receive light : even so the body of Christ crucified, being the only material sustenance of our souls, it followeth that the same sustenance must be received by faith into our inward hearts, or else it is not effectual.

3. Like as justifying faith goeth ever with its object Christ : even so to the same faith also must be required that it stand not merely in outward profession—in words, in tongue, and talk, as swimming only in the lips—nor in inward forms, in shows and gestures only, which is but a dead and an idle faith, making a hypocrite before men rather than a justified man before God, but must enter further into the inward heart, and, as the sustenance of the soul, must inwardly be received and digested.

Faith is tied to no time, to no age, or quality of life.

LIKE as it is in the summer season, some trees are fruitful naturally in the beginning of summer, some a little after, some in the midst, some after the midst—yea, and some do bear their fruit at the latter end ; and the tree is counted to be never a whit the less fruitful which beareth at the last than that which beareth in the beginning of the summer ; but the same is unfruitful which doth bear no fruit at all, neither in the beginning, neither in the midst, nor yet at the end of the summer ; for when the summer is once past, there is no hope that the tree which hath been barren all that time can bear fruit at winter, because that God hath so appointed that they should bear not in winter, but in the summer season : even so, likewise, he that cometh unto faith at the last cast of his life must be deemed no less a believer than he who began to believe in his youth ; but he that never believeth at all in his life, there is no hope of him that he can come unto faith in the winter time which shall follow the summer of this our life.

Luke xlii. 7.
Luke xxiii. 42, 43.
Acts ix. 1, &c.;
viii. 22-24.

Faith without a particular appliance hath no comfort or commodity in it.

LIKE as, if a man should believe himself to be rich, because many men possess great riches, himself to be filled and satisfied, because other men have whereupon to eat, or

Hab. ii. 4.
Eph. i. 12.

himself to see, because other men have eyes, herein he should much deceive himself: even so it is impudency, or rather infidelity, for a man to believe that other men have their sins pardoned them and not he himself.

Faith without works is vain.

James ii. 15, 16.

1. EVEN as that speech is vain wherein it is said to the needy, "Warm yourselves and fill your bellies," whereas helping hands are not also put to: so that faith is vain and dead which is in the mouth without the fruit of works.

James ii. 17.

2. As a carcase wherein is no lively spirit deserveth not to be called a living creature: even so faith that is dead and without works deserveth not to be called faith.

James ii. 18, 26.

3. Even as the spirit which is inwardly in a living creature, quick and lusty, doth bewray itself by moving and feeling, and by the outward actions: so, likewise, a lively faith doth show itself by good works, otherwise it is like a tree without its root, by which it is nourished, held up, and adorned.

4. As alms and liberality to the poor which consist but in fair speeches is cold and doth not help: so, in like manner, the faith which is but in words and outward profession of speech, although it be with ever so great brags, is dead; so that we must understand that a thing which is weak and dead in itself can by no means have power to give life and to save.

5. Like as, if that liberality which is only in words be cold and dead, and doth not profit the poor, nor make him a liberal man who useth it: even so that faith which is only in speech is dead, and therefore cannot save or profit him who hath it; for if words only could profit or cause it to be faith, then should words also profit the poor man or woman who is destitute; but words only cannot make a faithful man, nor words only make a liberal man.

6. As a man is known to be dead when he doth not breathe, cannot stir, see, hear, and such like; and, contrariwise, when he doth any of these, he is known to be alive: even so is it with faith. If it can or do bring forth no good works, then is it dead; on the contrary part, the actions and trusting thereof do show it to be alive.

7. Even as we see some painter so-skilful that he can cast such colours in painting fire that, at the first blush, it might make a man judge it to be fire indeed, but if a man hold his hand to it, to feel for some heat, and to make trial by the effects, a child will be able to judge easily that it is but a dead image, because the effects are wanting: even so there be very many men as cunning as any painter to make a show of faith, through great brags and vaunts that God is their God, and that they put all their whole trust in Him, that they look to be saved as well as the best—yea, though but a few, yet they hope to be of the number of those.

John viii. 40, 44.

8. As an unfaithful servant, who doth his business deceitfully and hypocritically to his lord and master, whose wages he taketh, and in the meantime favoureth his enemy, and laboureth by all the means he may to please him and with his diligence to serve him: even so, in like manner, he who boasteth of faith in Christ, and in the meantime liveth loosely and wickedly, professing those things with his mouth from which both his heart itself and all the studies and action of his whole life do disagree.

Faith's object.

LIKE as the act of healing through the eyes of the Israelites and the brazen serpent went together: so, in the act of justifying, these two, faith and Christ, have a mutual relation, and must always concur—faith as the action which apprehendeth, Christ as the object which is apprehended; so that neither the passion of Christ saveth without faith, nor doth faith help unless it be in Christ, its object.

Faithful.

1. As a whole (healthy) man, when he is thirsty, tarrieth but for drink, and when he hungereth abideth but for meat, and then drinketh and eateth naturally: even so is the faithful ever athirst and an hungred after the will of God, and tarrieth but for an occasion, and whensoever an occasion is given he worketh naturally the will of God.
2. As unbelievers declare their unbelief by the evil spirit working in them outwardly the fruits of that spirit: even so believers declare their faith by the working in them outwardly the fruits of the Spirit of God.
3. Like as, when we hear a musician play sweetly, or see a painter picture curiously, we do not inquire what countrymen they are, or whether they be born of noble parentage or no, but diligently hearken to the music, and mark and view well the picture: so a faithful and careful hearer of the Word must not so much regard the state and condition of the preacher as diligently to mark the good things that he teacheth, and so to practise them in his life and behaviour.

Fasting when needful.

1. As men accused in times past, with long hanging beards, uncombed hair, and black array, were wont humbly to abase themselves, to the end to procure the mercy of the judge: so, likewise, when we are accused for our sins before the judgment of God, when either pestilence, or famine, or war begin to rage abroad, or if any calamity otherwise seem to hang over our country, then it becometh us both for His glory and for common edification, and also is profitable and healthful to us that we should, in piteous array, humble ourselves in fasting and prayer before His majesty, and so crave to escape His severity. Joel ii. 25.
2. As bridles are necessary for wild horses: so, likewise, is fasting sometimes for a Christian, to tame the flesh.
3. As some men naturally are continually out of measure, and inclined to one extremity or other, which are both naught, and many there have been who have always continued but too licentious: so also some there have been so superstitious in fasting and abstinence, that they have made conscience of the use of such things as God hath left free and at their liberty.

Such a Father such a son.

As a viper's brood destroyeth them that breed them: so generally the children of them that murdered the prophets, and showed cruelty to the saints of God, fulfil the measure of their fathers, and are unmercifully bent against all those that seek their life and salvation. Matt. iii. 7
xxiii. 33.

In God's Favour.

LIKE, when a man is in favour with his prince, he is then bold to come unto him, and may have free access unto his presence, and may sue to him for any benefit or preferment whereof he standeth in need, and may obtain it before any other: even so they who are in God's favour, by reason that they are freely pardoned and justified in Christ, do boldly approach into God's presence, and they are ready to ask, and are sure to obtain, any benefit that is for their good.

Favourers and furtherers of wicked actions and sin.

Ezek. xlix. 4, 5.

EVEN as, when some huge and great fish is drawn out of a river in a net, many small ones which are about him are taken and drawn out with him: right so it is the Lord's manner not only to entangle and to trap within the infrangible net of His indignation and heavy judgments the first authors and chief brewers and broachers of idolatry, treason, treachery, or any kind of evil whatsoever, but all those also will He censure, with the same weight and measure of punishment, who have any pleasure in those forbidden evils, and are so far from being offended and grieved at the same, that they wish in their hearts good success and continuance unto them.

Fear.

Hag. i. 12, 13.

1. LIKE as the bristle which is on the shoemaker's thread goeth through the hole first, and so draws a long and strong thread after it: even so the fear of God's vengeance first goeth before and throweth down a man in his own sight, and then follows the long thread of God's mercies in Christ, offered in His Word.

2. As the thief that will not steal, not for love of any righteousness or reverence to God, but to escape the gallows: even so some men do well and eschew evil, not for any fear or love of God or goodness itself, but to escape punishment.

3. Like as, when the air is covered with clouds and the sun darkened, tempests begin to arise, lightnings and fire fly from heaven, rumbling and noise are in the air, the clouds burst, and the thunder-crack comes, then rain falls, and straight follow sunshine and fair weather: even so a man, truly fearing God, being touched in conscience with sorrow for his sins, as one oppressed with the burden and vileness thereof, complains to God, accuses himself, groans, sobs, and sighs like the thunder-crack, dares not look up towards heaven for his wickedness, but condemns himself, at the last bursts out in weeping, and tears, like drops of rain, come trickling down his cheeks; straightway follows quietness of conscience, with wondering and praising the unspeakable goodness of God for His mercies and comforts in Christ, His Son, offered to such a troubled conscience.

Fear of God.

Gen. xxxvii. 9.

1. As Joseph did dream that the sun and moon did bow unto him: so must the whole world fear and stand in awe of God's majesty.

Gen. xxxi. 42.
Prov. i. 7; xiv. 27.
Exod. xx. 20.
Gen. xlii. 18.

2. As Jacob told his uncle Laban, that, except the fear of Isaac had been with him, meaning the fear of God, who was Isaac's fear, he would have sent him away empty: even so it is with us all. Except God's fear remain and continue with us, though the Lord hath deserved ever so much at our hands, yet we, like unthankful Labans, would send Him empty away, and rob Him of the praise of all His blessings and graces bestowed upon us.

Superfluity in Feasts and banquets.

1 Cor. x. 31.

1. LIKE as, if a horse, by eating too many oats, should grow heavy, dull, and slack to go or draw, the owner would beware of giving him too much, lest he should both lose his provender and weaken his horse: even so in meat and drink, and long sittings at feasts, if the plenty make us heavy and slow in our vocations—namely, in the service of God—we have just cause to cut it off, and so to take away the abuse, which is especially hurtful, and to be condemned.

2. As men are wont to put water into their wine for fear of drunkenness, and to put salt in their meat to season it: even so must our speeches and talk savour of sobriety and Christian reformation at feasts and other meetings.

Job i. 4, 5.
Matt. xii. 36.

A fellow-like Feeling.

LIKE as there is no one part in our carnal body that is hurt, but all the rest of the members feel smart by the same: even so ought we to have compassion one upon another when any is in trouble and suffereth any sorrow, and our neighbour's business ought no less to be ours than our own.

Rom. xii. 10, 15, 16.

Feeling and finding not always in ourselves good desires to holy exercises, yet we must not be discouraged therefrom.

As a man that taketh bread and meat, and eateth it without any great appetite, hath not such a pleasure in eating as if he were well an hungred, notwithstanding that which he receiveth ceaseth not to profit and sustain him, as we see in sickness: even so do prayers and other Christian exercises to which cold-feeling persons do give themselves; and, therefore, it only remaineth for them to search the means how to encourage themselves, and to do even as a man would do to fire when it is almost out, and which he would have kindled again—he bloweth it, and layeth matter about it wherewith to kindle the same; or as a man that putteth oil to a lamp when the light is going out.

Feeling of faith, and other good graces which we are enauea with, is not always alike and the same in us.

1. LIKE as we are not always alike disposed at one time as at another: so we have not always alike desire to see or to hear the Word of God, or to read it, or to confer with our brethren who are more advanced in the knowledge and zeal of the true and right manner of worshipping of God than we are. And, likewise, the Spirit of God doth not touch and stir us up always alike. And this is the cause that in our faith, as in all other qualities, there is sometimes more, sometimes less, and that oftentimes it is more strong and lively, and then sometimes again more remiss and faint.

2. Like as we see the water is more hot or cold according as it is near or far off from the fire: even so is it with us. According as we are more or less exercised in the Word and driven by God's Spirit, we have more or less zeal and affection.

3. Like as the disposition of the body followeth the quality and temperature of the air, elements, and exercises to which we give ourselves: even so, according to the places where we live, and the nourishment that we there take, is the estate of our souls and consciences. But be it that water is sometimes hot and sometimes cold, and that it changes its qualities sometimes one way, sometimes another, yet it is always water: even so the man that is elect after his regeneration is always faithful, howsoever, in that he is the child of Adam, he be sometimes inclined to evil, and that his faith be not always in one and the self-same estate, and that he is not always accompanied with the like zeal and affection; for oftentimes it cometh to pass that we feel Jesus Christ to stir and move Himself in us, and by-and-by afterward we have no manner of feeling at all, but, therefore, He ceaseth not to dwell in us, no more than our souls to dwell in our bodies when we sleep, although in sleeping we neither feel them nor any of their operations.

Feeling of sinfulness greater in some than of the merits and righteousness of Jesus Christ.

Rom. vi. 1, &c.

1. LIKE as we feel the calamities and miseries of war more than the fruits and pleasures of peace, and griefs and diseases more than the quietness of health, and the hardness of poverty more than the profits and commodities of abundance and riches : even so we ought not much to marvel if we feel the stings and pricks of sin a great deal more than the consolations of the righteousness of Jesus Christ, seeing that sin dwelleth in us, and not righteousness, which thing is the cause that the one is more sensible than the other. Notwithstanding, for all this, we must not think that sin is greater and stronger than righteousness, or that it can in any respect be compared unto it, or can be more able to condemn and destroy us than the righteousness of Jesus Christ and the grace of God is to justify and save us.

2. Like as we have sometimes in the end of our finger some pain or grief, which we feel a great deal more than the health that is all over the rest of the body, yea, though it be much greater than the pain of our finger : even so we must not esteem the greatness or the strength, whether it be of righteousness or sin, according to that feeling we have, because the one—that is, sin—is more sensible than the other ; and specially, forasmuch as we embrace righteousness only by faith, which is of those things that are not outward and sensible.

Fickleness of the state of great persons.

As the pine is a great tree, yet the fruit falleth quickly away : so the goodness of many great persons quickly decayeth.

A Flatterer.

1. EVEN as the beast the hyena doth imitate a man's voice, and so learneth one's name, whom he calleth forth and destroyeth : so a flatterer will so soothe you with yea and nay, that at length he will bring you to the pit of destruction.

2. As a chameleon can turn himself into all colours save white : so will a flatterer change himself into all shapes and hues save honesty.

3. As there is nothing more dangerous than poisoned honey : so nothing ought more to be beware'd (avoided) than a flattering friend.

4. As lice do forsake the dead bodies where the blood is decayed, and whereupon they used before to feed : so flatterers are present so long as prosperity reigneth, but in adversity they are fled and gone.

5. As they who do bring up any wild beast will first behold wherewith his nature is pleased or offended, until at the length, by continuance, the same is made tractable and tame : so a flatterer doth accommodate himself to the will, mind, and affections of his friend, until at the length he may gather the knowledge of his inclination.

6. As the shadow, when the sun shineth, doth follow thee wheresoever thou goest : so a flatterer, in thy prosperous state, is ever with thee present.

7. As orators sometimes do speak in the persons of others : so a flatterer will report that he heard things good of thee, although it were not so.

8. As a scorpion is a venomous creature, which hath a pleasant face, but woundeth deadly with her tail ; she stingeth not with her face, but with her hinder part : even so such a one is every smooth-tongued and flattering body who speaketh fair to his neighbour's face and killeth him in his heart.

Prov. xxvi. 22, 28
xviii. 8.
Rom. xvi. 18.

9. As a bee doth carry a flower in her mouth, but behind doth prick very sharply with her sting : so, likewise, very many in these days do use most sweet and pleasant speeches, and will even stroke, as it were, thy humour and disposition with soft and sugared communications, to the end that (by reason of some malice couched in their hearts) they may work thy woe and utter overthrow.

Ps. cxviii. 12 ;
Ixxviii. 36, 37.
Prov. xxviii. 23.
Eccles. vii. 7.

10. Like as the end of an orator is, with eloquence, to persuade, and the end of the physician, with medicine, to cure and to heal : even so the end of the flatterer is, with his humble communication and sweet alluring talk, to deceive ; so that flattery is a sweet music to a man's ears, but, indeed, there is none more pernicious and pestilent than that is.

11. As a looking-glass doth imitate whatsoever is set before it, and doth represent the likenesses of them that look in it, but by a contrary way, for it showeth the left side to be the right ; and if thou look into the east, it doth represent thee looking towards the west : even so a flatterer, in voice and in gesture, will imitate thee. If thou laugh and be merry, he will also be pleasant and merry ; if thou weep, he will weep for company ; if thou wilt backbite and slander a man, he will take thy part, and will, with railings, obloquies, and slanders, even grievously wound the same man ; and if thou wilt praise thyself, he will help thee ; or, if thou lovest to hear thyself praised of others, he will carry thee, as it were, upon the wings of praises and commendations, up into the clouds and lofty skies. Through his subtle sleights and crafty devices he turneth and bendeth himself every way ; when he will work upon men that be sad and heavy, he is presently translated into their humour ; with men that are remiss, and without courage, he dealeth merrily ; he handleth old men gravely, and young men courteously ; with wicked men he is bold and impudent, and with libidinous and lecherous people he is filthy and shameless. The flatterer hath always at his fingers' ends, and ready under his girdle, the gestures, voices, inclinations, and dispositions of all persons, high and low ; he leaves out none, that he may deceive all ; he will praise thee in thy presence and scorn thee in thy absence, for the flatterer is double-tongued ; he now extolleth thee, and doth set thee aloft with great praises, and by-and-by he will cast thee down with injuries and wrongs.

12. As sticks and wood do nourish and maintain the fire, but the fire doth waste and consume them : so a man that is flattered by smooth dissemblers and hypocrites doth maintain his flatterers, for the most part, but in the end they will devour and utterly undo him.

Flattery.

1. As glass, a thing of no great regard, is much like unto the crystal, a thing precious and dear : so flattery, a thing as well vile as wicked, doth imitate friendship, a thing worthy of due laud and commendation.

2. As oil is death and destruction unto flies, ants, and such others : so is flattery and adulation unto princes and provinces utter ruin and clean decay.

3. Even as oil doth cause the fire to flame : so flattery doth minister nourishment to errors ; so that it is not good to believe a flatterer, for, under the person of a most sweet friend, he is a most bitter enemy.

Prov. xxix. 5.

4. As vermin will not breed where they find no warmth, no vultures sleep where they find no prey, no flies swarm where they see no flesh, no pilgrim creep where there is no cross : so there is no parasite or flatterer will lurk where he finds no gain.

Flesh and spirit.

Gal. v. 17.

1. As the air in the dawning of the day is not wholly light or wholly dark, as at midnight and at noonday ; neither is it in one part light and another part dark, but the whole air in the same horizon is partly light and partly dark throughout ; or as in a vessel of lukewarm water, the water itself is not only hot or only cold, or in one part hot and in another part cold, but heat and cold are mixed together in every part of the water : even so is the flesh and the spirit mingled together in the soul of man ; and this is the cause why these two contrary qualities fight together.

2. As a man doth feel a pain which is but in the top of his finger more sensibly than the health of his whole body, yet the health of the body is more than the pain of a finger : even so a godly Christian doth more feel the flesh than the spirit, yet the power and efficacy of the spirit, by the virtue of the Holy Ghost, is such that it is able to prevail ordinarily against the flesh, and therefore the flesh is not more than the spirit. And as men feel corruption, not by corruption, but by grace : so, the more they feel their inward corruptions, the more grace they have.

3. Like as, if the wood be taken from the fire, and the embers quenched, yet, nevertheless, the stones oftentimes remain hot and burning : so the flesh, though it be chastised with hot and dry maladies, or consumed by many years in travail, yet concupiscence abideth still in the bones.

Folly of some men great.

1. LIKE as he serveth not to be reputed wise who, applying all his study to the trimming of his garments, suffereth his body to perish with hunger and diseases : even so neither ought such men to be accounted wise that, pursuing and following the delights and vanities of the body, abandon and neglect the care of their souls—the body being none other but the apparel to the soul, as the garments to the body.

Ecc'les. X. 5.

2. As flies are busy in the apothecaries' shops, and if they happen to get into his glasses of sweet syrups and ointments, and there die, they stink, and so spoil his syrup or ointment : even so doth a little folly him that was had in great estimation for his wisdom.

Babbling of Foolish men and women.

As there is no beast that more loveth his whelps or younglings than the ass or ape : so some foolish women and fond men do more regard their own tale and blind babbling than all other men's talk.

Forgiveness of sins.

1. As the serpent or the toad, when they die, are not in so miserable a state as sinful men, because there is the end of their woe and misery : so, contrariwise, when men die out of the favour of God, and without the benefit of forgiveness of sins, there is then the beginning of their woe and misery.

2. Like as when Benhadad, king of Syria, was discomfited and overcome by the king of Israel, by the counsel of his servants, who told him that the kings of Israel were merciful

1 Kings xx. 32.
Ps. xxxii. 7.
Isa. xxxviii. 17.

men, he sent them, clothed in sackcloth, with ropes about their necks, to entreat for peace and favour;—now, when the king saw their submission, he made covenant of peace with him: so, likewise, we, by our sins, most justly deserve hell, death, and condemnation every day, and therefore it standeth us in hand to come into the presence of God, and to humble ourselves before Him in sackcloth and ashes, craving and entreating for nothing in the world so much as for pardon of our sins, and that day by day without ceasing, till the Lord give His blessed answer to our consciences, that all our sins are put out of His remembrance.

Isa. xlii. 22.
Mic. vii. 19.

3. Like as a man that, for some misdemeanour, hath been cast into prison, and lain there many years, winter and summer, in cold irons, when he obtains liberty he will often bethink himself of his old misery, and take heed for ever lest he fall into the same offence again: so, likewise, he that hath seen his own sins, and felt the smart of them, and withal, by God's goodness, obtained assurance touching the pardon and forgiveness of them, will never willingly and wittingly commit the like sins any more, but in all things change the course of his life.

Forgiveness of sins free, yet requireth thankfulness.

1. EVEN as the king, whose servant, owing him ten thousand talents, yet when he fell down and besought him, forgave him the whole debt freely, and of his mere liberality: so, also, God the Father doth freely forgive them all debts—that is, sins—who fly unto Him for succour, with trust and confidence in Christ.

Matt. xviii. 23, &c.
Luke vii. 41, 42.

2. Even as the king called again unto punishment that servant being unthankful and cruel toward his fellow-servants, and that which before he forgave him, when he humbly besought him, now he requireth again of him, being stubborn and cruel towards his fellows: so God, after He hath received us, being sorry for our sin, into favour, will have us imitate His example in liberality and goodness toward our neighbour.

Matt. xviii. 32, 33.

Forgiveness of sins only from God.

1. LIKE as the prince only hath power to forgive and pardon felony or treason in his subjects: even so God only hath power to forgive sin.

Mark ii. 7, &c.

2. As that man is a traitor who, being a subject himself, will take upon him to pardon treason or felony in another subject: even so is he a traitor to God who will take upon him to pardon that sin which is committed against God.

3. Like as no man can forgive debts but the creditor to whom the debt is due: so no man can forgive sins against whom there is no sin committed but He only that is hurt and offended by the sin, and that is God, either immediately or by means.

Isa. xliii. 25.

4. Like as, if one do forgive the debts due another man, the debtor is abused (deceived) if he do believe that he is discharged from the bond of his debt, and the creditor hath wrong done him, without whose knowledge and will the debts belonging unto him are forgiven and his debtor discharged, which forgiveness he doth make void immediately, and doth, nevertheless, claim the debt upon his debtor: even so, likewise, if any man do forgive sins which be not done against himself, he deceiveth him whom he forgiveth, and sinneth against him also to whom the offence was done, who hath the power only to forgive or withhold for the offences done unto him, and so he doth not only not discharge the party that is guilty, but offendeth him also into whose right he doth unadvisedly intrude.

5. As men do not give alms at any time to a stout beggar who, although he have need, yet will not confess it, and crave alms gently, acknowledging his poverty: even so no more will the Lord give unto us any spiritual alms—to wit, forgiveness of sins—unless we shall humble ourselves before Him with true feeling of our poverty and misery.

Matt. ix. 13; xi. 28.

Forgiveness of sins to be preached to all men.

Rom. xi. 32.
John iii. 16.
1 John ii. 1, 2.

1. LIKE as God hath shut up all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon all : even so He will have this grace of forgiveness of sins, of His mercy, to be set forth and preached to all mankind.

2. As the hungry stomach is able to receive meat, but yet for all that, unless he who is hungry do receive and eat the meat, he is not refreshed : so, likewise, the contrite and humble heart is able, indeed, to receive forgiveness of sins, but yet, unless he receive it in very deed, the conscience of sin is not quieted, but he doth receive it, indeed, when he receiveth the word of grace by faith.

Matt. iii. 2 ; iv. 17.
John viii. 11 ; v. 14.

3. As forgiveness of sins is not obtained without true repentance and amendment of life : so, after it is once obtained, it is not continued without the constant observing of the same ; for to what end is the disease cured if of purpose it is procured again, when it has been once healed ?

Forgiving of others.

1. LIKE as a seal put to a piece of wax leaveth an impression or mark like itself in the wax, which, when a man looks on, he doth certainly know that there hath been a seal, the print whereof is left behind : even so it is in every one that hath readiness to forgive others ; for by it a Christian may easily know that God hath sealed to him the forgiveness of his sins, even in his heart.

Matt. v. 7.

2. As a man, walking under a wall in a cold sunny day, is heated of the wall, which first received heat from the sun : even so he that sheweth mercy to others hath first received mercy from God.

Spiritual Fornication.

Ezek. xxiii. 1-8.

As they who forsake their husbands and give themselves over to strangers do become common whores : even so such is the state of those who leave God and the truth which some time they professed, and commit idolatry and cleave to superstitions.

For the love of Christ, we must Forsake all.

Matt. x. 37.
Luke xiv. 26.

1. As a faithful wife, having her husband in a strange country, when he sends for her, doth forthwith forsake father and mother, friends and acquaintances, goods and lands, not regarding either peril or poverty that may happen unto her, so that she may be in the fellowship and company of her husband, because she loveth him and hath her sure confidence and trust in him, and is sure that she shall participate with him whatsoever he hath : even so we that are faithful Christians ought, unless we would be reputed unnatural branches, unkind lovers, and insolent persons, to abandon and forsake, for the love of Christ, who hath married us unto Himself with the ring of faith, all worldly and fleshly pleasures, what and how many soever they be—yea, and our lives too.

2. As a weak woman will not refuse to forsake all and to follow her loving husband, who is nothing else but earth, ashes, flesh, blood, and corruption, having yet no certainty of his life nor full assurance of his person or presence : even so much more we ought to forsake all when our heavenly Husband Jesus Christ, for our salvation and commodity (advantage), and because He would make us like unto Himself, doth call us out of our own country to follow Him, who is the Author of life, the Preserver from perils, the Giver of all good gifts, and the most faithful Lover of our souls.

3. Like as a husband that hath divers mansions, the which also, by the common right of marriage belong to his wife, who causeth her to dwell in what house it pleaseth him, and when he list he causeth her to remove and to change habitation as he thinketh best, which she willingly is contented with, being a dutiful wife, and delighting in the company of her husband: so, likewise, Jesus Christ, who is the Lord of the universal world, who also hath married us to Him by faith, will have this prerogative over us—namely, to place us in which of His houses it pleaseth Him best; so that it is our part, for His love, to forsake all, and to obey Him and willingly to dwell in what place He will have us, and there to remain in leading a Christian life till such time as He shall call us thence unto some other place.

Breakers of the Fourth commandment.

1. As those parents that bring not their sons and daughters (being of years of discretion) on the Sabbath-day to the church, to be partakers of the holy exercises—as preaching, prayer, catechising, and sacraments—do transgress this commandment: so, in like manner, those parents greatly offend herein that bring their young children to the church on the Sabbath-days who, either by their crying or running up and down the church, do both trouble themselves, the minister, and the people, that the Word preached and the prayers uttered cannot with reverence be so well heard as otherwise they might. And no less do they offend herein that bring their hawks, hounds, or dogs to disquiet the congregation.

2. As magistrates, schoolmasters, and also all artificers and handicraftsmen, ought to abstain from their offices and callings on the Sabbath-day, because they are impediments to hinder their zeal and attentiveness that they ought to give to God in His worship and service that day: so, contrariwise, if God will not have them exercise their vocations and trades, being lawful and necessary, then much more He will not have them exercised in unlawful and unnecessary works, as in gaming, dicing, dancing, carding, drinking, rioting, and other vanities of this world, whereby they are not only drawn from the company of the holy congregation, but also do thereby defile their bodies, which they ought rather to sanctify and keep holy.

Frailty of man's nature.

1. LIKE as a hound cannot but follow his game when he seeth it before him, if he be loose: even so we cannot but fall into sin when occasion, by temptation, is given us, if the Lord withdraw and keep His helping hand from us.

2. As a small thread holdeth a strong man where he gladly desireth to be, and a little pulling draweth a man whither he willingly goeth; or as a little wind driveth a ship with the stream and tide; or as a light persuasion is enough to make a lecherous man believe that fornication is no sin, and an angry man that it is lawful to revenge himself: even so, if the Lord lead us into temptation, and give us over for our unkindness and unthankfulness, seeing our blind nature delighteth in evil, and is prompt and ready of itself to believe lies, a little is enough to make those that love not the truth to believe lies, feignings, and superstitions, and to harden them therein.

² Thess. ii. 1, 2, &c.

3. As a stone cast up into the air cannot go any higher, neither yet there abide when the power of the hurler ceaseth to drive it: even so, seeing our corrupt nature can but go downward only, and the devil, the world, and the flesh, driveth to the same way, how can we proceed further in virtue, or stand therein, when we are tempted, if our merciful and good God do not by His Holy Spirit, from time to time, guide and govern us?

Free from sin by faith

As we, being in the servitude of sin, demonstrate and make known our service by giving over our members to the obeying of sin from iniquity : even so we, being made free from sin by faith in Jesus Christ, and endued with God's Spirit—a spirit of liberty—must needs demonstrate this freedom and liberty by giving over our members to the obedience of the Spirit, by the which we are led and guided from virtue to virtue and all kinds of holiness.

Christian Freedom.

John viii. 35, 36.

As servants, when they have served a time, change their masters and are masterless, or serve others : even so Christians are to remember that their condition is unstable and uncertain in the Church of God except they have the spirit of freedom, namely, the spirit of adoption of children, and so by Christ, and in Christ, be truly made free.

Friends are not always to be chosen for their wealth.

Eccles. vi. 6, 7, &c.

As he is a fool who, buying a horse, beholdeth only the gay saddle and brave bridle : so is he most foolish who, going about to get friends, chooseth them rather by their wealth and apparel than by their good nature, qualities, and conditions.

Free-will lost in Adam.

1. As he who killeth himself doth it whilst he is alive, but, being dead, cannot revive himself again : so we had free-will to do good before we lost it in Adam, but, having lost it, we cannot recover it.

2. As a man that is in close prison must needs there abide, and cannot possibly get forth and walk where he will, yet can he move himself freely and walk within the prison : so, likewise, though man's will be chained naturally by the bonds of sin, and therefore cannot but sin, and thereupon sinneth necessarily, yet doth it also sin freely.

Jer. x. 25.
Jer. xxxi. 18.
Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27.
John vi. 44, 45.

3. As the prisoner that is not only sick and weak, but even stark dead, who cannot stir though the keeper untie his bolts and chains, nor hear though he sound a trumpet in his ear ; and if the said keeper would have him to move and stir, he must give him not only his hand to help him, but even soul and life also : even so such a one is every man by nature, not only chained and fettered in his sins, but stark dead therein, as one that lieth rotting in the grave, not having any ability or power to move or stir, and therefore he cannot so much as desire or do anything that is truly good of himself, but God must first come and put a new soul into him, even the Spirit of grace, to quicken and revive him, and then, being thus revived, the will beginneth to will good things, at the very same time when God, by His Spirit, first infuseth grace.

Gen. vi. 5 ; viii. 21 ;
xx. 6.
Prov. xvi. 1, 9 ; xx.
24 ; xxi. 1.

4. As a ship, when the helm is broken, is driven hither and thither where the tempest will : even so, by the devil, we are driven from one sin to another, neither hitherto can do anything but even as the devil will ; and except God doth deliver us with the strong hand of His mercy, we shall remain in the bonds and chains of sin unto death.

5. Like as, if a man should fall into a miry, deep, and stony place, and so should be covered with mire, be hurt, and drowned : even so we, by original sin, are defiled with lusts and concupiscence, are wounded as touching the powers and faculties of our minds, and are drowned in the darkness of ignorance.

6. As the understanding doth see nothing of itself but that which is carnal : even so the will of man doth hate and abhor of itself all things which are good, and loveth that which is evil, carnal, and not durable. 1 Cor. ii. 14.

7. Like as, when a man taketh a knife and cutteth bread with it, the knife doth cut, but not without the hand of him who holdeth the knife, for the knife is not free of itself either to cut or not to cut ; yet, for all that, when a man doth cut anything with a knife, he saith, " This knife cutteth well," or ill, although of itself it doth cut nothing at all but by the power and force of the cutter : so we, likewise, can do nothing of ourselves that is good and right except the Spirit of God worketh it in us ; so that all godly Christians will confess and say, " We have laboured, we have preached, we have prayed," &c., knowing themselves to be nothing else but the instrument of the Lord, who worketh. Prov. xvi. 1, 9;
xxi. 1.
Jer. xlii. 23; xxiv
7.
Ezek. xxxvi. 26.

Friend and friendship to be tried, and then trusted.

1. As Zeuxis painted slowly and with leisure that which should long last and continue :
 so must that friend be a long time tried who shall for ever continue faithful. Eccles. vi. 6, 7, &c.

2. As evil and unwholesome meat can neither be detained in the stomach without danger of diseases, neither expelled without great grief and pain : so, if you will keep an evil friend, he will hurt you ; but if you will reject him, he will exclaim, and breed you great tumult and trouble.

3. As he who hath no other money than one counterfeit coin is altogether money-less : so he who hath no other friend than he who is unproved or not tried may be well named friendless.

4. He who goeth about to obtain the friendship of many is like the unchaste woman, who, enjoying herself with many, hath no one assured lover.

5. As Telephus, the son of Hercules, all void of friends, was compelled to seek salve for his sore even of his enemy : so such as have no faithful friends, at whose hands they should be counselled, are fain sometimes to hear their foes.

6. As the concord in music of five tones and two half-tones seemeth, as it were, but one voice and sound : so, for true friends, there ought to be but one mind ; yet so doth the flatterer obey the talk of the rich man in all things, that a man would think one only spoke, and not two ; but such are to be tried.

7. If the field might be made more fertile with praising and lauding it, then should it be no less praised than ploughed or dunged : so, if your friend may, by praising him, be made bigger, good it is then to commend him ; if not, to what availeth such hateful, fond, and unprofitable flattery ?

8. As, in trying vessels, we first do fill them with water, and not with wine : so, in proving of our friends, we ought first to try them with trifling matters before we do commit unto them our weighty affairs and secrets.

9. Like as a physician cureth a man secretly, he not seeing it : so should a good friend help his friend privily, when he knoweth not thereof.

10. As mighty floods, by how much they are brought into small rivers, by so much they lose of their strength : so friendship cannot be amongst many without abating the force thereof.

11. As the man that drinketh poison destroyeth himself therewith : so he that admitteth a friend ere he perfectly know him may hurt himself by too much trusting him.

A Friend forsaken.

Ps. xxxi. 12.

As a vessel, how profitable soever it hath been to the owner, and how necessary for his turn, yet, when it is broken, is thrown away and regarded no longer : even so such is the state of a man forsaken of those whose friend he hath been so long as he was able to stand them in stead (to be of great advantage).

Friends, feigned.

Prov. xxvii. 17.

1. EVEN as a brook in winter is carried with great violence and runneth with a mighty force, flowing over with abundance of water on every side when there is no want or need of water, but in the heat of summer is dried up and empty when water is scant and hard to be had, whereto thirsty passengers, as they travel, running, in hope of water to drink, are utterly deceived : so a feigned and hollow-hearted friend, in the time of thy prosperity and rich estate, will promise thee many things when thou hast need of nothing ; but if the wind shall change and blow the contrary way, and thou shalt be turned and tossed with many sharp brunts and blustering blasts of trouble, adversity, penury, and poverty, thy friends, as thou thoughtest, will be like a tree withered through want of sap, and like a ditch without water, dried and parched with the heat of the sun.

2. As a shadow doth follow that man who is lighted with the bright beams of the sun, but if the sun be hid or covered with a cloud, the shadow vanisheth and is clean gone : so a feigned and counterfeit friend doth follow and ply that man whom he perceiveth to be rich, to be famous, honourable, and in the prince's favour, at whose hands he hopeth that something will be gotten ; but if he shall fall into calamity, be despoiled of his riches, and shall tumble down from the top of his honour into the low valley of disgrace, he presently forsaketh him, and maketh no reckoning or account of him.

3. As a swallow, whose company may be had in summer, but not in winter : so, likewise, friends, as they go now-a-days, will swarm about thee so long as thou art able and willing to feed their humours and serve their turns, but that ended, they will leave thee in the midst of a thousand surges and wants, of what troubles soever shall light upon thee.

Friends, unprofitable.

Prov. xx.

As the stump of a tooth is unprofitable to eat withal : so they in whom there is no faith or credit to be reposed are friends unfit and unprofitable for a man in the day of trouble.

A Gainful man, but sumptuous.

As a fruitful field which requireth great labour and charges, yet doth yield much profit to the owner, but none for itself : so a gainful man and thrifty, but yet sumptuous, can leave no store of wealth behind him for his heir. Such an one may be said to be penny-wise but pound-foolish.

Generation, spiritual.

As every man, by carnal generation of father and mother, is carnally begotten and born into this mortal life : so is every good Christian spiritually born by Christ unto eternal life.

Gentleness rather to be used than righteousness.

As some disease, which by no force can be expelled, oftentimes is, with the juice of herbs, assuaged : so some men you shall sooner overcome and win by clemency and gentleness than by righteousness and extremity.

The Gifts of God.

As men preserve the fire by blowing it : so, by our diligence, we must kindle and revive the gifts of God bestowed on us. 1 Tim. i. 6.

To Glorify God.

LIKE as the apostle advertiseth (admonisheth) the Hebrews, where he saith, "Brethren, exhort one another while it is to-day:" so, also, Christians ought to take occasion of glorifying God whilst it is offered unto them, lest, as Joab came to Absalom when his barley-field was burned, so they resort unto God when it is too late ; therefore, the sooner they come unto Him, the better it will be for them. Heb. iii. 13.
2 Sam. xiv. 30, 31.

Glory and renown.

1. LIKE as the shadow followeth the body as a companion inseparable : even so doth glory, renown, and fame accompany excellent virtues, worthy gifts, and noble qualities.

2. As a smoke, which at first is great and thick, ascending upwards, is quickly scattered and out of sight : even so the glory of the proud men of this world by little and little is obscured and vanisheth clean away.

3. As that fire smoketh not much which flameth at the first blowing : so the glory that brightly shineth at the first is not greatly envied at, but that which is long in getting is always prevented by envy.

Though there be degrees of Glory, yet all shall have sufficient.

LIKE as sundry vessels, whereof some are bigger and some less, if they all be cast into the sea, some will receive more water and some less, and yet all shall be full and no want in any : so, likewise, among the saints of God in heaven, some shall have more glory, some less, and yet all, without exception, full of glory. 1 Cor. xv. 41.
Dan. xii. 3.

The Glory of God.

1. As the glory of God infinitely surmounteth the body, the soul, the honour, and all that belongeth unto man : so it ought to be in greater price and estimation with us, and must continually be preferred above all things, and never be brought into the balance of comparison with them. Exod. xxxii. 32.
Rom. ix. 3.

2. As the want of zeal towards the glory of God in all our doings and the preferring of earthly things before heavenly, temporal before spiritual, breedeth and nourisheth a corrupt manner of profession : so it defileth all our counsels and works, and carrieth us headlong to the love of the world, which is contrary to the pure, vehement, and everlasting love of God. 1 Cor. x. 31.

3. As the salvation of men ought to be dear unto us : so the glory of God, which consisteth in that His orders in His Church be kept, ought to be much more dear, that if, at any time, the controversy could be between His glory and our salvation, our salvation ought to fall that His glory may stand.

God.

John xv. 1-6.

1. As the husbandman or vine-dresser cutteth off every branch that bringeth not forth fruit, and letteth it wither, and maketh a fire of it : so God doth cut off fruitless professing Christians and throw them into hell.

2. As the vine-dresser doth purge the fruitful branches, that they may bring forth more fruit : so God, by divers means, doth purify and cleanse His children, that they may be more fruitful.

Luke viii. 18.
Matt. xxv. 23.

3. As they who try a vessel first put water into it, to see whether it will hold water, then they commit wine unto it : even so, first, God giveth us one grace—if we use that well, then He giveth another, and after that another.

4. As the devil is not dead in those who are his, but worketh still to their damnation : so is not God dead in them who are His, but worketh still to their salvation.

5. As from the sun which we behold proceedeth to the world light, heat, and beams, whereby all things are quickened and nourished : so, from God, who is an invisible Sun to His Church, there proceedeth light—that is, a clear knowledge of God ; and heat—that is, the burning affections of hope, faith, and love ; and also the beams, which are the manifold consolations wherewithal the souls of the faithful are quickened, nourished, and made merry.

6. As a wise master of a family, desiring to know the disposition of his servants, hideth himself in a corner, or behind a cloth, and there beholdeth both the unruliness and misdemeanour of some, and also perceiveth the virtues of others of them, the which they would never have shown in his presence : so God doth, in a manner, absent Himself from the world, that both the faith of His servants and the outrage of sin in the wicked ones may be made manifest.

Ps. xci. 1.

7. As a shadow doth protect us from the beams and heat of the sun : so God doth protect us from dangers.

Ps. xci. 2.

8. As in high and defenced towers we are safe from the enemy : so God doth set us in safety.

God a spirit, which cannot be represented by any bodily shape.

Gen. i. 26, 27 ;
ii. 7, v. 1.
Col. iii. 10.
Eph. iv. 24.

LIKE as a bodily image, which representeth unto us the face of a man, ought, life-like, to set before us all his lineaments and proportions, that, by the counterfeiting or engraving, we might conceive whatsoever might be seen in him which the same representeth : even so the image of God must, through the same likeness, set before our senses a certain understanding of the knowledge of God. For this we are sure of, that nothing may bear the image of God but that which is a spirit, because, in very deed, God is a spirit, and therefore this image of God in man can have no abiding-place but in the soul.

God alone sufficient to His people.

As the sun hath no need to be holpen by the company of any other lights to give light to the world, and as one soul is enough to keep life and to govern the body : even so is one God alone sufficient to His people—yea, to all the world—for all things abundantly, without the help of any other.

God, by His Spirit, purifieth us.

As there can be no fire without warmth or light : so God cannot be by His Spirit in us, Rom. viii. 9. or with us, but He will also sanctify and purify us from all vice and corruption, that He may consecrate us unto God.

God chastiseth His, of very love and mercy.

1. LIKE as a natural father first teacheth his dear beloved child, and afterward giveth him warning and admonition, and then correcteth him at last : even so God, our heavenly Father, assayeth all manner of ways with us, who are well grown and old in years, but young and tender in faith. First, He teacheth us His will, through the preaching of His Word, and so giveth us warning. Now, if so be that we will not obey Him, then He beateth and jerketh us a little with a rod—as sometimes with poverty, sometimes with sickness and diseases, or with other afflictions—which should be named and esteemed as nothing else but a father's rods, or the wands of correction.

2. Now, if a small rod or wand will not help or do any good to the child, then his father taketh a whip or a cudgel—as, in case his son waxeth stubborn, and will prodigally spend his money and thrift wantonly and riotously in evil company, then cometh the father and pulleth him out by the hair of his head, bindeth his hands and feet, and beateth him till his bones crack, and sendeth him into prison, or banisheth him out of the country : even so, when we wax obstinate and stubborn, and care neither for words nor for stripes, then God sendeth unto us more heavy and universal plagues—as pestilence, death, sedition, uproar, casualty of fire, murder, war, loss of victory, being taken of our enemies, and led away prisoners and captives, &c. And all this He doth to affright and tame us, and, as it were, with violence, to drive and force us unto repentance and amendment of our lives.

3. Like as, in truth, it is against a loving father's will and mind to strike his child, who would much rather do him all the good that ever he could, but, through long-sufferance and overmuch cherishing, his child waxeth rude and evil nurtured, therefore doth he punish him ; but yet, in the midst of all his anger, his fatherly heart breaketh out ; in case that he putteth his son away from him for some grievous fault, yet he sendeth him not away altogether comfortless, but giveth him some apparel and some comfortable words, and so sendeth him from him, not to remain for evermore in banishment, but when he is once a little humbled, meekened, and amended, then to receive him home again ; and this he doth to turn his son and keep him from all such things as might hurt and destroy him, not minding (intending) to cast away his child or utterly to forsake him : even so, certainly, when God sendeth misery and affliction upon us, there lieth hidden under that rod a fatherly heart and affection ; for the peculiar and natural property of God is to be loving and friendly, to heal, to help, and to do good to His children, and therefore He sendeth us evil that He may do us good ; and yet, in the midst of all affliction and punishment, He sendeth some mitigation, comfort, and succour.

4. As a mother feedeth and nourisheth her child, and all the good she can do unto it that doth she, even of a motherly and tender heart, and yet, through the frowardness and unruliness of the child, she is sometimes so moved and provoked, that she is angry with it, chideth it, rebuketh it, and beateth it : even so such is the very nature and property of God, to suffer no manner of misfortune to happen unto us ; but yet, through our manifold sins, He is provoked to punish and chasten us.

5. As little as the mother can forget, deny, forsake, or give over her child, though she be angry with it and displeased at it : even as little doth God forsake or give us over in our need and necessity, misery and affliction, though He seem never so much to be displeased with us. Isa. xlix. 15.

6. As a master doth not correct and chastise his scholar or servant for any intent to hurt him, or for any malice and evil will towards him, but only that he should learn better Matt. xvi. 24-27.

afterward, be more diligent, and take better heed : even so, likewise, Christ receiveth no scholar or disciple but such as will forsake himself and take up His cross and follow Him.

7. Like as the physician or surgeon doth cut away and burn out the rotten and dead flesh with his iron and instrument, that the whole body be not infected and poisoned, and so perish : even so doth God sometimes afflict and punish our bodies sharply and grievously, that our souls may be preserved and healed ; and how deep soever God thrusteth His iron into our flesh and bodies, He doth it only to remedy and to heal us.

8. As the physician, in making of his treacle, occupieth (useth) serpents and adders, and such like poison, to drive out one poison with another : even so God, in afflicting and correcting us, occupieth and useth the devil and wicked people, but yet all to do us good withal.

Job v. 1, 18.

9. As long as the physician hath any hope of the recovery of his patient, he assayeth all manner of means and medicines with him, as well sour and sharp as sweet and pleasant ; but as soon as ever he beginneth to doubt of his recovery, he suffereth him to have and to take all manner of things whatsoever the patient himself desireth : even so the Heavenly Physician, so long as He taketh us for Christians and hath any hope to recover and heal us, He restraineth us from our will, and will not always suffer us to have what we most desire ; but as soon as He hath no more hope of us and giveth us over, then He suffereth us for a time to have and enjoy all our own will and pleasure.

10. Like as when the horse-breaker giveth unto a lusty fresh young horse too much of the bridle, he is wild and wanton and goeth not well as he should do, and so, by chance, in a slippery and sliding place, he falleth headlong over and over : even so, if our Creator and Maker should suffer us overmuch and give us too large liberty, we would soon wax wild and proud thereof, and so it might happen that we should undo and destroy ourselves ; therefore He giveth us a sharp bit in our mouths, and helpeth us to bridle and to tame our flesh, that the noble and precious soul perish not.

11. Like as the carter jerketh his horses with the whip and striketh them sharply when they will not draw or go forward, and yet favoureth and spareth them also, that he may enjoy them the longer : even so God striketh and whippeth us when we do not right as we should do, and yet nevertheless spareth us and will not utterly make an end of us.

12. Like as the poor shepherd, when his foolish sheep stray abroad in the wild wilderness among the wolves, driveth them from strange ways into the right way, and hunteth them into their sure sheep-fold, where they may be in safeguard : even so we, likewise, forasmuch as we mix ourselves oftentimes among the worldlings, and have fellowship with those that are enemies unto the Christian and true religion, therefore God cometh unto us and driveth us with sorrow and repentance from them, that we should not be destroyed and perish together with them.

13. As the herds-man will suffer such calves and cattle as are appointed shortly to the slaughter to run and spring about in the pasture at pleasure, while such as are reserved to labour are kept and used under the yoke : even so Almighty God doth suffer and permit unto those ungodly persons whose destruction is at hand to have all pleasure and lust upon earth, and to accomplish and fulfil their pleasures and desires ; but the godly, whom He will use to His honour and glory, those keepeth He under the yoke, and restraineth them from the pleasant lusts of the world.

14. Like as if the gardener cut off the knobs and the withered and crooked boughs from the trees in the garden, and loppeth them a little, yet, as long as the roots remain, the trees are never the worse, but grow nevertheless and bring forth fruit : even so doth God lop and hew the crabbed old Adam with the cross and afflictions, not to the end to hurt or harm us, but to keep us in awe and to teach us godly manners and Christian behaviour ; and, therefore, as long as the root of faith remaineth with us, though we be spoiled and destitute of all riches and of all manner of worldly and bodily comfort, yet shall we bring forth good fruits, to the honour and glory of God's holy name.

15. As the freemason heweth the hard stones, and cutteth off here one piece and there another, till the stones be fit and meet for the place where he will lay them: even so God, the heavenly Freemason, buildeth a Christian Church, and frameth and polisheth us, who are the costly and precious stones, with the cross and troubles, so that all abomination and wickedness—things which do not agree unto this glorious building—might be removed and taken out of the way. 1 Pet. ii. 5.

16. As physicians are wont to heal men diseased with filthy potions: even so God doth chastise and try His children by the means of wicked things, as by Satan, by wicked men, &c., who shall be damned.

17. As, in cities, the governors thereof keep executioners and hangmen, not that they like or commend their office, but only do suffer them to execute their office for the better preservation of their city: so, likewise, God doth suffer tyrants and ungodly men to afflict and grieve His faithful servants, and all for their good.

18. As we make so great account of gold, which is but a metal, that we will try it in the fire to make it please us the better: so, after the same sort, it is not to be marvelled at that God sometimes trieth, of very love, the faith of His children, to the end that, when they are once well purged from the degrees and filth of incredulity (unbelief) which remaineth in them, and are purified in the furnace of divers afflictions, and so melted as it were anew, their faith may be of like account (value) before Him.

God comforteth afflicted souls.

As God many times casteth down and confoundeth all those that vainly trust in things transitory, brittle, and momentary: even so, on the other side, He doth raise up and comfort such as be weak, pensive, faint-hearted, sorrowful, and mourning, and with spiritual instruction doth cherish, furnish, and refresh their sick souls and bruised consciences. 1 Kings xiv. 15.
Isa. xlii. 1, 13.
Luke iv. 18.

God comforteth His.

1. As the eagle cherisheth her young and fluttereth over her birds, and taketh them and carrieth them on her wings: even so doth God cherish and care for His people and Church. Deut. xxxii. 11,
Obad. i. 4.

2. As natural fathers and mothers are moved with pity and compassion towards their infants when they are in any distress: even so our heavenly Father is moved with much greater compassion towards us, His children, when we are in misery or suffer affliction. Ps. ciii. 13.

3. As the apple of a man's eye is the tenderest thing in all his body, and, therefore, most duly and carefully preserved from anything which may hurt it: even so God doth protect, defend, and care for those that are His. Deut. xxxii. 10.

God doth us not all the good He will do at a clap (a sudden act), fearing lest we should utterly abandon and lose it.

As a father of a household well advised, who, at the first dash, doth not much advance his servants, but doth for them by little and little, the better always to put them in comfort and hope to receive advantage at last, to the end that, by this means, they may be holden in service and not depart from his house: even so God, during the time that we are in this Jer. xxii. 21.

world, giveth us more hope than He doth benefits; and yet it is plain that the graces which He bestoweth upon us are infinite, for fear lest that, if He should make us great and rich at once, and should give us out of hand all the good that He keepeth in store for us, it would make us to abandon His service, as we see sometimes it happened to the Jews by this occasion.

God draweth out some goodness even out of the wicked.

LIKE as, if thou comest into a smith's or joiner's shop, and seest many tools, some crooked, some bowed and hooked, and some cut as saws—now, in this case, thou wilt not condemn the smith or joiner of unskilfulness, and his tools all to be nought, but rather thou wilt acknowledge thy ignorance in the use of them: so, in like manner, must we do in beholding the creatures of God in this world—first, acknowledge our own ignorance; secondly, reverently esteem the Creator; and, lastly, give Him all praise, that He hath not placed us in the number of those that seem confused.

God forsaketh His children sometimes and leaveth them to themselves.

1. As a mother sets down her young child and hides herself, suffering it to cry and have a sad face, not because she hates it, but that she may teach it to depend upon her and love her: even so God giveth grace to His children, and yet, again, sometimes He doth in part withdraw it from them, and then they fail in their duties sundry ways, and this He doth to make them ashamed of themselves, and to cause them to put all their confidence out of themselves in the merits of Christ.

Cant. iii. 1, 2.

2. Like as the corn-field that is ploughed and sown with good corn, but yet, for a time, it neither gives rooting beneath nor so much as a show of any blade appears above: even so God grants His servants the holy means of salvation—namely, preaching, prayer, sacraments—and yet holds back the efficacy of His Spirit for a time.

Rom. vii. 22-24.

3. Like as the prisoner who hath escaped the hand of his gaoler hath an affection to run a thousand miles every hour, but having, haply (by chance), his bolts on his legs, he cannot, for his life, but go very softly, the bolts galling and chafing his flesh, and so with much grief he falleth again into the hands of his keeper: even so God giveth His children a strong affection to obey His will, but He lets them fail in the obedience itself.

Ps. lxxvii. 7-9.

4. As the trees in the winter season that are beaten with wind and weather, bear neither leaf nor fruit, but look as though they were rotten and dead, because the sap doth not spread itself, but lies hid in the root: even so the manner of God's forsaking His elect is, when He hides His graces for a time, not by taking them quite away, but by removing all sense and feeling of them.

The Godhead of Christ.

Matt. xxvii. 46.

1. LIKE as, when a man sleepeth, the soul is not severed from the body, but lieth, as it were, dead, and exerciseth not itself: even so the Godhead of Christ lay still, and did not manifest His power in His manhood, but did, as it were, lie asleep for a time, that the manhood might suffer; and thus the manhood seemed to be forsaken.

2. Even as the altar in the Old Law did sanctify the sacrifice that was offered upon it, and made the same propitiatory: so, also, the Godhead of Christ, the Altar whereon He offered His humanity, sanctified the same and made it propitiatory and meritorious for all mankind.

3. Like as, in Christ incarnate, there be several things and not several persons : so, in the Godhead, there be several Persons but not several things's. Phil. ii. 6, 7.
Heb. i. 3.

4. As honey and oil, being mixed together, cannot be called either honey or oil, because, when things are mingled together, they cannot retain a name of one of the simples : even so the Godhead of Christ cannot be changed into His manhood, or yet mingled with His manhood, because the properties of the Godhead cannot agree with the properties of the manhood, nor the properties of the manhood with the properties of the Godhead ; for, as the Godhead cannot thirst, no more can the body be in many places at once.

God heareth our complaints.

As parents are ready to give their children good things when they beg or crave them : even so much more God our Father will not deny anything to His children when, in a true faith, they do beg or crave it of Him. Matt. vii. 9-11.

God is a Husbandman to His people.

As the husbandman dungeth his land, tilleth and dresseth it, that it may bring forth good corn : so Almighty God tilleth and cleanseth the hearts of His people, which be prone unto evil, that they may bring forth good works, and not tares. John xv. 1, 2.
1 Cor. iii. 9.

God is all-sufficient perfection.

1. EVEN as the sun, although it enlighteneth all the world, yet doth not lose any of its light : so God, now, after that He hath made all things, is not any whit hereby the less powerful or perfect.

2. Even as any king or tyrant, when he granteth unto one that which he hath taken away from another, may be said to play the part, partly of an unjust and partly of a liberal man : even so God, if, using His power only, He had restored man, it had been on the one part derogatory to His justice, and, on the other part, too much had been granted to mercy, therefore it was needful to find such a way to save man that these four properties in God (without which God could not be, or be called God) might stand together, and consist in the highest degree—namely, most high or perfect power, perfect righteousness, perfect mercy, and perfect wisdom.

God is present everywhere, but yet not with all alike.

As a sound or noise is heard more by some persons and less by others, being of equal distance from it, as they be of quick or dull hearing : so, albeit God be present with all things, yet He is in some more plentifully, in some less, not with partiality, but according to the diversities of their capacities.

God is in the ministry of all.

As, in a great house, there be many vessels of sundry sorts, to divers uses, not only of gold and silver, but also of wood and earth, some for honour, some for dishonour : so, likewise, in the outward society of the Church, there be men of all sorts appointed for divers ends, as apt and meet vessels for the Lord, and some otherwise, &c. 2 Tim. ii. 20, 21.

God loveth His children.

Ps v. 12; ciii. 13.

1. As we will take anything well at his hands of whom we are persuaded that he loveth us, for the assurance of his love swalloweth up and sweetly sendeth down all the rest—if he teach us, we take it; if he admonish us, we are contented; if he reprove us, we put up with it; if he jest with us, we are not grieved; yea, if he smite us, we are not offended—all is taken in good part, because all comes from Love, who never did hurt his beloved: so, likewise, God dealeth with His children. He teacheth them when they are ignorant, He correcteth them when they go astray, He admonisheth them when they are unruly, He reproveth them when they transgress, He threateneth them when they are stubborn, and He smiteth them when there is no remedy; but yet, in His favour and mercy, He teacheth, correcteth, reproveth, threateneth, and smiteth His children that they might not be damned with the world. If He wound us, His favour is oil to cure our wounds; if He send floods and seas of troubles, the assurance of His favour is like Noah's ark to bear us up from drowning; if His wrath shall burn like fire, His favour is water to cool the heat, whereof Dives in hell could not get a drop; if He send sickness either of body or mind, the assurance of His favour is a present remedy, like the brazen serpent; if He send sorrow over night, His loving favour shall bring joy in the morning, and joyful tidings, like, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven thee!" if He hide us, His favour that He beareth unto us will not suffer Him to chide for ever; if His wrath be kindled against His children, His favour puts out all again; if He set us up as marks to be shot at, He sets His favour before us, with the assurance whereof we are defended as with a shield.

2 Sam. vii. 14, 15.
Ps. cxviii. 18.

2. As a father's anger is rather love than anger, and his correction is to be counted rather a love-token than a punishment: so, in like manner, is God's anger towards His children who fear Him and keep His covenants; and, therefore, His correction is a love-token, and no punishment.

John xi. 35.

3. Even as, when Jesus wept over Lazarus, the Jews said, "Behold how He loved him!"—yea, though He suffered death to cast him into his grave, the common bed of all flesh, yet behold how He loved him: so, in like manner, may God's children say, when the Lord correcteth, or reproveth, or afflicteth them, "Yet mark how He loveth us, entreateth us, and woeth us!" And when we see this, we must needs say, "Behold how He loveth us!"

Gen. xxxiv. 19.

4. As Shechem deferred not to do all that was required of him for the obtaining of Dinah, because he loved her: so, also, when we stand in need of the Lord's help, He deferreth not to help us, because He loveth us.

Gen. xlii. 7; xxxii. 24, 25, 32.

5. Like as, when Joseph's brethren came to Egypt to buy corn, Joseph knew them, but spake roughly unto them, and bare them in hand that they came as spies: so the Lord dealeth with His children many times when they come to Him for such things as they want. He knoweth them well, but maketh Himself strange unto them, and speaketh roughly unto them, by seeming to deny their request; yea, sometimes, by increasing their sorrow and affliction—as Jacob, striving with the angel for a blessing, received a blow on his thigh more than he looked for.

Gen. xlii. 8.

6. Even as it is said of Joseph, that he took Simeon from them, and bound him before their eyes; now all this while Joseph knew his brethren, but they knew not him, for if they had known it had been their brother Joseph, who loved them, no doubt they would have borne anything at his hands: so, likewise, if we knew our troubles to come from our Father, who loveth us, we would willingly bear anything at His hands.

7. Like as, when Benjamin must go, then Jacob thought he had been robbed of all his children; but he found Joseph, Simeon, and Benjamin, all again at the last: so God's children, in the end, find all, when they think they have lost all.

8. As his brethren went home, hue and cry came after them for Joseph's cup, which was in policy conveyed into their brother Benjamin's sack, and, when search was made, they thought themselves clear; but, when it was found in Benjamin's sack, they were worse afraid than they had been before, for Benjamin must stay by the reckoning, and answer the matter—this passed all the rest: even so doth the Lord many times find out sin in us when we think all is well; and then things go worse and worse with us, as we think, and yet still the fear is greater than the hurt, for God loveth us.

Gen. xlv. 1, &c.

9. Like as Judah hereupon drew near to Joseph, and said, "Let me speak but one word in the ears of my lord," and so tells him a long story of the whole matter from the beginning to the ending, as though Joseph all this while had known nothing of the matter: so we oftentimes, in the grief of our hearts, pour forth many things and great complaints which the Lord knoweth well enough.

10. As, after many trials, it is said that Joseph could no longer refrain before all that stood by, but cried, "Have forth every man from me!" which being done, he wept and cried so that all heard him, both of the Egyptians and Pharaoh's house, and at last his love broke forth like the morning light, overflowing after long restraint—as a stream, whose course is stopped, overfloweth the banks—and so he uttereth himself, asking if his father were alive. "But his brethren could not answer him, for they were troubled at his presence." Little did they think that Joseph had been so near them; they did not once dream of any such matter or of any such man: even so the hand of God is many times tempering afflictions to the godly in love for their good, when they think but little upon it.

Gen. xlv. 1, &c.

11. As Joseph said to his brethren, "I am your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt; come near, I pray you, unto me; be not sad nor grieved with yourselves that you sold me, for it was God's doing for your preservation." Afterward they and their father and all his house came up, and had Egypt to inhabit: even so, after the like manner, after many trials, God dealeth with His children. He uttereth Himself unto them, and puts them in good remembrance of their injuries done, to His majesty; He freely forgiveth them, and giveth them the inheritance at the last, which is more than they deserve and more than they desired, and more than they looked for, by which they are assured of God's great love and favour unto them. Therefore let us be content, with patience, to bear what trial soever our loving God and merciful Father shall think good to lay upon us.

12. As Jehoram said to Jehu, when he marched in his fury, "Comest thou peaceably?" as if he should say, "If thou comest peaceably, march as furiously as thou wilt": so let us say to our God, "O Lord, comest thou favourably and in love against us? Then come as terribly as Thou wilt! Shoot Thine arrows, and spend them all upon us! Beat us to powder! Take all away, and in this life do with us what Thou wilt, so Thou dost assure us of Thy favour!"

2 Kings ix. 20-22.

13. As the birth of the child into the world swalloweth up all the pangs and pains of the mother which went before the birth in forgetfulness: so, likewise, we, if, after our manifold afflictions and sorrows for Christ's sake, we bring forth the assurance of God's favour here, and of eternal life hereafter, let forgetfulness devour and consume all the rest.

God may reward and deal with His creatures as liketh (pleaseth) Him.

As the clay is in the potter's hand, to order it at his pleasure: so are men also in the hand of their Creator, for that He may reward them as liketh Him best.

isa. xlv. 9.
Rom. ix. 20, 21.

God no partial Judge.

Ezek. xx. 47.

As dry wood is apt to burn, and green wood also, though not so quickly, will be consumed with fire: even so both strong and weak, high and low, rich and poor, one and another, go to wreck when God punisheth impiety and wickedness.

No man hath seen God at any time.

Exod. xxxiv. 34.
John. i. 18.
1 Tim. vi. 16.

As the children of Israel could not behold the shining face of Moses when he had talked with God on the mount, for the exceeding brightness thereof, so that he was obliged to cover his face with a veil, through which they did behold him: so no man hath seen God at any time, or can behold the face and presence of the Deity and Godhead, but so far as it is both veiled and revealed by the holy and human flesh of our Saviour Christ.

Not to believe that there is a God.

Ps. x. 4; xiv. 1;
Ahi. 1.
1 Tim. iii. 16.

As there is no wound more mortal than that which plucketh forth man's heart or soul: so, likewise, is there no poison or pestilence of greater force suddenly in men to kill all faith, hope, and charity, with the fear of God, and consequently to cast them headlong into the pit of hell, than to deny the principle and foundation of all religion—namely, that there is a God.

God is not the Author of evil.

1. LIKE as, if a man cut with an evil or dull knife, he is the cause of cutting, but not of evil cutting, or the hacking of the knife, but the badness of the knife is the cause thereof; or, if a man strike on an instrument that is out of tune, he is the cause that the strings sound, but that they sound jarringly and out of tune that is in themselves, and the man that striketh them is not to be blamed for it: even so it is no good argument, neither followeth it, that because all things are done and come to pass by God's determined will and providence, therefore He should be the Author of evil; for, seeing one may be the author and cause of an action, and yet not of the evil in the action, it doth not therefore follow that, if God be the Cause of the action, by-and-by the evil in the thing must also proceed of Him—nay, contrarily, this doctrine is a sealed truth, that no evil cometh of God in any work, but though in everything that is done the Lord be in some sense the worker, yet, as He doth it, it is ever good. As by these places of Scripture may plainly appear:—Deut. xxxii. 4; Job viii. 20; xxxiv. 10—12, 17; Ps. v. 4; Jer. x. 10; xii. 1; Dan. iv. 34; James i. 13, 14; Rom. ix. 14; 1 John i. 6.

2. As a man that rides upon a lame horse and stirs him, the rider is the cause of the motion, but the horse himself of the halting motion: so God is the Author of every action, but not of the evil of the action.

Isa. xiv. 7.
Amos iii. 6.

3. As the wheels of a clock, whereof some run forward and some backward, but all to make the clock strike: even so God and the devil work both to one end, though God have only a good purpose and the devil and his ministers have an evil purpose; yet there is no evil in God.

God is not the Author of sin.

Gen. i. 10-12.

1. As he that maketh tools and instruments of iron, or other metal, maketh not rustiness and canker, neither is to be blamed if those things which he hath made, by reason of too much moisture, dust, or other corruption, shall afterwards gather canker or rustiness:

even so that heavenly Workman, our God, did not bring in sin and iniquity, neither can He justly be blamed if His creatures do stain and blemish themselves with the foulness of sin and wickedness, for He made them good.

2. As the earth, affording sap as well to the evil trees as to the good, cannot be found fault with because the evil tree bringeth forth evil fruits : so much less can God be called either the Author or Cause of our sins, although by His providence He moveth all things—yea, even the ungodly.

Acts xvii. 28.
Ps. v. 6.
Prov. vi. 16.

3. Like as that which is no fault in the master of the house is a great fault many times in any of his servants, because it is the breaking of their master's commandment : even so, doubtless, the self-same work is sin in the servants and creatures of God which to God is no sin, but an ordinary work appointed for some special purpose, either for the manifestation of His power, as was the hardening of Pharaoh, or for the declaration of His mercy, as was the fall of David, of Peter, of Mary Magdalen, and all other repentant sinners.

4. As the sun sending forth his beams and heat on carrion engendereth in some corruption, and yet draweth to itself neither corruption nor any filthiness, neither yet doth the sun, by his purity and brightness, purge the carrion, but it remaineth stinking and corrupt : so doth God so work by the wicked, that the justice which is in Him doth not justify them, neither yet is He defiled by their wickedness and corruption.

God is not the Cause of sin.

LIKE as it happeneth sometimes that the self-same wine poured into a corrupt vessel is lost and made pale and loseth verdure, which wine, as it is brought by the husbandman and put into the vessel, is both sweet and good—neither is it hard to understand how one and the self-same act may, as touching one, be vicious, and in respect of another, just ; for as, when a murderer and a hangman do kill a man, the act, as touching the matter or subject, is all one—namely, the death of a man—and yet the murderer doth it most unjustly, and the hangman by law and justice : even so God is not the Cause of sin ; for if we will speak properly, and that it may the more manifestly appear, we must mark that every act, as it is derived and cometh from God, is both good, just, and holy ; for punishment is by God imposed and laid upon wicked men, and to punish sins no man is ignorant but that it pertaineth to justice ; wherefore God, in withdrawing His grace from the ungodly, and ministering some occasions which might move to good things, if they happened to right and just minds, but which He knoweth the wicked will turn to evil, may, after a sort (though not properly), be said to be the cause of sin. And, undoubtedly, that act, in that it passeth from us, is sin, but not as it cometh from God, for in that it cometh from God it is most perfect justice.

One God in Trinity.

1. EVEN as a margarite in every part shineth alike, but if it be defiled or fouled in one part loseth all its beauty : so the Trinity is but one God, and if one Person be dishonoured, all Three, being but one God, are dishonoured.

2. As one sun serveth to give light to the whole world, and one soul is able to rule and quicken the whole body, whereas, notwithstanding, neither the sun created the world nor the soul the body : so much more one God shall be able to rule and maintain His own work, which, with so great wisdom and power, He alone did create, unless we will make the work greater than the Creator, or charge the incomprehensibility of God with any imperfection.

God regardeth His faithful servants, &c.

Ps. xxiv. 1.

1. As a master, when his servants obey him and do his will, commandeth his steward or the governor of his house to minister unto them all things necessary, and that nothing be wanting; but if they offend him and deal unfaithfully with him, he giveth a contrary charge: even so God, the true and right owner of all things, of whom the kingly prophet David saith, "The earth is the Lord's, and all that therein is: the world, and they that dwell therein!" If we do obey Him, and serve Him faithfully, and give unto Him due honour, He commandeth the earth, His ancient steward, to minister unto us great store of necessities, and to give unto us all good, rich, and pleasant things in due time; but, on the other side, if we disobey Him, rebel against Him, and be not afraid to do those things which He forbiddeth us, and will commit we care not what sin, even with greediness, joy, and delight, then He commandeth His steward, the earth, to deny food unto us, and to afflict us with penury and extreme want of all those things whereof it was wont to yield us great abundance, and not to be so bold as to relieve or comfort us, until we be converted and fly unto Him, confessing and acknowledging our sins from the bottom of our hearts, and, most heartily bewailing them, shall prostrate ourselves before the throne of grace, craving and crying for remission of sins in the death and blood-shedding of our Saviour Christ crucified.

Mal. iii. 6.
James i. 17.
Ps. xvi. 8.

2. Even as a column or pillar is sometimes on thy right hand and sometimes on thy left hand, because thou dost change thy standing, sitting, or walking, for it is immoveable and keepeth one place: so God is sometimes favourable and bountiful unto thee, and sometimes seemeth to be wroth and angry with thee, because thou dost fall from virtue to vice, from obedience and humility to pride and presumption, for in the Lord there is no change, no, not so much as any shadow of change. He is immutable, always one and everlasting. If thou wilt bend thyself to obedience and to a virtuous and godly life, thou shalt ever have Him a strong rock, whereupon thou mayest boldly build a castle and tower of defence. He will be unto thee a mighty pillar, bearing up heaven and earth, whereto thou mayest lean and not be deceived, wherein thou mayest trust and not be disappointed. He will ever be at thy right hand, that thou shalt not fall. He will take thy part and will mightily defend thee against all enemies of thy body and of thy soul; but if thou wilt shake hands with virtue and bid it adieu and farewell, and, forsaking the ways of God, wilt live as thou list, and follow thine own corruption, and make no conscience of aught thou doest, defiling and blemishing thyself with all manner of sin and iniquity, then be sure the Lord will appear unto thee in His fury and indignation. From His justice and judgments none shall ever be able to deliver thee.

God the Life of the soul.

As the soul is the life of the body: even so God is the Life of the soul, and His Spirit is the Soul of our souls, and the want of fellowship with Him brings nothing but the endless and unspeakable horrors and pangs of death.

One God and three Persons.

As there is in man the soul, the spirit, and the body, three distinct substances, which nevertheless do make but one man and not three; in the soul there is the mind, the understanding, and the will, but these do not make three souls, but one; in the sun there is the very body of it, the heat and the light, and yet these be not thereby made three suns, but one; and if the heat and shining be taken from the sun, we should then see the body of it no more; if the heat or warmth be taken from the sun, we should then not feel whether there were any sun in the sky or no : even so, if the Word and Spirit be taken from God, we should then come by no knowledge of Him at all ; therefore, whereas the Son and the Holy Ghost are joined unto the Father, it doth further nothing to the making of many Gods, but to the manifesting of one true God in nature and essence, and three in persons and properties, which manifestation was to be spread throughout the world by the preaching of the Gospel.

2. Like as the sun in the firmament hath three distinct and sundry things, of which every one differeth from the other—as the globe, the light, and the heat ; and although every one of these keep severally their properties, yet it is but one sun, and is not divided into three suns : so, in the Deity, the unity of essence is not taken away by the distinction of persons, and yet for all that is there no confounding of persons or changing of one into another. For as there is but one sun in and through the whole world, no more is there but one God. And as the sun showeth himself by his beams : even so God, as Father, doth show Himself by His Son Jesus Christ, who is His Word and eternal wisdom. And as the sun by his heat doth make us feel his force : even so God maketh us feel His virtue by His Holy Spirit, which is His infinite power.

Deut. vi. 4 ; xxxii. 39.
Isa. xliii. 10, 11 ;
xliv. 6 ; xlv. 5.
1 Cor. viii. 6.

3. As reason, will, and memory are not three souls, but one and the same soul : so the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are three, distinct in property, and yet one God.

God tempteth no man to sin.

LIKE as, if a man have a servant who is a thief, and yet, nevertheless, the servant would be esteemed for an honest man ; so, to try and prove him, his master leaveth his purse full of money before him ; if his servant take and steal it away, is he not a thief, and does he not declare himself to be such a one ? Yes, undoubtedly. And now, who made him a thief, the master or the money which was left where he might come by it ? Surely neither of them, for the money is the good creature of God ; and when the master put it before his servant, he did not compel him to take it and steal it. If this servant had been an honest man, he would not have touched it, or if he had taken it, he would have brought it back to his master and not have kept it ; but seeing that the servant was already a thief, and had his heart given to theft, when he had the occasion to put into execution the wicked affection of his heart, he did it. And whereas he did it no sooner, that was because that he had not the occasion and means ; for if occasion had been sooner offered to him, and if he had found whereto to reach out his hand, he would not have kept it in ; and when he began to put forth his hand, he not only then began to be a thief, but he began to declare himself what he was. As we have the example in Judas, who was a thief a long time, but he never showed it until he had an opportunity : even so, although God hath given the occasion to man to prove and try him, and to cause him to make known that which is in his heart, it followeth not therefore that God hath done the sin or is the Author of it, or that we must impute the fault to Him and not to the man who hath committed it.

John xii. 6.
Gen. i. 20.
Job i. 11.

God the Author of all things.

As the general in the field appointeth every particular man his particular standing and office, in which he must live and die : even so God appointeth every man his particular place, standing, and function, where he must continue to the end of his life, unless God call him to some other.

God the Author of men's afflictions.

Ps. xxxii. iv.
Isa. l. 5; ix. 13.
Jer. v. 3.
Job i. 21.

LIKE as, if a man, having received a grievous wound, should not care for the healing of it, should not hasten to the surgeon or physician, nor should provide any remedy, but should sometimes accuse his own sloth and negligence for that he did not avoid the arrow, sometimes, grinning, should bite the arrow itself, or, finally, do some such like thing, when he ought rather to apply some remedy to his wound, whereby it might be healed: even so, as often as we are in any afflictions and in desperate cases, we must not look upon ourselves, nor upon our enemies, nor upon the world, as though we might from thence hope to have ease of our pain and grief; but let us look up to God, who, of His most notable and just judgment, sent and shot those arrows at us. Let us cast our eyes upon God, not to murmur against Him or to detract anything from His perfect equity, but rather humbly to crave His mercy and to require a salve of Him who gave us the wound.

God the Refuge of the comfortless.

Ps. xviii. 2.

1. As the rocks that are hard to be clambered unto are good refuges for the afflicted to fly unto from the face of their pursuers: so God is the safety of all such as in distress do fly to Him for succour.

2. Even as the birds and fowls of the air, that they may escape the nets and snares of the fowlers, are wont to fly up on high: so we, to avoid the infinite snares of innumerable temptations, must fly to God, and lift up ourselves from the corruptions, lying vanities, and deceitful sleights of the world.

God unchangeable.

Ps. cxviii. 24-27.
James ii. 13.

1. EVEN as the sun, which, unto eyes being sound and without disease, is very pleasant and wholesome, but unto the same eyes, when they are feeble, sore, and weak, is very troublesome and hurtful, yet the sun is ever all one and the self-same that was before: so God, who hath ever shown Himself benign and bountiful to those who are kind and tender-hearted towards His saints, and are merciful to those who show mercy. But unto the same men, when they fall into wickedness and grow to be full of beastly cruelty, the Lord showeth Himself to be very wrathful and angry, and yet is one and the same immutable God from everlasting to everlasting.

Isa. liii. 7.
John i. 29.
Rev. v. 5.

2. As a looking-glass doth show whatsoever thou shalt set against it—if thou show thyself pleasant and mild unto it, it also showeth itself mild and pleasant unto thee; and if thou be angry and full of wrath and indignation, thou shalt perceive in like manner the countenance of the glass to be, as it were, furious and cruel to behold, whereas, notwithstanding, the glass is one and the same: so God, who is one and the self-same immutable and everlasting God, is a glass without spot or blemish, and yet is sometimes compared to a lamb and sometimes to a fierce lion.

Why God denieth us our petition.

As sick folks are denied many things which they wish for, because they be often hurtful unto them; so God denieth us many things which we ask of Him because they are not good for us.

God will not be mocked.

As a man having a servant who is an idle fellow, who neglecteth his business, mindeth other matters, and goeth to his work lazily and like a bear to the stake, would not be pleased with his service, but rather shift his hands of him and send him packing: even so the Lord our God cannot abide that we should worship Him with our bodies when our souls are far from Him, that we should honour Him with our tongues when our hearts wander from Him, or that we should serve Him in part some piece of the Sabbath, and serve sin and Satan the rest; for He will not be mocked—He is ever jealous of His own glory. Gal. vi. 7.

God would have all to be saved.

EVEN as an earthly father is in such wise affected towards his children, that he would have every one of them to come to thriftiness, and be honest and worthy successors to him of his goods and substance; and yet, notwithstanding, being frustrated of his hopes, findeth them stubborn and disobedient, whereby they also at length do cast themselves, with great ignominy, into destruction and into some infamous kind of punishment; of this father it may be said, that he hath brought up children and kept them to this great mischief, not that his will and purpose was not far otherwise, but the children, through their own rebellion, have brought this mischief upon themselves: so God verily would have all men, made after His own image, to be saved; but if any, being rebellious, will not embrace His Word and by faith be converted, but, delighting themselves wholly in sensuality, pleasures, and vanities, do die in their wickedness, these God suffereth to perish, that they might sustain the just punishments as well of their own offences against His law as also of their contempt of obtaining salvation through Christ. 1 Tim. ii. 3, 4.

God's Children.

1. LIKE as natural children are like their natural fathers, in face, in speech, in laughter, or in some lineaments of their bodies: even so the spiritual children of God are like unto Him, their Father, in righteousness and holiness of life.

2. As we love them who love our children, and our hearts and hands too arise against those who misuse them: even so the Lord our God, who exceedeth all fathers in love, much more loveth those who love His children, and His heart and hand too arise, in His heavy wrath and displeasure, against such as harm and misuse them. 1 John v. 1.
Ps. xv. 4.
Matt. x. 40, 41.
Luke x. 16.
Zech. ii. 8.

3. As a woman in travail, in the midst of her sorrow, crieth in her pains: even so such is the estate of God's children in the midst of persecution. Isa. xxvi. 17.

The excellency of God's Children.

1. LIKE as David said, when he should have married Saul's daughter, "Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a king's son, seeing that I am a poor man, and of small reputation?" so seemeth it to any a light thing to be sons and daughters of God, the King of all kings, seeing we are sinful men, and of no reputation, but have deserved rather eternal confusion?

2. As the sons of princes are in great account with men in this world: even so the children of God are in greater account with God and all godly men, both in this world and in the world to come.

3. As the children of kings are attended on by noblemen, and guarded with strong men, yet both are but men, whose breath is in their nostrils, and their hands cannot accom- 2 Kings xix. 35.
Ps. xxxiv. 15.

plish the device of their heart: even so the children of God are attended upon by God Himself, whose eye is always over the righteous, and they are guarded by the angels of God, who for their swiftness are said to have wings, and who for readiness are said to stand in the presence of God always, and for their strength are described as incomparable.

Ps. i. 2; xvi. 3.
1 Cor. ii. 9

4. As the pleasures of the sons of men are such as the world doth afford—carnal security, worldly prosperity, fleshly delights, beastly sensuality, with pride and ease, wealth, fullness of bread, and such like: even so the pleasures of the children of God are such as the world can neither give nor take—as the love of righteousness, delight in the law of God, patience in affliction, love of the saints who excel in virtue, and such like.

2 Cor. iii. 17.
Gal. v. 22.
Isa. xi. 2.

5. Like as the riches and treasures of the sons of men are gold and silver, houses and lands, lordships and manors, rents and revenues, and such like, which thieves may steal, or moths may eat, or rust may fret, or fire may consume, or water may overflow, or time may wear, or death may end: so, likewise, the riches and treasures of God's children are the Word of God, God's favour, forgiveness of sins, freedom from hell and the devil, liberty with the saints, the spirit of contentment, peace of conscience, continual joy in the Holy Ghost, and a kingdom of glory in heaven, with such like, which no thief can steal, no rust can fret, no fire can burn or consume, no water can drown, no plague can infect, no time can wear, nor can death end.

6. As those are in most honour with princes who are said to stand in their presence and attend upon them in their courts, as Daniel did: so God's children shall stand in the courts of God, and have the full fruition of His comfortable presence; and, therefore, on the contrary side, the ungodly are herein accursed, in that they are shut out from the presence of God—to wit, His gracious presence—for otherwise all things whatsoever are in His presence.

God's favour the safest refuge.

1 Pet. v. 8.

As young chickens are in safety from the hawk and puttock (kite) so long as they stray not far from the wings of their parent hen, but, when they do stray far from them, they are easily taken of every vermin: even so they that depart and lead their lives within the compass and limits of God's laws and ordinances are most safely kept by Him from the force, enchantments, engines, and all the subtle devices of Satan and his instruments; but if they forsake God, and, not regarding His Word, divide themselves from Him by their sins and iniquities, they must needs fall into the talons and jaws of that tyrannical hawk and hound of hell, from whence there is no delivery.

The use of God's Gifts to men.

As a sheep hath and beareth a fleece of wool, not for itself, but for the necessity and benefit of men: even so the gifts of God which He giveth us, either spiritual or temporal, we are not to keep for ourselves only, but to supply the necessities and wants of others.

God's graces.

1. As a man sailing on the main sea, carrying his jewels with him in the ship, if so be he make shipwreck, doth, together with his ship, lose his jewels: so, likewise, this sea is the world, the ship the conscience, the jewels God's graces shed abroad in our hearts. If it be, therefore, that we once make shipwreck of a good conscience, we do utterly damage all the graces of God in our hearts.

2. Like as skill or cunning in any science or trade, if it be exercised, is both continued and increased : even so God's graces in us, if they be stirred up by continual exercise, are increased ; but if they be neglected through carelessness, they do utterly decrease.

3. Even as iron, if it be not used, will rust : so the graces of God in us, if they be not put in practice, will rust and decay utterly. Matt. xxv. 24

4. Like as the grain of mustard-seed is small to see at the beginning, but after it is cast into the ground, it increaseth speedily, and spreads itself : even so, if a man have but some little feeling of his wants, some weak and faint desire, some small obedience, he must not let this spark of grace go out, but these motions of the Spirit must be increased by the use of the hearing of the Word preached, Sacraments, and prayer, and they must daily be stirred up by meditating, endeavouring, striving, asking, seeking, and knocking. Matt. xiii 31.
2 Tim. i. 6.

God's promises.

1. LIKE as, if an earthly king should promise one a living whilst he lived, it would be an occasion that he should lessen his carefulness for earthly things : even so how much more should God's promise make us careless for worldly things, seeing He is King of all kings. Heb. xiii. 5-7
Josh. i. 5.
Ps. cxviii. 6.

2. Like as nutritive and cordial medicines are not good for every sick person, especially when the body needeth rather a strong purgation than a matter restorative ; or as incarnative medicines (medicines causing the flesh to grow) for the time allay the pain of the patient, but afterward the grief becometh more grievous : even so the comfortable applying of God's promises is not so profitable for every one that is humbled, especially when the soul is rather to be cast down than as yet to be raised up ; so the sugared consolations may, for a time, overheal the conscience and abate some present grief, but so as afterward the smart will be the sorer and the grief grow the greater, whereof ensueth this effect, that comfort seemeth to cure for awhile, but, through want of wisdom in the right discerning of the disease, we minister one medicine for another, and so, for want of skill, the latter fit grieveth them sorer than the former.

God's providence over His children.

1. As it was impossible that Herod and Pilate, together with the Gentiles and Jews, should conclude more and bring any more to pass in afflicting Jesus Christ, our Head, than the hand and counsel of the Lord had ordained to be done from everlasting : so, also, it is impossible that the Herods of our time, the Pilates and the Pharisees, together with the mad and bewitched people, should take more in hand and bring more to pass in afflicting the members of Christ than the hand and counsel of God hath first decreed to be brought to pass by them. Acts iv. 27, 28.
John vii. 30;
viii. 20.

2. As the smallest birds of the earth are not taken without the will and providence of our heavenly Father : even so nothing good or evil doth happen unto God's children without His provident will. Matt. x. 29.
Amos iii. 6.

3. As the Lord, in mercy, feedeth the birds of the air, that they have sufficient, and also so gallantly decketh the lilies of the field, which be so gorgeously and so richly clothed, that even Solomon, in all his royalty, was not apparelled like one of them : even so much more, if we have an assured trust in Him, so liberal and bountiful a Father, He will not, doubtless, see us, His children, lack anything that is good concerning our food or sustenance, apparel or clothing, but will give us those things which shall be meet and expedient for us. Matt. vi. 26, 28-30.

Some love Godliness whilst nothing is required of them contrary to their own affections.

As Ajax would seem devout toward God, so long as he perceived nothing to be required of him contrary to his affections, but when he was commanded to spare Ulysses—"In other things," saith he, "I will obey thee, but not in this thing": even so of this sort is the religion of many at this day, who will be lovers of godliness, so that it doth not disagree with their affections, which they will have wholly to be satisfied—yea, though God be angry therewithal.

Godliness the beginning and foundation of righteousness.

Lev. ii. 13.
Mark ix. 49, 50.

1. LIKE as, before the coming of our Saviour Christ in the flesh, when sacrifices were used, as God had then commanded, it was appointed that the same sacrifices should be seasoned with salt, or else the Lord would not allow of them: so, likewise, unless we be seasoned with the salt of true godliness, we, and all our doings, shall be unsavoury to the taste of the Lord—yea, whatsoever we do, this being wanting, though it seem never so glorious before men, yet shall it be loathsome in His sight as a thing defiled, and as a counterfeit righteousness.

Prov. xx. 14.
1 Tim. vi. 6.

2. As the buyer, while he is in buying, dispraiseth the thing which he buyeth, and saith "It is nought; it is not worth the price which ye ask;" but when he hath bought it, so soon as he is gone, he boasteth of his pennyworths, and saith it is better than his money: even so godliness, before a man have it, he saith it is not worth his labour, and thinks every hour too much that he spendeth about it; but when he hath found it, he would not lose it again for all the world, because it maketh him contented with that he hath.

John xv. 5.

3. A scion or imp that is grafted into a tree doth in such wise draw away the sap and force thereof that it bringeth forth fruit according to its own kind, and not after the kind of the tree whereinto it is grafted: but with Jesus Christ it is contrary, for they that are grafted into Him do, indeed, gather strength from Him, yet so that they alter their nature and bring forth fruit, not after the kind of Adam's children, but of Jesus Christ, into whom they are grafted.

A Godly life.

As it cannot by any means come to pass that he who enjoyeth the beams of the sun should be in darkness: even so it is impossible that he who hath his conversation with God should not be immortal.

A Godly man is a mighty man, though he be never so poor.

LIKE as precious stones, though they be cast into the mire, yet they lose not their beauty, nature, and property: so, likewise, men endued with honesty, replenished with goodly virtues, and well acquainted with the true worshipping of the most high and gracious God, although they be silent as men in their graves and are had in contempt by the world, yet have they not lost their dignity and the true honour proper to Christians, which consisteth not in the wealth and renown of this world, but in holiness, in righteousness, and in the faithful imitation of Christ.

Godly men.

1. LIKE as, in the strait seas, the water ebbs and flows : even so is it in the godly. As long as they live in this world, according to their own feeling, there is an access and recess, a coming and going of the Spirit. Ps. cxix. 5, 88;
lxxvii. 2, 3, 7, 8.
2. As the lights and stars of the firmament do give light to all which are under heaven : so the virtues of saints and godly men do give light to others to follow their example.
3. As the palm-tree is least at the bottom, and the higher it is, the greater and thicker the branches are, but all other trees are contrary : so the godly are most conversant and have the best part—that is, the soul in heaven—but the wicked are contrary.
4. As a panther hath four claws, and no more, on each foot behind, but five claws, and no less, on each foot before : so the godly, though they be weak world-ward, yet they are strong God-ward. Matt. xi. 12.
5. Like as the filthy do more and more wallow themselves in the mire, and do array and defile themselves with it vilely : so the godly do more and more apply themselves daily to cleanness and holiness of life. Rev. xxii. 11.
6. As the owl is hooted and wondered at among other birds : even so the godly are often made a gazing-stock and a wonderment unto the ungodly, because the course of godliness is most strange and foolish in their eyes. Lam. iv. 3.
I Cor. iv. 9.
7. As all birds, though hating one another, do wonder at the owl : so, likewise, all the wicked, being enemies amongst themselves, do set their several powers against the godly. The reason is, because they hate nothing so much as the truth, neither any people so much as the professors thereof. Matt. v. 11, 12;
xii. 34.
Ps. xxii.
Luke xxiii. 12.
8. As sheep are simple, but yet bring profit to their owners, both when they are living and when they are slain : even so the godly are not only harmless and innocent as doves, and can discern of true doctrine and false, but they are also very profitable both in their life and death.

Godly men see clearly the light of the Word, but the wicked do the contrary.

As they that have clear and sound eyes do easily receive the bright light of the sun, John viii. 12. wherewith eyes that be sore and diseased are greatly offended : so virtuous and godly men are illuminated and wonderfully cleared in their understanding and in the eyes of their minds with the divine and heavenly light of the Word of God, wherewith the wicked and ungodly are highly offended, insomuch that they hate the light, and love darkness more than it, and so, growing blinder and blinder every day, at length they fall and tumble down headlong into the insatiable pit of eternal destruction.

Godly men want nothing good for them.

As a natural son may assuredly trust that his father will do for him all things that may be for his setting forth and preferment : even so we may undoubtedly assure ourselves that, having Almighty God to our Father, we shall lack nothing, neither in this world nor in the world to come, which may be profitable and expedient for us toward the enjoying of the everlasting inheritance which our heavenly Father has prepared for us.

The Good of our brethren must be regarded.

1. As, in the parts of a man's body, every one has its proper function, yet not so much for itself as for the good of the whole body : even so, in like manner, in the Church and commonwealth, every man must have his particular calling, not so much for himself as for the common good and public weal.

2. As the stags, when they swim over a great water to feed in some meadow, they swim in a row, and lay their heads one over another's back, carrying the weight of one another's horns, and when the first is weary another taketh his room, and so by course : even so must we do, helping and doing good one to another, till we have passed the troublesome waves of this world, and are come to heaven.

Good men's estate amongst the wicked.

As the good corn may not grow nor increase unless the unprofitable weeds be weeded away : so, except vicious men and vagabonds were punished, good men might not prosper nor live in peace.

All Good things come from heaven.

As the rain and dew falling from above, watering the ground, make it fruitful : so, likewise, the grace of the Holy Ghost, coming from God the Father, stirs up our minds to all goodness,

Good turns or benefits unexpected.

As the fig-tree blossometh not, although having fruit most sweet : so some men do good turns and benefits though they promise none.

Good-will.

As a flood, divided into sundry little brooks or streams, runneth both weak and small : so good-will, stretched toward many, must at the length be feeble and faint.

Gospel.

1. As the law, because it is the minister of death, fitly serveth for the taming and mastering of the rebellious flesh : even so the Gospel, containing the bountiful promises of God in Christ, is as oil to pour into our wounds, and as the water of life to quench our thirsty souls ; and it fitly serveth for the strengthening of the spirit.

2. As the diamond, which, being moistened in the warm blood of a goat, may be bruised, though otherwise it cannot be hurt with any fire, be it never so hot, nor broken with any violence, be it never so strong ; or as the horse, which ere while was outrageously fierce, is, by gentle handling, meekened and made handsome for the saddle ; or as the dog, in like manner, whose nature is churlish and untoward, and agreeable to his name, is yet by gentleness brought to do that which is not incident to his nature : even so some men, whose hearts cannot be mollified and softened by the terrors and judgments of the law, are yet reclaimed, won, and made to relent by the mild and gentle persuasions and promises of the Gospel.

3. As the dove found no footing at the first sending: even so the Gospel of Christ doth not always find entertainment at the first. Gen. viii. 3.
Matt. x. 14.
Acts xiii. 51.

4. As the seed sown in the field—as wheat bringeth forth grain and corn, according to its nature and kind: so the Gospel preached bringeth forth out of a godly heart that which both in itself it teacheth and that which it delivereth—to wit, faith in Christ, amendment of life, the knowledge of God, love toward God and our neighbour, and such other fruits as are sown and preached.

5. As the lightning that breaketh out of the clouds shineth over all: even so doth the Gospel of Christ.

6. As men light not a candle to cover or whelm it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, Matt. v. 15. to light all that are in the house: even so the light of Christ's Gospel may not be hid nor made a separated thing, as though it pertained to some certain holy persons only—nay, it is the light of the whole world, and pertaineth to all men, and therefore ought not to be kept from any.

7. Like as the frogs of Egypt, raised out of the dust by the devilish art of the magicians, Exod. viii. 7. cried out against God's verity: right so do the Pope's legates and Papists molest, with their talk and speech, the preaching of the Gospel, the free deliverance, the Christian liberty, and true service of God.

8. Even as a murderer, guilty of death, contemning the favour of pardon which he heareth to be offered unto him by his most merciful king, calleth and procureth to himself the more grievous punishment: so, in like case, anyone hearing the Gospel of grace who embraceth not the same is to himself the author of heavier punishment and condemnation.

The Gospel to be mingled with the law in preaching.

1. As the strong purge, black hellebore, given uncorrected with other things to allay the power of it, hurteth more than profiteth: so the terrible judgment of the Word, when it is preached without some comforts intermingled, will do more harm than good.

2. As bitter wormwood and sweet honey, mingled together, are very profitable to take away the dimness of the bodily sight, and to make a man see worldly things clearly: so the bitter threatenings of the law and sweet promises of the Gospel, laid together, are most fit to take away the dimness of spiritual eyes, and to make them see clearly heavenly things; so, also, outward adversity and prosperity mingled together.

3. As pepperwort once sown continueth, and can hardly be destroyed: so the Word once received continueth, and can hardly be banished.

Government of the commonwealth.

1. As he must not take the lute in hand who is utterly ignorant of singing and playing: so ought none to take the government of the commonwealth in hand unless he be endued with wisdom and knowledge.

2. As the virgins of Vesta had one time appointed unto them wherein they should learn, another wherein they should exercise, and the third wherein they should teach: so the like ought they to do who take any government of the commonwealth in hand.

Grace.

Matt. xii.

1. As wherever shernwood, lysimachia, poley, calamint, dictamnus, nigella, peucedanum, are laid or grow, there venomous beasts fly away : so, where the grace of God is, Satan and evil motions depart.

Luke viii. 18.

2. As we see the leaves fall from the trees in a boisterous wind : so the graces of God decay and drop away in the wicked, one after another, as though they were in a consumption.

Gen. vii. 21.

3. As those that were out of the ark, though they had wit, glory, riches, and learning, were drowned in the flood : so, likewise, no wit, nor learning, nor riches, without grace, can save a man from perdition.

4. As that which is not in the vessel is not of the vessel, nor cometh thereof, yet it is drawn out of the vessel : so grace is not of the Sacraments, nor cometh of them, but springeth of the eternal Fountain, of the which Fountain the soul seeketh in the Sacraments.

5. As a man doth run to the vessel when he seeketh the liquor : so must he who seeketh the liquor of grace and hath it not run to the Sacraments.

6. As, when the west wind bloweth its pleasant blasts, the foulness and sadness of winter is put away, and the whole face of nature waxeth new and young again ; as the trees are beautified with boughs, and the green grass is distinguished with the sight of divers flowers, and the sun and the arch of heaven itself do delight the eyes with a pleasant aspect : even so soon as the grace of the Holy Ghost doth blow upon the mind of man, forthwith the deformity and foulness of the former life pass away, and in the stead of vices, the whole life shineth with virtues of comeliness ; so that that man may be counted as born again, and luckily to wax young.

Matt. xxv. 26
2 Tim. i. 6.
Gen. xvii. 1.
Ps. cxix. 57.

7. As fire is kindled and stirred up by often blowing and putting to of wood : so the grace of God must daily be stirred by the use of the Word, Sacraments, and prayer, and by meditating, striving, asking, seeking, and knocking.

8. Even as they are more like to retain and recover their health who are careful in using a competent diet of meat and medicine than they who carelessly distemper themselves in sickness and in health, not regarding what things are wholesome or hurtful to them : so, likewise, those Christians who are careful and painstaking in seeking and serving God are far more likely to attain to grace than they who are otherwise.

9. As it was the people's duty to come to the visible ark, and there to wait and look for the grace of God : so no man may hope for the grace of God, except he come to Christ as visible man and eat His flesh, and incorporate the same into himself by faith.

10. Like as a spring-lock, which of itself can shut, but cannot unlock without a key : even so we of ourselves may run into sin and wickedness, but we cannot return and come out of the same without the key of God's grace.

No heaven without the Grace of God.

1. As the pilot of a ship, without the shine of sun or moon, cannot take the haven of any land : so a man, without the light of grace, cannot attain to the haven of glory ; but howsoever he persuadeth himself that he casteth his anchor in a place of safety, it falleth out in the end that he casteth it upon a rock, where there is no hope of salvation.

Grace wrought by degrees.

As a man, looking steadfastly on a dial, cannot perceive the shadow move at all, yet, viewing it after a while, he shall perceive that it hath moved : so, in hearing of the Word, but especially in the receiving of the Lord's Supper, a man may judge even his own faith, and other graces of God, to be little or nothing increased, neither can he perceive the motion of God's Spirit in him at that present, yet, by the fruits and effects thereof, he shall afterward perceive that God's Spirit hath by little and little wrought greater faith and other graces in him.

Graces of God.

1. As the excellency of natural and outward blessings, being abused, is the means of the excessiveness of sin, not of the blessings, but by the corrupt disposition of our nature : so the spiritual graces of God bestowed upon men living in the Church, when abused, do often, by the just judgment of God, work the same effect, and that in far greater measure.

2. As it is impossible that, among heathen men, they who are of small wit, capacity, knowledge, strength, and riches, should be wicked in so high a degree as they who excel in the aforesaid respects : so it is not possible that any who have not received some spiritual graces of God should come to so high a degree of sin as they in whom it hath pleased God to work that shadow of regeneration which hath been declared in the former chapter.

3. As we see it coming to pass in natural things, as, namely, in water, which, after it hath been a little warmed, becometh more cold than if it had never had any heat in it : even so men, who have had some heat of religion kindled in their hearts by the Spirit of God, if they condemn and abuse the said graces of God, become more wicked and irreligious than they who never knew what religion meant.

4. As the increase of light doth make a decrease of darkness, it being impossible that two things of contrary natures should be together in one subject, and the one not expel the other, either wholly or in part : so the spiritual graces of God, which are the matter of man's holiness, bestowed on unregenerate men, do work in them a decrease of sinfulness, making them less sinful than otherwise they would be, and than unregenerate men usually are.

5. As all sweet and pleasant things are sour and unpleasant unto the taste of sick persons : so, likewise, will God's graces and gifts be unto us, if we vainly waste or abuse them.

The Graces of the Holy Ghost cannot finally be abolished.

1. As coals under ashes are hid and covered, and as sap in the root of the tree in the winter season appeareth not for a time at all in the branches : even so the common gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost may be lost and extinguished, but the gifts proper to the elect cannot ; they may, indeed, be diminished and covered, and the feeling of them may be lost, but they cannot finally or totally be abolished. 2 Chron. xxxii. 31.

2. Like as a mother that, loving her child most tenderly, sets it down on the floor, and lets it stand and fall, and all the while she hides herself, not because her purpose is to leave her child quite or to make it hurt itself, but that when she taketh it up again it may love her the better : even so the Holy Ghost dealeth with men. To make them see their own weakness and frailty, He hides Himself, as it were, in some corner of the heart for a season, that they may the more earnestly hunger after grace, the want whereof they feel.

Great men full of cares.

As the tops of trees planted on great mountains are moved with the least blast of wind that bloweth: even so those men who are set in high places of honour and dignity are troubled with the report of every messenger, though never so base; whereas men of low degree and calling, for the most part, live quietly at ease, without any molestation.

Guilty before God.

As, in the maladies and diseases of the body, that disease is most dangerous that hath possessed and seized upon the body, and yet the body feeleth it not: so, likewise, in all God's judgments, it is most dangerous to stand guilty before God and not to know it; and yet many a man standeth guilty before God many years and never feeleth it.

Hardness of heart.

Zech. vii. 11.
Eph. iv. 19.

1. LIKE as we feel our sickness by contrary life and health: even so hardness of heart, when it is felt, argues quickness of grace and softness of heart; but, contrariwise, when hardness hath so possessed the heart that it is never felt, that is dangerous. This is the state of those who have their consciences seared as with a hot iron, who, by reason of custom in sin, are past all feeling, and who, likewise, despise the means of softening their hearts.

2 Cor. ii. 16.
Acts xix. 9.
Exod. ix. 34.

2. Like as, if the clearness of the sun do happen to shine upon the eyes of him that is blind, his eyes are not made clearer thereby, but rather more dim; or if one do shout or speak loud in the ears of him that is deaf, his hearing is nothing thereby quickened, but rather more dulled: even so, if any man shall propound and speak the truth to him whose heart is hardened, he is not made anything at all the better by it, but afterwards conceiveth more hatred against the truth.

3. As it is dangerous to the state of his body, whose vein, being stricken by the physician, sendeth forth no blood: even so dangerous is the condition for his soul that hath his heart smitten by the Word of God, but sheweth no tokens of repentance.

4. As, in some kind of sickness, a man may die languishing: so, likewise, where hardness of heart reigns wholly and finally, a man may descend to the pit of hell triumphing and rejoicing.

5. As we are careful to fly the infection of the bodily plague: so much more careful should we be to fly the common blindness of mind and hardness of heart, which is the very plague of all plagues—a thousandfold worse than all the plagues of Egypt.

Isa. xlviii. 4.
Jer. v. 3.

6. As there is nothing harder than the adamant stone, especially that which is had in the Indies, and which, in firmness, hardness, and value, exceedeth the rest, and yet is said to be subdued and mollified with the warm blood of a goat: so, likewise, the heart of man, being hardened through the continuance and custom of sin, will not be mollified, bridled, nor tamed, neither with the blood of a goat nor yet with the blood of that immaculate Lamb Christ Jesus, notwithstanding that He gave Himself a sacrifice for us upon the altar of the cross, and there bestowed His blood, that He might mitigate and appease our wild minds, and prick to the quick our hard and senseless hearts, and to open unto us the way to the attaining of eternal life and everlasting salvation.

Exod. xv. 5.

7. As a stone presseth to its centre: so a hard-hearted man is pressing towards hell.

Hatred.

1. LIKE as love beareth goodwill even to the dead, and wisheth them alive, and would, if it were possible, stay those from death who are condemned to die : even so hatred seeketh to slay the living and deemeth them unworthy of life who have offended never so lightly.

2. As the fire doth consume that substance whereby it is nourished : even so hatred consumeth the heart wherein it hath been nursed.

3. As the moth doth gnaw the garment where it is bred : so hatred gnaweth the heart wherein it was conceived.

4. As a bee stinging and pricking another doth lose his sting, and can neither make honey nor live but a small time after : so the heart, pricking another with the sting of hatred, doth lose many sweet virtues and killeth itself.

Health to be sought for of God.

1. As a good physician or surgeon will first remove the cause ere he begin to heal : Luke viii. 43. even so he that will recover his health must, first of all, go unto Jesus Christ, the Physician of the soul, that the cause may be removed ; then physic hath virtue and power to heal, and not before.

2. As the virtue attractive to draw Elisha from his work was not in Elijah's cloak, but 1 Kings xix. 19, 20. in the power of his words : even so the virtue of healing is not in the physicians, nor anything they take in hand, but in the Lord of life.

Hearers of the Word.

1. As desperate patients, who, at no hand, will practise the good physic given them, because they see their physicians somewhat sickly and crazy ; or as those men who, being as blind as a bat themselves, yet do most willingly refuse the true and faithful directions of their appointed guides, because, as they think, those guides have a blemish in one of their eyes : even so such are those hearers of the Word who say they will not believe the preacher, say what he can and will, because he doth not practise himself that which he preacheth to others.

2. As all those excellent creatures of God, so high, so singular, so pure, so precious, so beautiful, and so shining, were first formed, every one of them, by the word of the Lord, from that unfashioned, dark, and confused chaos, and are not, therefore, contemptible, but rather most highly to be esteemed, as apparent testimonies of the incomprehensible majesty, goodness, wisdom, power, and providence of God ; and as, for example, wine, which is so friendly to nature, such a strength to the weak, such a solace to the sorrowful, and in many ways so medicinable for men, is not, therefore, to be despised, because it is drawn from a warped, a wooden, or a worm-eaten barrel ; or as milk, which is such a strength unto nature, so wholesome for diet, and every way so wonderful in working, is not, therefore, to be misliked, because it is drawn from a hairy, a fat, or fleshy bag ; or as roses, which are most seemly in sight, so sweet to smell upon, and so meet for medicine, are not, therefore, to be rejected, for that they grow up among pricks, among brambles, and briers ; or as an electuary, which comforteth nature, purgeth corruption, and restoreth to health, is not, therefore, to be forsaken, because it is made of vile and bitter confections, or brought out of a loathsome box ; or as silver and gold, which are such singular treasures, so glittering in sight, and every way most necessary for men's uses, are not, therefore, to be abhorred,

Gen. i. 3. &c.
Ps. xxxiii. 8, 9 ;
cxlviii. 5.
Rom. i. 20.
Matt. xxiii. 2, 3.

because they are brought forth out of the lowest element, which is the earth ; or as precious stones, which are so seemly in show, so rich in value, and of such singular operation, are not, therefore, to be loathed, because they are commonly brought forth by filthy and venomous beasts ; or as silk, which is most precious, is, for all that, spun by the vilest worm ; or as the body of man, which, after a sort, may be called the final cause of all creatures, the most excellent in form, the perfectest in substance, and which only was ordained to eternal happiness, yet was both formed of earth and fashioned even of filthy clay,—by all which similes, we may truly conclude, that for so much as the aforesaid matters are not to be vilely esteemed, notwithstanding they do proceed from such vile and filthy beginnings : even so much less may the Word of the Lord be rejected by any hearers of the same, being truly preached, though the life and manners of those ministers thereof be never so much to be disliked of men.

2 Pet. i. 21.
1 Tim. iv. 6, &c.
Titus iii. 1, &c.
2 Sam. xxi. 1, &c.

3. As the physician, when he is sick, cannot heal himself, nor hath his judgment so perfectly as he had before he was sick, but seeketh help at another physician's hand : so the learnedest man living (though he be a preacher himself), as long as he liveth and beareth sinful flesh about with him, shall have many sinful and froward lusts and affections reigning in him, which blindeth his sight, that he seeth not his own sins ; and, therefore, it is very needful that he should often hear the sermons and counsels of others, although they be much his inferiors.

4. As a sponge gathereth up all liquor, whether it be good or bad : even so some hearers of sermons receive all that is spoken, good and evil.

5. As an hour-glass or conduit, through which in an hour the sand runneth in and through the same, in another hour runneth out again : so, likewise, some hearers forget in one hour that which they heard and learned in the hour before.

6. As a vessel that receiveth liquor, which being poured out, the dregs remain ; or as a sieve that casteth out the good corn, and retaineth only the chaff : even so some hearers of the Word preached do reject and neglect the wholesome and profitable doctrine, and keepin mind only that which is not so necessary and profitable.

7. Even as a dog (being other ways but a filthy beast) hath a tongue very medicinable for many maladies ; and as the dragon, though he be very cold of body himself, yet, for all that, there proceedeth a fire out of his mouth for the heat of others : so, likewise, some preachers, notwithstanding they be lewd in life and cold in godly conversation, yet, for all that, they may have such a tongue as may prescribe a very sovereign salve for the healing of their hearers' souls ; and they may also have such a mouth as may kindle a fire to consume the corruption of their hearers, and so also enflame them in newness of life ; and, therefore, to be heard willingly.

8. As a famished man, who doth never refuse any wholesome food prepared for him by his host, though his host himself will not taste thereof ; and, likewise, a very sick patient, who never rejecteth healthful medicine, though his physician doth minister the same with a leprous hand ; or as a miserable beggar will not forsake a fair piece of silver or gold, though it be proffered him in a filthy fist ; and like as unto an imprisoned rebel, who will never reject the prince's pardon, though it be brought him by a most lewd ribald ; or as a sorrowful, distressed caitiff would willingly hear any joyful news, notwithstanding the messenger who brings the same be a very ungracious varlet : so there can be no more dainty diet provided for Christians than the food of their souls ; there cannot be a more healthful medicine made for Christian hearers of the Word than that which amendeth their spiritual maladies, nor can a more golden gift be given unto them than the seven times purified gold of the sacred Scriptures rightly divided, neither can there be any more welcome pardon proclaimed to men than that which concerns the inheritance of everlasting life. Notwithstanding the preacher himself be careless, be leprous, be filthy, be beastly, or vile, yet the godly hearer will not forsake this heavenly food, or make light account of this wholesome medicine, or lightly esteem this gold, or reject this pardon, or scorn this news, but feed hungrily upon it, apply it in time, lay it up in his heart, yield all reverence unto it, and delight only therein, as in the very joy of his soul.

9. As a poor apprentice who is very desirous to learn his occupation thoroughly in every point, notwithstanding his master doth daily revile him, call him ass and dolt, yea, and sometimes doth surely swinge (flog) him, yet will he accept the same in good part, and by no means be driven from learning the mystery of his trade, seeing that it bringeth in the end a pleasure with profit: so, likewise, every Christian hearer of the Word should be so addicted to the love thereof, that, neither respecting some outrageous affections, nor yet weighing at all the disordered words which unadvisedly pass from some preacher's mouth, but, regarding rather the matter in hand, wholly fix their minds thereon, assuring themselves that, albeit the same seemeth sore at the first to flesh and blood, yet, in the end, it will bring quiet rest to their souls. Heb. xii.

10. As the anvil, or stithy, the more it is hammered, the harder it is: so most hearers of the Word, now-a-days, have their hearts so hardened in sin, and their consciences so seared as with a hot iron, that the hammer of God's Word cannot break them in pieces, nor zealous preaching approach to the quick, as it did before by the apostles, &c. Ps. xciv. 8.
Rom. ii. 5.
Eph. iv. 19.
1 Tim. iv. 2.
Jer. xlii. 29.
Acts ii. 41; viii. 24.

11. As it is the beastly nature of some horses to kick at their keeper, who provides them provender: so is it the mark of a degenerate mind for any man to murmur at the just reprehension of his pastor:

12. As a glass window receiveth in the light so soon as it shineth, and withstandeth every tempest or shower that beats at the same: so should every Christian hearer be ready to receive the light of the truth when he heareth it preached, and be likewise as careful to withstand and reject every error or false doctrine that doth slip from the preacher, and which, if received, will afterward move a tempest in his conscience by the sense of God's judgment.

13. As a riddle or sieve letteth the clear water issue forth quite, and keepeth only the chaff, or the mud that swimmeth aloft; or as a dainty and delicate dog, which, when one offereth him a good morsel of meat, will scornfully cast his head aside and catch a fly: so, in like manner, the malicious hearer, whatsoever good morsel of doctrine or instruction shall be proffered him by the preacher, the same shall surely fall to the ground; but if any vain or unsavoury matter shall slip from him, whereby he may sustain any reproach, that shall be sure to be caught and marked, and be cast in his teeth, &c.

14. As the thistle, which, if it be stroked upward, will not lightly molest a man, but, being stroked downward, doth prick him: so, surely, many hearers of the Word preached, so long as their minister doth preach pleasant things, they seek not to stir him at all, or be displeased with him, but so soon as he beginneth to rub them a little on the gall, and to touch them home to the quick, then they kick and storm at the same.

15. As meat, the more a man receiveth, the more it distempereth, if it be not digested: so the more a man learneth, and the more he heareth, the greater is his sin, if he grow not by it.

16. As the auditors of Ezekiel did willingly come and sit before him, and hear him, but they jested at his words, and would not do as he taught them: even so many will give preachers a hearing, but with their mouths they jest it out, and make no more reckoning of their sermons than they do of a fiddler and his song, and not so much. Ezek. xxxiii. 30-32.

17. As Nahash the Ammonite said, who would make a covenant with the men of Jabesh-gilead upon condition that he might put out their right eyes, and bring all that shame upon Israel: so, likewise, many hearers of the Word will, in effect, say to the Lord, "We are content to be Thy children, and to hear Thy preachers, and Thou shalt be our Father, so that we may have what we will, say what we will, and do what we will." 1 Sam. xi. 2.

Zeph. iii. 1, &c.

18. As, where the Word is not preached, there the people perish: so, where it is plentifully delivered, and the people negligent in hearing of it, and do not obey it, there is deep damnation and utter destruction shortly to be looked for.

19. As stony grounds, mingled with some earth, are commonly hot, and therefore have, as it were, some alacrity and hastiness in them, and the corn, as soon as it is cast into this ground, sprouteth out very speedily, but yet the stones will not suffer the corn to be rooted deeply beneath, and therefore, when summer cometh, the blade of the corn withereth, with roots and all: so, likewise, is it with those professors and hearers of the Word who have in their hearts some good motions by the Holy Ghost to that which is good. They have a kind of zeal to God's Word, they have a liking to good things, and are as forward as any others for a time, and do believe; but these good motions and graces are not lasting, but are like the flame and flashing of straw and stubble, neither are they sufficient to salvation.

20. As they that have any bodily diseases, if they refuse the physic ministered unto them, reap no profit at all, albeit the physician offer them medicines a thousand times: even so the preacher of the Word shall do no good by his preaching, unless his hearers and auditors attentively mark and carefully practise the same.

Gen. iv. 9.

2 Kings v. 25.

Mark vi. 17.

Acts vii.

1 Sam. xv. 20.

Jam. xii. 13.

Acts ii. 37.

Matt. xi. 16.

21. As the wicked and ungodly in old time, when they were reprehended by the Lord's prophets for their sins and wickedness, did either deny their fault committed—as Cain and Gehazi; or else they were angry, and used reproachful words, and sought revenge—as King Herod upon John the Baptist, and the elders to Stephen; or else they craftily and covertly excused themselves—as Saul did: even so do the wicked and ungodly hearers of the Word, when their sins and wickedness are spoken against and laid open by faithful preachers; whereas, contrariwise, the godly do acknowledge and confess their faults when they are reprehended—as David, and Ezekiel, and the men that heard Peter's sermon.

22. As children that are of such heavy, sad mould as that they are never moved with mirth nor with the crying of other children: even so such is the dullness of a number of people in hearing of the Word, who are no more moved with the judgments of God to fear, nor allured with the sweet promises of God to love and like, than if they were so many stocks or stones.

Heb. vi. 7.

Rom. i. 20.

Acts vi. 7.

23. As the fruitfulness of the earth, when the rain doth fall upon it, and when it yieldeth to them that labour in it fruits for them that dress it, is a testimony of God's blessing upon it: even so, when men profit by the labours which are bestowed upon them in the preaching of the Word, it is a testimony of God's blessing upon them.

James i. 23-25.

24. As he that looketh upon his bodily face in a glass, and by-and-by departeth away about other business, and forgetteth his fashion and form: even such are the forgetful hearers of the Word, who never practise that which is taught them.

Ezek. xlv. 9.

25. As, in the time of Ezekiel, those people that came to offer sacrifice might not go out of the same door whereby they came in: so those that come to hear God's Word should not come forth again unchanged in their affections, which were evil.

Matt. xxvi. 75.

26. As the cock did crow three times before Peter repented: even so the Lord hath much to do with us before we profit effectually by the hearing of His Word.

Eccles. viii. 2-4.

27. As the best way to purchase favour with princes is to honour their person and fulfil their commandments: so, likewise, the chiefest way to have God's favour is to honour His majesty, and to do His will revealed unto us in His Word preached.

Matt. xii. 42.

28. As where the dead carcase is, thither do the eagles resort: so, when God's Word is truly taught, to that place should Christians repair to hear it.

1 Pet. ii. 2.

29. As, when the parent hen feeds her young, every bird gapeth, and strugglETH, and stretcheth the neck to receive the food: so, when we come to hear sermons, every man must reach and stretch out his heart to receive the Word preached.

30. As the eagle continually soareth till it comes to the highest : so, also, Christians must still increase in knowledge, through and by the hearing of the Word, till they come to perfection. Heb. vi. 1.

31. As Pharaoh's ill-favoured kine devoured the fat kine, but yet remained as ill-favoured and lean as they were before : so, likewise, many that have heard sermon upon sermon for the space of thirty-six years are yet never the more reformed for all their hearing, but as lean in knowledge and godliness as they were before. Gen. xli. 3, 4.

32. As a carpenter, who should square all by his rule, yet sticks it at his back, and works all by aim (guess) : so many have heard much preaching, and remember many things, but yet make no profit or practice of it, so that it had been better that they had never heard it. Job xv. 22, &c.

33. As bees, passing over other things, take pleasure only in flowers, and, forsaking the rest, do crop them : so, likewise, some hearers of the Word preached do only desire to have their ears fed with fine phrases, delicate flowers of eloquence, dainty smiles, pretty comparisons, and pleasant histories ; as for sound doctrine, they condemn it, and hate to have it a bridle for their lusts, a reproof of their vanities, and a glass to see themselves in ; they seek rather after flatteries and fables, and they loathe the truth, which should do them good. 2 Tim. iv. 3.
Acts xvii. 21.

34. As God in some part did rebuke the sons of Eli for their wickedness, but yet they would not obey, and the reason is there set down because the Lord would destroy them : even so, in like manner, howsoever we may not judge of any man's person, yet this may be said, that if men will not learn, but remain ignorant still, and refuse to hear the Word of God preached when they may, or if in hearing they will not obey, it is a fearful sign that God will at length destroy them. 1 Sam. ii. 25.

35. Like as, when a trumpet is sounded in a man's ear, and he lies still, not stirring at all, he is certainly dead : so, surely, when the trumpet of the Gospel is sounded in the ears of our hearts, if we awake not out of our sins to newness of life, we are no better than dead men before God.

36. As it is very requisite that a pastor set over a congregation should be continually resident to preach unto them and catechise them at the least once every Sabbath, and not leave them to strangers, whose voice they know not : even so every Christian hearer of the Word ought ordinarily and usually to hear such a pastor, and not to go from him on the Sabbath-day, especially if he be desirous to grow and increase in faith and knowledge.

37. Like as, in times past, those trees which did bear fruit might not be cut down : so those Christians which have a care to lead a virtuous life, according to the prescribed rule of God's Word, are not in danger of St. John's axe—to wit, of the judgment of God for sin. Deut. xx. 19.
Matt. iii. 10.

38. As, of many men coming into a goldsmith's shop, one buyeth a chain of gold, another a costly ring, some a rich jewel, and some buy plate cunningly and curiously wrought, and some one among the rest stoopeth down and taketh up a black coal, which he turneth and tumbleth in his hands till it fouls and makes black his fingers : even so very many do come to the church to hear the Word preached, and do learn and bear away exceeding good and heavenly lessons, and do gather great strength to their faith, and much comfort to their souls, and peace to their consciences ; and some again do come without any good purpose, intending to take some occasion to quarrel with the preacher, and to mark if anything fall from him unwisely, indiscreetly, or barbarously, wherewith they may sport themselves and scorn him ; such as they came, with wicked purposes and cavilling minds, so they depart, with hearts as hard as adamants, seared consciences, and brazen faces, so bloodless that they cannot blush, and far worse than when they came.

39. Like as, when a man casteth a handful of corn upon a very hard and smooth path, it is all one as if it were cast upon a pavement : so, also, through the custom and deceitfulness of sinning, the devil hath made the hearts of some hearers unmeet to receive the heavenly food of the Word of God. Matt. xiii. 4.

Gen. vi. 13.
1 Pet. iii. 20.
2 Pet. ii. 5.
Matt. xiii. 3, 4.

40. As the men in the old world were disobedient to Noah, and contemned the preaching of righteousness: so many faithful Noahs preach the Word sincerely, but, alas! it falleth into the hearts of many only as good seed into evil ground, and therefore either bringeth forth little or else no fruit at all; and so the contempt of the Word of God was then, and is now, the cause of many plagues.

41. Even as hunting dogs never leave searching till they have found out the wild beast in one place or other: so careful hearers of the Word must never leave searching till they have found the Word, and never leave asking till they understand it.

42. As honey, which is naturally sweet, maketh those things sweet wherewith it is mingled: even so such is the lively nature of God's Word in the soul of a diligent hearer of the same.

43. As the ignorant ploughman, going in the field, trampleth and treadeth upon precious herbs, but when the skilful herbalist and physician come there, who know the virtue of them, they wonder at them, and gather them for their use: even so it is with ignorant and careless hearers and readers of the Word of God, but it is otherwise with diligent and careful hearers and readers thereof.

44. As there are many degrees before the grapes come to be wine—as, that they bud, flower, come into clusters, ripen, &c.: so there are many degrees before a hearer be fit for God—as, that he hear the Word preached and read, and that he lay it up in his heart, and practise it in his life.

John iii. 18; v. 24.

45. As a sick body who saith to the physician, "Prescribe me what you will, but I will take what I list," shall perish for all his physician: so, in like manner, such hearers of the Word of God as say to their preacher, "Say what you will, we will never believe you, but do as we list, and as we think good," such shall surely perish, and go to the devil, for all their hearing, without speedy repentance.

The irrecoverable destruction of obstinate Hearers.

Isa. xxx. 10, 14.

As an earthen pot, so broken to pieces, that a shard (fragment) of it cannot be found fit for any use: so shall the destruction of such be whose ears cannot abide the truth, but will needs have their preachers flatter them in their sins and soften them in their errors.

Hearing of the Word necessary to all.

Eph. iv. 16.

1. As a young child, after he is born, standeth in need of nourishment, that life may be both preserved and increased: even so he that is begotten anew by the seed of the Word of God must yet be fed by the same Word, that he may get strength and spiritual increase, till he come to some good measure of perfection.

2. Like as none will refuse a present or gift that is sent from a prince, although the bringer thereof be never so simple a body: even so, likewise, none ought to refuse to hear God's Word, although the minister be never so homely that preacheth it, because he is sent of God.

3. As the razor, though it be tempered with due proportion of steel, yet, if it pass not on the grindstone or whetstone, is, nevertheless, oftentimes unapt to cut—yea, though it be made once never so sharp, yet, if it be not often whetted, waxeth dull: even so there is no man so ripe in forecast, ready in policy, sharp in judgment, fervent in love, earnest in truth, zealous in religion, who, although he hath profited well by hearing of sermons, is therefore so sufficiently instructed that he needeth to hear no more, but rather, in truth, standeth in need often, from time to time, to hear advertisement (admonition), counsel, and direction, by the preaching of the Word.

4. As a tree, or a branch of a tree, that hath no deep rooting, but either is covered with a slight mould or else lieth in the water, at the season of the year bringeth forth leaves and blossoms, and some fruit too, and that for one or two, or more years, but is neither fruitful nor lasting : even so one that is a hearer of the Word may receive the Word, and the Word, as seed, by this general faith, may be somewhat rooted in his heart, and settled for a season, and bring forth some fruits in his life—peradventure very fair in his own and other men's eyes, yet, indeed, neither sound nor lasting, nor substantial. Luke viii. 13, &c.

5. As corn and herbs do die and wither, if they have not the first and latter rain and moisture in due season : so, likewise, faith and godliness must needs perish and decay in those who have not often the heavenly watering of God's Word to refresh them withal. Deut. xi 14 ;
xxviii. 12, 24.

6. As fire goeth out for lack of wood : so is faith extinguished in us for lack of the preaching of the Word of God, and earnest and hearty prayer, whereby it is maintained.

7. Like as one man may not believe for another, and as one cannot be saved by the faith of another, whosoever he be, if he himself do not believe in proper person : even so one man may not hear the Word preached for another in such sort as it may profit him, if he himself do not hear it in his own person. Rom. x. 14-17.

8. As a man may the better both spy his spots, that he may wash them, and also set his attire in the better order about him, if for that purpose he diligently view himself in a glass : even so he that is careful to avoid that which he should not do, and to execute that which he ought to do, hath very great help by hearing the Word preached, and by imprinting of it in his mind. James i. 23.

9. As iron, except it be used, doth become rusty : so the soul, except it be often exercised with hearing and reading the Word, begetteth sin.

Heart of man.

1. As a pot full of sweet liquor, if it be made hot and boiled upon the fire, will drive away flies, that they will not come near it, but if it be cold, the flies will by-and-by go into it, and it will receive them, and they will corrupt and consume it : even so the heart of man, if it be inflamed with a true and sincere love of God, will not receive into it those dangerous temptations which are continually flying about it, but will remove and drive them far off and give no place unto them ; but if, by reason of slothful idleness in heavenly things, and for want of a godly courage, it grow cold in the love of the Lord, then is it obvious and wide open to all temptations—it barreth out none, it receiveth all ; none are rejected, be they never so wicked ; all are embraced, entertained, and welcomed. Then is it a receptacle of all abominations—as idolatry, blasphemy, murder, adultery, and whatsoever is wicked, mischievous, and damnable.

2. Like as, if thou shalt cast into a censer odoriferous and sweet pomander balls, the whole house will be filled with a sweet savour and pleasant perfume ; but if thou shalt cast into it brimstone or some such matter, all the house will be full of a most horrible stink : so, in like manner, if thou shalt put into the heart of some man good and wholesome counsels, and shalt instruct him with godly advertisements (admonitions), and shalt open unto him the fountain of the truth, thou shalt bring to pass that there shall proceed out of his heart a great savour of a most sweet smell ; but if thou shalt fill him with evil and wicked counsels, and shalt persuade and draw him to impiety, hatred, treachery, and all abominations, thou shalt be the cause of an intolerable stink—there shall come out of his heart a most poisonous savour, wherewith not only his own heart, but the whole house wherein he is, and all the commonwealth where he abideth, shall be hurt, infected, and poisoned.

3. Like as, if one cast into a hot burning furnace wood and sticks that be sere and dry and ready to burn, there will arise and burn out a most pure and clear flame of fire ; but Rom. i. 20.

if he cast into the same furnace green sticks, wet and stinking rushes, or some other such matter, they will burn indeed, but the chimney and whole house will be filled with smoke, and will be even black, by reason of the thick darkness which proceedeth of the foul and stinking smoke : so the heart of man is a furnace continually burning. If thou wilt nourish it with cogitations and heavenly meditations of the love of God, there will appear and shine out of it a pure flame and bright light of true and unstained love, to God and man ; but if thou wilt cherish and maintain it with thoughts and devices of self-love, then it will be full of vile smoke, stink, and darkness.

Prov. xxiii. 26.

4. As the sun riseth first, and then the beasts arise from their dens, the fowls from their nests, and men from their beds : so, when the heart sets forward to God, all the members will follow after it — the tongue will praise Him, the foot will follow Him, the ear will attend Him, the eye will watch Him, the hand will serve Him ; nothing will stay after the heart, but every one goes like a handmaid after her mistress.

5. Like as that woman who would have her dough leavened, if she lay her dough in one place and the leaven in another, where one cannot touch the other, loseth her labour : even so he who would have his heart sanctified, comforted, and enlightened, and will not give it to God, who can and would do it, greatly deceiveth himself, for the tempter then cometh and keeps them asunder, and seizeth upon the heart, which he finds alone.

Gen. xxxiv. 1, &c.

6. Even as Dinah was deflowered when she strayed from home : so is the heart when it strayeth from God.

Gen. xxii. 6.

7. As Abraham, when he was bid to offer his son, rose up betime and left his wife at home, and never made Sarah privy, lest she should stop him, being more tender over her child, like women, than the father is : so we must give our heart to God before the flesh hear of it.

1 Sam. xxv. 18.

8. Like as, if Abigail had consulted with Nabal whether she should have supplied David with victuals or no when he sent, the miser would never have given his consent, for he scolded as soon as he heard of it ; therefore she went alone and gave that which he had asked, and never told her husband what she would do, lest he should hinder her, who sought her welfare and his too : so we should steal our hearts from the world as the world stealeth them from us, and transport them to God when the flesh is asleep.

James i. 8.
Eccles. ii. 13.
Acts iv. 32.

9. As no man sitteth upon two seats together, no man hunteth two games together, no man jousteth with two spears together : so he that hath two hearts, if he have a true heart of the one, he will have a false heart of the other.

10. As there be two colours, red and blue, in one rainbow : so there must be two afflictions, joy and sorrow, in one heart.

Matt. v. 8.

11. As a bright and shining resemblance or image may be seen plainly in a clear and pure looking-glass : even so doth the face, as it were, of the everlasting God shine forth and clearly appear in a pure heart.

Man's Heart naturally corrupt from the womb.

Gen. vi. 5 ; viii. 21.
Ps. xiv. 1-3 ; liii.
1-3.
Rom. iii. 10, &c.
Mark vii. 18, 21,
22.

1. As a tree whose root is rotten and infected with venomous sap bringeth forth none but corrupt and naughty (worthless) fruit : even so from man's heart, which is corrupt and naturally infected with the contagion of sin, can proceed nothing that is good, for that which is born of the flesh is flesh.

2. Like as a wolf can only engender a young wolf and a serpent a young serpent, and even as we do not leave off or cease to hate a young wolf although that he hath not yet eaten or worried any sheep, or a young serpent, notwithstanding that it hath not yet cast forth its venom, but do judge them worthy of death because of the perverse nature that is in them : so ought we to esteem and think that God hath no less occasion to hate and condemn us, even from our mother's womb, because of our perversity and natural malice engendered within us. And though the Lord should damn us eternally, He should do us no wrong, but only that which our nature meriteth and deserveth ; for although the young infant hath not yet done any work which we may judge to be evil and wicked, sith (since) he hath not yet the understanding, discretion, or the power to do it, yet it followeth not therefore but that the perversity and malice which is natural in man hath already its root in him as one part of his paternal inheritance, the which cannot please God ; for although it bringeth not forth its fruits, yet they do remain still there, as in their root, which will bring them forth in its time—as the venom is already in a serpent, although he bite not, and the nature of a wolf in a young wolf, how harmless soever he seemeth to be.

3. As a seal cannot be imprinted in adamant, which, by reason of the hardness thereof, will not yield : even so the heart of man is by nature so hard that it will not yield until it be wounded and bruised by the Spirit of God through the preaching of the law. Ezek. xi. 19.
Rom. ii. 5.
Ps. li. 17.

4. Like as, when the adamant is beaten to powder, it will then receive any print : even so, when the Lord shall bruise our hearts and batter our affections, and take the fence (guard) from them, then they will, no doubt, receive some impressions of God's anger and vengeance.

5. As wax melteth with the heat of the fire : so the heart of man fainteth with greatness of troubles and vexations. Ps. xxii. 14.

Hearts of strong men.

As the heart of a woman fainteth and yieldeth in travail : even so the hearts of strong men faint when God is become their enemy, and doth afflict and scourge their country. Jer. xlix. 24.

Our Hearts must be elevated daily to heaven.

1. As those who keep clocks are wont every day, once at the least, to pull up the plummets, lest their weight should draw them down so far that the course of the clock be hindered : so, in like manner, we must set apart some time of the day for the elevation and raising up of our minds to heaven by meditation on God's Word and prayer, lest our hearts should so far descend, through the weight of the cares of this world, that our course in godliness should be hindered and stopped.

2. As the mariner on the sea doth cast out the best jewels and most precious things, if they overload his ship and put it in danger of shipwreck : even so we, in this our pilgrimage, must cast from us the most precious things we enjoy—if it be our eye or our hand—if they hinder us in the race of godliness, and do press us down so that we cannot go on cheerfully as we ought. Matt. v. 29, 30;
xviii. 8.

Quiet Hearts.

EVEN as a quiet, calm, and pleasant water will show unto us, if we look into it, the very image and likeness of ourselves, as if it were a glass, but, being moved, stirred, and troubled, it doth not so : so, likewise, our own hearts, if they be quiet and not troubled with horrors nor distempered with fears, will plainly show us what we be, so that we may easily know ourselves and not be deceived, but, being filled with fears, tossed with terrors, and overwhelmed with troubles, they cannot do so. John xiv. 27.
Ps. lv. 4, 5.

Heaven.

Ps. cii. 25, 26.
Heb. i. 12.

1. As our clothes, when they wax old, we change them : even so heaven and earth and all that is in them shall be changed.

Isa. II. 6.

2. As smoke vanisheth and passeth away : so, likewise, heaven and earth and all that in them is shall vanish and pass away.

3. As we see many weak men who, for a prize, will enter into combat or jousts against those stronger than themselves, and, though they be overcome, yet will not give over till the last breath : so must we, for heaven, strive to excel in godliness those that have greater gifts than we, and never give over.

We are Heirs, not through works, but through grace.

Rom. iv. 5, 6, 8.

1. As an earthly father doth give unto his children according to their deeds—that is, inheritance to them that are obedient, and disinheriteth them that be disobedient : even so God our heavenly Father promiseth inheritance to His children ; but those who, instead of being children, are obstinate and enemies, He suffereth them not to enjoy the inheritance.

Rom. vi. 23.

2. As it is manifest that the children of an earthly father are neither children nor heirs through desert of their works : so, after the same sort, the children of God are neither children nor heirs because of their works, but through the grace of adoption, which is received by faith alone ; and yet, notwithstanding, both of them do give unto their children according to their deeds.

Hell vanquished and overcome by Christ.

Judges ix. 45.

As a city or town that is sacked, razed, and beaten down, even to the ground, and which is ploughed, sown over with salt, and harrowed, is unable to recover itself or to harm the enemies that have served it so : even so Christ our Saviour hath given such a conflict and overthrow unto Satan by His death. He hath so bruised and broken his head, and gotten such a conquest and victory over all the powers of hell, that now they are no more able to hurt the children of God ; but for them only hell is overcome, and unto them alone this victory is gotten, hell having still full power over the unfaithful.

Vain is the Help of man.

Jer. xviii. 5, 6.

As heath in the dry and desolate wilderness, where no habitation is, is apt and good for nothing, and yet easy to be consumed with fire : so, also, the man that putteth his trust in man, and maketh flesh and blood his strength and defence, and passeth not on to the Lord, he shall not see any good, but shall perish together with his helps.

Heretics.

1. As one being bitten with a mad dog will not only run mad himself, but also with his contagion infect others : so they who have conceived any pernicious doctrine or heresy will not only themselves be infected, but also with their infection utterly mar and defile others.

2. As the wind doth not carry away the sound and good wheat, but only the light chaff ; neither doth a storm overturn a tree fast and soundly rooted : even so no more doth every wind of doctrine carry away true members of the Church, but the chaff and rotten members only, as heretics, ignorant persons, hypocrites, fantastical heads, new-fangled men, &c.

3. As unconscionable vintners mingle their wine with water: so heretics corrupt the truth and mingle their own conceits with it.

Hiding of faults.

As they are very hardly cured who have no sense or feeling of their disease—for example, those that have the lethargy and frenzy: even so none are more hardly brought to goodness than those who do hide their faults.

High estate of life dangerous.

As a tree set upon the top of a mountain is mightily shaken and easily rent up by the roots with every blustering blast and storm of wind: even so man in this world, the more and higher he is exalted, the more and greater dangers is he subject unto.

Luke i. 52.
James iv. 6.
Luke vi. 44.

High-minded men.

As the hawk is lost when, trusting to her wings, she riseth and mounteth too high: even so do vain and proud men fall from God when, with their own wit, reason, and wisdom alone, they will understand the deep mysteries of God, as though the counsels and wisdom of God's eternal majesty might and could be comprehended with the reason and wit of man.

Rom. xi. 20.

Holy days.

LIKE as the children of Israel, when they had made a molten calf and offered burnt-offerings and brought peace-offerings, did then ordain a holy day, which they spent in eating, drinking, and pastime, which corruption they took from the Egyptians: even so, likewise, our holy days, which came from popish idolators and idolatrous papists, are, for the most part, spent and consumed in idle pastimes, in much vanity and belly cheer.

Exod. xxxii. 5, 6.
1 Kings xli. 28, &c.
1 Cor. x. 7.

The Holy Ghost compared to fire and water.

1. As the fire is pure and clean and can suffer no uncleanness: so the Holy Ghost doth purge, cleanse, and lighten the consciences of Christians, setting them on fire with the love of God.

Matt. iii. 11.
Luke iii. 16.

2. As fire is an element exceeding pure and clean, and so necessary for man's life, that we may in nowise want or forego it: so, also, the water is very needful for us, being of a very clear, pure, and clean nature, and very meet to represent and signify the nature, office, and properties of the Holy Ghost. Or as the water doth renew and comfort the earth, making it fertile, causing it to bring forth fruit, and also doth wash away the filthiness of the body: so the Holy Ghost doth wash, purify, refresh, and water the hearts and consciences of the faithful, moving, stirring, persuading, ruling, enlightening, and, finally, comforting and making them to bring forth pleasant fruits acceptable to God.

Isa. lv. 7; xlv. 3.
Ezek. xxxvi. 25.
John iii. 5; vii. 37.

3. Like as water doth put out fire and quench thirst: so the Holy Ghost doth quench the fire of the evil concupiscences of the flesh, and doth also quench the thirst of poor

John iv. 13, 14;
xv. 7.

troubled souls, satisfying them for evermore—yea, He doth assuage, ease, and comfort the griefs and mourning of the godly, who commonly are in this world most afflicted, and whose sorrows do pass all human consolation, whereof He hath the proper name Paraclete, or the Comforter.

4. Like as in this life it cometh to pass in the elect and chosen, as we see it by experience in bladders, if they be empty and thrown into the water forthwith they sink, but if they be blown and filled with wind, they float and swim above like a bubble, and sink not under the water: even so men's minds, being as yet void and destitute of the Spirit of God, are drowned in their inordinate desires, sensuality, pleasures, and other sundry passions and worldly affections; but when they are replenished and filled with the Holy Ghost they triumph over sin, and are of it never overcome, so that by His means we have ability to will those things that are right and to do those things that are good.

Matt. iii. 11.
John iii. 5.

5. As it is the nature of fire to warm the body that is benumbed and frozen with cold: so, when a man is benumbed and frozen in sin—yea, when he is even stark dead in sin—it is the property of the Holy Ghost to warm and quicken his heart, and to revive him.

6. As it is the property of water to cleanse and purify the filth of the body: even so the Holy Ghost doth spiritually wash away our sins, which are the filth of our nature.

7. As oil doth strengthen the members and make them more nimble, and doth also restore and heal them being broken: so much more doth the Holy Ghost make us cheerful and quick readily and constantly to perform the duties of our calling.

8. As fire altereth things sometimes by burning out, sometimes by inflaming: so the Holy Ghost altereth man by regenerating—burneth out by mortifying the old man, and inflameth by quickening and raising up the new man.

The Holy Ghost God.

As Christ is called the Word of God, not a word of letters or syllables, but a substantial Word—that is, being for ever of the same substance with the Father: even so the Holy Ghost is called the virtue (power) of the Most Highest, not because He is a created quality, but because He is the substantial virtue of the Father and the Son, and therefore God equal with them both.

The Holy Ghost is Maker of the world.

Gén. i. 2.
Ps. civ. 30.

As the hen is borne by her eggs, and as she sitteth upon them, and so hatcheth her young: even so the Holy Ghost was borne upon the waters, and sat upon them, and thus were brought forth and hatched all creatures which have life in the world.

The Holy Ghost worketh where and in whom He will.

John iii. 8.

1. LIKE as the wind bloweth in what quarter of heaven it listeth, and where it beginneth blowing, and where it endeth, no man can tell, neither can any man devise means to stop the course of it: even so, with like liberty, and with the like open appearance, worketh the Holy Spirit of God where and in whom He will, and no power or ability of man is able to resist and withstand Him.

2. As, of dry wheat, one lump cannot be made without moisture, nor one loaf: so neither could we, that are many, become one in Christ Jesus without water, which is from heaven—that is, without the Holy Ghost.

The Holy Spirit regenerateth not all.

As the sun doth not warm everything that it enlighteneth : so neither doth the Spirit regenerate, nor draw to the love of wisdom, all whom it illuminateth, and to whom He giveth the knowledge of His doctrine, but only the godly and the faithful. Matt. xxiv. 46.

The Holy Spirit the earnest-penny of our inheritance.

1. As with a thing that is bought there is sometimes given an earnest-penny—to wit, some part of the money agreed on, as well for the beginning of the payment as by consequent—for the assurance that the bargain shall be held firm : so, likewise, the Holy Ghost, who, by faith, engendereth peace and joy in the hearts of the faithful, is the earnest-penny, assuring us, by this beginning of spiritual blessings, which God promiseth to His children, that He holdeth us for His possession, purchased to the praise of His glory, and that at length He will gather us into the full enjoyment of the inheritance of heaven. Eph. i. 13, 14.
Rom. viii. 29, 30.

2. Like as, when a man doth purchase an inheritance, he first giveth earnest—that is, some part of the money promised—that serveth as a beginning to the payment of the total sum : so God, having redeemed us by the blood of Jesus Christ, giveth the earnest-penny of His Holy Spirit—that is to say, a beginning of knowledge of the true God, of sanctification, of love to God, of righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit, attending until He finish in us the communication of that light, joy, holiness, and glory that we shall have perfectly in heaven. Eph. i. 13, 14.

3. As among men, concerning things that pass to and fro and be in question, yet, when the seal is put to, they are made out of doubt : even so when God, by His Spirit, is said to seal the promise in the heart of every particular believer, it signifieth that He gives unto them evident assurance that the promise of life belongs unto them. Eph. iv. 30.

Holiness.

As the greater riches that a man hath, the greater is his gain, desire, and increase of riches : so the more holiness that any man hath, the more carefully ought, and the more fruitfully may, he labour in increasing it. Phil. iii. 13.

Hope.

1. As a man, passing through a very swift flood, doth not look down to the water, lest it should make him giddy, and so he be in danger of falling, but he hath his eyes fixed on the bank or shore that he goeth over unto : even so a Christian, passing through the waves of the troubles of this world, lifteth up his eyes to heaven, and beholding there, with a spiritual regard, the quiet bank that he shall come to by Christ, respecteth not the troubles and torments that he is in, which troubles and torments the wicked do respect, and that is it that casteth them into desperation.

2. As the whole use of the anchor is to hold fast the ship in one sure and certain place, notwithstanding all tempests and waves beating against it, because it entereth into the very depth and bottom of the sea, there taking fast hold : even so the principal use of hope is to enter into the heaven of heavens, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, and to hold fast our souls there with Him, notwithstanding all the waves and tempests of Satan, sin, and condemnation do beat daily and continually against them.

Horror of sin bringeth remorse of conscience.

Jer. li. 26, 27.

As the thief or wicked person cannot be brought unfeignedly to confess his fact (deed) before it be made known, and he himself attached (arrested) to appear before a judge, that he may be condemned for the same: so, likewise, the case standeth with every one of us, who, by nature, are no better than thieves and murderers before the Lord, that we can by no means be brought in truth to confess our sins before the monstrousness and ugly shape thereof, with the pain and penalty due thereunto, be set before our own consciences and we, as it were, summoned before God's judgment-seat to be condemned for the same.

The Lord's Hosts are mighty.

Jer. xvi. 16.

1. LIKE as fishers, with nets and hooks, catch fish in great number: even so shall they that God stirreth up to execute His judgments against any people catch and destroy great plenty of them.

Jer. xlvii. 2.

2. As floods overflow and destroy all: even so they by whom God plagueth any land or people do spoil all.

Houses of the wicked.

Jer. v. 27.

1. As cages do ordinarily serve for keeping of birds: even so the houses of wicked and ungodly men do ordinarily serve for inventing of deceits.

2. As, for the most part, cages are full of birds: so the dwelling-places of the wicked are replenished with all manner of guiles, whereby they become great and rich.

Humanity, or gentleness.

LIKE as pride oppresseth love, provoketh disdain, kindleth malice, confoundeth justice, and at length subverteth states: even so humanity stirreth up affection, augmenteth amity, maintaineth love, supporteth equity, and most soundly preserveth cities and countries.

Not proud, but Humble men do profit by reading and hearing of the Word of God.

1. As the bough of a tree, the fuller it is of fruit, the weightier it is, and the greater and more plentiful fruit it beareth, the lower it stoopeth, and humbleth itself the more; but the proud man, like a fruitless and barren bough, lifteth his head on high, not seeking the profit and good of his soul, but the idle praises of men and the vainglory of the world.

Deut. xxix. 29.
Ps. xxv. 14.
Isa. lxvi. 2.

2. Even as, if any man should steadily look upon the bright sphere of the sun, he would become blind, because the weak sight of the eyes is not able to abide so great a brightness: so whosoever, trusting to his own wit, shall cast the eyes of his mind upon the wonderful and unspeakable brightness of the secrets of God, he shall be overthrown of the same, and the sight of the mind being blinded and put out, he shall never attain to that which he would, because the great and hidden mysteries of the Most High God cannot be comprehended by man's wit, being puffed up with pride; or else there should be no difference between God and man, if man of himself could attain unto the secrets of God's eternal majesty, sealed up in His blessed Word, and not to be opened but by the mighty power of His most Holy Spirit.

The Lord Humbleth us in this world, that He may exalt us in the world to come.

As he that would have a little flame of fire to mount and rise up on high first keepeth it low, and holdeth it down with the force of a fan and the gathering together of much wind : even so God presseth us down and keepeth us low, that He may lift us up and exalt us on high. He throweth us down here on earth that He may exalt us in heaven, and layeth many times disgrace upon us in this world among men, that we may be gracious in the world to come, with Himself, His angels, and His saints.

Humility.

1. As the leaves wherewith the stem of the lily is set from the root to the top, by little and little, as they grow up to the top, wax smaller and smaller : so the godly, as they grow higher in preferment, wax humbler and smaller in their own sight.

2. As the valleys ordinarily are more abundant and bring forth more fruit than do the mountains, by reason that, being lower, they receive more commodiously (advantageously) all the dew and fatness which falleth and descendeth from the high hills : even so it behoveth that every Christian be more and more lowly and humble in his own eyes, if he will that God endue and replenish him with His graces, the which can find no place in him that presumeth any whit on his own virtues.

1 Sam. xv. 17
Isa. lxvi. 2.
James iv. 10.

3. As they that go or walk in a plain way are not in so great danger to fall as they who go upon the ridge of houses or upon the top of some high mountain : even so they that will be humble and have no opinion of themselves, they go a great deal more safely and surely than they who have proud hearts and lofty looks, for the way that leadeth to life is strait.

4. As sheep by nature are meek, innocent, and harmless : even so such as be good Christians ought to be humble and meek, and rather to suffer wrong than do any, and not to be cruel like lions, ravenous like wolves, wily like foxes, lecherous like goats, filthy like swine, or to show themselves in behaviour like savage and wild beasts.

5. Like as the sun being high, at noon, causeth short and small shadows, but being low, in the morning or evening, it causeth the same to appear both broad and large : so, by how much the more a man is endued with virtue and godliness, by so much the less he desireth the boasting and advancement of himself ; whereas, on the contrary part, one endued with the smack and smell of virtue will straight crack, brag, yea, and make thereof his boasts.

6. As eggs that be full do sink in the water, but those that are empty do swim above : so he that is adorned with true virtue and learning will not so much brag or boast himself as he that is otherwise.

7. As no man is so thankful for health as he that hath been in continual sickness : even so no man feeleth the mercy of God that is not truly humbled in his own sight.

8. As it is honourable for a man, when he is bidden to a feast, to be removed higher than he offereth to sit, rather than to be removed lower : even so humility in our dealings bringeth honour and estimation.

Luke xiv. 9, 10.

9. As proud persons stay themselves upon their own strength—that is, they stay upon a reed, and upon the ice of one night's freezing, and are like unto smoke that mounteth up on high, and so in going up is scattered and consumeth to nothing : even so, contrariwise, the humble man is a rock or a square body, which is always stayed, on which side soever it be turned.

1 Cor. viii. 1;
xiii. 1.

10. As brass or copper doth make a greater sound, and is heard further off than gold, whereas, notwithstanding, gold is far more excellent than either : so eloquence joined with knowledge soundeth louder and farther than humility coupled with charity, and yet such humility is far better and more excellent than the other.

11. As the high hills after much tillage are often barren, whereas the low valleys, by the streams of waters passing through them, are very fruitful : even so the gifts of God joined with a swelling heart are fruitless, but joined with love and the grace of humility they edify.

Matt. vii. 17.
Luke i. 52, 53.
James iv. 6.

12. As a tree, the more deeply it is rooted in the earth, the taller it groweth and mounteth the higher : even so a man, the more humble and lowly that he is, the more and higher doth the Lord exalt him.

Luke xiv. 11;
xviii. 14.
Matt. xxiii. 12.

13. As a building is so much the firmer and stronger, as the foundation and ground-work of the same is laid lower and deeper : even so the ground-work of Christian philosophy is unfeigned humility, and the deeper the same is laid and settled in our hearts, the surer and more permanent will the building of our religion be.

Matt. vii. 13, 14;
xi. 29; xviii. 3, 4.

14. Even as we see sometimes two men about to go into some sumptuous and stately hall or house, through a very low and narrow door, the one stooping and bending himself doth pass through and go in without harm ; the other, stout, not stooping nor bending at all, but pressing in with great force, hurteth his head and falleth backward : even so such a stately and princely place is the kingdom of heaven, the habitation of the saints of God, whose way is very strait, as Christ affirmeth, and the door thereof is low and narrow ; so that that man who humbleth himself and stoopeth low doth enter into that most stately and princely house of the King of heaven, but he that is puffed up with pride and swelled with insolency cannot get in at that gate ; he falleth to the ground, for his pride doth throw him backward.

15. As spices smell best when they are smallest beaten : so a Christian's good works are more acceptable to God when they are lessened by humility.

16. As pride and a good conscience can never go together : so humiliation of heart is the beginning of all grace and religion ; and such as have knowledge in religion and many other good gifts, without humility, are but unbridled, unmortified, and unreformed persons.

17. As the valleys are more usually fertile than the hills, for that the fatness of the earth is more easily carried thither by rains and showers : so must it be with us. If we will be filled with the graces and blessings of our God, we must be humble, low, and plain as the valleys.

18. As that great orator, Demosthenes, who, being demanded what was the first, second, and third especial point of rhetoric, answered always, "Action" : so may we, likewise, say of true humility, that it is the principal part of Christianity, and, as it were, all in all—yea, the life and soul thereof—so that it be true, entire, and unfeigned.

19. As the heavier the burthen is, the more it presseth down : so, likewise, the more and the more heinous that our sins be, the greater is and ought to be our humiliation.

20. As it is in the parts of holiness, that the more they are practised by the body in the life and action, the more they are confirmed and increased inwardly in the soul : so the more that a man giveth himself to the use of all the outward exercises of humility before men, the more doth he humble himself in the sight of God.

2 Cor. iii. 5.
John vi. 44.

21. As trees growing on the tops of hills have a rough bark, crooked knots, long boughs, and, therefore, unfit for any building until they be fallen, piled, squared, drawn home, and can do nothing of all these themselves : so, likewise, we, as long as we be wandering in the mountains and wild woods of this world, being high-minded, and in great wealth or authority above others, as on a hill, we have froward, proud minds, and not meet for God's house until we be humbled and made lowly in our own sight, and fall flat down at Christ's feet, and have the rough bark of our old Adam pulled off, and our crooked affections cut away, and be mortified and drawn home by the preaching of His Word and the working of His Holy Spirit.

Humility ought to go before dignity.

1. As some birds, before they fly out and mount on high, stoop down with their heads and touch the ground with their bills: so every man, before he be advanced to any high dignity, ought to show great humbleness of mind and a casting down of himself.

2. Like as wheat, the weightier, sounder, and better it is, the lower place it desireth and seeketh: even so the humble man, the wiser and more gracious that he is, the more pleasure and delight he hath in Christian humility and lowliness; but the proud man, being lighter than the wind, lifteth up and extolleth himself above all things; whereupon it cometh to pass that he perverteth all the laws of God and man for the sake of that sovereignty which he falsely imagineth to belong unto himself alone.

Luke xiv. 10.
1 Cor. iv. 7.

The Husband and wife's duty.

1. As the ancient counsellors of King Solomon gave wise advice and counsel unto Rehoboam, king of Israel, to the end that he might win the love and good liking of the people—"Speak kindly unto them," said they, "and they will serve thee for ever!" which counsel not being followed, great inconvenience and mischief after befel unto him, &c.: even so, likewise, if the husband be desirous to procure the love of his wife, and to win her to God—or if the wife would also procure the love of her husband, and win him to God—then they must draw on one another with sweet and gentle words of love, speaking kindly one to another, because gentle words do pacify anger, as water queneth fire; but if they shall use taunts or words of reproach, and despite one against another, much hurt may ensue thereof, for a little leaven soureth the whole lump.

1 Kings xii. 7, &c.
Prov. xv. 1.

2. As the spiteful Jews, who hated the Lord Jesus, would not vouchsafe to give Him His name when they talked of Him or with Him, but, to show their utter dislike of Him, they used to say, "Is this He?" or, "Art Thou He that wilt do such a thing?" "Is not this He?" &c. Again, "Whither will He go that we shall not find Him?" They would not say, "Is not this Jesus Christ, or the Son of God?" This is a most spiteful kind of speaking, and doth bewray the abundance of malice that was hidden in their hearts: even so it sometimes falleth out betwixt the husband and the wife, betwixt the father and the son, betwixt the master and his servant, &c., that they will not speak dutifully one to another, but contempt, disdain, anger, and malice will not suffer the one to afford unto the other their names and their titles, lest they should be put in mind of those duties which those names require, out of which Satan sucketh no small advantage; whereas many times the very name of a husband or wife, father or son, master or servant, &c., doth greatly help to persuade the mind and to win the affection—yea, the very mentioning of these names doth oftentimes leave a print of duty behind in the conscience.

John vii. 11, 15, 15.

3. As the mistress-bee abideth always in the hive, and will not suffer any bees to be idle, and those bees that should work and labour without she sendeth them to their work, and whatsoever any of them bringeth home she marketh, receiveth, saveth, and disposeth it, until the time come that it must be occupied, and, when the time cometh that it must be occupied, then she distributeth everything according as reason requireth; and those bees that abide within she causeth them to weave and make the fair honeycombs after the best manner; and she taketh care that the young bees be well fed and orderly brought up but when they come to that age and to that point that they be able to work, she sendeth them out with one, the which they follow as their guide and captain: even so a good housewife must abide within the house, and those her servants who must work abroad she sendeth them to their work, and they that must work within she sendeth them to it; and such provision as is brought in she receiveth it, and that which must be spent of it she parteth and divideth it, and that which remaineth of it she layeth it up and seeth it kept safe until time of need; and she is careful that that which is appointed to be spent in a twelvemonth be not spent in a month.

4. As he who poureth water into tubs full of chinks and holes, thinking to fill them, loseth his labour: even so the husband that provideth things necessary for housekeeping shall avail little, except the wife carefully save and keep that which is provided and brought home.

Husband the head over his wife.

1 Cor. xi. 3.
Eph. v. 23-25, &c.

1. LIKE as the head seeth and heareth for the whole body, ruleth and guideth the body, and giveth it strength of life; or as Christ doth defend, teach, and preserve His Church, and is the Saviour, comfort, eye, heart, wisdom, and guide thereof: even so must the husband be head unto his wife in like manner, to show her like kindness, and after the same fashion to guide her, and rule her with discretion for her good and preservation, and not with force and wilfulness to entreat her.

2 Kings v. 13, 14.

2. Even as the master is to counsel his servant, and likewise to hear the good counsel of his servant, as Naaman heard his servant: so, in like manner, the husband's duty is to counsel and admonish his wife, yet so, that when he faileth in duty, he is to hear her good counsel and admonition, either concerning heavenly matters or worldly affairs, she, notwithstanding, considering her estate and condition under him, and in humility confessing herself to be the weaker vessel.

Gen. iii. 16.
1 Pet. iii. 1.
Col. iii. 18.
Eph. v. 22.

3. As it is with a lute or other musical instrument, two strings concurring in one tone, the sound, nevertheless, is imputed to the strongest and highest: even so, in a well-ordered household, there must be communication and consent of counsel and will between the husband and the wife, yet such as the counsel and commandment may rest in the husband.

Eph. v. 24.
1 Cor. xiv. 34.
Numb. xxx. 7.

4. Like as the Church must depend upon the wisdom, discretion, and will of Christ, and not follow what it listeth: so must the wife also rule and apply herself to the discretion and will of her husband, because the government and conduct of everything resteth in the head, and not in the body.

5. As it were a monstrous matter, and the means to overthrow the person, that the body should, in refusing all subjection and obedience to the head, take upon it to guide itself and to command the head: so, likewise, were it for the wife to rebel against the husband.

The Husband's duty to his wife.

1 Pet. iii. 7.

1. As a crystal glass is a precious and profitable vessel, and yet so brittle that a man doth more carefully take heed of breaking it than of some earthen or tin vessel, the one being more base and the other more strong: so, also, the husband ought to have such regard of the frailty of his wife, that he may bear with her and entreat her with gentleness and discretion, that he may use her as a precious vessel, to his comfort and joy.

1 Sam. i. 8.

2. As, in a great stormy wind, a man lappeth his cloak about him, and holdeth it fast for fear of losing it, but, when the wind is down and the weather calm, he letteth it hang easily : so, when husbands will, as it were, perforce wrest away their wives' infirmities, many of them will obstinately resist; yet, contrariwise, by sweet words and loving exhortations, they might be won voluntarily to forsake them.

3. As it is mere folly for a husband to praise and commend his wife in company : so is it as dangerous to check and reprove her before witnesses.

4. As God created the woman not of the head, and so not equal in authority with her husband : so, also, he created her not of Adam's foot, that she should be trodden down and despised, but He took her out of the ribs, that she might walk jointly with him, under the conduct and government of her head. Gen. ii. 21.

5. As God hath testified His singular goodness unto man, in creating him a helper to assist him : even so the husband ought to consider in how many sorts she is to him a helper to pass over this life in blessedness. Gen. ii. 18.

Hypocrites.

1. As the cotton head of the herbs lysimachia, fodefoot, dandelion, and fleabane, which a blast of wind carrieth clean away : so, likewise, the religion and zealous profession of hypocrites, when a little trouble or persecution ariseth, are then carried clean away.

2. As the small herb biscort hath smooth and plain leaves like unto the herb patience, but in the earth hath a crooked root : so many bear a smooth countenance and a fair show outwardly, seeming to take all well, who inwardly have a crooked and an evil heart in meaning.

3. As the small celandine springeth and flowereth at the coming of the swallows and summer birds, but withereth at their departing : so many men, professing religion, rise at the warm prosperity of some, and fall away at their departure into the stormy winter of adversity.

4. As holewort with the solid root and holewort with the hollow root never grow together the one by the other in the same garden : so hypocrites and hollow-hearted Christians will ever be among the sound and sincere Christians in the same Church, though the faith of the one groweth not with the other, but dieth. It is, however, otherwise in the Church invisible.

5. As the sound-rooted holewort is always the smaller, the hollow-rooted holewort the greater : so hypocrites are commonly greatest in worldly matters and substance, and the greatest in worldly things are commonly hollow-hearted.

6. As silkworms, after they have for a time brought out their silk, at the last turn into moths or butterflies : so some, having done good in the Church for a time, fall afterward and become vain persons, and sometimes, with the silkworms, consumers of that good which they have wrought.

7. As dodders have properties according to the herbs whereon they grow, being hotter when they grow on hot herbs than upon cold : so many are zealous or cold in religion according as their masters are upon whom they hang ; they grow hot and also cool with them.

8. As the herb oleander maketh a goodly and beautiful show, yet hath scarce one good property, but is deadly to the users of it : even so are hypocrites.

9. As the herb horseflower, or melampyrum, hath seed like to wheat, yet is hurtful to corn : so, likewise, are hypocrites to godly Christians.

10. As the herb called horned claver, after it hath once borne seed, perisheth, both branch and root : so shall hypocrites do.

11. As the wild Caroline thistle is by the receivers found hot of operation, yet by nature is cold : so many evil men to others seem hot for a time in profession, yet have cold hearts within them.

12. The mulberry-tree is counted the wisest of all trees, because it only bringeth forth its leaves after the cold frosts be past, so that it is not hindered as other trees be : but, in Christianity, he is but a fool and a hypocrite that professeth not openly till dangers be past, and till he may do it without loss or hindrance.

13. As the flower of periwinkle, milkwort, and lysimachia is pleasant to behold, yet without savour : so hypocrites make a fair show, yet are unsavoury to the nostrils of the Lord.

14. As the small tornesell, when it hath made a show for a time with white velvet leaves and yellow flowers, fadeth away, without bringing forth any fruit : so hypocrites, when they have made a fair show for a time, fall away, without bringing forth any fruits of godliness.

15. As mousetail and adder's-tongue flower in April, and are ripe in May, and shortly after the whole herb perisheth in the pride of the year : so many people, at the beginning of religion, make a great show, but fall away long ere troubles come, even in the midst of the Church's prosperity.

16. As the seed of mercury is commonly lost before it be ripe : so many lose their religion before it come to perfection.

17. As the stinking coriander bringeth forth a sweet seed : so a hypocrite and wicked man sometimes utters good words.

18. As a wooden leg set to the body is no member of the body : even so a Christian who doth only in show and name profess Christ, such a one is no true member of Christ's mystical body, but a hypocrite.

19. As there needeth no more but one pin or prick to pierce a bladder, and to make all the wind therein enclosed incontinently to come forth : even so there needeth no more but one very little temptation to pull the vizard from hypocrites, and to discover them to every man, who shall know after that they be tried that there was nothing but a colour and an imagination of all the reputation of righteousness and virtue which they had gotten amongst men.

20. As sea-wormwood, if it be in a natural and proper place, is of a very strong smell, salt, and of a most strange and bitter taste, but if it be removed into gardens or grounds naturally holpen with sweet waters, it doth marvellously alter, and yet is sea-wormwood still : so the wicked in their own company are most ungracious, but coming into the Church, where the sweet streams of God's Word run, they seem greatly changed for a time, and yet remain wicked men still.

21. As the herb biscort, though it have straight and smooth leaves, yet is rightly called by that name, because the root in the earth is crooked and writen : so, though many make outwardly a fair profession, yet the Lord condemneth them as wicked, because he seeth their heart within to be wickedly set.

22. As the yellow wolf's-bane flowereth in winter, and yet a venomous and naughty herb for all that : so many make a fair show even in adversity, yet are evil men for all that.

23. Even as some birds hatch other birds' eggs, forgetting their own : so, in like manner, hypocrites hatch other men's discredit upon little or no ground, but forget their own lives, that are full of gross sins and hypocrisies.

24. Like as a good and fair cloak, being large, so covereth a man, that many things may be carried under it and conveyed cleanly which he would be loth and ashamed to

Rom. x. 3.
2 Cor. iiii. 5.
1 Cor. ii. 14.

2 Sam. ii. 12, &c.

1 Pet. ii. 16.
1 Cor. iv. 2.

have seen : even so hypocrites' craft and deceit hideth and covereth their untruth, which to be plainly seen and perceived they would be ashamed.

25. As drunkards err, go astray, and are not able to guide and direct themselves in their way : even so shall it be with wicked hypocritical priests, prophets, and ministers, for they shall fail in vision and stumble in judgment, as by experience may manifestly be seen by many. Isa. xxviii. 7.

26. Like as, when we see tares to grow in the corn-fields amongst the wheat till harvest, which cannot without some hurt to the wheat be rooted out before : so wicked hypocrites and other evil men, of whom there is hope that they may be converted, shall be always in the outward account of the Church till the end of the world. Matt. xiii. 29, 30.

27. Like as graves, upon which lie fair stones, costly engraven with imagery, and having inscriptions in brass, and the arms of them that lie in them fair set forth and blazed by heralds' cunning, have yet within them nothing but a rotten stinking carrion : even so are hypocrites, who outwardly bear a glorious show before men, but inwardly before God are most foul, filthy, and loathsome. Matt. xxiii. 27, 28.

28. Even as mariners, who are carried with the course and force of winds, being in a haven, will not lift anchor nor depart out of the haven without a prosperous wind blowing to their very good liking : so hypocrites do look that the people should shout and clap their hands in token of the great praises and commendations they seek for, and hunt after vain bruits and reports, without which they are disposed to do nothing well. Matt. vi. 2-5.

29. As in a piece of wax, the nearer it approacheth and cometh to the fire, so much the more the heat of the fire appeareth in melting it : even so, in like manner, the holiness of God may be better known in the revolt of hypocrites, approaching unto Him by honourable offices in His Church and profession of His Word ; and that He may be the more glorified of the people in such judgments, so much the less will He suffer their corruptions, but will punish them sharply. Lev. x. 3.
2 Tim. iv. 10, 14-16.

30. As a thick wood and goodly grove, that giveth great shadow, very pleasant to behold, and doth delight the eyes of the beholders greatly with the variety and thickness of flourishing trees and pleasant plants, so that it seemeth to be ordained only for pleasure's sake, and yet within is full of poisonous serpents, ravening wolves, and other wild, hurtful, and cruel beasts : even so a hypocrite, when outwardly he seemeth holy and to be well-furnished with the ornaments of all sorts of virtues, doth please well and delight much the eyes of his beholders ; but within him there lurketh pride, covetousness, envy, and all manner of wickednesses, like wild and cruel beasts walking and wandering in the wood of his heart—for feigned holiness is double iniquity.

31. As a swan, whose feathers are all white, but her flesh black—white without and black within : even so he is not to be counted religious, but a hypocrite, who doth cover and hide his foul faults and loathsome sins with a fair and beautiful show of virtue, feigning holiness where none is.

32. As the viper, although she be pestilent and poisonous, yet, notwithstanding, whilst she is numbed with cold, may safely be handled, not because she hath no poison in her, but because of her cold and numbness she cannot use it : even so pernicious and dissembling hypocrites do sometimes want opportunity and power to practise and to put in execution their wicked and detestable treacheries.

33. As the skin of a fox is of some value and in request, but the flesh is nothing worth : so outward shows of holiness are highly esteemed with hypocrites, but cleanness of the heart and inward purity are by them not a whit regarded.

34. Like as an apple that is very beautiful without but is rotten within ; or as a goodly tall tree that flourisheth and is full of leaves, but yet fruitless : even so such is a hypocrite, who would seem to be what he is not, and hateth to be what he seemeth. 2 Tim. iii. 5.

35. As the ostrich, being a great and mighty fowl, hath wings, but doth not fly, neither is lifted up from the ground with them : so very many men in the world do seem to be carried up to heaven upon the wings of their ceremonies, but are indeed, in heart, mind, and desire, fast nailed to the earth.

36. As the kite, being a most greedy and ravening fowl, mounteth exceeding high, so that you would think she toucheth the gliding clouds, and, as she flieth, doth spread her wings, and yet when she is at the highest she hath her eyes fast set and fixed below on the earth, prying and spying to catch, if she can, some poor chicken or other prey within her talons—indeed, she flieth high, but never looketh up towards heaven, but altogether down towards the earth : even so thou shalt see a number of men feigning a certain sanctimony, counterfeiting much holiness, who, although they are thought, with the contemplation of heavenly things, to be ravished and taken up into the clouds, yet mind nothing less than true godliness, neither anything more than earth and earthly things ; their study is for worldly honour, their greatest carking and care is for rich and large revenues, for dignities, princely favours, and worldly wealth ; such men turn their backs to heaven and fly from God, and so, being disappointed of that light which they seem to seek for, they are wrapped in palpable and most dangerous darkness.

37. As brass is a metal of red colour and hath a certain likeness to gold, but is, indeed, brass and not gold : even so such are hypocrites, who, under the shape and colour of religion and holiness, do cover a chaos and confused heap of all wickedness and abomination. Such men, when they seem best, are then worst, for, of all wickedness, there is none more pernicious than that of those who, when they are most bent to deceive, handle the matter so that they seem to be honest, virtuous, and godly men.

2 Tim. iii. 5.

38. As he that hath a painted ox, and under cover of it hunteth and followeth for partridges, is not an ox, but, under the shape and likeness of that simple creature, lieth in wait for the pretty fine birds, that he may take them and kill them : so, likewise, a hypocrite that, with a counterfeit and feigned holiness, will colour and cover impiety, wicked purpose, or whatsoever is against the Word and will of God, is not a just man, but, under the colour and shape of godliness and honesty, seeking the praise and glory of the world, he casteth in his head and worketh by degrees the ruin, decay, and undoing of his neighbours, that he may compass their goods, lands, and possessions, and gain some honour and dignity among men.

Matt. ii. 8.

39. Even as the swiftest hawks, going about to seize and to take the bird that flieth, as it were, in the top of the air, doth not, when she first seeth her, fly directly towards her, but rather, with setting of a compass, doth seem to forsake and to despise her, and to draw and to fly from her, but, at the second or third flight, she goeth towards her with a wonderful force and incredible swiftness, to take her in the air and to rend her in pieces : right so do hypocrites behave themselves ; for at the first they will seem to thee not to regard, but to condemn the riches and promotions of the world, but then they coin and counterfeit a simplicity, fowling for a greater matter than yet they see at present, and reaching at some higher advancement and greater dignity than the present time and occasion doth offer ; but at the second or third flight, when everything doth answer their expectation, thou shalt perceive that with all speed and greediness they will lay hold upon those things which thou thoughtest they had condemned. They do not wish or desire anything more, neither can anything more highly please them, than the very self-same things which they once made the world believe they detested and could not abide them. These are double-hearted men ; they have wicked lips and hands that work iniquity ; these are those sinners that go two manner of ways ; and everlasting woe is their reward.

Rom. xii. 1 ; vi. 4.
1 Cor. v. 7, 8.
Eph. iv. 24.

40. As painters who have a greater regard to the colours and shadows of images and pictures than unto the substance of the same, and, contemning the inward parts, they bestow all the wit, skill, and cunning they have in expressing and painting out a bare shadow and outside of a thing, and the more they deceive the eyes of them that behold it, the more excellent painters are they judged : even so hypocrites do some deeds which to see to are very good works, but, nevertheless, they keep their hearts, minds, and wills divided and separated far from God ; these things—to wit, their hearts, minds, wills, and purposes—they steal from the Lord, and do bestow them upon the world ; they regard not God, they seek only to please men ; in the action of virtue they have no respect unto virtue itself, but only and barely to the show and shape or likeness of virtue.

41. As the herb of the sun—so called because it windeth itself to follow the sun—in the morning very early it beholdeth the rising thereof, and all the day it followeth the course of the sun, ever turning its leaves towards the same, but the root never changeth, stirreth, nor moveth—it hath that still fast fixed within the earth : so, likewise, hypocrites will seem to follow the Sun of Righteousness, Christ Jesus, but it is only in leaves and outward shows, for their roots—that is, their hearts—are far and fast within the earth, where, indeed, their treasure is.

Matt. vi. 21.

42. Like as apple-trees, which, in the sweet and pleasant spring-time, will be well stored and full of goodly blossoms, and will give a frank offer and a large promise of much fruit, but when the fruit is looked for, and should be gathered, there is none to be had—they were but bare leaves and idle blossoms : even so such are hypocrites, who will lift up their hands, eyes, and voices towards heaven and God, and with such godly green leaves will make a fair flourish and a beautiful show ; but their hearts and affections are surely set upon earthly, vain, vile, and transitory things, and are as far from God as heaven and earth are distant one from another.

Isa. xxix. 13.
Matt. xv. 8.

43. As a rush or grass, without moisture, withereth and drieth up : even so hypocrites, because they have not faith moistened with the grace of God, perish and vanish away.

Job viii. 11.

44. As the doer of God's will doth abstain from evil, because it is contrary unto the will of God, and doth good, because he is constrained with the love of Him who is only good : so the hypocrite, contrarily, abstaineth from evil for fear of punishment, and doth the thing which seemeth good, not constrained with the love of God, but moved of his own will, by desire of praise or hope of reward.

Matt. vii. 21

45. As an actor in a comedy or tragedy, who sometimes resembleth Agamemnon, sometimes Achilles, sometimes their enemy Hector, sometimes one man's person, sometimes another : even so a hypocrite will counterfeit and seem sometimes to be an honest and just man, sometimes a religious man, and so of all conditions of men, according to time, persons, and place.

46. As the ostrich hath things like wings, and would make one believe that she could fly, but cannot : so a hypocrite will resemble and make a great show of that which he is not.

47. As stage-players appear not in their natural character, but do put on and represent a strange person, and hide that under a personage which they are : so the Scripture, by a metaphor, calleth such hypocrites as by external gestures and deeds boast themselves for saints, when, for all that, their mind is profane and wicked—that is, when the outward man appeareth meek as a sheep, and the inward man is ravening like a wolf.

Matt. vii. 15.

48. As the king who exacted of his debtor ten thousand talents did, nevertheless, frankly forgive the whole debt to him who had nothing to pay when he fled unto the mercy of his creditor : so the Lord saith unto the proud hypocrite, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments!" to the end that the hypocrite, descending into himself, might confess his filthiness and poverty, and so crave pardon, which, had he done, he had heard, with the sinful woman, "Thy sins are forgiven thee."

Matt. x. 17.

Luke vii. 48.

49. As it is easy to know a piece of gold from a piece of brass when they come both to the anvil and be stricken with the hammer, for brass will not be handled, but when it cometh to the beating it breaketh and maketh a sharp din and irksome ; but gold soundeth sweetly, and is pliable—you may stretch it out, both in length and breadth, in thin and fine leaves, as you list: so, in like manner, when the hypocrite cometh between the anvil and the hammer of affliction, he brasteth (breaketh) with impatience; he murmureth, crieth out, and lamenteth in blasphemies against God; whereas a faithful Christian praiseth God, giveth Him thanks, and layeth out his heart, submitting himself willingly under the Lord's hand that striketh him.

50. As the viper hath a smooth skin, finely spotted without, but most poisonous within: even so a hypocrite hath sugared words and fair speech, but a deceitful heart.

51. Like as the viper, when she goeth to the water to drink, casteth out her poison, and after she hath drunk receiveth the same again: so, likewise, a hypocrite, when he presenteth himself to be partaker of the Lord's Supper, will counterfeit much holiness, and seem to be religious and upright in life and conversation, but afterwards he returneth to his vanity, and continueth in his wicked course.

52. As a rush cannot grow without moistness: so cannot the hypocrite, because he hath not faith, which is moistened with God's Spirit.

Hypocrisy.

1. As it availeth a man nothing at all, to the ease and relief of his poverty, to have false coin in his purse; it must be good current money, otherwise it doth the more endanger himself, and openeth a gap to his utter destruction: even so a fair tongue with a foul heart is false coin; it will help no man if he say he hateth sin, and yet loveth it in his heart; for in so doing he condemneth himself, notwithstanding how many and how good prayers he may make.

Matt. xxii. 23.

2. Like as little children will fear and be greatly afraid of bugbears, and yet, without fear, will thrust their hands into a candle or fire: so, likewise, many men will be afraid to commit the lesser sins, yet make no scruple at all at great sins, as the Papists do, who will not stick to blaspheme the name of God, and yet make a conscience of such sins as the breach of any of the pope's decrees, &c.

Hypocritical heretics.

1. As the card-thistle, or teasel, hath cells and cabins like the honeycomb, and in them first white flowers, but after their falling away a bitter seed: so the wicked have their synagogues and a fair show of words, but in the end bitter fruits.

2. As the heads or knops of card-thistle are hollow within, and, for the most part, have worms within: so the chief ringleaders of the wicked have hollow hearts, and commonly the worm of conscience gnawing them.

Idleness.

Prov. xxviii. 19.
1 Tim. v. 13.
2 Thess. iii. 10, 11.

1. As water, though it be ever so clear and fair, fresh, and comfortable, yet, if it stand still in a pit or hole, or be kept long in a vessel, from whence it hath no issue, it will rot and smell, and be unwholesome: even so it fareth with children—yea, and with all the sons of Adam. If they be idle, have nothing to do, and no way to bestow their wit, they will rot and prove unwholesome, and devise mischief all the day long.

2. As labour and exercise of body in one man, industry and diligence of mind in another man, are sure forts and strong bulwarks of countries: even so idleness and negligence are the cause of all evil; for an idle man's brain becometh quickly the shop of the devil.

3. As, in all natural things, there is one thing or other which is the spoil of it, as the canker to the rose, the worm to the apple, and the caterpillar to the leaf : so the common spoil to all youth is the contrary to pains and travail, which is idleness. Ezek. xvi. 49.

4. As the traitorous servant, while his master is asleep and all things at rest, setteth open the door for the thief to enter in upon and spoil him at his pleasure : so idleness, while we are not aware, lying soft upon the pillows of security, openeth the door for the devil to enter into us with full swing, to the destruction both of body and soul.

5. Like as, while men slept, saith the Evangelist, the enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat : so the fittest time that the devil can find to work upon us is when we are idle, for that is the sleep of the soul. Judges xvi. 1, &c.

6. Even as a firebrand, drawn from the fire and lying still, waxeth cold, and by little and little dieth and is extinct, but, being moved and put to the fire, burneth and flameth : even so an idle life doth by little and little extinguish virtue, but, being well exercised, it doth kindle and increase the same. *Job v. 7.
1 Cor. iii. 8.*

7. As idleness breedeth poverty and beggary in very many who might live well and in good sort with diligent and faithful labour : so is the same very dangerous in those that be rich and feel no smart nor want in this life ; for while they give themselves to idleness, voluptuousness doth overcome reason, and they are snared and taken in the deadly traps of the deceitful flickerings of the world, and are poisoned with carnal pleasures and fleshly delights, which bear them fair in hand for a little while, but, at the length, do deceive them and leave them in shame and confusion. *Gen. iii. 19.
2 Thess. iii. 10.*

8. As the earth, when it is not tilled or trimmed, doth breed and bring forth briers, brambles, nettles, and all noisome and unprofitable things : so idleness in man doth breed and brood in him ungodly thoughts and wicked cogitations of all sorts, and doth allure, hale, draw, and even drag him to do those things which are so odious in the sight of God, that he must either most earnestly repent that he hath done them, or else he must die eternally for doing of them.

9. As, by the pump of a ship, water doth often secretly get in and increaseth, so that, through the negligence of the mariner, the ship is drowned : so, by idleness, wicked thoughts and concupiscences are multiplied in our hearts, till at length our souls are in great danger.

10. As the crab-fish, as Pliny saith, when he seeth the oyster lie gaping in the sunbeams, putteth a pebble into the mouth of the oyster, and thus getteth at the fish : so, likewise, when we lie in idle security, the devil stealeth upon us.

11. Like as, in standing water, worms are engendered and bred : so, likewise, in an idle body are engendered idle thoughts ; and therefore we must always be doing some good works, that the devil may find us always well occupied and exercised.

12. As, by experience, we see that those children who have been brought up in learning and virtue prove honest and profitable for the commonwealth : even so, contrariwise, those children who have passed their time in sloth and idleness prove dishonest and hurtful to the Church and commonwealth.

Idolatry.

1. If men take and account it for a despite and a great reproach to be termed and named an idol : even so much more will God our heavenly Father be offended if any shall call images the likenesses of God.

2. As the breach of wedlock and defiling of the marriage-bed by filthy adultery is a most wicked and detestable sin : so, likewise, is idolatry a most shameful and execrable thing, when the honour and glory due to the living God is profaned and given to another, *Jer. xvi. 11.
Ezek. vi. 4.
2 Kings xvii. 7.
1 Cor. x. 14.*

3. As it cannot be otherwise but, wherever the air is corrupted, there must follow pestilence and infection of the blood : so, where the mind is not purely persuaded of God, this gross and sensible idolatry must follow, that would honour God in an idol.

Ignorance.

1. As men that dream and wake again, who, when they are asleep, think they have found some great treasure, and have great joy in it, but, after their waking, they see that all is vanished like smoke, whereupon they vex and grieve themselves : so, likewise, men slumbering in the night of ignorance think that they are righteous before God, but they are grieved when they find that this is a dream, which passeth through their spirits and vanisheth as soon as they be awake—that is, whenever they are delivered from the darkness of ignorance, wherein they were asleep and buried.

2. As in the night, by reason of the darkness spread upon the earth, all things are hid and covered, which causeth that we cannot discern and discover the spots we have on our faces, but when the light beginneth to appear, and we take a glass to behold ourselves therein, then they are discovered and show themselves : even so, likewise, during the time that we are covered with the darkness of ignorance, the vices that dwell in us are hidden there ; and oftentimes we think, being leprous and deformed, that we are beautiful and perfect, but our eyes, being open and illuminated by the Spirit and grace of our God, and taking the glass of the law, therein to behold the state of our nature and our life, then we begin to know the great and grievous imperfections that are in us, and we at once lose the opinion which we had conceived before of our own righteousness and virtues, and perceive what danger we were in before.

3. As men sometimes inquire for others amongst those with whom they do stand and with whom they associate : so some are ignorant in that which is so plain that all others know it, and it is strange how they can hardly avoid the knowledge of it.

4. Like as the day and the night is all one to those that are blind : even so is superstition, idolatry, and the preaching of the Gospel to those that are ignorant of the means of their salvation.

John iii. 19, 20.

5. As they that love not the light hide their doings in the dark, which is a manifest token that their own consciences beareth them witness that their doings be naught : so, likewise, they that love and choose ignorance rather than the knowledge of Christ, it is a manifest token that they loathe to see the filthiness of their own works.

6. As he that goeth in the dark catcheth a sharp turning before he perceiveth it : so he that walketh in ignorance runneth headlong to destruction when he least thinketh of it.

Gen. xix. 15, 16.

7. As Lot was so long loitering and trifling in Sodom, that the angel was fain to pluck him out with violence : even so, certainly, unless the Lord, by the good means of His providence, should pluck us out of ignorance and darkness, wherein we use such trifling, and plunging, and delaying, scarce one of a thousand would be saved.

8. As the light of godly knowledge increaseth virtue : so the darkness of ignorance is a hindrance to all goodness.

Ignorant men.

1. As those people will never come to the physician to be healed who think themselves not to be sick : so, likewise, there are no people more unapt to be taught and enlightened of God unto salvation than those who think they understand and see of themselves, when, in very deed, they are altogether ignorant, and, for lack of understanding, be overwhelmed and snared in the darkness wherein they were born, and so wallow themselves therein continually, to their utter destruction.

2. Like as that man who is ignorant of the principles and rules that appertain unto the science or art that he professeth can never come to the end, skill, or perfection that his profession requireth: even so the end of a Christian man is eternal life, and his profession is to know and learn the principles and rules that most plainly and sincerely lead him unto this end of everlasting felicity; for he that is ignorant of the means is ignorant of the end, and being ignorant of the cause must needs be ignorant of the effect.

Joh. xvii. 3.
Isa. . 3; v. 13.
Prov. i. 28, 29.

3. As he that will be a physician must learn the precepts that teach physic, and he that would be a musician must learn the rules of music, the orator the rules of rhetoric, the ploughman the rules of husbandry, and so every man the rules that belong to his profession, or else he shall never profit in his science or art, nor be accounted a craftsman that knoweth the principles of his craft: even so no more, before the majesty of God, is he to be accounted a Christian, although he be baptised and braggeth never so much of the name of a Christian, who perfectly knoweth not the duties belonging to a Christian man.

2 Thess. i. 6-9.
Rom. iii. 12.

4. As no man will be content to entertain and give wages to a servant who professeth himself in words to be a husbandman, and yet neither knoweth nor can do any part that belongeth to husbandry: even so we may not think that God will allow or like of such men as outwardly in words profess themselves to be Christians, by saying they hope and believe well, and yet are ignorant and not able to render a reason of any point of Christianity.

5. Like as the physician cannot communicate his health to the sick patient, or as the living man cannot divide his life with the dead body of another man, but every man enjoyeth his own health and liveth with his own life: so the knowledge that another man hath profiteth not him that is ignorant and unlearned; but every man must know and learn himself the grounds and principles of Christianity if he will be saved.

6. Like as, if a child be born and brought up in a dungeon of a prison, and grown to some years, never seeing light, if one tell him of trees and mountains and birds and other creatures, he cannot tell what he meaneth: so, likewise, it is with us, who are born in blindness and ignorance, we know not what heavenly things mean till we be told and shown them by the light of the Scriptures.

Image of God.

LIKE AS, when a man thinketh of some one he knows who is absent, he doth, as it were, draw in his mind the proportion of his body whom he mentally beholdeth, thinking of him who is absent—as when a painter draweth with his hand the portraiture of that body whose image he painteth, to the intent that the painted image may represent, as much as may be, the shape of him who is absent; so, likewise, when the Scripture saith that man was created in the image and after the likeness of God, we must diligently mark how far he is said to have been so made, and that there was in him that whereby he did resemble the excellency of his Creator, and so did, as it were, represent God Himself in a glass.

1 Cor. xi. 7.
Eph. iv. 13.
2 Cor. iii. 18.

2. Like as a bodily image which representeth unto us the face of a man ought, in a lively manner, to set before us all his lineaments and proportions, that by the counterfeiting or engraving we might conceive whatsoever might be seen in him who is represented: even so the image of God must, through the same likeness, set before our senses a certain understanding of the knowledge of God.

Gen. i. 26, 27
ii. 7; v. 1.

Imperfections do not make God to refuse us.

Ps. ciii. 13.

1. As a father casteth not away his children because they are sick, crooked-backed, blind, or maimed of hand or foot, or otherwise counterfeit and imperfect, but handleth them more tenderly, and dealeth more softly with them than with the others, respecting their debility and feebleness; or as men cast not away wine, though it have lees or grounds, nor cast away gold, howsoever it be covered with dust; and as a husbandman refuseth not land, though it be overgrown with brambles and briers, but will use the greater diligence to stock it and to plough it, hoping by his labour that it will bring forth fruit plentifully: even so God, likewise, will not refuse and put us away because He seeth many imperfections and infirmities in us—nay, rather, that is an occasion that He will take the greater pity upon us.

Gen. xxviii. 21, 22.

2. As we, looking aside through a glass—be it blue or yellow, or of any other colour—all the things which we see seem to us to be of the colour of the glass through which we behold them: so God also, beholding and looking upon us in His Son, we seem to Him to be of His colour, notwithstanding our manifold imperfections and wants, and we have the appearance and brightness of His innocence and righteousness, which causeth, that, in seeing and touching us, He thinketh He seeth and toucheth his own beloved Son, even as old Isaac did in handling Jacob.

The Incommunicable properties of the Godhead.

As the soul of man is wholly in the head and wholly in the feet—yea, wholly in every part—and yet the soul cannot be said to use reason in the feet or in any other part, but only in the head: even so, though all the Persons of the Godhead be one and the same essence, yet do they really differ each from the other in regard of their peculiar manner of subsisting; and, therefore, man's nature may be assumed by the Second Person, and yet not assumed either by the Father or the Holy Ghost.

Inconstant men.

1. EVEN as the delicate balance of a goldsmith is moved with every little weight, so that with one grain laid upon it it falleth downward: so with everything, whether it be lucky or unfortunate, we are wont to be greatly moved and do suddenly change our purposes. Sometimes we exceed in mirth, and by-and-by we are overwhelmed with sorrow; we are now praising men to the skies, and presently we hurl them down from heaven with our tongues, and thrust them into hell; we love men and hate them; we save men and kill them, all with one breath; now we choose virtue and by-and-by we choose vice.

2. As the chameleon changeth its colour according to the thing whereupon it sitteth: so we, likewise, at every temptation do change our minds and are driven from our purposes and determinations—yea, our wicked lusts and the ungracious thoughts of our hearts do force and drive us even whither they will.

3. As the chameleon will be changed into any colour save white: so an inconstant man is most apt and prone to all kind of vice, but to no virtue.

Rev. iii. 15, 16.

4. As the beast hyena and the beast of Egypt (now called the mouse of India) are supposed to be sometimes males and sometimes females: so many be so inconstant, that now they are friends, now-foes, now Papists, now Protestants, now hot, now cold, now wise, now foolish, &c.

Matt. xi. 7.

5. As the reed is shaken to and fro with every little wind: even so, such is the inconstancy and mutability of the common people, every small trifle doth cause them to alter their mind and judgment.

Incorporation with Christ.

1. As the imp or graft is translated from its native tree to grow on another : so we, as many as be true Christians, are translated from Adam to Christ, and, from being Gentiles, to be of one body with the posterity of Abraham. Rom. vi. 5 & xi. 17.

2. As men graft to the end that the verdure of the stock may correct and amend the taste of the fruit, so that it may be the more pleasant to the eater : so Christians should have their corruptions corrected and amended by Christ, and His Spirit working in them, that they may the better taste to God.

3. As the grafts live not by their natural juice, but by the juice or moisture received from the root of the stock whereinto they are grafted : so we that are true Christians can only live by the power of Christ's Spirit working in us, or rather, it is Christ liveth in us. Gal. ii. 22.

Infidelity.

1. LIKE as the mole, which is blind to see things on earth, cannot see the stars in heaven : so he who will not believe God concerning things on earth cannot believe concerning heavenly things.

2. Even as a subject or tenant disclaiming his king and lord, and devoting himself to a new master, even one who is a deadly and professed enemy to his first master, doth incontinently deprive himself of all those farms, lands, houses, preferments, and commodities whatsoever which he did enjoy whilst he lived in allegiance to his lord : so the case standeth with a man when, by infidelity, he falleth from God, for then he loseth all manner of blessings belonging either to his happiness or to his holiness—yea, it is impossible that a man should either love, fear, honour, or obey God, from whom he looketh for neither good nor evil ; and therefore infidelity is to be accounted the root of all evil. Heb. iii. 12.

The Infirmities of godly fathers are set down in the Scripture for our comfort and instruction.

EVEN as they who first sailed on the seas gave proper names to dangerous rocks and perilous places where they hardly escaped with their lives, to the end that their posterity, by such marks, might shun shipwreck and pass safely away, calling places diversely—as “The Sage-bed,” “The Lavender-bed,” with other like names best known to sailors ; or as carters set up some bush, or other like mark, in that place where their wain or cart stuck fast, for a warning to them that come after : so, likewise, have the godly fathers—as the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles—furthered us by their falls and infirmities, and by their experience taught us to eschew many incumbrances which they, because they brake the ice first themselves, could not foresee. 2 Sam. xi. 2, &c.
John xviii. 17, 25,
27.
Gal. i. 13.
Luke xv. 12, &c.

Infirmities ; why God suffereth them in the best.

LIKE as a judge dealeth in some criminal proceedings, he will give an enlargement, but yet with a condition that at any time he may call it back, and put the accused into the legal estate wherein he was before, if it happen that he fall into any new fault again—the judges do this to keep them always in fear and diligence to do their duty, and to stop them from taking too great liberty : so, likewise, God doeth with us. He will pardon our sins and set us at liberty, but leaving us, notwithstanding, a great sort of infirmities and imperfections, which may always serve Him to charge us, and for matter to call us to a reckoning when we would wind out of His service, or boast ourselves abroad of the goodness of our reason and loyalty.

Infirmity of falling diminisheth not the grace of Christ.

Rom vi. 15, 16, &c.

THOUGH God forgiveth and pardoneth not sinners to the end that they should sin : yet doth not infirmity of falling diminish the grace of Christ, where faith with repentance worketh.

Ingratitude of base-born persons and others.

As ivy, sticking to the boughs of trees, is thus by the others' help exalted, and yet, as it were, by a flattering and over-hard embracing, doth either kill or much hinder the growing of the trees : so base-born persons, that be promoted in honour by the help and familiarity of them that be noble, do yet oftentimes oppress them by whose help they have ascended and have been advanced.

Ingratitude of the Church.

Isa. v. 1, 2.

As a vine planted, which, neither as to choice of good ground nor for any other thing which the hand of the husbandman might do to it, can justly complain of any want, and yet deceiveth the husbandman's expectation, and maketh him to lose both pain, labour, and cost : even so such is the unkindness of people oftentimes who would be counted for the people of God, and whom God hath diligently called to the knowledge of Himself by the preaching of the Word, who yet proceed in impiety and ungodliness.

The reward of Iniquity.

Isa. xxviii. 24.
Prov. xxii. 8.

As ploughing, reaping, and eating the fruit do successively follow one another : so he that plougheth wickedness shall reap iniquity and eat the fruit of lies.

Injury.

LIKE as, if any do offer an injury or bodily harm to a doe or a sheep, or to any innocent creature, though it be unto death, yet they will not make any resistance : so, likewise, if any injury or wrong be done to the faithful servants of God, they will patiently suffer it, without any resistance, &c.

Instructors of Children.

1. As the good riders do first bring their horses to be obedient unto the bridles : so they that instruct children must first exhort them to obedience and humility.

1 Sam. ii. 19.
Prov. iv. 9.

2. As Hannah made coats for her son Samuel, who served in the house of God : so, likewise, parents and masters ought to array their servants and children with the godly ornaments of wisdom and knowledge, which are from above.

Gal. vi. 7.

3. Like as a man will sow his ground with the best seed, and plant his orchard with the best fruit, because he looketh for the greater and more gainful increase in the time of gathering: so, in like manner, men loving their children as well as they do other commodities, ought also to train them up in the best things which are found in the discipline, knowledge, and faith of Christ, for, by so doing, they will not only escape many a secret grief and bitter mischief, but also bless the Lord with great joyfulness, when they find this fruit of their education in knowledge of these good things—namely, their children to be a comfort, refreshing, and honour to their grey hairs, and their servants necessary helps before them in all good causes and matters of honesty, truth, justice, and mercy.

Good Intent.

As, if a man, who had borrowed a piece of money of a creditor, should come to him at the day appointed to repay it again, and should say to his creditor that he had dreamed that he had paid him, the creditor, by this saying, would not think himself fully satisfied and paid; or as, if a master, who had given forth in writing his will and mind to one of his servants, and had given him charge and commandment neither to add to nor diminish from it, would be content with such a servant if he would not vouchsafe either to read or learn his remembrancer, but, trusting to his own wit, would do all things after his own will and mind: even so we may not think that our Master and heavenly Father, who hath left us in writing His will and mind, to the end that we should keep and fulfil the same, will allow and take for payment our well-meanings and good intents, without either knowing or learning the same His will and mind.

1 Sam. xiii. 9, &c.
xv. 8, &c.
2 Sam. vi. 6.
1 Chron. xiii. 9, 10.
Job xvi. 2.
Acts vi. 12, &c.

Interludes or games.

1. As Socrates did advise men to beware of those meats which might entice them without hunger to eat, and of those drinks which should allure them without thirst to drink: so are those interludes, games, and talk to be avoided which might move the beholders or hearers to any dishonesty or vice.

2. Like as, if it be not lawful to name vices unless it be in the way of dislike: so much less is it warrantable, in interludes or plays, to gesture or represent vice in the way of recreation and delight.

Eph. v. 3.

Inventions of men.

As hay, wood, and stubble put to the fire are brought to sudden consuming: so the inventions of men, not stablished by the Word of God, cannot bear the trial of the Holy Ghost, but they by-and-by fall away and perish.

1 Cor. iii. 12, 13.

Unbelieving Jews.

As that dry skin which a snake doth cast to renew her age hath in it the shape, likeness, and prints of eyes, and that thin rind also wherewith the eyes of the snake are covered, and yet indeed hath no seeing eyes: so the wicked and unbelieving Jews did seem to have eyes, but in deed they were blind, and idle and empty skins and rinds without sight. They were men, but not of God; they had eyes of the flesh, but none of the Spirit; they could see creatures, but they had not one eye to behold the Creator; and as for Christ, they had no more sight nor knowledge of Him than they had of the sun and moon at the time when they were yet in the wombs of their mothers.

John ix. 29.

Our Journey to heaven.

1 Cor. vii. 29, &c.

1. As travellers that be upon their journeys do not abide in those hostelries or inns where they are well used, lodged, or entertained, or where they find pleasant gardens, walks, or such other enticements, but after their bait (having taken refreshment), or in the morning, do pass on their way: even so we, albeit God in this life give us goods, honours, houses, and other carnal commodities, yet we must remember that we are travellers, and must not stay, but go forward on our journey toward heaven—yea, and in case we be afflicted with sickness, poverty, or any other calamity, yet must we still think that we are upon our journey, and, therefore, taking comfort, say, "Peradventure we shall be better to-morrow."

2. As they who are to depart from a foreign land towards their own country do prepare things necessary for their journey: so must we, likewise, provide that which is expedient for the happy performance of our journey towards our heavenly country.

The Joy of the elect.

1 Kings i. 40.

1. As the people rejoiced exceedingly when Solomon was crowned king: even so much more shall the joy of the elect be when they shall see Christ, the true Solomon, crowned with glory in the kingdom of heaven.

Matt. ii. 1, 9, 10.

2. As the wise men who came from the East to worship Christ, when they saw the star standing over the place where the Babe was, were exceeding glad: so, likewise, much more shall the elect rejoice when they shall see Christ, not lying in a manger, but crowned with immortal glory in the kingdom of heaven.

The Lord and His people are inseparably Joined together.

Jer. xlii. 11.

As a man girdeth himself with his girdle: even so God tieth His people to Himself.

The Joys of heaven endless.

LIKE as, if the whole world were a sea, and that at the end of every thousand years which expired a bird must carry away or drink up only one drop of it, in process of time it will come to pass that this sea, though very huge, shall be dried up, but yet many thousand millions of years must be passed before this can be done: so, likewise, if a man should enjoy happiness in heaven only for the space of time in which the sea is in drying up, he would think his case most happy and blessed; but behold the elect shall enjoy the kingdom of heaven, not only for that time, but when it is ended they shall enjoy it as long again, and when all is done they shall be as far from the ending of this their joy as they were at the beginning.

Judges.

Job xv. 34.
Deut. xvi. 19;
xxvii. 25.
1 Sam. xii. 3.

1. As the beam with balances doth bow towards that part wherein is the greater weight: so some judges favour them most whose gifts be greatest, and not whose cause is best.

1 Sam. viii. 3.
Isa. i. 23; xxxiii.
15.
Ps. xv. 5.

2. As they who desire with heed, and more surely to see, do shut the one eye: so a judge, to the intent that he may discern according unto justice and equity, ought not to be partial, or given to the respect of any person, but ought to have one single eye, which is to be set and placed upon justice and equity in every matter, and not to regard either persons or rewards.

3. As a white or painted wall, the bravery whereof serveth for no profit, but is a mere show : even so such is the profit that cometh to the commonwealth by those judges who, sitting in the place of justice, do wrong to men contrary to the laws. Acts xxiii. 3.

4. As a judge must not wrong one for another's sake : so must he not unjustly favour one because another hath displeased him. Deut. i. 16, 17.
Prov. xxiv. 23.

5. As the lion, though he be the king of beasts, is yet at length made a prey to small birds, and then is that saying verified, " Better is a living dog than a dead lion " : even so judges and rulers, although they be great in authority, yet, at the last, they are but a bait for the small worms. Eccles. ix. 4.

The general day of Judgment.

1. As the husbandman diggeth up all unfruitful trees, pareth off all rotten boughs, weedeth out cockle and tares, and casteth them into the fire : even so God will serve them that He shall find empty of good works and without oil in their lamps. Matt. xxv. 1, 2, &c.

2. As the husbandman appointeth his servant to purge his floor, and with the fan he separateth the good seed from the chaff : even so God shall send His angels to His floor—that is, into this world—and they shall carry the good seed—to wit, the faithful—into everlasting barns, but the chaff and dross—that is, the ungodly—shall be thrown into a furnace of fire, where there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.

No sound Judgment can be given of a man until he be thoroughly tried.

As a wall all whitened on the outside is not easily perceived, whether it be made of stone or of clay, unless it be smitten and tried with a mallet or some other instrument : so a man garnished outwardly with good things to see to is not judged and presently discerned, whether he be a man of patience, of charity, or of other virtues, unless he be first smitten and tried with the mallet or beetle of obloquies, slanders, afflictions, troubles, and temptations.

All must appear before the Judgment-seat of Christ, but yet diversely.

1. LIKE as some do come to the assizes or sessions, there to receive their judgment and condemnation, and some others also come to give evidence against them, and to aid and assist the judge in the execution of his office : even so, after the same manner, shall it be at the last day ; for the reprobate, ungodly, and merciless shall appear there to receive their deserved condemnation ; but, contrariwise, the faithful shall then, with the angels, come to assist and wait upon their Judge Christ. Matt. xviii. 28, 29.
&c.
Matt. xix. 28.
Luke xxii. 30.
1 Cor. vi. 2, 3.

2. As, at the bar of an earthly judge, the malefactor is brought out of prison and set before the judge, and there examined : even so, in that great day, shall every man, without exception, be brought before the Lord to be tried. Rom. xiv. 10.
2 Cor. v. 10.

Sound Judgment necessary.

As the eye is the sight of the body, to guide and lead it in the right way, and if it be clear, the body cannot go amiss : even so the judgment is the eye of the mind, which, being sound, true, and framed according to God's Word, then are our affections right, the actions and motions of our mind right and good in God's sight, as far as man's weakness can comprehend.

Rash Judgment condemned.

Acts xviii. 21;
xxi. 14.
Rom. x. xv. 32.
1 Cor. viii. 9.
Pa. cxv. 3.
Prov. xviii. 3.

As it is a point of great rashness, and a thing disallowed of all men, even in worldly affairs, for one man to condemn another before he has heard him: even so it is great folly for a man to give his judgment upon spiritual matters before he hath well weighed and advised of them.

God's Judgments not regarded of many.

1. As lightning breaketh the clouds, and the sudden light doth not so much illuminate as dull the sight of the eye: so many, feeling the hand of God, are rather dulled than moved forward to heaven.

2. As skilful physicians, in curing diseases, use certain degrees—first, they begin with gentler sorts of salves, and if they do little good, then they lay sharper remedies unto the wound; for if medicines do not heal, the iron doth heal, and those which the iron healeth not the fire doth heal, but such as the fire doth not heal those are incurable: so God doth sometimes reprove man's wickedness by His Word; if that doth not help, He correcteth with sickness, infamy, and imprisonment; if these profit not, He inflameth the fire of His judgment in the minds of men, and maketh them aghast and amazed with the terror of everlasting torments; but if that doth not heal their canker, He leaveth them quite as incurable, and giveth them over unto a reprobate mind, so that they have neither a right judgment to discern things nor any sorrow at all, by reason of the filth of wickedness wherein they wallow.

Justice.

1. As the root of a tree, being utterly rotten, the boughs cannot bud and flourish, nor bring forth pleasant fruits in their due time: so justice, being violated, it cannot be that peace can flourish and bring forth so plentiful fruits as she is wont to do.

Dan. ii. 32, 33.

2. As the image of Nebuchadnezzar, although it had a head of fine gold, yet it fell, and was broken all to pieces, because it had feet of clay, which, being touched with a stone, overthrew the whole invention: so justice many times falleth to the ground, because, although the princes, who are rightly called the heads of their countries, be very excellent justicers (administrators of justice), and many of them, as it were, of the purest and finest gold of virtue, yet the inferior ministers of justice are earthen, and do bend their hearts and minds to nothing but earth and clay, and sometimes, with gifts and rewards, they are carried every way—for gain, they will sell judgment, and so break the neck of Justice.

3. As there is no assurance of fair weather until the sky be clear from clouds: so there can be in no commonwealth a grounded peace and prosperity where there are not informers to find out offences as well as magistrates to punish offenders.

4. As a physician cannot see every secret grief, but, upon revealment, may apply a curing medicine for a hidden disease: so many can discover a mischief which the magistrate seeth not, but the magistrate alone must remedy the same.

Justice of God.

Ps. xxxvi. 6.

As far as the great mountain exceedeth the rest of the earth: so far doth the justice of God exceed and excel the righteousness of any creature.

Justice of God in desertions.

LIKE as, if a magistrate, for a just cause, give a man over to be hanged, he doth but justice : so, likewise, God, if He, for our disobedience, give us up to Satan, He doth but justly. Now, if the hangman do misuse him grievously, there is no fault in the judge or magistrate, but in the malice of the hangman : so, likewise, there is no fault in God if the devil do cruelly handle us, being given over unto him.

Right Justice is to be judged by the authority of God's will.

As often as there is any malefactor or wicked person to be punished, they which be appointed the judges do declare unto the prince his wicked fact (deed), and so look for a writ from him ; and that being had, they do see the pains prescribed therein to be executed upon the malefactor. Now, if the judges or officers do anything contrary unto that, it is taken for a great offence and rebuke done against the authority and jurisdiction of the prince, and they escape not clear withal : even so it is a much more just matter before God, that none be put to death contrary or beside His will and word, who is the only Lord of life and death.

A godly King.

1. As breath is necessary for the body of man : so also is a godly king to the people whom he governeth. James iv. 14.
2. As the roaring of a lion is fearful : so the wrath of a king is terrible. Prov. xix. 12.
3. As a thief taken in stealing, in the act of doing the deed, is brought to open shame : even so kings, princes, and nations, putting confidence in idols, are deceived, finding no help in them, and, in time of their distress, are put to manifest shame and confusion. Jer. ii. 26, 27.

Kingdom of heaven.

1. LIKE as merchants are well content, when they see pearls of great price, to bestow all their substance and wealth on them, hoping to be great gainers thereby : even so much more godly Christians ought not to spare any earthly treasure or to forbear any cost for the attainment of that most precious pearl, the kingdom of heaven. Matt. xiii. 45, 46
2. As he that findeth a treasure in another man's ground cannot justly enjoy the same except, at his great charge, he first strain himself to purchase the soil : even so the kingdom of heaven, the heavenly riches cannot be had but of them who, if need so require, can be content to forego all their worldly wealth for it. Matt. xiii. 44.
3. As we do naturally love the body more than the soul, and the goods and commodities of this temporal life more than the treasures of spiritual riches : so we seek first the things that concern this present life, and as for those that belong to the kingdom of heaven, we seek after them but seldom, slightly, and, as it were, for a fashion. Matt. vi. 33.
4. As all they that are possessed with righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, which Saint Paul calleth the kingdom of God, are certain to enter into heaven : so it is in vain to pretend to enter into the kingdom of God, which is in heaven, unless the kingdom of heaven, which is the gate, be first in us—that is to say, if we have not the true knowledge of God and of his Son Jesus Christ, a lively faith, a fervent charity ; unless we increase in sanctification of body, of soul, and of mind ; unless, in ourselves, we do feel a good conscience conjoined with peace and joy in the Holy Ghost ; and unless we be regenerate in newness of life. Rom. xiv. 17.
John iii. 3.
1 Cor. vi. 9.

5. As, where there be two gates to a town, it is not enough that we enter the first unless we also pass through the second : so is it not enough that we, being members of the Church, use the holy ministry, which is as the first gate to the kingdom of heaven, unless we thence proceed to the second, in living as true and lively members of the Church, declaring the effects of the holy ministry by the testimony of our faith, mortification of the old man, newness of life—in brief, by daily amendment of life.

6. As, when winter is over, the nearer that the sun draweth unto us, the more doth the earth, being warmed by the heat thereof, fructify, and the longer that the days are, the more work may we do : even so, the nearer that the kingdom of heaven doth draw unto us by the coming of Jesus Christ—especially by His ascension into heaven—the more should we be heated in the love of God and charity to our neighbours, and thus bring forth the more fruit of holiness, and be the more addicted to all good works.

7. Like as it is commonly said that the cat would fish eat, but would not her feet wet : or as Balaam wished, that he might die the death of the righteous, and that his end might be like theirs, but yet would not obey the will of God : so, in like manner, many do wish and be desirous to enter into the kingdom of heaven, but yet they will not do the will of God—neither labour nor take any pains for the means—that is, the preaching of the Word of God, whereby they may come by it.

Matt. vii. 21 ;
xix. 16, &c.
Luke xiii. 24.
Matt. xi. 12.
Luke xvi. 16.
John vi. 27.
Numb. xxiii. 10.
19, &c.

Kings.

Ps. li. 2.

As in a sudden casualty of fire, or in a city surprised, there is great fear : so profane and superstitious kings and their counsellors, when the voice or doctrine of the Gospel is heard, do tremble for fear, and do mortally hate the same, as if it were the firebrand of sedition in a commonwealth, and the looseness of discipline.

Knowledge.

1. As that man who, having received abundance of wealth at his master's hands, doth, notwithstanding, steal from him and rob him of that which is his own, is more worthy of death than he that had no means to help himself : even so is it with him on whom the Lord hath bestowed knowledge, and yet, according to the same, will not join obedience ; for obedience is the Lord's, and he that faileth herein robbeth God of His honour.

Luke xii. 47, 48.
Matt. vii. 21.
Rom. xii. 2.
Eph. v. 17.

2. As he who hath knowledge shall, if with the same he join not obedience, have greater punishments than he who hath less knowledge : so, also, he that hath less knowledge, or none at all, and will not labour for understanding and spiritual wisdom, shall surely feel those torments wherewith the other was afflicted, on whom the Lord bestowed more knowledge.

3. As wine, without the mixture of water, doth trouble the brain, &c. : so knowledge, without love, doth make a man proud.

Knowledge and belief in gross.

1. As a man may carry fire about him in a flint stone without heat, and perfumes in a pomander without smell, except the latter be beaten and the other chafed : even so it is with such men as know and believe in gross the mysteries of our faith—namely, that there is a God who rewardeth good and evil ; that He is terrible in His counsels upon the sons of men ; that there is a hell for sinners, a heaven for good livers, a most dreadful day of judgment to come, a straight account to be demanded, and the like—all this they know and believe in general, as if it were merchandise wrapped up together in a bundle ; but for that they unfold not these things, nor rest upon them in particular ; for that they let them not down into their hearts, nor do ruminate on them with leisure and attention ; for that they chew them not well in mind by deep consideration, nor do digest them in heart by the heat of meditation—they remain with them as a sword in its scabbard, and do help them as little to reformation of life (for which they were revealed) as a preservative in their pocket, never applied, can help their health ; and thus they bear the general knowledge of these mysteries locked up in their breasts as sealed bags of treasure that be never told nor opened, and, consequently, they have neither feeling, sense, nor motion thereby.

2. Like as that one man may know another by sight, whom yet, indeed, he knoweth not thoroughly, because he understandeth not what affection he beareth towards him : so men know naturally that there is a God, but what His will is, or what is not His will, they do not know.

Rom. iii. 17.
John i. 18.

Knowledge and sight of ourselves.

1. As salt is made of sea-water, but so long as it is in the sea is not salt—it must be taken out of the sea and placed upon the dry land, that, being in salt pits, where the sun may shine and the air blow upon it, the water may be thickened and so converted into salt : even so this world is a sea. So long as we live in the world, tossed with the ebbings and flowings of the world's inconstancy, and overwhelmed in the bitter waters of the sins and wicked practices of the same, we are as yet no salt ; we must go out of the world and enter into the land—to wit, into ourselves—and take a just view of our own imbecility, and have a due consideration of our own miserable and wretched estate, that the Sun of Righteousness may thrust out His beams, and the wind of heavenly grace may blow upon us, and so we may be turned into an admirable and wonderful salt, that, being seasoned ourselves, we may be the means and the Lord's instruments to season others.

2. As our eyes, which do behold heaven and earth and other innumerable creatures of God, do not see themselves, but, looking in a glass, by that means they perfectly see themselves : so we do not see and consider our own frailty and brittle estate, but if we will set before our eyes the glass of the remembrance of death and the true knowledge of ourselves, beholding diligently this clear glass, we cannot choose but very plainly see ourselves and what we be.

James i. 22, 23, 25.

Knowledge of God.

1. As he that diggeth for treasure casteth the earth from him and maketh a deep pit until he find that which he seeketh : even so he that seeketh the knowledge of God must cast away all earthly affections and wholly pry into heavenly affairs.

Prov. i. 4, 5.

2. As great and rich treasure is many times hid in a homely earthen vessel : so it pleaseth God to put the precious knowledge of Himself and His truth into poor, weak, and frail men.

2 Cor. iv. 7.

Knowledge of God, how it is attained unto.

1. As our natural eyes have power to discern the things of this world by the sun that we daily see : even so the knowledge of God, that we hope to have of Him, must come by grace through the light of Him that can lighten our understandings and open the eyes of our minds ; otherwise we shall rest in continual darkness if our inward eyes receive not light by that supernal Sun.

1 Cor. xiii. 12.

2. As there is great difference betwixt the viewing of a man in a dark or dim glass and the sight of him face to face in a bright day: even so is there much more difference betwixt our present knowledge of God in this life and that which shall be in the life to come.

3. Like as a man who goeth to buy or borrow some candles, and bringing them home, it being within night, and keeping them unlighted, receiveth no comfort or benefit by them: even so, if a man have knowledge in the Word of God, and yet his heart and mind is not inflamed and kindled with the love of the truth, his knowledge will not profit him to salvation.

Knowledge may be increased always in the best.

2 Tim. iii. 6, 7.

LIKE as he who useth the hand and help of many physicians, though he be always under the cure of some, yet never cometh to perfect health: even so it is with such as do always seek and ever learn, yet for all that they never come to the perfect knowledge of the truth.

Means of Knowledge.

John xiii. 35.

As light endureth not always, but darkness succeedeth: so the times and means to get knowledge endure not always, but we are to use them whilst God doth give them.

Labour.

As the mariner, when he perceiveth a storm or tempest to be near, he first calleth upon God by earnest prayer that he may safely attain to the wished-for haven, and then striketh his sails, and useth all good means which he supposeth needful for the same: even so we must so trust to the providence of God, that we also use our own industry in all good means and sort convenient.

Labour lost.

As a wife, by a long suit obtained, sometimes much molesteth her husband: so some men, with great labours and charges, purchase that thing which afterward is their only care and vexation.

Lamenting for trifles.

As, if you forbid children one play or game, then they straightway cry and weep, not regarding any other kind of pastime: so divers kinds of men will so lament for a trifle or small displeasure, that thereby they make all other commodities and pleasures altogether unpleasant.

Law of God.

1. As some mark by the wayside may direct us well and show us which way to take: so the Law of God may lead us well, and teach us the way that we should take and walk in, but it cannot give us strength and courage to go through if we be weary, neither can it enable us to come to the place whither we would go.

Rom. x. 4.
Gal. iii. 24.

2. As a physician and surgeon, coming to a sick man to heal him, openeth the vein and taketh away blood from him, not to the end to make him die, but as a remedy appointed for the recovery of his health and safety : even so the law pierceth our imposthume, and sometimes maketh a great hole in it, but neither to the end to kill us nor to hurt us, but to bring us into a good order, to the end we may be the more easily healed.

3. As a chaste virgin, sojourning and dwelling with harlots in the stews, who, although she be chaste herself, yet cannot win those to chastity with whom she is conversant, but prevaieth nothing, and is weak : even so the law, although of itself it be good, holy, and just, yet in carnal men the flesh doth hinder and repress its power, and thus it is weak and feeble ; and so, likewise, the Gospel, as it is written on paper and parchment, and is preached by man's voice, is weak in those that be void of God's Spirit, but it is the power of God to salvation only to those that believe.

Rom. vii. 12 ;
viii. 3 ; i. 16.

4. As a pleasure or good turn may be said to be the cause of ingratitude, and prosperity the cause of envy, but yet improperly : even so the law bringeth transgression and wrong doing, although not of itself, but by our fault ; for it requireth obedience, but it findeth us doing amiss, and so it is said to be the cause of transgression, but improperly.

Rom. vii. 7-9, &c.
Gal. iii. 19.

5. As Christ, rising from death, was freed from the grave, Peter delivered from prison was freed from the prison, the sick of the palsy from his bed, the young man from his coffin, the maiden from her couch, and yet the grave, the prison, the bed, the coffin, the couch remained still : even so the law is abolished when we are not subject unto it, the law is dead when we are dead unto it, and yet it remaineth still.

6. As he that hath an inward disease or corruption in his body, although, because it appeareth not on the outside, he may be careless of the danger, yet when the same is lanced, and he perceiveth the inconvenience and peril ensuing thereby to his body, he will then be desirous of the chirurgeon : even so the lancing of our sins, by the preaching of the law, will cause us, being otherwise careless, to seek remedy in Christ.

7. Like as the sum of our faith is comprehended in the creed of the apostles : even so the law of God is the direction and rule of good works.

8. Like as, if a man were bound to pay a thousand pounds to his creditor which he oweth him, and this creditor did demand this debt of him, and he were not able to satisfy him or pay him, yet the creditor should not do unjustly to ask him his thousand pounds ; for when the king did ask of his servant the ten thousand talents that he did owe unto him, he did not unjustly or wrongfully : even so the whole law of God is nothing else but a commandment, whereby we are commanded and bidden to pay that unto God which we owe unto Him, for we are bound of duty to love God with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our strength, and our neighbour as ourselves ; for we are debtors, saith the apostle, but not unto the flesh. Shall we say, then, that God is unrighteous, or that He doth unjustly in asking that thing of us that we do owe unto Him of bounden duty ; but rather that He doth most justly, godly, and righteously demand such things of us.

Matt. xviii. 24.
Deut. vi. 5.
Rom. viii. 12, 13

9. Like as this consequence is nothing worth—money doth not justify or make a man righteous, therefore it is unprofitable ; the eyes do not justify, therefore they must be plucked out ; the hands make not a man righteous, therefore they must be cut off : so, likewise, is this nought also—the law doth not justify, therefore it is unprofitable ; for we must attribute unto every thing its proper effect and use.

10. As the raven was sent forth before the dove : so the law was given before the Gospel.

Gen. viii. 6, &c.
John i. 17.
Luke xvi. 16.

11. As the raven by nature is a foreteller of death : even so the law beforehand enjoined the penalty of death to Adam's transgression.

Gen. ii. 17.

12. As the colour of the raven is black and full of melancholy : even so it is the effect of God's law to bring a black day upon the reprobate.

Joel ii. 2.
Matt. xxii. 13.

13. As the raven brought no tidings of the waters abating from the earth : even so the law telleth us not that the wrath of God is appeased for our offences.

Rom. x. 4.
Gal. iii. 24.

14. As knives and lancets must first be used to open that wound which is full of corruption and rottenness, even to the bottom, and then sharp and bitter salve to draw out the corruption and to eat out the dead flesh thereof, before there come any healing plaster near it, the nature whereof is to close up and skin the upper part of the wound, which, if any corruption remain, afterwards breeds much inconvenience and makes the wound far more dangerous: even so it fareth with all those who are wounded with the venomous dart of self-love, which wound, being choked with the corruption and dead flesh of covetousness and pride, they yet will use no other medicine for the curing thereof than that pleasant healing salve of the Gospel, which, if they knew in truth how little the same did profit them before such time as the sharp lancing knife of God's law had opened the wound, and the bitter salves of His judgments and sharp threatenings had eaten out the rottenness thereof, they would go another way to work, and use a more suitable course for the obtaining of health, although it be very tedious and sharp at the first.

Gal. iii. 24.

15. As a schoolmaster serveth not his scholar continually, but only till such time as the scholar may grow to some good ability, to go forward at his book by his own study: so the Lord causeth fear in His people by the law, not always, but till such time as they have sufficiently learned to know themselves, and therefore to fly from themselves to Christ Jesus, who freeth them from the curse and condemnation of the law.

16. Even as a rule directeth the artificer in his work and keepeth him from erring in any practice: so the law and commandments of the Lord are a rule to guide us, and to show us wherein we err from the right way.

17. As a line declareth the straightness or crookedness of the tree: even so the law and commandments of God, laid to our actions, declare how far we wander and go astray.

18. As a band doth knit and hold many things together, and as of many links is made one chain, or as, by the sinews, the joints and parts of our natural bodies are tied and bound together: even so, by law, the body politic of a commonweal is united and knit together as one for the preservation of peace, in the profession of one true everliving and overruling Lord.

19. As, among all ordinary accidents that are incident to the prosperity or adversity of mankind, there is nothing in earth that more fully proportioneth the joys in heaven than music and marriage—to hear the one, we leave our meat and drink, and to be joined to the other, we leave father and mother: even so, among all ordinary instructions incident to the earthly felicity of mankind, there is nothing that more fully proportioneth our condemnation to be just than the law, nor anything that more fully proportioneth our salvation to be in Jesus Christ than the Gospel. In the one we hear thunderings, earthquakes, lamentations, mournings, and woes; in the other, nothing else but sweet voices, pleasant songs, and instruments of music, all proportioning and perpetually pointing to our marriage with Christ Jesus, in whom we are freed from the curse and threats of the law and all other inconveniences whatsoever.

20. As a scholar is in subjection to his schoolmaster till he become learned, and then he is set at liberty: so, in like manner, the law hath performed the office thereunto appointed when by it we have learned to know and see and acknowledge our infirmities, corruption, sinfulness, unrighteousness, and do fly unto Christ to be justified by faith in Him.

21. As honey by nature is very sweet, but seemeth very bitter to some sick and distempered bodies: so doth the law seem burdensome; but this cometh not by nature, but through our weakness.

Matt. xviii. 23, 24,
&c.

22. As the debtor, not being able to pay his debt, was freely forgiven: even so the law, in the act of justification, is utterly idle, as that which is neither the cause nor a part of our righteousness, as it is wrought for us.

23. Like as, if I owe a man a hundred pounds, and be bound to pay him at a certain day, if I do then pay it, albeit mine heart be never so grudging and unwilling thereto, yet have I fulfilled the law and discharged my bond, so that there shall no process or judgment pass against me; but God's law requireth a thing to be done with a cheerful and a well willing heart and mind, and even of pure love; for if I do it, either for fear or unwillingly, that shall be imputed unto me for sin—if I do it for fear, then do I it not of love, but rather hate both the thing that I do and also the law that constraineth me to do it; and if I do it unwillingly, then would I do the contrary, and so would that there were no such law, neither any God that should judge me in so doing; and seeing that God judgeth me after mine heart and will, then must He needs condemn me, for I would do contrary unto His law and will—yea, and do wish in mine heart contrary to that which I do in mine outward deed.

24. Like as, if I see a poor man who is not of ability to do me any pleasure, and, nevertheless, useth all his diligence to seek my favour, and would, with heart and mind, give me some acceptable present, if he were of power, being also sorry that he cannot perform his will and mind towards me;—now, if there be any spark of humanity or gentleness in me, I will count his good will as well as though he had in very deed performed his will, for his ability extendeth no further—if his power were better, better should I have: even so, seeing we are not of power and ability to perform the law of God, and yet bear a good heart towards God and His law, bemoaning our imbecility that we can do Him no further pleasure, then will God account us, not as His enemies, but as His dear children and beloved friends.

25. As after sleep the body, being awaked, is fresh, lusty, strong, and courageous to do its work: so, likewise, after the fearful threatenings of the law, when we hear the glad tidings of the Gospel, that God will be our Lord and dwell with us, the mind is comforted, strengthened, and moved up to do its duty.

26. As a man is judged and known to be waking when he can do the office of a waking man, as talk, work, write, or such like: even so is a man awaked out of the sleep of sins when he lives in charity, fears God, and walks according to His law in His vocation.

27. As we see in courts of justice here amongst us, there is a royal seat set where the judge sits; he that is accused stands at the bar, holds up his hand, hears his indictment read, witness is brought against him, and, if guilty, he is justly condemned to death: so, likewise, we shall see Jesus Christ, the righteous Judge of the world, who will not be bribed, sit in His seat of majesty at the last day, and all the company of angels about Him, and, if we have died unsaved, we shall stand at His bar accused and indicted for breaking that righteous law of His Word; moreover, the devil, who enticed us so to do, shall bear witness that the accusation is true—yea, and our own conscience also, with the fear of that fearful sentence, "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire," &c., shall make us to tremble.

Matt. xxv. 31 34.
41.

28. Like as he who cannot esteem and discern his sickness or the grievousness of his disease must, of necessity, have a negligent care of seeking a remedy and a wholesome medicine for the same: even so he who learneth not to acknowledge his sins by the law, the same, doubtless, knoweth not how to embrace grace by the Gospel.

The Law our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ.

1. Like as the schoolmaster reproveth his scholars, whereby he grieveth them and maketh them heavy, and yet not to the end that this bondage should always continue, but that it should cease when the children are well brought up and instructed accordingly, and that afterwards, without any constraint of the schoolmaster, they should cheerfully enjoy their liberty and their father's goods: even so they who are vexed and oppressed with the law do know that these terrors and vexations shall not always continue, but that thereby they are prepared to come unto Christ, who is to be revealed unto them, and by whom they are to receive the liberty of the Spirit, &c.

Gal. iii. 24.

Gen. xxi. 27; ii.
7.

2. As the duties of a schoolmaster be especially three—first, to teach his scholars; secondly, to frame their manners; and, thirdly, to punish offenders: even so the law of God first teacheth us concerning God, that there is a God and what manner of Being He is, and what manner of nature man's was by creation, and what was the image of God, or original righteousness, in man—namely, agreeableness to the law of God; it teacheth also of sin and the penalty of sin, of the last judgment, of the resurrection of the dead and life everlasting, of outward discipline or honest government of conduct, with many other such things; secondly, it frameth our manners in the outward and civil conversation of life, and is a rule of life or good works, in which those that are born again must show their obedience to God; and, thirdly, it chastiseth us with the threats of God's wrath and endless damnation, and it punisheth us with sickness, death, and other miseries, all which are sermons of the law concerning God's dreadful wrath against sin.

3. As a looking-glass doth neither wash nor make him fair that looketh therein, but giveth him occasion either to seek for water or else for some other thing that may make him fair and clean; even so the law sheweth unto us our sins, and maketh known unto us our miserable estate and wretchedness, and how that there is nothing good in us, and that we are far off from all manner of righteousness, and so driveth us of necessity to seek righteousness in Christ, the Physician and Fountain of all salvation, who only hath by His death taken away sin and death and delivered us out of the prison of the law.

4. Like as in the night, by reason of the darkness spread upon the earth, all things are hid and covered, which causeth that we cannot discern and discover the spots which we have on our faces; but when the light beginneth to appear, and that we take a glass to behold ourselves therein, then are they discovered and show themselves: so, likewise, during the time that we are covered with the darkness of ignorance, the sins and vices that dwell in us are hidden there, and yet oftentimes we think, being leprous and deformed, that we are beautiful and perfect; but our eye being once opened and illuminated by the Spirit and grace of our God, and taking the glass of the law, therein to behold the estate of our nature and our life, then we begin to know the great and grievous imperfections and wants that are in us, and so at once we lose the opinion which we had conceived before of our own righteousness and virtues, and are forced to fly to Christ for remedy, &c.

The Law pointeth out true bliss, but furthereth not the certainty of it.

LIKE as, if a man should show a needy body a bag of gold upon the top of a high tower, and yet not lend him a ladder wherewithal he might climb up to the top and fetch down the bag: even so doth God's law only point men to the sovereign good, without showing us how we may come by it, seeing that no man fulfilleth the law.

Suits in Law; how they are lawful.

1. As a soldier in lawful war may kill his enemy, and yet love him: even so a man may forgive an injury that is done against him, and yet seek remedy by law, so it be done in a Christian manner—that is, without private revenge and not scandalous to the Church—but to maintain peace, and that the party offending may be chastised, and brought to repentance for his fault.

2. Like as physicians use desperate remedies when weaker will not serve: even so must men use law, as the last means, when all others fail.

Laws like to cobwebs.

As little flies are fast tied and easily snared in the cobwebs, but the drones and great flies break and escape through them : so, likewise, poor and mean men are fast wound and holden in the penalties and dangers of laws, but lords and men in great authority daily break laws and are not corrected, so that the weakest goeth to the wall and the worst holdeth the candle.

Learning.

1. LIKE as, in meats, wholesomeness is as much to be required as pleasantness : so, in reading or hearing authors, we ought to desire goodriess as well as eloquence.

2. Like as a field, although it be fertile, can bring forth no fruit except it be first tilled and seed cast in : so the mind, although it be apt of itself, cannot without learning bring forth any goodness.

3. As men in nothing differ more from the gods than when they are fools : so in nothing do they come near them so much as when they are wise and learned.

4. As a bird bringeth all kinds of food to her young ones' nest, and is nothing the better herself thereby : so some do only learn that they may immediately teach, not seeking thereby to amend and make themselves better.

5. As vessels that are to be filled are bowed, and made apt to receive the liquor that is poured therein : so ought a learner to accommodate and apply himself, that nothing of that which is profitably spoken do escape him.

6. Like as, in meats, one and the self-same dish is diversely set forth, according to the invention of the dresser and appetite of the eater : even so, in learning, one and the self-same point is diversely handled, according to the discretion of the writer and capacity of the reader.

7. Like as choice and good wine loseth its verdure and strength if it be put into a vile and impure vessel : right so a good word or sentence, if it be spoken to an evil man, or learning, if it chance to a wicked man, taketh no effect.

8. As the diamond, enchased in gold, giveth a far brighter gloss than if it were set in lead, iron, or other base metal : even so the love of godliness and virtue, planted in a learned man's breast, bringeth forth far greater and more excellent fruit than if an unlearned man enjoyed the same graces.

Appearance of Learning amongst inferiors.

As the ship lying in the haven or river seemeth huge and great, but being in the main sea it sheweth both slender and small : so divers persons who be but simple and mean in some places appear to be wise, excellent, and learned, whereas amongst their betters they appear base, simple, and plain.

Learning or virtue, the difficulty of obtaining.

1. As the date-tree is most hard to be climbed, although having fruit most pleasant : Prov. iii. 12-15. so, likewise, the entry or way to learning and virtue is most difficult, although they have fruit both pleasant and profitable.

2. Like as nature hath hid very deep in the ground stones precious and of much value, but others of no virtue are everywhere to be found : so things of estimation and price, as virtue and learning, are known but unto few, neither can they be obtained without great labour and study.

3. As he who hungereth or thirsteth can do nothing unless his appetite and desire be satisfied : so all things ought we to lay aside until we obtain learning and wisdom.

4. As the best wine soon loseth taste or colour if it be poured into a vessel filthy and impure : so is good learning more than lost if it happen to a naughty (wicked) man, for he will use it most perversely even to serve his gain and appetite.

How we must behave ourselves in Lending to artificers and labourers.

2 Thess. iii. 10, 11.
Luke vi. 35, 36.
Isa. lviii. 7.
Prov. xix. 17.

As charity doth not require that we should give of our goods freely to them that are strong, lusty, and able to work and labour : so, when necessity urgeth artificers and labourers, and they desire to borrow anything of thee, then thou must obey the rule of Christ, and lend without looking for a recompense in the like or in any other kind of duty.

God's Liberality.

As fire ministereth light to a multitude, and yet is not diminished or consumed thereby ; or as a candle, where many other candles be lighted, the light is not thereby in any wise diminished or hurt at all ; or as the voice of one preacher teacheth a hundred as well as one : even so God bestoweth innumerable benefits upon us, and yet His liberality is not hindered thereby.

Liberality to the poor.

Matt. vi. 19.
2 Cor. ix. 9, 10.
1 Tim. vi. 17.
Heb. vi. 10 ; xiii. 16.

As, if householders keep their corn in their barns all the year, the vermin will consume it, and so it will decrease, but if they sow and scatter it in the field, then they receive increase thereof : so, likewise, if we do not scatter and bestow our wealth and riches on the poor and needy, God will rather decrease than increase them.

The fruits of Liberty are, by good right, required of Christians.

John viii. 34.
Rom. vi. 20.
James ii. 12.

As he who doth commit sin is the servant of sin : even so he who is delivered by Christ will be no more bond, but free, and therefore will not take upon him the yoke of bondage.

Godly Life.

Exod. xxxiv. 29.

1. As when Moses had been and conversed with God for forty days upon the mountain, at his coming down his face shone and glistened with heavenly glory : so will it be with us. When we have for twenty or thirty years been conversant in heaven, we shall become heavenly and spiritual, both in word and deed.

2. As by experience we see that, when a countryman hath dwelt some twenty or thirty years in a court, he forgetteth his country speech and course of life, and groweth to be as good a courtier as if he had been born in the court : even so our earthly talk and communication, our worldly course of life, and the corruptions of the flesh, that bear but too much sway in us, do but over manifestly show how little we are conversant in heaven, and consequently do testify that we account ourselves burgesses of earth, and not of heaven.

3. As the rough teasel or thistle doth make the cloth smooth : so doth a straight and strict kind of life make the conscience more quiet.

Life variable and troublesome.

1. As the sea by tempest is sometimes troublesome, and then is quiet and calm by fair weather again : so the life of man sometimes is oppressed with sorrow and extreme necessity, and sometimes it floweth with joy and wealth at will.

2. As a flower, so soon as it bloweth and is ripe, is cut down or very shortly gathered : so, likewise, is the continuance of man's life. Job xiv. 2.
Isa. xl. 6, 7.

3. As the beauty of a flower suddenly fadeth and is quickly gone : so, likewise, is all the glory and grace of all flesh. Ps. ciii. 15.
James i. 10, 11.
1 Pet. i. 24.

4. As the sun is now shadowed with clouds, but by-and-by shineth forth brightly : so, likewise, the life of man is subject to change. Job viii. 9.

5. As vapours appear for a little while, but afterward vanish away quite out of sight : even so the life of man quickly vanishes and is gone. James iv. 14.

6. As wind suddenly passeth away with a blast : so, also, suddenly passeth away the life of man. Job vii. 6, 7.

7. As there is no way so plain but it hath many turnings and by-paths, that, unless a man take good heed, he may wander and go out of his way : even so the life of man hath many by-paths to walk in, so that, unless he take great heed, he will easily wander out of the right way.

8. As there is no way but hath a beginning and an ending : so, likewise, the life of man, as it hath a beginning, hath an ending also.

Some have better Liking to other men's things than to their own.

Even as adulterers are greatly pleased with other men's wives, but their own they do condemn and little regard : so some men do take more delight in the pleasure or things of other men's than in their own.

To Live well is to die well.

LIKE as Balaam wished and had a great desire to die the death of the righteous, but he would not imitate them in godly conversation : even so all men wish for a happy end of life, but few care to live virtuously and honestly, which, doubtless, is the ready way to die well. Numb. xxiii. 10.
Acts viii. 19, 20 ;
xix. 13.

The Lord's Supper.

1. LIKE as, in the person of Christ, when He was on earth, His manhood was seen, but His Godhead was not seen, and yet, notwithstanding, it did great and wonderful things, without any changing or confounding of natures : even so, in the Lord's Supper, we see the bread and wine, but Christ's body we see not, although it, nevertheless, worketh mightily in us.

2. As the body of the sun's light above is in itself whole, albeit it be dispersed here beneath : so, likewise, Christ in heaven above is whole, notwithstanding that He suffereth us in His Supper each one to be a full partaker of His body and blood when He giveth Himself unto us, and yet without any diminution at all when He offereth Himself unto us who are weak, and without being enclosed in us when He is received of us, and without any dishonour at all to His majesty when He cometh into our small cottage, and will have our hearts to be His temple and dwelling-place.

Gen. II, 17.

3. Like as the forbidden fruit, which Adam and Eve did eat in the Garden of Eden, by Satan's provocation, procured their death: even so that heavenly manna, which Christ hath appointed for our spiritual food in His Supper, doth bring unto the worthy receivers thereof everlasting life.

4. As the sick man, the weaker he knoweth himself to be, should so much the more earnestly desire meat, both to receive nourishment and to refresh his strength: even so, so far from it ought it to be that our weakness should keep us from the receiving the Lord's Supper, that it ought rather to spur us forward to come unto it, that by it we might be strengthened in faith and repentance.

5. As the Word of God is all one, whether it fall upon the evil or upon the good, surely it is all one in the minds of the hearers: so the Sacrament of the Lord's body and blood is all one, whether it be received of the good or of the evil. And as the Gospel in itself is the power of God to salvation, and doth also save, but not to the unbelieving as it is to the believing: so the Sacrament is of itself the body of Christ; but to the wicked who contemn it, and to them who do receive it unworthily, it is far otherwise.

6. As a mother, having brought forth her little one, doth not forsake it, but nurseth and bringeth it up: so Christ, having ordained baptism to be a seal and pledge of our spiritual new birth into His Church, did institute the Holy Supper, to the end that, by participation in His body and blood, we might the more be strengthened in the assurance that Christ is ours, together with all His benefits, and so feed our souls spiritually to life everlasting.

7. As a little wax poured upon other wax is made all one with it: even so they that receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper worthily abide in Christ, and Christ in them.

8. As the child, when he cometh to age, is bound to honour his parents, not only for begetting and bringing him into this life, but also because they have fed and brought him up, and still do continue the same duties unto him: even so should it be with us, whom God hath, as it were, begotten into His Church through our baptism, and to whom He hath since, in His Holy Supper, ministered the food of our souls, in the communion of the body and blood of Jesus Christ; for not only our spiritual new birth by baptism, but also the spiritual food which our good Father giveth unto us in His Holy Supper, binds us to honour Him—yea, and should thereto mightily induce us, considering that, for food of our souls, He hath delivered His only Son Jesus Christ to be crucified for us.

9. Like as, if any man had a child so sick, that nothing could serve for his food and recovery but precious pearls confectioned or preserved, this child should be much bound to love and honour his parent that, for his relief, did not grudge such cost and expenses: even so we shall deserve great reproof of our heavenly Father, who feedeth us in His Holy Supper, not with pearls, but with the very flesh and blood of His Son Jesus Christ, if we should make no account to please Him by amendment of life, withal considering that, as there is no comparison between pearls and the body and blood of Jesus Christ, so the spiritual life of our souls is, without comparison, much more excellent than the life of our bodies.

10. As meat and drink ministered unto the body do maintain the life, motions, and senses of the body: so from communion of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, which is the food of the soul, must proceed the spiritual and heavenly life, with its cogitations, affections, words, and deeds.

11. As it were a strange case if the body, by eating and drinking, should gather no sustenance, and, consequently, want all motion, sense, and bodily operation: so were it a monstrous matter that the soul, communicating in the body and blood of Jesus Christ, should gather no spiritual food that might bring forth newness of life and holiness in words and deeds.

12. As the Holy Supper is the table of God's children, the faithful members of the Church of Jesus Christ: so communicating thereat is a solemn protestation that we are the children of God, true believers, and members of the Church of Christ, and that so we separate ourselves from profane, worldly, and vicious people, and do purpose to live holily, righteously, and religiously, as it becometh the children of God and faithful members of the Church. Such, therefore, as, communicating in the Holy Supper, do not, nevertheless, amend their lives, but, walking after the world and the flesh, are given to swearing, whoredom, drunkenness, gluttony, covetousness, deceit, fraud, ambition, pride, envy, hatred, backbiting, with other like vices and corruptions, do show themselves counterfeits and hypocrites, do eat and drink their own damnation, and do horribly scandalize and offend the Church whereof they should be members, together with the doctrine that they do profess.

13. As love is the fulfilling of the law, and the mark of God's children: so there is nothing that can more mightily induce us thereto than the use of this Holy Supper.

14. As the bread made of many kernels is but one bread: so we that communicate in the bread and wine of the Holy Supper are one body, under one Head, Jesus Christ. 1 Cor. x. 17, 18,

15. As bread hath this property, through God's blessing given it, to feed and strengthen our natural bodies in this life: so, likewise, the body of Christ, being represented effectually unto us in the Lord's Supper by that bread, hath the self-same property, touching our souls, to strengthen and to nourish them spiritually.

16. As wine doth comfort and make man's heart glad: so our full joy and spiritual comfort is to be found in Christ alone.

17. As our diet is then full, whole, and perfect, as it were, when it consisteth of these two things, bread and wine: so we must know that the fullness and perfection of all spiritual nourishment is found in Christ alone, and nowhere else, whilst that He is become as well the drink as the meat of our soul, not only in this double sign—helping our infirmity, as it were—but also teaching us to seek the heavenly refection and nourishment of our souls fully and wholly in Christ, and nowhere else.

18. As the bread is made of many grains, and the wine of sundry and several grapes, and yet all make but one bread and one wine: so all the faithful should be instructed thereby, that, though they be several and distinct persons one from another, as the members in the body are, yet they, all compacted together, make but one body, Rom. xii. 4, 5,
1 Cor. xvi. 16, 17,

19. Like as, when wax is put into that which is melted, it is presently mingled and united with it: so we are united to Christ by faith, in worthily receiving the mysteries of His body and blood in the Sacrament.

20. Even as we are by the blood of Christ cleansed, and by the Holy Ghost, in baptism, regenerated: so we, being cleansed and regenerated, are spiritually fed and nourished by the benefit of the body and blood of Christ in rightly using the Lord's Supper according to His own instruction.

21. Even as there is no liberal-hearted gentleman that maketh a feast but is desirous that his guests should have a greedy and hungry stomach: so our heavenly Father is desirous that all men who are bidden to His heavenly feast should be partakers of the mysteries of the Lord's body and blood, and to this end should have hungering and thirsting stomachs, which hunger and thirst must be of the soul, and not of the body.

22. As bread nourisheth and strengtheneth man, and giveth him ability to labour: so the body of Christ, eaten by faith, feedeth and satisfieth the soul of man, and furnisheth the whole man to all duties of godliness,

23. As wine is drink to the thirsty, and also maketh merry the hearts of men : even so the blood of our Lord Jesus, drunken by faith, doth quench the thirst of the burning conscience, and filleth the hearts of the faithful with unspeakable joy.

It is our duty to communicate at the Lord's Supper.

As they who, living in fornication and will not marry, lest their fornication, which they are not minded to give over, should be the more grievous, being thereby converted into adultery, are in a woeful state ; or as they who, hating their neighbours, when they say the Lord's Prayer, " Our Father," &c., do leave out this petition, " Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us," and so, refusing to ask forgiveness for their transgressions, continue in hatred against their neighbours, are worthy twofold condemnation—one in respect of the hatred that they continue in, the other for their sins, for the which they ask no forgiveness : even so they that forbear the Holy Supper, in respect of their bad consciences, do pronounce sentence against themselves—namely, that they deserve double death ; first, for their sins, which they continue in wicked conscience of ; and secondly, they separate themselves from the communion of Christ, in whom only is the fullness of life.

Preparation needful before receiving of the Lord's Supper.

1 Cor. iv. 11.

As it is very convenient that he who will hear the Word fruitfully should prepare himself before to hear : so, likewise, it is very needful for him that will receive the Lord's Supper comfortably, that he should, by examination, be prepared before receiving thereof ; for this preparation, both before hearing and receiving, is, as it were, a kind of physic, for preparatives are ministered always before physic, otherwise it would do no good, but hurt : so, unless examination go before the Sacrament, the party sealeth up the threatenings which are written against him, instead of the promises which are made unto him ; for the Sacrament is a seal, and, therefore, sealeth good or evil, as every other seal doth.

Love.

1. As a candle wasteth itself to give light unto others : even so a good Christian ought to spend his life for the benefit of others.

2. Like as, in the building of a house, one stone is bound and fastened to another with mortar : even so, in the spiritual building of Christ, one Christian man is joined to another by love.

3. As fire goeth out if it be not maintained with wood : so, likewise, love groweth cold which is not mixed with good works.

4. As fire without wood turneth to ashes : so doth love without works come to an end and finish.

1 Prov. x. 12.

5. As hatred is the cause of contentions among men : so, likewise, love covereth faults, either by reforming them or by winking at them.

6. As the rod of Moses, when turned into a serpent, devoured all the other serpents into which the magicians' rods were transformed : even so the love of God must devour the love of all other things.

7. As that is the hottest fire which warmeth them that are furthest off : so that is the most fervent and perfect love which forsaketh none, though they be ever so far off, neither friend nor foe, but embraceth all in Him, who never doth forsake unless He be forsaken.

8. As envy, hatred, or malice, moveth us to reproach and disdain our brother when he displeaseth or offendeth us : so, in like manner, love hideth and pardoneth the faults which he committeth against us, though they be never so many. 1 Pet. iv. 8.

9. As a king is honoured in his image : so God, in man, is both loved and hated. He cannot hate man who loveth God, neither can he love God who hateth man.

10. As fire cannot be hidden in flax without some flame, nor musk in the bosom without smell : even so neither can love be hidden in the breast without suspicion of its being there.

11. As a cold stone, by lying three or four hours in the warm sun, gathereth heat : so the love of God shining upon our souls ought to kindle us to love Him and all men for His sake.

John iii. 16.
1 John iv. 16, 19,
20.
Eph. ii. 4.
Rom. v. 8 ; xlii. 10.
1 Cor. xiii. 1, &c.

God's Love.

1. As a sure friend is not known but in time of need : so God's goodness and love is never so well perceived as it is in helping of us when we cannot help ourselves. Ps. xli. 11.

2. As Adam's fall did serve to manifest God's justice and mercy—the one in punishing, the other in pardoning of sin, which otherwise we had never known : so the troubles of the Church serve to manifest, first, our deserts, by reason of our sins ; secondly, our weakness and inability to help ourselves ; and thirdly, the loving kindness of the Lord our God, in saving and defending, that so we might be truly thankful, and return all the praise and glory to God and none to ourselves. Rom. ix. 22, 23.

3. As a father keepeth his son and heir short, without any money in his purse or anything else at his own will, till the time come that he shall inherit ; and in great wisdom he doth it, for if his son should have the inheritance, presently he would waste it and spend it vainly : so God dealeth with His children, and for no other cause, both in singular wisdom and love, that they may say afterwards, "By this I know that Thou lovest me," &c. Ps. xli. 11.

The Love of God in giving His Son for us.

LIKE as, if a man give a penny who hath a great deal of money in his purse, it is not so much as one who giveth it having but it only—as when the woman of Zarephath gave Elijah the handful of meal, having no more for herself and her son : even so the wonderful great love of God towards mankind appeared in this, that having but one only Son and not many sons, He would vouchsafe to give Him for a ransom, for a redemption for us most wretched and vile sinners.

1 Kings xvii. 12.
Jer. vi. 26.
Amos. viii. 10.
John iii. 16.
1 John iv. 9.

Love of our neighbour.

As he that loveth the Lord doth altogether surely and thoroughly depend upon Him in firm faith and clear conscience, and, therefore, doth not admit any other gods nor serve idols, nor dishonour His name, nor profane His Sabbaths : even so he that loveth his neighbour as well as himself, will neither contemn his parents, nor hurt or harm his neighbour, nor defile his wife with adultery, nor steal his goods, nor falsely witness against him, nor covet any jot of all that is his ; but will heartily seek his commodity (advantage) as his own.

Deut. vi. 5.
Matt. xxii. 37.
Mark xii. 3 ; x.
27.

Love of the world.

As a nurse that will wean her child from the love and liking of her milk doth anoint her teat with aloes, mustard, or some other such bitter things : so our merciful Father, to the

1 Cor. xi. 32.
Luke xv. 12, &c.

end that He may draw and wean us from the love of worldly delights, is wont to send us tribulation and affliction, which, of all other things, hath most force to work to that effect—as we see in the example of the prodigal son.

Lover of virtue.

As some lovers do much delight in the pale colour of her whom they love : so the lover of virtue and godliness doth not abhor the banishment of sincere Christians, neither the poverty of sound professors, nor yet the condemnation of the faithful saints of God.

Lying.

Ezek. xiii. 6, 8, 10.
Jer xxiii. 25, 26.
1 Tim. iv. 2, 3.
Isa. lx. 15, 16.

1. As he sinneth most grievously that deceiveth blind men or travelling men, by showing them a contrary way : even so much more heinously doth he offend who, in matters of religion, doctrine, and godliness, doth bring men into errors through lying, because he doth thereby, as it were, thrust them out of the kingdom of heaven.

John viii. 44.

2. As the devil is the father of lies : so lying is an evident token of his children.

Prov. xvii. 7.

3. As magnificent talk is uncomely to a poor soul : so lying is unmeet for a prince.

Lust and pleasure.

Isa. xxxviii. 17.
Gen. iii. 6.

1. As pills that are outwardly fair, gilt, and rolled in sugar, but within are full of bitterness : even so lustful pleasure is no sooner hatched but repentance is at hand, holding her by the head, ready to supplant her ; for pleasure and sorrow are twins.

1 Tim. v. 6.
Isa. xxiii. 12-14.

2. As a painted sepulchre, fair without, but within full of mortal infection and stench : even so lustful pleasure is presently turned to sorrow and tears, and flieth and slideth away, leaving rather cause of repentance than occasion of remembrance.

3. As he that companieth with millers or colliers shall hardly escape free from meal or blacking : so, likewise, shall he hardly escape lust and pleasures that haunteth with those who are given to follow their lusts and pleasures.

4. As green wood laid upon the fire, albeit at the first it resisteth, yet, in the end, doth burn and is consumed : so is it with him that frequenteth those that give themselves to lusts and pleasures, albeit at the beginning he resisteth the evil, and for a while falleth not thereinto, yet, by continual haunt (association), he finally falleth in with them.

Joel ii. 12, 16.

5. As it is unnatural to kindle fire with water : so is it impossible for lust and pleasure to breed in a penitent heart that sorroweth for sin.

Rom. xiii. 14.
Heb. xi. 25.

6. As Agis, the last king of the Lacedemonians, was in his youth given to all lusts and pleasures, but, being established ruler of the land, he quite gave them over, and showed such an example of temperance and sobriety in the use of pleasures among his subjects that they also addicted themselves to sobriety : even so we Christians, albeit before the knowledge of the truth we wallowed in the lusts of the flesh, yet, being now raised to this honour and estate, to be made kings and priests—yea, even the children of God—we ought now to be the more estranged from all lusts and pleasures, to the end that, after our example, all others may renounce the same and imitate our sobriety.

7. Even as a snail, by little and little, creepeth up from the root of a tree unto the top, and as she goeth consumeth the leaves, and leaveth nothing behind her but foul and filthy slimish steps : so, likewise, lust and pleasure, if we consent unto them, will creep into our souls and bodies, and will deprive them of all ornaments of virtue, and will leave nothing behind but a foul, filthy conscience, and reproach to us and our posterity.

8. As wine and drunkenness make a man senseless, &c. : so lust and pleasure perverteth the sense and weakeneth the soul.

9. As fevers or agues, the heat or cold whereof, though they be internal, yet are more extreme and more painful to be endured than the coldest or hottest season of all the year : so, likewise, there is no fire whatsoever whose heat is so forcible as is the scorching flame of our own lusts and concupiscences.

The offices of Magistracy and Ministry.

1. LIKE as it is meet that the diseased seek to the physician for counsel than that the physician should go about to seek for the sick : even so he that knoweth himself fit either for magistracy or ministry, or for any dignity or office, should rather abide till he be called thereunto than seek for it himself.

Exod. xviii. 21.

2. Like as a governor of a ship is not chosen for his riches, but for his knowledge : so should the chief magistrate in every city be chosen rather for his wisdom and godly zeal than for his wealth and great possessions.

3. Like as a battered or crazed ship, by drinking in of water, not only drowneth herself, but all those that are in her : so a ruler, by using viciousness, destroyeth not himself alone, but all others besides that are under his government.

4. Like as a good musician, having any key or string of his instrument out of tune, doth not immediately cut it off and cast it away, but, either with straining it higher or slacking it down lower, by little and little causeth it to agree : so should rulers rather reform transgressors by small corrections than seek to cast them away for every trespass.

Necessity of the Magistrate and of a preaching Minister.

1. As the wall within and without also is made of squared stones, between the which the lesser stones are concealed, to make the building up : even so the preaching minister within the Church, and the magistrate in the commonweal, should support and uphold the meaner sort in due obedience.

2. Like as the soul in excellency surpasseth and exceedeth the body : so doth the office of the preacher, which principally is occupied in instructing of the soul, deserve to be preferred before all such functions as concern only the body and the direction and ordering of the outward life of man, out of which office of a diligent preacher springeth and issueth the true outward obedience unto the civil magistrate—for as he compelleth, the preacher persuadeth ; as he constraineth, the preacher allureth ; as he forceth with the sword, so the preacher draweth voluntarily by the doctrine of the Word.

Magistrates' duty to their subjects.

1. As that medicine is more to be allowed which healeth the parts of a man's body than that which utterly burneth away the same : so is that magistrate more to be praised who, by correction, causeth evil-doers to amend than he who, by death and execution, utterly taketh the same away.

2. As God is above all men, the soul more excellent than the body, and the kingdom of heaven more precious than earthly treasures : so, likewise, doth the chief and principal end of the magistrate's charge and office consist in the establishing and maintaining of purity of doctrine, of the holy ministry and service of God, of the holy administration of the Sacraments, of the invocation of God's name, of the order of ecclesiastical discipline, &c.

Rom. xiii. 4.
1 Chron. xv. 1 ;
xxii. 6.
2 Chron. xiv. 3,
&c. ; xv. 8, &c.,
xvii. 6, &c. ; xxix.
1, &c. ; xxx. 1, 2,
&c. ; xxxi. 1, 2, &c.
Dan. iii. 24, &c.
Ps. ii. 10.

Dan. vi. 9, 25, &c.
Jer. xxxviii. 5.
Matt. xxviii. 23, 25.

3. As inferior magistrates ought not to shrink from equity and justice, notwithstanding the commandments of their superiors: so ought not the superior, for fear of displeasing his inferior, to make any wrongful or unlawful decree.

Numb. xxxv. 32,
33.
Josh. vii. 12, &c.
Deut. xxii. 10, 11,
17; xxi. 1.
Jonah i. 15.
1 Cor. x. 6, &c.;
v. 4, &c.

4. Like as, when fire hath taken a house, men are wont to pull it down and cast it to the earth, lest it should fire also the neighbours' houses: so must the magistrate pluck down and punish the transgressor, lest the heat of God's wrath be kindled and consume all the people.

Numb. xxxv. 11,
12; xxxv. 16, 17.
Exod. xxi. 12.

5. As it is great rigor to condemn to death a man that by mischance killeth one: so is it an exercise of mercy condemned by the Lord Himself to pardon him that wilfully committeth murder.

6. Even as too much cruelty and severity on the part of a prince make his subjects to fear and hate him: so, also, do general good will and gentleness make them to love him and to fear lest he should be taken from them or incur any mishap.

Deut. xx. 1, &c.

7. As princes and magistrates have their laws, statutes, and ordinances wherewith to contain their subjects in their duties in the time of peace: so, also, should they take order for good government in time of war, to the end their just wars may justly and holily be prosecuted.

Malice.

As the herb mint doth much hinder milk being turned into cheese: even so the malice of the heart doth hinder benevolence to increase and grow.

Malicious.

As the spider weaveth her web out of that which she hath within herself: so the malicious can frame slanders out of their own brains, though they have no matter to work upon.

Man.

Acts xvii. 24, 25.

1. LIKE as God hath created all things in the world for man's use and service: even so hath He created man alone for His glory.

Acts xvii. 27-29.

2. Like as all things in the world serve man, and are subject to man: even so ought man to be subject to the Lord, and to serve Him; and for this end man was created.

Ps. cxliv. 4.

3. As things that be nought worth are thrown out and cast away, not fit for any good purpose, but to be rejected and trodden under feet: even so man, in his sinful and mortal state, appears a thing of nought.

Ps. xlii. 1, 2.
Phil. i. 21-23.

4. As the excellent and noble hawk called a falcon, upon the fist of the fowler, seeing a prey flying on high, doth by-and-by spread her wings and offer to break the strings wherewith she is holden, and to be gone after the prey, but, if she be hooded, she neither seeth the prey nor is any whit moved: even so man, whose nature far excelleth all other living creatures, thinking upon the things that are above in heaven with God, and with the eyes of his mind, beholding eternal bliss and endless felicity, he is inflamed and pricked with a great and wonderful desire to attain unto the same; but if he be hooded with ignorance, spiritual blindness, and a love of this world, he will never be touched with any heavenly motion, nor any whit moved with any right love of God, nor once turn so much as an eye of his mind towards heaven or God.

Gen. ii. 7; iii. 15;
xviii. 27.
Job iv. 19; x. 9.

5. As the crocodile is a creature of an incredible bigness, and yet hath his beginning of a very small and little egg, and is known only to Egypt and to those countries which are watered with the river Nile, and in this thing is very admirable, that no living creature that hath so small a beginning, as of an egg, doth grow to such an exceeding bigness : even so such a one is man, when he, forgetting his original and the sole matter of his beginning, waxeth insolent and proud ; and yet in this one thing he is more admirable, that, being moulded out of the earth and dust, he will make his heart a nest for pride and all abomination to build and to dwell in.

Ps. cxlvi. 4.
lxxviii. 39.
Isa. xl. 6-8.

6. As earth or clay by its natural course is borne downward, and is lowest of all elements : so man, borne by the disposition and motion of the flesh, is beyond horse and mule, and is by the prophets warned to learn wisdom by the swallow, by the ant, by the spider, by the ox, by the ass, almost by all the beasts of the field.

7. Like as, if a beggar, who hath not a rag to cover him, will, notwithstanding, brag that he is the greatest man and the richest in all the country, and, in all assemblies, is not ashamed to take the highest place, every man would judge such a man worthy to be whipped ; or if there were a thief, who, being convicted of many great crimes, notwithstanding, would be so shameless and so stately, that he would not humble himself before his judge nor any other man, he deserveth, without any pity, to be punished with all severity : even so, in like manner, if a man, dissembling his beggarly estate, his vice and ignorance, will presume that he is wise, rich, and virtuous, he doth by this means make himself unworthy of God's mercy, whereof he should participate if, by an humble confession of his misery, he would seek for it.

8. As a vessel cannot be known, whether it be whole or broken, until it have liquor in it : so can no man be known what he is before he be in authority.

Man of no continuance.

1. As a dream, smoke, vapour, a puff of wind, a shadow, a bubble of water, hay, grass, herbs, flowers, leaves, a weaver's shuttle, dried stubble, are things of small account and less continuance : even so the glory, beauty, magnificence, strength, and wisdom of man is nothing else than vain, brittle, transitory, and ruinous, unless it be sustained, upholden, and undershored by the heavenly power of the sure and eternal Word of God.

Ps. lxxlii. 20.
Job xx. 8.
Ps. ciii. 14, 15.
Job vii. 6, 7 ;
viii. 9 ; xiii. 25 ;
xiv. 2.
Hos. xlii. 3.
James iv. 13.
Isa. xl. 6.
James i. 10.
1 Pet. i. 24.

2. As the birds, when they fly, do guide themselves with their tails, and the ship is guided by the stern : so we should look to our tail—namely, that we are but dust and ashes.

Man is born to love God.

1. As birds of all sorts do desire the air, fishes seek for water, and the fire of the earth mounteth and flameth up towards the elemental fire, and all things seek their place and centre, and do tend towards the same : even so we ought to seek after our God, who is our only rest, our centre, and our only God.

2. As floods and rivers with great force run into the sea, because they came out of the sea : even so we ought to love God, and to aspire towards Him, and in all fervency of love draw near unto Him, who is that immeasurable sea of all goodness from whence we came, for He hath made us after His own similitude and likeness.

Gen. i. 26.

3. As we are bound to keep the precepts and commandments of God : so are we most strictly bound to love, honour, and obey Himself.

4. Even as the horse is ordained to run, the ox to plough, and the dog to hunt : so is man born above all things to love God.

Man may not accuse God of unrighteousness.

Rom ix. 10, &c.
Job ix. 3, 22;
xxxviii. 2, 5.

LIKE as, if a child of eight or ten years old, hearing a philosopher discourse of the greatness and course of the sun, should argue against him, and maintain that the same were no greater than a platter, neither of any swifter pace than a snail, the philosopher would not stand upon the delivery of the reason of his discourse unto him, because the child could not be capable to conceive it, but he would tell him, "Thou art yet a child": even so is man, in comparison of God, infinitely less in knowledge than is a child in comparison of the most excellent philosopher in the world, and therefore he ought not to reason, strive, or dispute with God, why He either electeth some to salvation or reprobate others to damnation.

When Man, in trouble, seeketh for comfort from the world, he seeketh for life in the house of death.

As the blood in the body of a man, being corrupted with a poisoned arrow, doth by-and-by fly to the heart, even seeking and hoping, as it were, to find some remedy and help there, and yet doth, even so soon as it toucheth the heart, find death where it sought for life: so men, when they are sore pressed with calamities, do make the world their first refuge, and whilst they seek for succour and comfort in the world, they find no better thing than death where they thought to have found life. Experience doth teach them that they sought for life in the house of death, and for a medicine where no good thing is to be had.

Man wholly corrupted.

Ps. xxiv. 4, 5.
Eph. iv. 22-24.

1. As we say it is not the essence of the loadstone doth draw iron, but the properties thereof: so, likewise, the whole nature of man is corrupt, not in respect of the essence of the soul or body, but in respect of the qualities. The soul is corrupt, not in respect of the essence which is spiritual, but in respect of the qualities which be in the soul.

2. Like as if a man, being fallen into a pit, should rather be inquisitive how he fell in than how to come out, or as a man deserveth to be counted mad and unwise that hath his house on fire, and will stand thinking how it came to pass, and not rather labour to quench it: even so he may be counted a foolish man that is more careful to know how he became wholly corrupted through original sin than to know and learn how rather to come out of it, and so escape the danger of it.

Good Manners in the Church.

As the material sanctuary had outward ornaments—as gold, silver, precious stones, silk, purple, fine linen, and such like: so the spiritual sanctuary, which now consisteth not of wood and stone, but of the souls of Christians, besides religion, which is the inward beauty, must have also the outward ornaments, which are good manners and comely behaviour, that nothing may be wanting unto the due honour and dignity thereof.

Man's estate in this life.

LIKE as it cannot be that they who sail on the sea should be void of all care: so it is impossible in this life that a man should not be subject to many cares, anguishes, and vexations.

Man's nature to be mortified.

1. As the seed of the right artichoke, if the point of it be not broken, bringeth forth the prickly artichoke or thistle : so the best man's child, if his corrupt nature be not mortified, will bring forth nothing but ungodliness.

2. Kneeholm, growing of itself, bringeth forth fruit, but being planted it bringeth forth none : but man's nature, if it be suffered to grow of itself, is unfruitful, but being planted in Christ, becometh fruitful in good works.

3. The superfluous moisture of elecampane being dried up, it cometh to its full virtue, and is hot in the third degree ; but though the superfluity of evil be mortified in us, yet we ourselves will never come to our first perfection, except we be quickened by God's Spirit, &c.

Marriage of itself is good.

As drunkenness is not to be referred to wine, which is the good and wholesome creature of God, but the fault is to be imputed to the excessive bibbing and over great greediness of man, who abuseth God's good creature : even so marriage of itself is good, but many use not well the thing that is good, and therefore they feel the smart of their foul abuse worthily (deservedly).

Marriage ever esteemed for increase of the commonwealth.

As he is counted no good gardener that, being content with things present, doth diligently prune his old trees, and hath no regard either to imp or graft young sets, because the self-same orchard, though it be never so well trimmed, must needs decay in time, and all the trees die within few years : even so he is not to be accounted half a diligent citizen that, being content with the present multitude of citizens, hath no regard to increase the number by lawful matrimony.

Married folks are one a help to the other.

LIKE as, in the parts of a man's body, there is a mutual help and participation of the one towards the other : even so ought it to be also among married folks—the one ought to be an eye, ear, mouth, hand, and foot to the other. In trouble, the one must be the comfort of the other ; in adversity must the one be the other's refreshing ; yea, and in all their life must the one be the help and succour of the other.

Marrying.

1. As they that purpose to plant anything do first consider the nature of the ground in which they mind (purpose) to plant : even so much more should the man that intends to marry have respect to the nature and condition, but especially to the soundness of religion, of the woman of whom he desireth to have children who shall be to his welfare.

2. Like as the husbandman doth with diligence till that ground which he hath once taken to farm, although it be never so full of faults, as if it be dry, or if it bring forth weeds, and though the ground cannot bear much wheat, yet through good husbandry he winneth fruit thereof : even so, in like manner, he that hath a froward or irreligious wife must have care and diligence to instruct and order her mind, and courteously apply himself to weed out by little and little the noisome weeds of sin out of her heart, and to plant wholesome precepts out of God's Word, that in time he may see the pleasant fruit thereof, to both their comforts ; for, as it is commonly said, "A good Jack maketh a good Gill."

2 Cor. vi. 14, &c.
Deut. vi. 3.

3. Like as a man, having but one hand or one foot, if by any means he get himself another, can thereby the more easily lay hold on what he listeth, or go whither he will : even so he that hath married a Christian wife shall more easily enjoy the healthful pleasures and profitable commodities of this present life ; for, in trouble, the one is a comfort to the other ; in adversity, the one is a refreshing unto the other—yea, and in all their life, the one is a help and succour to the other.

The Mass in the Church of Rome.

As a harlot, who setteth her body to sale, doth paint herself to all lasciviousness and uncleanness, doth set out herself with rings and jewels, and putteth on costly apparel, therewithal to allure to herself companions, whose substance she may waste away : even so that whore of Babylon that celebrateth the mass cometh abroad, set out, as it were, with gold and jewels, whilst she doth use certain holy lessons and songs out of the Word of God, whereby she doth easily deceive the ruder sort and the simple, who, deceived with the outward show, do think her to be a very chaste virgin, but, indeed, she is a most filthy harlot, hurting her companions more than the vilest harlot that may be.

Masters' duties towards their servants.

Eph. vi. 9.

1. LIKE as the centurion, who had many servants under his authority, and they were all at his beck and commandment, most ready to obey him in anything that he set them about ; and this good order he brought them to by reason that his said servants were dear unto him—that is, he made a special reckoning of them, and was as a father unto them : so, likewise, all masters are in conscience bound to esteem and account well of their servants, and to use their authority that they have over them mildly and Christianly, and then, if their servants do perceive that they are dear unto their masters, so may the masters in time work them like wax to their own mind, except they be such as have sold themselves to work wickedness.

2. If masters and dames do love and cherish cats and dogs which have been brought up a long while in their houses : even so much more they ought to love and favour their servants that have done them long and faithful service.

3. As it is impossible that he that hath no skill in music can make another man a musician ; or as it is hard for a scholar to learn that thing well that his master teacheth ill : even so it is impossible that a master who is naturally negligent should make his servant diligent.

A Mean estate of life is safest.

1. As men being in deep caves are never stricken with thunder or lightnings : so a base, low, and mean estate or degree is most at ease and in safety.

2. Like as they that dwell in valleys and in deep and low habitations are not easily hurt by any lightning : even so the state of life that is low and mean keepeth and maintaineth itself most sure, and with least danger, against all manner of storms.

Means must be used.

1. EVEN as Noah, though he knew he should be saved, did not neglect the means, but made the ark as God commanded : so, also, we, though we be persuaded of our salvation, must, notwithstanding, use those means that God hath appointed and set down for the same in His Word.

2. As God is able to keep in health whom He listeth, and, either without food, physic, or any such means, preserve from death of the body : so, likewise, is He able to deal with the soul, but yet He will have His appointed means used, as hearing His Word preached, catechising, and the partaking of the Sacrament.

3. Like as, when a certain king maketh this proclamation concerning a company of rebels or malefactors—that those who come into his presence and have his sceptre reached out unto them shall live, but the rest shall have the law to pass on them, yet he keepeth himself within a strong castle, the gates being fast shut. Hereupon many of these malefactors, casting off their old and filthy apparel, address themselves in the best manner they can to come before the king ; but, when they come to the place of his abode, they find no entrance (save only a few of them) ; yet they that stand excluded deserve better to be admitted than those who, condemning the king's offer, never look towards him ; and yet, in truth, they that stand nearest to the gates do no more deserve life, neither are any more capable of it or any nearer unto it, for aught that they themselves can do, than they who be a hundred miles off : so God biddeth all cast off their sins, their corrupt dispositions and lives, and to come and seek to Him for grace ; yet they do not by this means deserve, nor can by any means compel, God to admit them into His favour and to touch their hearts with His Spirit. All should use the means and hope to obtain grace—yea, none can hope to obtain grace who do not use the means ; yet some use the means and do not obtain, and others obtain not using the means ; yet the means are carefully to be used and necessary to be known.

4. Even as we must be diligent to do all good works, and not put our trust of salvation in them, but say, when we have done all those things which are commanded us, "We are unprofitable servants : " so, likewise, we must use always lawful means to defend ourselves, and yet say, "Our help is in the name of the Lord, who hath made heaven and earth ; " for He hath ordained such means to save us by, and works our deliverance by the same when it pleaseth Him ; and sometimes, to show His power, He delivereth us without such ordinary means.

Ps. cxxiv. 6.

Luke xvii. 9. 28.

Godly Meditations.

As a flint, smitten against iron or steel, doth send out sparks of fire : even so godly meditations of heavenly things draw out of hard hearts some warmth and, as it were, fire of the love of God.

Ps. xxxiv. 2.

A Member of Christ falleth not finally.

As a man's arm, taken with the dead palsy, hangs by and receives no heat, life, or sense from the rest of the members, or from the head, yet, for all this, it remains still united and coupled to the body, and may again be recovered by plasters and physic : so, after a grievous fall, the child of God that feels no inward peace and comfort, but is smitten in conscience with the trembling of a spiritual palsy for his offence, nevertheless, indeed, remains before God a member of Christ, who shall be restored to his former estate after true and unfeigned repentance.

Memory.

As the leaves of a book which is seldom used will cleave fast together : even so the memory waxeth dull if it be not oft quickened.

Men by nature cruel.

Jer. x. 14.
Isa. xl. 6-8; lxx.
25.

LIKE as wild and fierce beasts are often by industry of man tamed, and lose their desire to hurt : even so men by nature are glad and desirous of one another's hurt, till God work an alteration in them by His Holy Spirit, and so reform them.

Men known by their doings.

Matt. vii. 16.

As the goodness or badness of trees is discerned by the goodness or badness of their fruit : even so men, especially such as take upon them to be teachers of others, are discovered by their well or evil doings.

Merciless Men.

Ezek. xvi. 49.
Prov. xiv. 31; xix.
17; xxi. 13.
Matt. v. 7.

1. As beasts are not eaten until they be dead, and are boiled or roasted : even so merciless men, whilst they live, will do no charitable deeds or works of mercy to the poor, until Death hath them in his pot and there boiled them after his manner ; for it is only at their death, in their last testament, they will perhaps leave some legacies to be given when they be dead, but death must be sure of them before the poor be sure of a penny. It were much better done to relieve the poor with their own hands in their lifetime ; it is not amiss that they do good at death, but it were better done before.

Matt. ix. 13.
Prov. xi. 17.
Luke vi. 36.
Mic. vi. 8.

2. As it is oftentimes with young children, the more the father doth cocker and dandle them, the less they care for him ; and if he say unto them, "I will have this or that done," none are so ready to bid him command and do it himself as those very children : so it many times falleth out with us. God, our heavenly Father, hath blessed us and blessed us again, and yet when He saith, "I will have you to be merciful and pitiful to your needy brethren," like stubborn children we sit still and stop our ears, as if we heard Him not.

Men merely natural.

As the moon decreasing hath her open side hanging downward, but increasing and gathering light hath her opening up towards heaven : so, likewise, men merely natural have their hearts set only upon earth and earthly things, but men regenerate have the open side of their hearts ever towards God and heaven and heavenly things.

No difference of Men after death.

As trees growing in the wood are known, some by difference of their trunks or bodies, and some by the properties of their boughs, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruits ; but this knowledge is had of them only whilst they stand, grow, and are not consumed ; for if they be committed to the fire and turned into ashes, they cannot be known—it is impossible that, when the ashes of divers kinds of trees are mingled together, the tall pine-tree should be discerned from the great and huge oak, or the mighty poplar from a low shrub, or any one tree from another : even so men, whilst they live in the wood of this world, are known, some by the stock of their ancestors, some by the flourishing leaves of their words and eloquence, some in the flowers of beauty, and some in the fruits of honesty ; many by their savage ignorance and barbarousness, and some by their mild lenity and kindness ; but when death doth bring them into dust, and hath mixed and mingled them all together, then their ashes cannot be discerned or known ; for when the ashes and dust of all are mingled together, then shall there appear no difference between mighty princes of the world and the poor souls that are not accounted of—between the learned and the unlearned, betwixt rich men and beggars, or between the wise and the foolish.

Men's devices.

LIKE as, if a wicked servant who taketh upon him to serve his master with wholesome food should mingle therewith some secret poison to annoy him, deserveth due punishment, according to his demerits : even so as displeasedly shall the confused minglings and foolish devices of men be taken of the Lord in making mixtures of their own devices with His worship and service.

Men's traditions.

1. As when the natural sun is darkened with clouds that arise from the waters and from the earth : even so our Saviour Christ, who is the true Sun of Righteousness, is wonderfully darkened with the mists and clouds of men's traditions and dreams, so that many times His comfortable light is clean taken away from the eyes of our souls and consciences.

2. Like as, if the sun be darkened, the moon of necessity must lose her light : even so, when the cheerful light of the true Sun of Righteousness is taken away by men's inventions, superstitious doctrines, and Popish traditions, without all doubt the Church must utterly lose her light, must needs be without all heavenly understanding and knowledge, and must fall into horrible darkness and the shadow of death.

Mercies of God.

1. As a river continueth running always : even so the mercies of God do daily light on the faithful.

2. As a river hath a swift course : so the mercies of God help at a pinch.

Ps. xlvii. 1, dec.

3. As a river is deep : even so the mercies of God are great, neither can the bottom of them be sought out by any man.

4. As a river hath this property, as hath also all other water, to bind, and, therefore, it is the earth doth not dissolve, because, as the philosopher saith, the water bindeth it in : even so the mercies of God do bind us unto Himself, or else we should dissolve and become Satan's sink and puddle.

5. As a beggar will never go forth a-begging as long as he can have provision or maintenance at home : so we will never come to Christ for mercy so long as we see any goodness in ourselves.

Ps. xxxii. 4.

6. As a spark of fire is in comparison to all the water in the sea : even so no more is all the wickedness of man unto the mercies and mercifulness of God.

7. As no man is so thankful for health as he that hath been in continual sickness : so no man feeleth the mercy of God that is not truly humbled in his own sight.

Mercy.

James ii. 13.
Matt. v. 7.
Rom. xii. 8.
Prov. iii. 3, 4; xiv.
22, 31; xvi. 6;
xix. 17.

LIKE as he that is without compassion in beholding another man's wounds shall have nobody to pity him if, at any time, he be hurt himself: even so he that, with pity, doth raise up his neighbour, being fallen, shall have many to relieve and comfort him if he himself fall into any calamity.

Mercy of God to be appealed to.

1 Kings xx. 30-32,
&c.
Matt. xviii. 26, 27.
Luke vii. 37, &c.;
xv. 21; xviii. 13.
2 Chron. xxxiii.
12, 13.

LIKE as that woman did, when she stood arraigned at the bar before Alexander the Great, and was, according to her demerits, condemned, she then said, "I appeal from thee, O king!" Alexander, wondering at her, said, "Thou art a mad woman! Dost thou not know that every appellation is from a lower judge to a higher? But who is above me?" Then said she, "I know thee to be above thy laws, and that thou mayest give pardon, and therefore I appeal from justice to mercy, and for my faults I crave pardon:" so, likewise, must we do. When we look into the perfect law of God's Word, and see Him ready to condemn us for our sins, and our consciences witness that we have deserved death, we must appeal from justice and our deservings unto His pardon and forgiveness, and both call and trust to be partakers of that salvation which He hath purchased and offered to the whole world; for His mercies do pass all our miseries, as far as God is greater than man, and His pardon can forgive all that call on Him in true faith.

Merit or desert not to be looked for in well-doing.

Ezek. xxxvi. 22.
Matt. xviii. 27;
xxv. 14.
Luke xvii. 7, 9, 10.
Gal. i. 15; iii. 18.

1. LIKE as, if one say, "The prince hath bestowed a great office upon such a honest man!" this only betokeneth upon what manner of person the prince hath bestowed it, but does not show wherefore: even so, in like manner, if we say that God will give glory, the kingdom of heaven, and everlasting life to them that walk uprightly, this teacheth us what manner of men the Lord will give the inheritance unto, but doth not show for what cause moving Him He will give it unto them.

2. As he who is wicked and doth wickedly hurteth himself and not God; or as he who hath the health of his body, and doth by good diet keep and preserve it, doth he, therefore, deserve any reward at the physician's hands? Verily, no; for he doth it not for the physician's profit, but for his own: even so, likewise, he that by the gift of God hath obtained the health of his soul, and by His grace doth the things that belong to the preservation of the same, shall we say that he doth merit or deserve any reward at God's hand because that he is made such by His grace and gift, and doth now, through His help, aid, and assistance, keep the same grace for his only profit and commodity, either by earnest belief, or by unfeigned love, or by assured hope, or by well-doing and patience in adversity and trouble, &c.

3. Like as, if a man that hath an interest for a term of years, and taketh profit from a piece of ground by another man's liberal grant, should also claim to himself the title of the property, doth he not by such unthankfulness deserve to lose the possession which he had? Or like as, if a bond slave, being made free by his lord—made free by manumission and not by birth—should hide the nature of his freedom, and boast himself to be a freeman born, is he not worthy to be brought back into his former bondage? Even so good works proceed from the grace of God, and do please Him, and are not unprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receive for reward the largest benefits of God, not because they deserve, but because the goodness of God hath of itself appointed this price unto them; but what spitefulness is this—that men, not contented with the liberality of God, who giveth free rewards to works that deserve no such thing, should, with ambition full of sacrilege, endeavour that that which is wholly of the liberality of God may seem to be rendered to the merits of men.

Mind.

1. As we use not the troubled water until it be cleared again : so must we not use our mind being moved and angry, but suffer it first to be pacified.

2. As out of a vessel which is filled with liquor the air is expelled : so a mind replenished with virtue and godliness is void of all kinds of vanities.

Mind diseased and sick.

1. As the sick body cannot away with (endure) either heat or cold : so a sick mind is neither pleased with wealth nor woe.

2. As unto them that are sick all things are troublous—they loathe their meats, blame physicians, and be angry with their friends—but, health being restored, they delight in things again : even so unto a sick mind each kind of life is loathsome, but to a sound mind no kind of life is misliked.

3. They who be sick in body give themselves to rest, they will keep good diet, and send for the physician with speed : but they who be diseased in mind do abhor all rest and remedy.

4. Like as, if a fountain be muddy and corrupted, nothing that is pure can proceed from the same : so, if the mind be infected with evil affections, it will corrupt all that proceedeth from the same.

5. As children and they whose stomachs are queasy cannot abide bitter and unpleasant potions, though they be wholesome, but rather like sweet things best, though most hurtful : even so wicked men, fools, and those whose souls Satan hath bewitched, like them better that sing “Placebo” and speak “Placentia”—that sow pillows under their elbows and do flatter them—than they who tell them the truth and find fault with their sins.

6. As a good stomach turneth all that it eats into good nutriment, and a bad stomach turneth all that it eats into raw humours : even so a good mind converteth all that it heareth, all that it seeth, and all that it feeleth unto some profit ; but a bad mind maketh a temptation of everything.

Rom. xiv. 14.
Tit. i. 15.

7. As a field, although it be fertile, without tillage cannot be fruitful : so the mind of man, without the Word of God and heavenly instruction, must needs be barren, and can bring forth no effects of faith nor fruits of godliness.

8. Like as, if one drink or eat, sleep or labour, too much, it hurteth the corporal health, which cannot be preserved but by a mediocrity in all things : so, likewise, may we say of the mind, which surely is not in health if it be either too haughty, proud, or presumptuous, or too base, low, and submissive.

9. As the air is cleared with the brightness and shine of the sun, and when the sun is down and set the air is covered with darkness : even so the mind of man, when it is purged and cleared with heavenly wisdom, sought and drawn out of the Word of God, doth shine most excellently, and sendeth forth a pure and perfect light of Christianity, which may easily be discerned to proceed and come from God Himself ; but being without that true light, it is overwhelmed with a horrible and fearful darkness, and giveth out nothing but filthy mists and stinking vapours, which do spring and rise out of the corruption and rotten nature of man, and even from hell and Satan himself.

The Mind of man.

Ps. l. 9.
Gen. xvil. 7, 8.

1. As trees, planted and set by the water's side, seem fair and pleasant, adorned with many and great variety of fresh and green leaves : so, likewise, doth the mind of man, being garnished with godly knowledge and moistened with the water of God's Divine Spirit, flourish and shine with the bright beams of virtue, and spread abroad its boughs of faith toward God, and also yields the fruit of Christian works toward its neighbour.

2. As the eye of the body, although it behold all other things, yet it cannot see either itself or some other parts of the body, even those which are nearest unto it : so it fareth with the mind of man, the eye of the soul. It rangeth over the whole world, above the highest heavens and beneath the bottom of the earth, and yet it is a stranger at home, most ignorant of its own estate.

3. As we see, in running rivers, that the force of the water is greatly diminished when the current thereof is turned into several little streames, and that both the heat and hight do lose much of their virtue when they are dispersed abroad into large and open places : so, likewise, it happeneth to our minds when they are applied unto several studies, which sometimes are contrary one to the other, so that we, thinking, through an ambitious desire, to do many things, in the end effect and bring to pass nothing as we should do.

4. As pork anciently betokened uncleanness, from which we must abstain, and beasts did signify that beastly affections should be killed : so the mind and will must be renewed, that it may allow, choose, and do such things as please God.

5. As the body, being always oppressed with labour, loseth its strength and so perisheth : so, likewise, doth the mind of man, oppressed with the cares and pleasures of this world, lose all its force, love, and desire that it had to the rest to come of eternal life, and so dieth not only the death of sin, but hasteth what it can to hate and abhor all virtue.

A Mind ruled by reason.

As the ship which hath a strong anchor may safely stay in any haven : so, likewise, a man who hath his mind ruled by reason will live peaceably and quietly in any region of the world.

A Mind troubled.

1. LIKE as a great and deep wound cannot be touched with one's hand, though never so softly, but with some grief to the party : even so a troubled and wayward mind, hard to please, thinketh scorn of every thing, and is offended with the least word spoken.

2. As the sick man cannot endure the sight of his wife, hateth the physician, is grieved at his friends that come to visit him, and yet, being gone, is displeased again at their departure : even so is a wavering way and kind of life, and a wandering and inconstant mutability of the mind, which seldom doth arrive at the quiet and desired port and haven.

3. Even as they who are queasy stomached, and disquieted with vomiting, do leap from one part of a ship to another, that they might find some ease thereby, until they perceive themselves nothing the better, but yet do the same still that they did before, carrying their vomit, as we may say, still about with them wherever they go : so, in like manner, they who ever and anon choose now one and now another kind of life, entangle themselves in cares and troubles of a discontented mind rather than be discharged and rid therefrom.

4. As it sometimes falleth out that one who receiveth an injury is grieved and studieth to revenge, and another, being author of a wrong, rejoiceth at other men's harms, and seeks to keep him still under whom he hath once oppressed : even so is the mind itself at war with itself, and, through contrary and repugnant affections, is rent and, in a manner, torn in pieces.

Ministers.

1. As a mule, the offspring of a horse and an ass, is neither horse nor ass : so some ministers, whilst they endeavour and study to be of the court as well as of the spirituality, and to be civil magistrates as well as preachers of the Gospel, are, indeed, of neither.

2. As a physician may persuade his sick patient to take medicine, and may tell him the danger if he will not receive it, but he cannot compel him, yet oftentimes the sick patient is forced by his parents and friends to receive it : even so it is the office of a minister and preacher to persuade, by all good means, his parishioners to abstain from all notorious sins, but to compel them he cannot, but the magistrate may and ought to do it.

Deut. xxi. 18-21.

3. Like as a woman who taketh a child to nurse and feed for hire, although she should pray for it one part of the day, and sing to it another part of the day, and should wash and keep it as clean as possible the third part of the day, and yet should give it no milk, nor feed it, but suffer it to die for hunger, nevertheless, for all her singing and saying, washing and praying, she were a murderess ; or as, if a watchman were hired of the citizens to watch the city, and should leave his place and go into the city and help the masons to build the walls, or be occupied about some other affairs which he had no charge of, and, in the meantime, the enemy should come and kill some within the city, in thus doing he should be guilty of their death : even so that minister who taketh a congregation to feed, although he be diligent in reading the service, singing of psalms, ministering the Sacraments, or occupied about some affairs of the commonwealth, if he shall leave undone the most principal part of his calling, which is preaching and catechising, and so the people perish for want thereof, in thus doing he is a soul-murderer, and guilty of all those that thus perish.

Ezek. xxxiv. 2,
&c. ; xxxiii. 2, 3,
&c.
Jer. xxiii. 1, 2, &c.
Ezek. xi. 17.
John x. 1, &c.

4. Like as cooks who commonly are occupied in preparing of banquets, although they have as much feeling and seeing of the meat as any other, yet there is none that eateth less of it than they, for their stomachs are cloyed with the smell and taste of it : so, in like manner, it may come to pass that the minister who dresseth and provideth the spiritual food may eat the least of it himself, and so, labouring to save others, he may be a reprobate.

Matt. vii. 22.
Acts i. 16, 17.
2 Tim. iv. 10.
Heb. vi. 5.

5. Like as, if ministers cannot answer one thing of a thousand, if God should enter into judgment with them in respect of themselves : even so much less will they be able to answer the Lord for every soul that dieth belonging to their charge, which will be required at their hands—dying, I mean, the spiritual death, for lack of spiritual food.

Job ix. 3.
Ezek. iii. 18.

6. As there cannot be a greater treasure or jewel in a Christian commonwealth than an earnest, faithful, and constant preaching minister of the Lord's Word : even so there cannot be a greater plague among any people than when they have one for their pastor and minister that is either a non-resident, a blind guide, a dumb dog, or an hypocritical hireling.

7. As a just and righteous man regardeth, and is merciful even to, the very beast that doth him service : even so much more ministers ought to have a great care of the souls and salvation of those people committed to their charge.

Prov. xii. 10.
Acts xx. 28.
Col. iv. 17.
1 Pet. v. 2, 3.

8. As a lawyer may not expound the law as he thinketh best himself, but he must expound law by law, and as the tenor of the writings do require : even so a minister of the Word may not expound Scripture after his own humour, and as best liketh (pleaseth) him, but he must do the same by Scripture, and as the tenor of the same will suffer him, and according to the meaning of the Holy Ghost.

9. Like as a careful householder knoweth everything in his house and what is necessary for every one: even so a careful minister doth watch over his flock, that he may know every man, his conversation and manners, and so may minister comfort where it is needful, and reprehend the blameworthy.

Matt. v. 14.
John v. 35.
Rev. i. 20.

10. As there be divers sorts of candles—some of rushes, which give a small light and are soon consumed; some of wick, which will not burn unless they be often snuffed; but the best sort are of cotton, and burneth clearest: even so there be divers sorts of ministers in England—as, first, reading ministers, and these give no light at all, therefore to be cast out; secondly, such as be turncoats and time-servers, as King Henry's priests, Queen Mary's chaplains, who also do more harm than good, without great compulsion; but the best sort are zealous and painful (laborious) pastors, who are the true lights and candles.

Amos iii. 5, 7.

11. As birds fall not into the snare where no fowler is: even so God revealeth not His secrets to His people but by His ministers.

Ps. xviii. 28.
Mark iv. 21.
Matt. v. 15, 16.

12. As a candle that is lighted ought not to be put under a bushel, but set upon a candlestick, that all they who come into the house may see light by it: even so the ministers of the Word ought not to hide their gifts, but so plainly to set forth the light of God's most Holy Word, that every man in the Church may thereby be guided and directed in his calling.

Numb. xvii. 8.

13. Like as Aaron's rod, being before withered and dried, by divine virtue became green again, budded, and brought forth good and wholesome fruit: even so, likewise, it is meet that such as be called to the office of the ministry in the Church of God should show forth the fruits of virtue and good works in themselves, and, by wholesome doctrine, also instruct others under their charge to do the like, and to show forth their sound and lively faith by good and Christian actions.

Gal. iv. 19.

14. As the pains of a woman in childbirth are great and wonderful: even so the pains, toil, and grief of body and mind which true and faithful ministers of Christ take and suffer, to form and fashion Christ in them that pertain to their charge, are excessively great.

2 Cor. xii. 14, 15.
1 Thess. ii. 13.

15. As natural fathers do not spare their labour, travail, and toil to get and lay up in store for their children: even so the true ministers of the Word ought to take great care and pains, and not to spare themselves, but bestow themselves and all their gifts fully and wholly upon their flock, to win them to God, who hath made them fathers over His people.

Ezek. xlvii. 9, 10.
Mark i. 17.

16. As fishers do oftentimes catch with their nets great store and plenty of fish in the sea: even so, when it pleaseth God to bestow His graces in abundance, then His preachers, by the preaching of His Word, shall catch great store and variety of men's souls, and so convert them to God.

Luke v. 5, 6.

17. As the apostles, when they had laboured all night in fishing and caught nothing, yet in the day time cast out again, at the commandment of Christ, and so enclosed a great number: even so godly ministers are never to despair though they do not see that they win any by the Word, for God will bless their labours when He seeth it good.

1 Kings vii. 13, 14.
&c.

18. As Hiram bestowed much labour upon the material temple: even so should pastors and preachers take much pains with the people of God, who are His spiritual temple.

Deut. xxii. 10.

19. As the Israelites might not plough with an ox and an ass: so only those ministers must instruct the people of God who are able to teach them.

20. Like as the runners look ever to the mark, and the champions employ all their shifts and practices to smite their adversary, and start not aside nor beat the air with rash strokes : even so every man in his vocation, but specially the ministers and teachers of the Church, ought to choose out wisely the means that lead straight to the right end, and, in exercising the same, to use diligence and continuance, that they may in eternal life attain the promised reward of their diligence. 1 Cor. ix. 24, 25.

21. As hired servants will not tend men's sheep and cattle longer than there is money and profit coming to them for it : even so those ministers who serve in the Church of God, if their end be their own profit and promotion, then they surely give over and change their copy when days of prosperity fail and when storms and persecution for the Word begin to grow. John x. 12, 13.

22. As a careful householder is not content merely with provision for the present time, but provideth beforehand, and hath by him store of things needful, both old and new, as well for his household as for the entertainment of his friends : even so he that is a minister in the Church of God ought, by long study and meditation beforehand, to be thoroughly furnished and stored with all manner of doctrine and comforts needful for every sort of men. Matt. xiii. 52.

23. As that is counted the life of men wherein they most delight and rejoice : so that is a good-minister's life to see his flock stand fast in the Lord. 1 Thess. iii. 8.

24. Like as a nurse doth favour and with all mildness foster and cherish her children : even so ought a minister with all kindness and lenity to cherish his flock. 1 Thess. ii. 7.

25. As a soldier taketh wages of them for whom he fighteth and goeth on warfare : even so a minister of the Gospel may lawfully receive maintenance at the hands of them to whom he preacheth the Gospel. 1 Cor. ix. 7.

26. As a soldier pressed forth to the wars entangleth not himself in other civil affairs : even so a minister, who is God's soldier, ought to keep himself free from all such things as might hinder him from his calling. 2 Tim. ii. 4.

27. As one candle cannot light another if itself be put out : so, likewise, a minister and preacher cannot inflame others with the love of God and godliness if he himself be void of and without the same love and godliness. Job xxi. 17.
Luke xxii. 32.

28. Like as the trumpet soundeth out aloud to give soldiers and servitors warning to prepare and put themselves in readiness for that which they are appointed for : even so much more should godly ministers strain their voices and cry aloud, both to princes and people, to show them the dangers that are imminent and at hand for their sins. Isa. lviii. 1.

29. As the trumpeter that is set to watch for the coming of his enemy is guilty of the blood and death of the citizens and people if, through his negligence and for want of warning by his trumpet, the enemy steal upon them and make slaughter and havoc of them at unawares : even so the ministers of the Word also, if the people perish in their sins for want of continual admonition and calling upon to repent, their blood will be required at their hands. Ezek. xxxiii. 2,
&c.; iii. 17-19.

30. As the wrestler obtaineth not the crown or garland except he strive for it according to the laws of wrestling : so, likewise, ministers are not to look for any reward except they do their diligent endeavour to perform their duties faithfully. 2 Tim. ii. 5.

31. As workmen that labour faithfully and painfully (laboriously) in their calling are worthy to have their hire and wages well paid them : even so much more those ministers who labour carefully in the Church of God, for the salvation of souls, deserve to have the reward allotted and appointed them for their pains. Matt. x. 10.

32. Like as a man that hath meat and drink enough, but no stomach to digest it, and thus the more he eateth the more it turneth to his hurt : even so such ministers as make no Mark xiv. 4-conscience of sin, do, by God's just judgment, prove devils, as the example of Judas manifesteth; for the more knowledge a man hath, the more wicked he is if he want grace.
John vi. 70.

Jer. xv. 19.
Isa. vi. 5.

33. As a lump of wax, if it be kept from heat or from the fire, keeps its own form still, but if it be held to the fire it melts and runs abroad: so ministers, who, by reason of their callings, come near God, if they be lumps of iniquity and live in their sins, they shall find that the corruptions of their hearts will melt abroad as wax at the fire.

34. Like as, if a nurse should take a man's child to bring up, and yet never give it milk, inasmuch that the child dieth for hunger, she for thus doing is a murderer: even so is it with him that taketh upon him the charge of God's people, and never feeds them with the milk of God's Word, or else so seldom that their souls do famish; he is the murderer of them, and hath betrayed them into the hands of their enemies, and shall be condemned for them as a traitor unto God unless he repent.

35. Like as a charitable and godly master sometimes giveth a good alms by the hand of a lewd and wicked servant: even so God, if it seem good to Him, by the ministry of an evil minister, can draw the ungodly to know, love, and fear him.

Exod. xxxvii. 23.
Isa. lviii. 1.
1 Tim. iii. 2.
James i. 27.

36. As the snuffers and tongs which were in Solomon's temple, wherewith they did snuff the lamps, were of most pure gold: even so the ministers of the Gospel, who are bound to reprove and check the sins and iniquities of others, ought to keep themselves blameless and unspotted from the world.

Prov. xi. 26.
Ezek. iii. 17, 18;
xxxiii. 2.

37. As he who hoardeth up and hideth his corn, that it may not help and succour hungry souls in the time of dearth, is grievously cursed of men, women, and children; and, contrariwise, he that, in a famine and great dearth, doth bring forth his corn and selleth it is highly praised and prayed for of the people: so, likewise, that minister and preacher deserveth sharp and rough reprehensions who will not impart his knowledge and skill to the hungry and thirsty souls of the children of God; and, on the other side, he is worthily praised who openeth unto them the garner of divine doctrine, and who teacheth and preacheth and doth faithfully exercise the office of a watchman.

38. As learned and skilful physicians, with the bitter potions and sharp medicines which they minister unto their patients, do mix some sweet and pleasant thing to win those that be sick the more willingly to receive them: so ministers and preachers of the Word of God, being learned and godly wise, ought, if need be, to temper their bitter and rough reprehensions with a sweet and comfortable doctrine, and so, of sharpness and mildness, to make a sovereign and wholesome medicine to heal the spiritual griefs and diseases of their hearers.

39. As the priest that serveth and waiteth at the altar is worthy to live upon the offerings, and the soldier that ventureth is worthy his wages, and the husbandman that toileth is worthy the harvest, and the shepherd that feedeth a flock is worthy to be fed with the milk and clothed with the wool: so, questionless, that minister who preacheth not is worthy no offerings, the soldier that fighteth not is worthy no wages, the husbandman that loitereth is worthy of weeds, and the shepherd that feedeth not can with no good conscience require either the milk or the fleece, but his due reward and just recompense is punishment, for, by his default, the sheep—the people of God—are hunger starved and destroyed by the wolf.

Exod. iv. 11, 12.

40. As the words of a lord chancellor are said to be great, because they come from the king: so the words of a minister are said to be great because they come from God; hence preachers are said to be the mouth of God and their words a two-edged sword.

Josh. i. 18.

41. As God said to Joshua, "Whosoever will not obey the words of thy mouth shall die": even so he that obeyeth not the words of God's holy ministers shall surely die.

42. As the Gospel is to be preferred before the law for the worthiness of it: so its ministers are to be preferred before the prophets for their worthiness.

43. As they who dress much meat for others taste some themselves, and as nurses, who chew meat for young children, suffer some to slip down into their own bellies: so the ministers of the Word, who study day and night how they may set before the eyes of the people the ugly and filthy shape of sin, should themselves be greatly affected with it, that they who labour to affright others with the fearful judgments of God should stand in some awe, and that they who inflame others with the love of God should heat themselves, and, in brief, that all the doctrines, exhortations, threatenings, and promises which they propound to the people in the name of God should redound to their own profit and edification.

44. As it is meet that the steward of a great family should be wise and discreet, in such sort that he have a respect to every man's age, ability, and disposition, and to give and distribute to every one of them accordingly: so, likewise, it is very requisite that ministers, who are the disposers of the blessed Word of God, should have a special kind of dexterity, wisdom, and good discretion, whereby they may skilfully and fruitfully divide to every one their portion accordingly.

1 Cor. iv. 1, 2.
2 Tim. ii. 15.

45. As a father beareth a tender affection to his daughter: even so a godly minister hath a loving heart and tender affection to his people who are members of the Church.

Lam. ii. 17.
1 Cor. iv. 15.

46. As the mouth of the ox is not to be muzzled that treadeth out the corn: so the minister of the Gospel must be provided for.

Deut. xxv. 4.
1 Cor. ix. 9, 10.

47. As the candle that is carried in a lantern may light many candles, and yet lose no part of its own light; be the wind never so boisterous; but the candle which is open to the weather a little puff of wind or one drop of rain will put it out, that it can neither give light to others nor to itself: so, in like manner, that minister who taketh heed to learning and continueth therein, and he to whom the Word of God is a lantern and a light, shall help himself and others, when he that ventureth without it shall put out his own light and the light of others also.

Tim. iv. 16.
Ps. cxix. 105.

48. As it is to be seen and read in the Gospel, that "Not every one that saith unto me," saith Christ, "Lord, Lord, shall inherit the kingdom of heaven, but they which do the will of My Father which is in heaven": even so is it often said that a hood maketh not a monk, neither rounding nor polling, neither yet a long gown nor a square cap or tippet maketh a true apostle or minister; but he is counted to be the assured minister of Christ who both is able and can by sound doctrine exhort and confute the gainsayers thereof, and also doth diligently comfort and go before the people of God by good example of life and virtuous conversation.

49. As it is the duty of judges, who sit in judgment concerning matters of life and death, to shut the one ear to the accuser and to reserve the other for him that is accused, after the example of Alexander the Great: so, likewise, it is the part of ministers to be ready to make answer to every question of the law of God; for he that is ignorant in God's law may assure himself that he can by no means be God's minister.

Insufficient Ministers.

1. LIKE as, if a man should feign himself to be a physician, and had no skill at all in physic, and yet should take a sum of money to heal a sick man, and afterward should run away; or if he tarried with the sick man, and did him no good, nor could do him any, were not this apish physician a thief? Even so that minister who taketh upon him to be a minister, and taketh wages of a people to do those duties that belong unto a minister to do—that is, faithfully to preach unto them the Word of God, and diligently to catechise them—but yet either doth it not or cannot do it, such an one is, indeed, a thief and a Church-robber, &c.

John x. 1, &c.

1 Cor. ix. 14-16.
1 Tim. iii. 13.
Tit. i. 7-9.

2. As, in a commonwealth, he is not to be borne with who would justify false and counterfeit money or coin : so, likewise, is he to be reprov'd, condemn'd, and rebuk'd not a little who will justify an ignorant, a lewd, and a counterfeit minister, because he doth approve such coin for good as never came out of the Lord's consistory—a thing no good or faithful Christian ever did.

3. Like as no one who is a good subject to his prince will traffic with counterfeit coin, but will do his endeavour to have it defaced and openly nailed upon the post : even so every true servant of Christ will not only keep far off from dealing with any such wicked and counterfeit minister, but will also do his best, in all godly manner, that such a one may be forced to take some other calling upon him, &c.

Isa. lix. 10; lvi. 10, 11, 16.
Acts viii. 31.
Matt. xv. 14.

4. As a blind man groping for the wall, when he knoweth not how to come by a guide, is in great distress : so, likewise, such ignorant people as are destitute of faithful ministers, and not knowing by whom to be guided with sound instruction, are in a most fearful state.

Zech. xⁱ. 17.
Matt. v. 13.
John x. 13.

5. As vinegar is to the teeth and smoke to the eyes : so is a wicked, idle, and insufficient minister to the people, dulling their senses and blinding them with ignorance.

Ps. l. 16 17.
Prov. xxix. 18.
Jer. xxiii. 1, 2, &c.;
xlvi. 10.
Rom. ii. 1, &c.
Luke xxii. 32;
xli. 42, &c.

6. Like as it is impossible for an evil man, drowned in all kinds of vices, to enter into the heavenly paradise : even so it is for the lecherous, covetous, arrogant, and stout-stomached and insufficient or unpreaching pastor or minister to make his people and parishioners chaste, humble, and meek, and fit and able to embrace the kingdom of God.

Ministers must obey Christ.

As no ambassador can have any higher authority than that which is limited and expressed by plain words in his commission by the prince, or whosoever it be that granteth it; and as every one of the commissioners to whom a commission is directed hath that authority which in their commission is mentioned, and no other : even so, in the commission that Christ gave to His apostles, every one of them ought obediently to observe their Master's commandment with His authority given to them, and not to break it and go beyond the bounds and limitation of it.

Ministers must preach according to the state of their people.

As he is said to be an unskilful physician that ministereth a purgation to cleanse idle humours when he should minister a potion or ointment to strengthen and comfort the patient : even so is he said to be unskilful and an indiscreet preacher that takes in hand to comfort and strengthen his auditory when they should be sharply reprov'd and corrected.

Ministers that have more livings than one are never true teachers.

LIKE as a dog, which, as long as he holdeth a bone in his mouth and gnaweth it, so long he holdeth his peace and cannot bark : even so, as long as ministers have this bone of pleasant riches and superfluity of living, they will neither deal faithfully nor truly with the Word of God, nor yet carefully discharge their calling.

Ministers that save others are often reprobates themselves.

Gen. vii. 1.
Exod. xxv. 8, 10,
11.

1. As they that built the ark for Noah's safeguard were yet drowned themselves ; or as they that were curious workers of the sanctuary for the Lord to dwell in were yet shut out themselves ; or as they that made the ark, the tabernacle, and the mercy-seat upon it, to shadow and to defend others, and yet were not themselves shadowed or defended therewith ; or as the Jews, who cried, "The temple of the Lord ! This is the temple of the Lord !" when they most of all profaned and defiled the temple of the Lord : even so such are those ministers who teach others the right way to heaven, but, wanting the graces of God's Spirit, cannot find the good and perfect way for themselves to be saved.

Neh. iii. 1, &c.
Jer. vii. 4, 5.
Rom. ii. 17-24.
1 Cor. ix. 27.

2. As firebrands and wood, being kindled and set on fire, do give light and warmth unto others who are cold and in darkness, and yet are wasted and consumed themselves, so that others receive the benefit and they the loss and spoil themselves : so an unlearned and ungodly minister, while, without repentance or remorse of conscience, he delivereth the Word and ministereth the Sacraments unto others who are prepared, know what they do, and reverently hear the Word and worthily receive the Sacraments, doth only hurt himself ; but the rest receive comfort by the Word, are edified by the Sacraments, and are saved, though he perish.

3. As the whetstone doth good and sharpeneth many instruments, but yet consumeth itself : even so many ministers save others and condemn themselves through want of faith and Christian behaviour.

4. As a deformed painter may make a fair picture : so an evil minister may save others, though he condemn himself.

Ministers must be able to confute the enemies of God's Truth.

1. LIKE as they who builded again the material and stone wall of the earthly Jerusalem had not only the trowel in one hand to build withal, but, moreover, the sword in the other, to beat back their enemies who assayed to hinder the work that was in doing : so, in like manner, those men whom the Lord hath appointed to build up this spiritual Jerusalem of His, the Church of God, it behoveth them not only to hold fast the Word of Truth, to edify withal, but, moreover, they must be of ability, through the plentiful knowledge of the Word, to confute and confound all their gainsayers.

Neh. iv. 17, 18, &c.
John xvii. 17.
2 Cor. vi. 7.
Eph. i. 13.
Col. i. 5.
2 Tim. ii. 15.
James i. 18.
2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.
2 Tim. ii. 25.

2. As the proclamation is the prince's, who first set it forth, though it be afterward published again by the crier : so the Word is God's, who first uttered the same, though it be rehearsed anew of any learned writer.

3. As he that calleth the king's proclamation, repeated by the crier, the crier's proclamation had need of a favourable interpreter to save him from rebuke : even so, if any shall avouch the Word and authority of God's Spirit, repeated of learned men, to be his authority, he had need of a very partial hearer to quit him from blame.

4. Like as, if a man were sent on a message from his prince, and, by the way, should hear his message repeated by one of his fellows, or more, if, when he cometh to do his message, he should say, "Thus saith my companion !" or "Thus saith my lord the king and my companion together !" what might we think of such a one in so saying ? In like manner are they who take so much pains to allege the words of the Lord, or the sum and meaning of them, under the name of learned writers, or join God and men together as co-speakers, to make the matter sufficient, as though otherwise it were not enough ; for they are unwise to think that men will regard what man saith in such matters.

5. Like as, if any nobleman of wisdom and credit should be called to witness the truth in any doubtful matter, which he well understood, and having declared the whole truth, the party that requireth the same should answer thus, "I would rather believe this that you have said to be true, if so be that I might hear some of your servants witness the same ;" in so doing, might not this nobleman well think that he was greatly abused, who could not be credited unless his men should also testify thereof?—even so, how can the Lord take it in good part, seeing He hath so often in His Word commanded that we should speak nothing

1 Pet. iv. 11.
Deut. xviii. 18.
Jer. ix.
1 Kings xxii. 14.
2 Chron. xvii. 7-9.
Ezek. iii. 4, 17 ;
xxxiii. 7.

unto His people but that which cometh from His mouth, without any other additions, and hath sufficiently set down in His Word the whole truth, both what is needful for us to do and what to leave undone? And yet many will not believe Him unless they hear that heathen and other learned writers do witness the same.

Isa. lix. 21.
Heb. iv. 12.
Jer. xxiii. 22, 29.
Ps. xix. 7, 8.

6. Like as, if a scholar will not believe that which his master hath taught him, unless his school-fellows will say it is so, this fond (foolish) opinion of the scholar maketh not the teaching of the master insufficient: even so, when a man will not believe what the Word of God doth teach, or confute this or that, unless the doctors do so expound the same, this proveth not but the Scripture of itself is sufficient to do it, though he make not so much account thereof.

The duty of Ministers both to seducers and the seduced.

Gal. vi. 1.

LIKE as parents, when their child is hurt with the biting of a dog, are wont to pursue the dog only, but the weeping child they bemoan and speak fair unto, comforting it with most sweet words: so, likewise, godly preachers must be impatient, zealous, sharp, and vehement in condemning and detesting the jugglings and deceits of the authors of false doctrine and maintainers of sects; but, contrariwise, they must, with all mildness, good affection, and gentle speech, behave themselves towards those that are misled, gone astray, and fallen through weakness, and so to reclaim them.

Unlearned Ministers are not to be admitted until they be fit.

Acts i. 4; ii. 2-4.
Matt. xxviii. 19.

As an eagle, so long as her young ones be not fledged and thoroughly feathered, she doth not suffer them to go out of the nest and to fly abroad; but after they be perfectly winged and in the beauty and strength of their feathers, she throweth them out of the nest, that they may fly and exercise their wings and feathers and use them to the end wherefore they have them: even so our Saviour Christ, that heavenly Eagle, after His resurrection, commanded His disciples to stay at Jerusalem, as it were in a nest, and not to depart thence until, on the day of Pentecost, He had filled them with the grace of the Holy Ghost; and then He commanded them, that, passing through the world and travelling through divers coasts of the earth, they should publish abroad and spread far and near the Gospel of His kingdom.

Wicked men take part against their Ministers and godly men.

As there was such affinity and alliance betwixt Hippocrates' twins, that when the one wept, the other wept also; when the one laughed, the other laughed; and when the one was touched the other was touched—one's joy was another's joy, and one's grief was another's grief: even so is it with the wicked and reprobate imps of the devil. If the minister speak against one (say they) he speaketh against all—touch one, touch all; so wise they are in their generation, that they will not say, "The preacher spake against me," but "He spake against such a one."

The Ministry of the Word.

1. As all men know that the good estate of the body doth chiefly consist herein, that the meat wherewith it is nourished be well dressed and made fit for the receiver, not raw, offensive, or mingled with any hurtful thing: so, without question, the health of the soul doth chiefly depend on the ministry of the Word, that it offer to the Church nothing but that which is both in itself good and sound, and also made fit for the present estate of the hearers.

2. Like as most men are curious about the dressing of their bodily meat, part of which is soon turned to filth, and so cast away as a most loathsome thing—yea, which, together with the belly, for which it is prepared, shall be abolished: so, surely, much more it is to be wished, and the contrary greatly to be wondered at, that men would be likewise as careful in providing for themselves wise and cunning cooks, able to prepare aright the Sacred Word of the everlasting God, wherewith their souls are, or ought to be, fed to eternal life. But, alas! men spend their whole care, time, and substance about the one—to wit, the filling of their bellies and the feeding of their bodies—and are altogether careless of the other, thinking no cost sufficient for the one, and every penny that is bestowed on the other clean lost.

The Misery of worldlings

1. LIKE as we see the mules of princes go all the day long laden with treasure and covered with fair cloths, but at night turned off into a sorry stable, much bruised and galled with the carriage of those treasures: even so rich men that pass through this world, laden with gold and silver, do greatly gall their souls in carriage thereof, are despoiled of their burden at the day of death, and turned off with their wounded consciences to the loathsome stable of hell and damnation.

2. As we be justly moved to pity by beholding the momentary miseries of men and the distressed state of their bodies, being consumed with sores and sickness, and even at death's door: even so much more ought we to be grieved at the fearful state of worldlings, for the eternal misery of their souls—not dying, but being already clean dead in sin, and yet living in that state which leadeth to unspeakable torment and the hot burning furnace of the wrath of God.

Moderation of worldly care.

LIKE as a traveller, in his journey, is troubled with care for nothing but that which shall be necessary for him in his journey: so we, in the pilgrimage of this life, must be careful for nothing but that which may benefit us in our journey to life everlasting.

Moderation in military discipline.

LIKE as, in vintage time, the grape-gathering cannot be so clean but that some be left behind, nor the shaking off of olives so precisely done but that some berries remain, either among the leaves or in the top of the tree: even so, in the doleful massacre and lamentable destruction of the people, there should not be made such a general sweep, but that some should be left and reserved under hope of mercy.

Isa. xvii. 4, 5, 6 10.
Jer. xlix. 9.

Mortification.

As the ark was to Noah as a grave, and yet the way to save him: even so he that will live everlastingly must be mortified and die to his sins.

Gen. vii. 1, &c.

Mothers ought to nurse their own children.

As every tree doth nourish that which it bringeth forth : so, likewise, it becometh natural mothers to nourish their children with their own milk.

Matt. ii. 14.
Gen. xxi. 7.
Exod. ii. 8, 9.
Judges xiii. 4, 24.
1 Sam. i. 23.
1 Tim. v. 13.

Mourning for our sins.

Luke vii. 44

1. As the eagle, feeling his wings heavy, plungeth them into a fountain and thus reneweth his strength : even so, after the same sort, a Christian, feeling the heavy burden of his sins, and bathing himself in a fountain of tears, and so washing off the old man, which is the body of sin, is made young again and lusty as an eagle.

Matt. xiv. 28, 29.
Mark xiv. 72.
Luke xxiii. 63.

2. As Peter's faith was so great, that he leapt into a sea of waters to come to Christ : so, also, his repentance was so great, that he leapt into a sea of tears when he went from Christ.

Jer. ix. 1.
Acts xx. 31.

3. As it is an idol and no god which hath eyes and seeth not : so he is rather an idol shepherd than a godly pastor who hath eyes and weepeth not more or less, one time or other, in preaching to the people.

4. Even as the olive-tree is most abundant in fruits when it distilleth : so, likewise, a Christian is most plentiful and powerful in prayer when he weepeth and mourneth for his sins.

5. As salt vapours arise out of the sea, which afterward are turned into a pleasant shower : so out of a sinful sorrowful soul doth arise sobs and sighs, like salt vapours, which immediately are turned into a sweet shower of tears.

6. As a quail, when flying over the sea and beginning to be weary, lights by the way into the sea, then, lying on one side, lays down one wing upon the water and holds up the other towards heaven—lest he should presume to take too long a flight, at the first he wets one wing ; lest he should despair of taking a new flight afterwards, he keeps the other wing dry : even so must a Christian man do when he lays down the wing of fear upon the water to weep for himself, then he must hold up the wing of love towards heaven, to rejoice for Christ, while he holds down the other of sorrow for himself.

7. As a hind goeth not still forward in one way, but jumps across out of one way into another : right so a Christian, in mourning for his sins, must jump across from himself to Christ, and then back again from Christ to himself.

1 Sam. i. 5.

8. As Hannah wept for her barrenness : even so have we great cause to weep for our sins, seeing we can conceive nothing but sorrow, and bring forth iniquity to death.

2 Sam. xiii. 19

9. As Tamar wept, being deflowered by her brother : so, likewise, we have greater cause to weep, seeing we commit spiritual incest and adultery daily with the devil.

Gen. xxi. 14.

10. As Hagar wept, being turned out of Abraham's house : so this ought to be the greatest cause of weeping unto us, that our life is no life, because we never cease from sinning, while we are here pilgrims and strangers, exiled and banished out of our Father's house in heaven.

11. As the Virgin Mary wept so sore for the death of her Son Jesus, as though her tender heart had been stabbed and pierced through with a sharp sword : even so there is nothing in the world that ought to cause us to be more sorrowful than this—that Christ, being blessed in Himself, was cursed for us, being exalted in Himself was made base for us, being justified in Himself was condemned for us, being alive in Himself was dead for us.

12. As a ship, being neither too heavily burdened nor too lightly balanced, feareth neither waves nor winds, but saileth safely to the haven : so we, being neither too heavy for our own sins and miseries, nor too light for Christ's mercy, but joining "Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves !" both together, shall neither be drowned with waves of desperation nor puffed up with the winds of presumption, but we shall sail safely in the ark of Noah upon the sea of this world till we arrive at the haven of all happiness in heaven.

Luke xxiii. 28.

13. As a father pitieth his own child, and if he see him cry doth what he can to still him, and takes out his handkerchief and wipes the infant's eyes himself: even so, after the same fashion, God our heavenly Father will, with His own holy finger, wipe away all tears from our eyes, and take us most lovingly by the hand and lead us out of the house of mourning into the house of mirth; then, though we have sown in tears, yet we shall reap in joy.

Ps. ciii. 13.
Rev. vii. 17.
Ps. cxxvi. 5.

Murder.

1. LIKE as, if a subject deface the arms of his prince, it is counted an injury so great that it shall be revenged and punished as murder, for that it tendeth to the confusion of all order: even so he that by murder defaceth the image of God, which is imprinted in men, for such an outrageous villainy he deserveth double punishment.

2. As it is good for a man's body betimes to cut off a rotten member, lest the sound part be drawn to rottenness by it: so, likewise, it is profitable for the safety of human society to take out of the way murderers, noisome and hurtful citizens, lest the corruption of one, by little and little, creep into the whole body of the society.

3. Like as, if such tyranny should be used against any natural mother as violently to pull her infant from her breasts, cut the throat of it in her own bosom, and compel her to receive the blood of her own dear child into her mouth, all nations would hold the fact so abominable, that the like had never been done in the course of nature: even so no less wickedness commit they that murder and shed the blood of God's children upon the face of their common mother, the earth.

Murderer of souls.

LIKE as, if a nurse should for wages take in hand to nurse a young child, who, either having no milk or having milk enough, would give it none, but suffer it to die for hunger—in this doing, she were a murderess: even so that minister who taketh a flock to feed by preaching and catechising, who either hath no knowledge to perform this duty, or having sufficient knowledge, is non-resident and absent from them, and so suffereth the people to perish for want of instruction, such a one before God is a soul-murderer.

Ezek. xxxiii. 2,
&c.; xxxiv. 2, &c.
Jer. xxiii. 1, &c.
Zach. xi. 17.
Isa. lvi. 10, 11.

The Mysteries of God's Word are not to be opened to the wicked.

As a merchant that is expert and skilful in his profession and faculty will not open or show his rich wares and costly merchandise unto those whom he well knoweth will not buy them, who come into his shop or warehouse either as curious persons or as crafty spies and subtle searchers, not with any purpose to buy, but to do some evil, but calleth unto him only those whom he knoweth to be very willing and desirous to buy: even so it is the Lord's manner not to open His heavenly mysteries and the deep secrets of His sacred and most holy Word unto them whom He perceiveth and seeth plainly to seek after them vainly and curiously, or with a wicked mind and corrupted purpose to search them out, to the end they may tread and trample them under their feet, but doth call to the true knowledge of His laws and ordinances, and doth instruct and teach them only whom He is sure will profit themselves and others thereby.

Matt. vii. 6;
xii. 38, 39.
Luke xxiii. 8, 9.

Mystery of the Gospel.

As the virtues of water betony, pennywort, sea-chickweed, bluebells, wild elder, dames' violets, golden flower of Peru, red lilies, bastard hyacinths, talpia, &c., are yet unknown : what marvel, then, if heavenly things and many mysteries of the Word be hid !

A good Name.

1. As fire once kindled is soon preserved, but, being extinct, it is not easy to kindle the same again : so it is easy to defend a good name, but if it be once blotted and lost, hardly shall we restore it again.

Prov. xxi. 1.
Eccles. vii. 3.

2. As the Lord, by the eighth commandment, bindeth our hands, as it were, with a manacle or hand-shackle, from stealing, robbing, or in any ways diminishing of our neighbour's goods : so also, by the ninth commandment, He bridled our tongues, that we should not hurt or impair the good name, credit, or estimation of our brethren, but, by love, to uphold and maintain the same.

Cants. i. 2.
1 John ii. 20, 27.

3. As a precious ointment, being poured forth, casteth out and spreadeth a sweet, a fragrant, and an odoriferous smell far and near : even so the good name and fame of such Christians as are anointed with the Holy Ghost do cast out and spread itself far and near, very sweet to the nostrils of the Almighty, and very delightful to the members of Christ.

The Name profiteth none in whom virtue is not commended.

John viii. 39.
Matt. iii. 9.
Gal. iii. 7.

1. As neither the yearly revenues nor the glorious titles and names of ancestors, or to descend of noble parentage, maketh men noble and renowned indeed, unless they themselves be godly, honest, and wise : even so, neither the godly names, no, nor yet the faith and virtue of fathers, availeth wicked and ungodly children anything at all, unless they repent and become faithful, as their fathers were.

Josh. x. 1.
Dan. i. 7.

2. Like as those children who are named and called by and after any of the names of patriarchs, prophets, or apostles, or by the name of other saints, man or woman, are not anything the better because they have such godly and Christian names, unless they do imitate and follow them in faith, virtue, and godly behaviour : even so, on the other side, they that be not called by such Christian names as are mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures are not, in respect of their names, anything the worse, having an assured faith in the merits of Christ, His death, passion, and blood-shedding, and leading their lives agreeable to the same.

To what end proper Names were given us in baptism.

Luke i. 59; ii. 21.

LIKE as infants, in ancient times, had their names given them when they were circumcised, to this end, that the circumcised might be admonished by the calling of their names at what time and place they had their names given them, and that also they should think they are written in the number of the children of God, and joined in league with Him, and made partakers of the covenant : so, after the same manner, must we remember, who have had proper names given unto us at our baptism, that it was for this use and end, both to distinguish betwixt man and man, and also to put us in mind that we are by grace adopted to be the sons of God and received into His favour, and therefore that we are God's own and, as it were, His goods and riches, which bear His name as proper unto Him.

Natural thing.

As the salt water, being for drink unprofitable, yet sustaineth and beareth up the ship better than the sweet, which for drink is more apt and meet : so every natural thing hath its own use, whereunto, if it be applied, then it worketh its effect.

Neglect of heaven for earthly things.

LIKE as, if a golden game of inestimable value should be proposed for such as would run and could win the same, and when the course or race were begun, if some should step aside and follow after flies or feathers that passed in the air, without any regard of the prize and goal proposed, who would not marvel and take pity on their folly ? Even so is it with men of the world, who are placed together in a course or race, and to whom the kingdom of heaven is propounded for the game or prize ; but few endeavour to enter therein. And why ? Because that most men do step aside and leave the mark ; most men do run awry and follow feathers up and down in the air ; most men do pursue vanities and hunt after pleasures, and weary themselves therewith, until they can neither run, nor go, nor move their limbs any further, and then, for the most part, it is too late to amend their folly.

1 Cor. ix. 24-27
Pa. iv. 2, 3.
Jer. ii. 13, 18.

Wicked Neighbours.

LIKE as thorns cannot be touched or handled, except men's hands be fenced with hedging gloves : so are wicked neighbours very cumbersome, except a man be well defended and take great heed unto himself.

2 Sam. xxi. 6.

The Nobility of ancestors nothing available to those that are loose and lewd of life.

1. As it profiteth not a river to flow from a pure and clear fountain, if itself be foul, filthy, and unwholesome : even so the nobleness of fathers and the honour of elders and ancestors do nothing pleasure (favour) at all their sons when they themselves, degenerated from their noble and honourable parents, brag only of their nobility, and, while challenging their honour, but despising their virtues, do show themselves wicked, loose, and lewd of life ; for in him that is not ennobled for some worthy act of his own, nor renowned by reason of some famous virtues, known and found to be in himself, no honour, in very deed, is to be looked for, seeing there is nothing in himself that is good, but only a vain and proud challenging of the worthiness and excellency of other men.

Isa. i. 4.
Ezek. xvi. 3.
John viii. 39, 42,
44.

2. Even as Æsop's jay, being clad with the fair feathers of other birds, did vainly take upon himself a beauty he did not possess, but, being discovered, was for punishment stripped of all, thoroughly scorned, and was turned into his old black gown, when every bird had taken from him his own feather : so they that make their boast of the noble acts of others, and do vaunt of the dignity of their predecessors, and do usurp the nobility of ancestors, themselves being naked of all virtue and utterly void even of common honesty, temperance, and sobriety, are constrained many times, with great ignominy and shame, to put off other men's vestures, and with no small disgrace, to forego their usurped honours. It is, therefore, a thing far more honourable and worthier commendation that a man flourish and be famous with his own virtues and just deserts, than to borrow his praise and honour of others. Men are fitly, though not naturally, called the sons of them whose deeds they do, and whose vices or virtues they imitate.

Noblemen and householders.

Phil. ii. 15.
Mat. v. 16.

1. LIKE as the the sun in the firmament giveth light to all the regions round about him, and by his bright appearing expelleth the darkness and comforteth and cheereth the world : so, likewise, should noblemen, magistrates, gentlemen, ministers, and householders labour to banish sin and corrupt religion, and be a lantern of godly life to comfort and shine to others, that they might direct their lives after their good examples.

Deut. xvii. 19, 20.
Josh. i. 8.
Ps. i. 2.
Deut. iii. 11-13.

2. As Cyprian let no day pass without reading of Tertullian, nor Alexander without reading of Homer, nor, finally, Apelles without some line proportioned : so is it meet that persons of degree should lose no opportunity or occasion granted for meditation on the Christian religion, but rather, being taught by the example of the Emperor Constantine, repose their whole study in the Word of God.

Obedience of Christ's death.

LIKE as, by the determinate counsel of God, the disobedience of Adam conveyed itself, by natural propagation, from him to all his offspring for ever : even so, on the other side, the obedience of Christ's death appertaineth fully to all those that are spiritually begotten of Him by a lively faith.

Obedience to God the whole duty of man.

1. LIKE as, amongst archers, there is but one mark only whereto they must direct their arrows who would shoot well, and yet there are many ways to miss and shoot short : so is there but one holiness only whereunto we must aspire and seek after, namely, a settled desire and will full resolved wholly to obey God ; but there are many kinds of vices and means to disobey Him and to withstand His will.

2. As it is a common practice of sick men, when they make their wills on their death-beds, in the very first place, to commend their bodies to the grave and their souls to God who gave them in hope of a better resurrection—all which is well done ; but afterward they bequeath their goods, gotten by fraud, oppression, and forged cavillation, to their own friends and children, without making any recompense or satisfaction, which, alas ! should not be so : even so obedience that goes with good conscience must be performed to all God's commandments without exception ; for if it be done but to some alone it is but counterfeit obedience, and he that is guilty in the violation of one commandment is guilty of all.

We do Obey God in obeying them to whom He hath made us subjects.

LIKE as, in a house which is well ordered, all things are directed unto the alone will of the good-man of the house (for unless it should be so, the good order and estate of the house could not continue), so that there is one conformable will in all and through all, which is derived from the good-man of the house into all the family, as from the head to the members of the same body ; and yet, after a certain degree, some be preferred above others, whom the rest of the people, inferior in age or in condition, are subject unto and do obey, because of the will and order of the good-man of the house, whereby he doth give authority unto them whom he setteth above the rest in his house, and which authority must be obeyed, if, by that obedience, there be nothing derogated or diminished from the superior will and power of the good-man of the house : even so, in like manner, it standeth with the case of our obedience to God, who is the chief King and Householder in this world, and whose alone will is in all, and of all specially to be regarded ; and in case He hath made us subject unto none, we be not bound to obey any living man ; but, in case there be any to whom we are made subject, this cannot be in any other way but by His will, so that we must of necessity obey them unless we will show ourselves to be out of all order.

Offence.

As a traitor, who clippeth the coin of his prince and maketh it lighter to be weighed, although never the worse to be touched : so he that, by sinister reports, seemeth to impair the credit of his friend, may make him lighter among the common sort, who by weight are oftentimes deceived, but nothing impaireth his good name with the wise, who try all gold by the touchstone.

Offenders ought to be reprov'd and admonished.

1. As he who seeth a man commit murder, and standeth by and looketh on without giving forth anything to show the murderer his dislike of the fact (deed), is worthy to be accounted accessory to the murder ; or as he that seeth a blind man running into a pit, and neither stays him from running into it nor yet helpeth him out, being fallen into it, but letteth him there be drowned, is guilty of his death : even so is he to be accounted who seeth his brother kill his soul by sinning and will not endeavour to do what he can, by rebuking him, to stay him from so doing.

Heb. iii. 12.
Lev. xix. 17
Gal. vi. 1.
Eph. v. 11.
1 Thess. v. 11, 14.

2. As one member is ready to help another—as the hand is ready to pluck out a thorn or thistle, by the direction of the eyes, even out of the least toe : so godly Christians ought to be ready, by admonition and reprehension, to pluck out sin and error one out of another, and that as speedily as may be, lest they be like Cain.

1 Cor. xii. 14.
Gen. iv. 9.

3. Like as, if a mote fall into a child's eye, the mother thereof will take and bestow great pains, by wiping and blowing and licking, to get it out, and all this she doth of love to her child, because she knoweth that the mote would in time be noisome, perilous, and do much harm to her child's eye : even so, if there were that love in Christians one towards another that ought to be, they could not but do their best endeavour, by admonition and reprehension, to help one another to get out the least mote of sin and error that their brethren are infected with.

Matt. vii. 4, 5.

4. As physicians do oftentimes cut off a rotten member, lest it corrupt and putrify the other members : so it behoveth men of authority, if they will preserve the commonwealth in safety, to root out of it all those that do give themselves, even with greediness, to beastly behaviour and to rotten conditions, as theft, adultery, fornication, murder, blasphemy, treachery, treason, and such like, lest the rotten ones destroy them that be sound, and the wicked and rebellious crew draw the better sort to disobedience.

5. As it behoveth to reward well those that be profitable members and such as do live in the fear of God and due obedience : even so it is no less necessary and needful to reprove the wicked and to give them their deserved punishment.

The Office of God ; what it is.

1. LIKE as toward the obedience of a prince, it profiteth much if in this sort a man know what the king is—to wit, if he know what the king's doings, purpose, duty, and office are : even so it is profitable for a Christian if he know that the office of God is to be Maker and Preserver of all things, and that He is such a One as without whom nothing can be, neither yet continue.

1 Tim. iv. 10.
Isa. xlv. 3, 4.

Heb. xi. 6.

2. As it helpeth not the sick patient to know the name and shape of the physician if he be ignorant that he is a physician : even so it availeth a man nothing if he know that there is a God, His name, and His being, if he know not that He is the Maker, Saviour, and Governor of all things, and so know not the same as that he ought to pray unto Him.

Many Offices cannot be discharged.

As he that cometh to a heap of corn, the more he seemeth to take up in his hand the less he may : even so he that coveteth many offices, either in the Church or commonweal, shall be able to discharge none well.

Three sorts of Officers needful in the Church.

1. LIKE as we see that, in trimming of the material vine, there be divers labourers, for some cut away the branches that be void, some underset and lay abroad the vine, yea, some pare away the old earth and lay new to the root, which offices be also so necessary to the vine, that, if any of them fail or be wanting, it will either hinder or utterly destroy the growing of the vine—for, unless the vine be cut, it will wax wild ; except it be raised up and laid abroad, weeds and nettles will soon overgrow it ; and if the root be not fatted with new and fresh dung, it will wax barren with feebleness : even so no less needful in Christ's Church be these three officers—to wit, magistrates, ministers, and labourers—for it becometh magistrates not to suffer wrongs and thefts, oppressions and injuries to be done, and to maintain God's law and them that be the preachers thereof—yea, and to see the land kept from insurrection and invasion of foreign enemies ; it also appertaineth to the ministers and preachers to labour faithfully to weed and cut away the void branches of sin with the sword of God's Word ; and to labourers it belongeth to work and labour bodily and carefully to get out of the earth bodily sustenance, both for themselves and others. All these estates be so needful to the Church, that none may well be without the other ; for if magistrates and men to govern the people by law and wisdom should be wanting, then thieves and wicked livers would so increase that no man could live in peace ; and if preachers should be wanting, then the people would wax wild in all vice and sin, through ignorance and for default of knowledge of God's Word, and so perish everlastingly ; and if labourers and artificers should be lacking in the commonwealth, then both magistrates and ministers must become husbandmen, labourers, and handicraftsmen, or else must die for want of natural food.

2. If there were but one horse or one sheep in the world, yet if he had corn and grass, as nature and kind have ordained for such a beast, he would live well enough by himself, without any help of others of the same kind : but if there were but one man in the world, although he had all the good and wealth therein, yet, for want of others, he would die, or at least he would be worse than if he were not living.

Old men ready to embrace superstition.

Col. ii. 27.

LIKE as young children that want reason and discretion will catch at the burning candle, which if they knew that it would hurt them they would not do it : so, likewise, old men and old women will soonest be drawn into superstition, because it hath a glittering show, which they would not if they knew the hurt that it bringeth to their souls.

Old men's example.

1. LIKE as dyers do most often dye that colour which they perceive most men do delight in: even so young men do most studiously haunt and embrace that which they see old men and counsellors have in most estimation.

2. As an old man in years and experience is beyond them that are young and green-headed: so he ought, in life and example, as well as in counsel, to instruct others, for when he falleth into folly he hurteth himself greatly with his sin, and others more with his example.

3. As fire, when it breaketh out of compass and order, is more perilous in old buildings than in new houses: so misdemeanour, covetousness, lechery, pride, drunkenness, and blasphemy are more offensive and do more harm in old age than in green youth.

One manner of sinning in the godly, and another in the ungodly.

A WICKED man, when he sinneth in his heart, giveth full consent to the sin: but the godly, though they fall into the same sins with the wicked, yet they never give full consent, for they are in their minds, wills, and affections partly regenerate and partly unregenerate, and therefore their wills will partly abhor that which is evil.

Rom. vii. 22.
Matt. xxvi. 69-72

Pitiless Oppression.

As a raging rain beateth the corn down and washeth away all before it: so, when one poor man oppresseth another, commonly it is without pity or mercy.

Prov. xxviii. 3.

Order to be used in reforming the Church or commonweal.

As there is but small hope that he who rolleth about an eye to get a mote out in which a beam is sticking shall clear the eye, but rather, it is to be feared, he will do more harm than good: even so they that go about to reform the Church or commonweal of small faults or offences, and leave great matters unreformed, deal very disorderly, and without wisdom and due consideration.

Matt. vii. 3.

Original corruption is the root of all sin.

1. As a serpent, yet young, or yet unbrought forth, is full of poison, and cannot afterward, when time and occasion is given, but bring forth the fruits thereof: even so we, though we showed not the fruits of sin as soon as we were born, nor long after, yet were we full of natural poison, from whence all wicked deeds do spring, and cannot but sin outwardly as soon as we are able to work, be we never so young, if occasion be given.

2. As an adder, a toad, or a snake is hated of us, not for the evil it hath done, but for the poison that is in it and hurt which it cannot but do: even so we all were hated of God for that natural poison which is conceived and born with us, before we did any outward evil.

3. Like as the evil which a venomous worm doeth maketh it not a serpent, but, because it is a venomous worm, therefore doth it evil and poisoneth: even so do not our evil deeds make us evil first, but, because we are of nature evil, therefore we do evil and think evil to eternal damnation by the law, and are contrary to the will of God in our will, and in all things consent unto the will of Satan.

Original sin.

1. LIKE as corn, how clean soever it be purged from the chaff and straw, if it be sown, will nevertheless spring up again both with straw and chaff: even so, in like manner, how clean soever the children of God themselves are purged from their sins by the blood of Christ, yet their children, notwithstanding, do grow up with the seeds of all sin in them.

Ps. 7. 4

2. As a great house is dark having but a little window, and not because there is any fault in the sun that shineth into it: even so we are evil of ourselves, and not by any fault that is in God.

Pacifiers of angry men must not be angry themselves.

As the chirurgeon, in healing them that have the toothache, doth not so sorrow for the other's grief as he doth rejoice for his own health, and keepeth indifferent and pleasant: so he who goeth about to remedy another's anger ought not to be moved himself, but pleasantly to handle the sick mind of his neighbour.

Painful labours.

As the rose, a flower of all others most pleasant, is gathered upon rough briars or brambles: so of diligent and painful labours there cometh at length pleasant profit and great gain.

Of greatest Pains, greatest gains.

As roses, which are the most pleasant flowers, do spring and wax out of thorns: even so of hard and great travail springeth the most pleasant fruit.

Women Painting themselves.

2 Kings ix. 30.

1. LIKE as, if another were to come in, and, when a painter hath finished a piece of work, should set his hand thereto and lay on other colours, it would displease him: even so, likewise, much more will God our Creator be offended when a mortal woman, whom He Himself hath created, shall, by painting her face, take upon her to correct the image and workmanship of her God.

2. As a woman of discretion will in no wise mar her natural complexion, or seek to recover it with paint or artificial trash: so ought the husband in no sort to be consenting to her filthy sponging, pruning, painting, polishing, or such like follies.

Papist craft in composing their prayers.

As ratcatchers are wont to take good bread, cheese, and butter, and to mingle the same with poison or ratsbane, the good bread, cheese, and butter being for nothing else but to allure the rats to eat the secret and hidden poison to their destruction: even so the Papists, in the beginning of all their prayers, say, "Almighty and everlasting God," and at the latter end of their prayers they say, "Through Jesus Christ our Lord;" but, between the beginning and ending, there is set in the merits, passions, sufferings, intercessions, and mediations of saints, that, through them, their sufferings, blood-sheddings, merits, and holiness, we should obtain heaven and life everlasting to our salvation, &c.

Papists.

1. As the Jews alleged that they had plenty of all things when they served the Queen of heaven: even so, likewise, our Papists say and allege that it was a merry world when as yet they were plunged over head and ears in papal idolatry, and when they had twenty-four eggs for a penny. Jer. xlii. 17, 18

2. As the Philistines, when they had put out the eyes of Samson, did then lead him whither they would: so, likewise, the Papists, when they had subtilly put out the eyes of the people, in taking from them the light of God's Word and the Gospel of Christ, brought them where they listed, and made them believe what they would. Judges xvi. 21.

3. Even as young vipers do eat out and tear in pieces the bellies of their breeders that themselves may get out: so not the Jews only, but the Papists also, do mangle and tear in pieces the law of God, and do rend and corrupt the words and doctrine of the holy prophets of God, even as if it were a belly and bowels, that they may creep out and escape from a lively, perfect, and saving faith, and that they may be confirmed in their errors, heresies, and infidelity.

4. As the Jews have from time to time slain the gracious and wise prophets of God: even so the Papists now, where they bear any sway of rule and authority, do most cruelly torment and murder the saints of God.

5. As mice will be still in the house, but never become acquainted with the master of the house: even so such are Papists; for they will draw near unto Christ with their lips, but deny Him with their deeds; they will kiss Christ with Judas and give Him gentle outward entertainment, but it is for thirty pence, or thirty pound vantage, or money, more or less.

6. As the children of Israel, grudging and murmuring against God in the wilderness when any temptation arose, and would go back again into Egypt, died in the wilderness, and were not suffered to enter into the land of Canaan: even so such are all Papists, unfaithful and fleshly livers, who are superstitious and cannot abide to have their idolatries and lewd lusts restrained and reprov'd by the Word of God, or to worship Him according as He hath appointed, but will go after strange gods, worshipping Him after their own inventions. All these, unless they repent and be converted, shall not enter the kingdom of God, but shall lie in the wilderness—that is, a place of everlasting trouble and vexation. Numb. xi. 1, &c.
Ps. lxxviii. 24, &c.

7. As the Gentiles fashioned their gods with what figures they listed: so do the Papists. To declare God to be strong, they made Him in the form of a lion; to be vigilant and diligent, they made Him in the form of a dog.

8. As an ancient people, the Mendosii, formed their god Pan with a goat's face and goat's legs, and thought they did their god great honour, because, among them, the herdmen of their goats were had in most estimation: so do the Papists, who would yet be counted Christians, paint and portray God and His saints with such pictures as they imagine in their fantasies—namely, God Himself, like an old man with a hoar head, as though His youth were past, who hath neither beginning nor ending; St. George, with a long spear upon a jolly hackney, giving the dragon his death's wound (as the painters say) in the throat; St. White, with as many round cheeses as may be painted about his tabernacle; so that there is no difference at all between a Papist and a Gentile in this idolatry, saving only the name, for they thought not their images to be God, but supposed that their gods would be honoured by these ways as the Papists do.

9. As among the Gentiles there were some called augurs, that, by observation of the birds of the air, in their flying, crying, and eating, made men believe they knew things to come: so, likewise, some Papists think they can do the same—as, if the pie chatter, they look for guests; if the crow cry, they say we shall have rain; and if the owl howl and cry, it is a sign of death.

10. As there were some that, by the observation of the stars, took upon them to speak of things to come by certain superstitious and devilish incantations, whom the Persians call magi or enchanterers; the Greeks, philosophers; and the Latinists named them wise men: even so there are some among the Papists called soothsayers or prognosticators, who write and speak of things to come—as, when Jupiter ruleth the constellations above, and is not impeached nor let (hindered) by the conjunction of his contrary planet, we shall (say they) have a good year and a plentiful; if Saturn and such as astronomers attribute contrary qualities unto reign, we shall have scarcity and dearth of things.

11. Like as Valerius (lib. viii., cap. 1) writeth of one of the nuns or virgins of the goddess Vesta, who was falsely accused of an unchaste life, and desired the goddess to clear her innocency in that crime in some miracle, as she did—the maid went to the river Tiber with a sieve and brought it full of water into the temple of the goddess: so, likewise, there be some Papists that, by the abuse of God's name, through the help of the devil, do sometimes work similarly in healing men and beasts; as, in the time of Popery, they persuaded some simple and ignorant people that this kind of Popish medicine could heal all diseases: ✠ Jesus, ✠ John, ✠ habuit ✠ vermes, ✠ Job, ✠ patitur ✠ vermes. ✠ In ✠ nomine ✠ Patris, ✠ et Filii, ✠ et Spiritus Sancti. ✠ Amen. ✠ Lama sabachthani. ✠

12. Like as the lantern holdeth the candle not for itself, but for others: so Papists have the Word and baptism among them not for themselves, but for the true Church of God.

13. Like as, if an unchaste wife should receive many lovers into her house in the absence of her husband, and, being reprov'd, should answer that they were the friends of her husband, and that she kept them only in remembrance of him: even so the Papists allege that they use and worship images only in remembrance of God, having no commandment so to do, but the contrary.

14. As it happeneth, when we see the clouds move in a dark night, our sight is so dimmed that we imagine the stars to go another way: so the Papists, not finding any end or stableness in the clouds of their errors, are not able rightly to judge of the truth, but think that the Scripture and all goeth awry.

15. Like as Caligula, who, bidding many guests, caused to be set before them empty golden dishes and golden cups and bade them eat: even so the Papists have blindfolded the people by keeping them from knowledge, and by devising to fill their eyes with dumb shows to gaze upon, and their ears with bare sounds of words, far from their capacity to reach unto or profitably understand.

Papists like the old heretics.

Gen. i. 28; ix. 1;
il. 18.
Lev. xxi. 7.
1 Cor. vii. 2-9.
1 Tim. iii. 2; iv. 3.
Heb. xiii. 4.

LIKE AS, if the physician should say to two men of one age, of one disposition, and sick of one disease, that the medicine that heals the one will kill the other: even so the Papists think they are greatly injured when they be compared to the heretics, the Davidists, who denied matrimony to all men; but the Papists prohibit it only to the order of their ecclesiastical ministers, as though they condemned not matrimony, because they deny it not to all but to some; but the Scripture is altogether against them.

Parents.

1. As arrows are an excellent weapon of defence to a strong and a mighty man that can shoot them with courage : even so children godlily brought up are a special protection and defence to their parents. Ps. cxvii. 4.

2. As the strong man's quiver, the better it is furnished with chosen shafts, the better defence he hath : so, likewise, the more godly children parents have, the greater is their joy and happiness,

3. As arrows are at the commandment of the owner to be used : even so children are at the commandment of godly parents.

4. Like as the ape doth with embracings well-nigh kill her young whelps : so some parents, through immoderate love and overmuch cherishing, do utterly spoil and mar their children.

5. Like as when the head is well and sound, and also the stomach pure from hurtful humours, the body is commonly well affected : even so, where the head of any family or householder is religious and sound in faith and feareth God, it commonly goeth well with all the household ; for, according to the common proverb, as the old cock croweth, the young learneth ; such a father, such a son ; like mother, like daughter. 2 Sam. xlii. 28, 29.
Ezek. xvi. 44.
Isa. xxiv. 2.

The Passion of Christ to be revered.

As he who rejoiceth when another hath killed the king's son is convicted as a partaker of the treason : so he who is glad at and doth not speak reverently of Christ's passion is guilty of it.

The Pastor not above the Prince.

1. LIKE as, if the king should command the guard to keep his nobles out of the court or palace, yet were not the guard superior or above the nobles : so, though the pastor should restrain and keep the prince from receiving the communion, it cannot hence be concluded that the prince is inferior to the pastor, as Doctor Bilson truly saith. Page 222.

2. Like as, if the prince do yield to the instruction of his pastor out of God's Word, this yielding is to be accounted to God, not to his pastor, for the pastor, as minister in God's stead, doth speak unto him : so, when, by the commandment of God, any Church censure is exercised against a prince, it is God and not the pastor that doth it. 2 Cor. v. 20.

The duty of Pastors and ministers.

1. As they who shall be saved by the ministry of pastors shall be their crown and joy in the day of the Lord ; and they who shall win most to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever : so, contrariwise, the blood of such as shall perish through the negligence of pastors shall be required at their hands. Phil. iv. 1.
Dan. xlii. 3.
Ezek. iii. 17.
Heb. xlii. 17.

2. As he is known to be a tailor that cutteth out and soweth garments, he a shoemaker that maketh shoes, he a physician that employeth himself in curing of sicknesses, and so of others : even so, likewise, is a pastor and a minister known, in that he preacheth and teacheth the Word of God. 1 Tim. iv. 16.
1 Pet. v. 2.
Mark xvi. 15.
2 Tim. iv. 1.
1 Cor. ix. 6.
Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.
Jer. i. 6, &c.; iii. 15.
Ezek. xxii 27, 28.
Jer. xxiii. toto.

3. As the physician who ordaineth a potion which, instead of health, procureth death is not a physician, but a murderer : even so it is with the pastors that do preach lies instead of truth.

1 Tim. iii. 2.
2 Tim. iii. 16.
Tit. i. 6.

4. As a householder cutteth out bread at meal times to his children: so, in like manner, a faithful pastor must be apt and fit to teach and preach, that, cutting out directly and skilfully the bread of God's Word, the Church may therewith be nourished and edified.

5. As the office of the physician consisteth in two points—first, to prescribe things meet for the health and to prevent diseases; and secondly, to cure such as fall into any sickness: so it is the office of the pastor in such sort to accommodate and apply his doctrine, that it may serve to prevent the snares and stumbling-blocks of sin, as also to reprove, redress, and comfort such as are fallen.

Acts xx. 31.

6. Like as the curing of the plague requireth more forcible and violent medicines than the prevention thereof; or as it is necessary to have more help to pull a man out of the water when he is fallen in than to hold him from falling in: even so must the pastor use more sharp and vehement admonitions in the raising up of such as are fallen into sin, than in preventing the fall: neither is he to employ himself in his functions slightly and, as it were, for a fashion, but, as St. Paul protesteth of himself, he must be careful, diligent, and constant in preaching and admonishing.

7. As physicians, albeit when they have tried many recipes for recovery of a sick person, and yet perceive no amendment, do not desist from visiting him and continuing the employment of their art so long as there is any hope of life; or as when a man taketh upon him to fell a great oak with thirty or forty of the first blows, it may seem that he loseth his labour, because the tree will not stir, but stand stiffly without stooping, yet in continuance it cometh at length down, and sheweth the effect of the first blows conjoined with the last: even so the like custom are the pastors to use for the soul as the physician doth for the body, and still to persevere in due admonitions, exhortations, and consultations, in hope that finally God will bless their diligence and constancy in this duty.

Job xxi. 3, &c.

8. Even as fishermen do often cast their nets into the sea and take nothing, yet are not discouraged, but cast so long until they light upon some fish: so are pastors, the fishers of men, patiently and constantly to proceed in their duties, in hope that it will be with them as it was with St. Peter, who, when he had taken nothing all the night, yet, notwithstanding so much labour lost, did again cast forth his nets, at the commandment of Jesus Christ, and took a great multitude of fishes.

Acts xx. 26, 27.
Ezek. xxxiii. 9.

9. Husbandmen, when they are disappointed of their expected harvest, have not any to recompense their loss, but all is gone, both seed and labour; but notwithstanding the labour of the minister doth not profit with men, in respect of their incredulity, yet hath he his reward in heaven.

Isa. xlix. 4, 5.
2 Cor. ii. 15.

10. Even as the false prophet, that, having endeavoured to seduce and divert the faithful from the truth, but, through their constancy, cannot compass his purpose, is, notwithstanding, worthy to be punished: so, likewise, the true pastors, when they have constantly employed themselves to reduce those that be strayed into the way of salvation, albeit, in respect of this constancy, they cannot profit, yet are they worthy their hire and recompense in the sight of God.

Isa. lviii. 1.
Jer. i. 17.

11. As the springs do not cease from giving forth their waters or the rivers their streams, albeit no man come to take up any or to sail upon them: so must not the minister cease from preaching, admonition, and reproof, albeit, in a manner, no man maketh profit of his doctrine and admonition.

Luke ix. 54.
2 Kings i. 10.
2 Tim. i. 7.
Isa. i. 7, 8.
Mic. vi. 8.

12. Like as when the apostles said unto Jesus Christ, "Lord, wilt thou that we command that fire come down from heaven and consume these Samaritans that deny Thee lodging, as Elijah did?" He answered, "Ye wot not of what spirit ye are:" even so there are some ministers who think to imitate the prophets in bitter and sharp reprehensions, but they are not led by the like spirit, for they do it either to purchase a reputation of zeal, and to be thought such as will spare none, or for some other perverse passion. "God," saith St. Paul, "hath not given to us the spirit of fear, but of power, of love, and of sound mind;" thereby showing that pastors truly must not fear the appearance of persons so as to dissemble their sins and offences, but must be strengthened by the Spirit of Christ, to discover and open their wounds, that they may be healed; but to this power and boldness they must join on the one side discretion and soundness of mind, whereby to be able to yield a reason of their power and boldness; and on the other side, such love and charity that their reprehensions and threatenings may proceed from a heart not provoked, bitter, or flowing with revenge, but as having compassion on such as do amiss, seeking by love to reclaim and reduce them into the way of salvation.

13. Like as, if a sick body, troubled in mind, should spit in the physician's face, yet would he not be so displeased as to forsake and give him over; or like as, if the nipples of a woman's breast should be so sore that she could not suffer her child, without great pain, to take them, yet would she endure all to suckle her child: even so must pastors deal with their flocks, though they be wronged and slandered for the truth's sake, even of some of their own people, yet, with patience, they must bear it, and seek to cure and reduce them to amendment of life.

2 Tim. ii. 24; iv. 2.
2 Cor. vi. 4.

14. Even as when the physician hath prescribed some potion or recipe for the cure of his sick patient, returning the next day, he inquireth concerning the operation thereof, and feeleth his pulse, that he may learn his disposition and thereafter order for him himself: so, likewise, it is not enough that the pastor preach, reprove, exhort, and comfort his charge, but he must also seek to understand how every member thereof is disposed, and what his preaching and catechising have wrought in them.

Ezek. iii. 14.
Heb. xiii. 17.
Acts xx. 28.

15. As, at a feast, when one that sitteth at the table eateth nothing, we are wont to demand whether he be well or no: even so, if any of those that are committed to the pastor's charge do not eat of the spiritual food unto him offered, by preaching and catechising, it is to be feared lest he be crazed or not well at ease, and therefore, without delay, the pastor is to hearken out (observe) the cause, and diligently to see to his cure and to procure him an appetite.

16. As Jesus Christ requireth that His sheep should not only hear His voice but also follow Him: even so it is the pastor's duty to learn whether his parishioners do follow the doctrine preached unto them; and, to that end, he is to visit his people, by examining them whether they be instructed in the knowledge of the principal points of doctrine required to salvation, whether they persevere in the truth, whether they profit in pureness of life and holy conversation.

Acts xv. 36.

17. As good parents have this care and diligence toward their children that go to school, that they cause them to say their lessons or look upon their writing, and, by such examination, try and see whether they profit or no, but finding them to be negligent and faulty, they reprove, admonish, and exhort them to their duty: so, in like manner, must good and faithful pastors deal with their people, following the example of St. Paul.

1 Thess. ii. 10.
Acts xx. 20.
Jer. xxiii. 2.

18. As a careful shepherd seeketh his lost sheep, a surgeon bindeth up wounds, a physician trieth all medicines for the cure of the sick, and a father seeketh all means to reclaim his unthrifty son into the right way: even so, likewise, are the ministers of the Word bound to all these and the like duties towards people committed to their charge.

Ezek. xxxiv. 4.

19. As men ordinarily and grievously afflicted with sickness, feeling the same, and having some apprehension of death, are then most troubled with impatience, mistrust, and other temptations and dangerous assaults, wherein the devil practiseth his uttermost endea-

Ezek. xxxiv. 2.
2 Kings xx. 1, 2,
&c.

vours : so have they at that time especial need of the presence of their pastors, to visit, to comfort, and strengthen their patience and faith.

Esther xiv. 3, &c.
Eph. vi. 19.

20. Like as Queen Esther, when she was to speak to King Ahasuerus for the bodily health of her nation, prayed unto God to give her convenient words : even so much more ought the pastor and preacher to pray unto God to give him grace to speak well and truly when he is to preach the Word and doctrine of the everlasting salvation of His people.

Acts vi. 4.
1 Sam. xii. 19, 23.

21. As he that is to preach must seek to be heard willingly, and with understanding and obedience : so must he know that he shall the sooner attain thereto by prayers unto God for means to speak well, and therefore he is to pray both for himself and for his hearers.

Acts vi. 2.
2 Tim. ii. 4.

22. As the husbandman's mind and care are ever upon tillage, sowing, and reaping, and the mariners' upon their ships, winds, and havens : so must the thoughts, minds, and affections of the ministers of the Word run only upon instructing, comforting, exhorting, edifying, and saving of the souls of their parishioners.

2 Sam. vi. 6.

23. As God was angry with Uzzah, and slew him, for that he imagined that the Ark of God must needs have fallen had not he stretched forth his hand to hold it up, which was beyond his calling : even so the ministers of the Word ought to fear, and that justly, lest God confound them in their ministry for meddling in civil causes and undertakings above their callings.

24. Even as the soldier that is enrolled to serve in the wars, so soon as he heareth the drum, must forsake wife and children, house, shop, and all other affairs, that nothing may hinder or withdraw him from the service of his captain : so much more ought pastors, whom the Sovereign King hath enrolled for spiritual warfare and the holy ministry of the Word, keep themselves from all civil and political affairs, and such as belong not to their vocation, to the end they may wholly serve and please Jesus Christ.

25. As a brook, sufficient to drive a mill or carry a boat, being cut into many ditches, will not be able to do either : even so the pastor that meddleth with many occupations and much worldly business is very unprofitable for any.

1 Tim. iv. 12.
Tit. ii. 7.
1 Pet. v. 3.
Matt. v. 14-16.

26. As, in a dark evening, one goeth before with a torch or lantern for others to follow : so the life and conversation of the pastors ought to be as a burning torch to guide others in the way of salvation and life everlasting.

James ii. 17.

27. As faith without works is dead : even so the doctrine of ministers is of no force where it is not accompanied with holiness of life.

2 Cor. xii. 7.
Luke xxii. 24, 25.
Matt. xxiii. 12.

28. As worms do usually breed in fat cheese : even so ministers that most plentifully have received the graces of God are most subject to ambition.

29. As, when one of our eyes turneth aside, the other turneth the same way : even so all the consultations, affections, and deeds of pastors ought jointly, and in a holy harmony, to tend to one end, even to the glory of God and edification of His Church.

30. As they that jointly do bear the mast of a ship, or any other great piece of timber, upon their shoulders, do employ themselves in a joint labour, and all tend to one thing : so pastors ought to be joined and united in the affairs of the Church of Christ, that happily they may advance and finish their work to His glory.

Patience.

1. As, in playing tables, we know not what cast shall happen, but, whatever happeneth, it is the players' part to play well : so what things shall happen in our life is not in us to appoint, but, whatever happeneth, it is our duty by patience to accept and use well.

2. As the apostles did wait with patience for the promise of Christ, for, so soon as He was ascended into heaven, they came straight to Jerusalem, where they continued ten days, till the Holy Ghost was sent: so, likewise, must we prescribe no time to the Lord, but patiently wait for those things which we want.

Acts i. 11, 12; ii. 1-4.

3. Even as the husbandmen, labouring in tilling and sowing their fields, do patiently look for fruit: so the godly ought by patience to look for the end of faith, which is the salvation of their souls.

James v. 7.

Patience in afflictions a perfect trial of true Christianity.

1. EVEN as in a sea, moved and tossed with great waves and mighty surges, the pilot's skill and wisdom is thoroughly tried, and his manliness and courage perfectly seen: so, likewise, a man that is godly without dissembling, and religious without hypocrisy, in the midst of terrible tempests, of great troubles, when he is thrown up and hurled down, tossed here and crushed there, in a thousand storms of dangers, then his patience, his spiritual courage, and his immoveable constancy in virtue and true holiness are declared.

2 Sam. xvi. 5, &c.

2. Like as when a child, being corrected and punished of his father, suffereth it patiently, his father hath the more pity upon him, and holdeth his hand and ceaseth the sooner; but if the child show himself froward, cry loud, or murmur and grudge against him, then is the father the more angry and fierce over him, and beateth him the more sharply: even so the heavenly Father punisheth the patient man more easily, and healeth him the sooner; but towards them that murmur against Him, He showeth Himself sharp and fierce.

3. Like as the bird that is caught with the lime rod, the more she striveth to deliver herself, the more do her feathers cleave and hang to the lime; or as the fish that is caught in the net, the more it seeketh to get out, the more it windeth itself in; or as he that is bound with chains and fetters of iron, the more he trieth to flee, the more harm he doth to himself: even so such as are froward and impatient in adversity do increase their sorrow and hurt themselves the more.

4. As he that hath a heavy burthen upon his back, the more he struggleth and striveth, shutteth and moveth the same, the more doth it grieve him: even so the more froward and impatient a man is under the cross, the more grievous and painful is it unto him; for a good heart in adversity taketh away half of the misery, and the fear of adversity and pain before it cometh is worse than the pain itself when it cometh.

5. Like as, in a school of defence, he that showeth the most manly touch, and hath won the victory, hath the greater commendation and higher honour: even so is it much more commendable and a greater honour to overcome and subdue our spiritual enemies, and to have the victory against the assaults of the flesh and the devil.

6. As he that forsaketh his bodily master without a just cause is regarded before the world as a man that lacketh faith, truth, and honesty: even so, likewise, it is a great point of dishonesty and unfaithfulness for a Christian, in the time of affliction under the cross, to forsake Christ and His Word, and through impatience to work and do against the same.

7. As when men in warfare, lying in camp, will play the sluggard, and be slothful and not resist their enemies stoutly and manfully, their friends are destroyed, their houses spoiled, their villages set on fire, their dear friends and neighbours murdered and slain, and their wives and daughters defiled and ravished, and all goeth to havoc and is full of misery: even so, in the spiritual warfare and field, if we yield unto the flesh and the devil, and resist them not manfully and constantly, we cast ourselves into perpetual danger, misery, and unquietness; but if we fight against our ghostly enemies stoutly and patiently, we may the sooner attain to perpetual rest and quietness.

8. Like as he that is sick, if he will not receive the medicine, because it is bitter and sour, it is no marvel or wonder if the same man perish in his sickness and disease; but if he would suffer himself to be handled after the mind and counsel of the physician, he might overcome the smart, and have good hope to be restored to his health again: even so all right and faithful Christians that are patient in adversity may conceive a much more steadfast and sure hope that they shall attain to everlasting rest of body and soul; whereas, contrariwise, they who remain and continue in their frowardness and impatience against God the heavenly Physician must smart for it everlastingly, both in body and soul.

9. As popes feign that there is a tree which, for every branch that was cut from it, would presently send out two, and the more men laboured to kill it, the more the life of it increased: so must men afflicted double their patience and virtues by persecution, and not be killed at the first stroke.

10. As a good soldier that hath manfully and carefully done his endeavour in the battle conceiveth a certain and sure hope that his prince, for whom he hath fought and hazarded his life, will give him thanks, recompense him, and give him some preferment: even so when, as by constant patience, our faith hath been proved and found good, then doth our hope increase more and more, and we do conceive a firm assurance and sure certitude of our salvation.

Patience in all crosses whatsoever, so that we may live with God afterwards.

Luke xv. 18, 19.

1. As the prodigal desperate son did so humble and submit himself, that he desired no more to be taken for a son, but to be put to labour as a day labourer and an hired servant, so that he might but only remain in his father's house: even so whatsoever God sendeth we ought to take patiently, so that we may but only dwell in the house of God, in heaven, with Him everlastingly.

2. As that pilot is to be praised who can rule a ship cunningly not only in calm weather, but in time of tempests: so he is a good governor of himself who can do it not only in prosperity, but who doth also overcome adversity with patience.

3. As Noah's ark, the higher the water and flood rose, the higher it did rise: so must our courage and patience be in the deepest troubles.

Peace and prosperity.

Ezek. xiii. 10, 11.

As a building set up with untempered mortar, the mortar crumbleth and washeth away with every storm: even so is the peace and prosperity that false prophets promise the people, and preach unto them out of their own hearts when God hath not sent them.

Peace of conscience.

Heb. x. 22.

Rom. v. 1; xv. 16.

1. As all men naturally in Adam are corrupt, so all men naturally have corrupt and defiled consciences, accusing them and arraigning them before God's judgment for their sins, in such wise, that every suspicion of death and fear of imminent danger maketh a natural man stand aghast at his wits' end, not knowing what to do; but, by faith in Christ, the Christian is persuaded of remission of his sins, and so the disquietness of his conscience is appeased, and he hath an inward peace in all extremities which cannot be taken from him.

2. As he that drinketh quencheth his thirst : so, likewise, he that thirsteth after peace of conscience with God, and righteousness to be allowed at His judgment-seat, findeth it, and quencheth his thirst by drinking of the blood of Christ. John vi. 54, 55.

3. Even as, after great showers and storms of rain, the air is cleansed and cleared : so, after great troubles, sorrows, afflictions, and temptations, cleanness of heart, quietness of mind, and peace of soul and conscience do follow.

Peace and unity of the Church.

As in a true, perfect, and certain clock, the wheels being tempered, and in equal and due proportion divided, do perform their courses, and do keep their several compasses without jarring or differing one from another, evenly and alike—so that one moving, the others are moved ; and one standing, the rest stand and stir not ; so that, though they be many in number, in form, fashion, and agreement, yet they are but one : even so, in a Christian commonwealth and Church, there ought to be one and the self-same will, and so great a concord and likeness of minds, reconciled and drawn together with the infrangible band of sincere love in Christ, that though in bodies they be infinite and innumerable, yet, in unanimity, consent, and good agreement in the Lord Jesu, they should be all as one man.

Ps. cxxxiii. 1.
Luke i. 79.
Eph. iv. 3.
Rom. xiv. 17.

God protecteth the Penitent.

1. As the root is the foundation whereof trees are stayed and whereby they receive their nourishment : even so all such as are penitent and sorrowful for their sins, and lean only unto the mercy and protection of God, shall surely prosper, be perdurable and lasting.

Job xxxix. 19.
Hos. xiv. 5.

2. As a city, the walls and defences whereof are broken down, is in danger of every enemy that is of force and might : even so man, who hath no stay of his appetite, affections, and desires, is always easy to be despoiled of any that will seek it.

Prov. xxv. 28.

Penitent heart.

As the beggar is always mending and piecing his garments where he finds a breach : so the penitent and believing heart must always be exercised in repairing itself where it finds a want.

People.

As there is nothing more moveable and inconstant than waters, and when once stirred up, then they be furious and outrageous : even so the common folk or people are also moveable and inconstant, and, being moved, are outrageous and mad.

People imitate their Prince.

1. As the sea, especially that which is called Mare Mediterraneum, is wont to imitate the air—as, if the air be calm, the sea is very calm ; but if the air be stormy, the sea is also very stormy : even so the common sort of people in all places, for the most part, do follow their prince. If princes be just, subjects love justice ; if the prince be ungodly, they embrace ungodliness.

Matt. ii. 3.

2. As a brook doth follow the nature of the fountain from whence it cometh: so the people do follow the disposition of their prince. The fountain being troubled, the brook is troubled also; and the prince disquieted, the people find no peace.

Who is said to be Perfect.

Gen. xxii. 2, 3, 4,
6, 9.
Matt. xix. 21.
James i. 4.
Gen. xvii. 1.
Matt. v. 48.

1. As Abraham because, by faith, he preferred obedience toward God before the life of his most dear and only son, is said to be perfect; and the young man following Christ, if he had preferred poverty and liberality toward the poor before his riches, had been perfect according to the sentence of Christ: so, likewise, every one who, by a true faith, preferreth obedience toward God before all things of this world is said in Scripture to be perfect; and, on the contrary, they who prefer worldly things—their own affections, honour, glory, pleasures, and divers other deceits—before obedience toward God, are imperfect—yea, they do but in vain glory in the name of Christians.

2. As all men, through Adam's fall, have in them by nature the seeds of all sin, no sin excepted, not even the sin against the Holy Ghost: so, by grace of regeneration through Christ, all the faithful have in them likewise the seeds of all virtues needful to salvation; and, hereupon, they both can and do endeavour to yield perfect obedience unto God according to the whole law.

Persecution a means to enlarge the Church.

Ps. xcii. 12.
Acts iv. 3, 4: xi.
19-21.
Phil. i. 12-14.

1. EVEN as the palm-tree, the more it is laden and pressed down, the more it groweth and stretcheth out or spreadeth its boughs in length and breadth: so, likewise, the Church, the more she is persecuted and afflicted, the more force, courage, and liveliness, she taketh to herself.

Exod. i. 12.

2. Like as roses and lilies are accustomed to flourish and to increase among thorns: so this is a common thing to the Church to flourish and to increase in the midst of persecutions.

3. As he that bindeth fire in his napkin doth not extinguish the same fire, but burneth his napkin, and so the fire is made greater: even so they who persecute the godly do only make them more famous and bring themselves to destruction.

We must labour to come to Perfection.

Phil. iii. 14.
1 Tim. i. 13.
Rev. xxii. 11.
1 Sam. xvii. 36.

1. As they who leap, the further they go backward to fetch their race and run, the further they leap forward when they have run: so we may look back a little and remember that we have done ill to amend it, and also that we have done well to continue in it; otherwise, the remembrance either of vices or virtues is so far from putting us any whit forward, that it casteth us quite backward.

2. As they who dye cloth do not immediately change one contrary colour into another, but first turn a white into an azure, and then make a puke of it: so we can never hold colour as a good puke, except first our white be turned into an azure—that is, except first we do well and forget that which we did ill—except first we happily unlearn that which we did unhappily learn.

3. Like as they who work in wax cannot frame any new impression in it till the old be defaced: so the image of Caesar, the prince of this world, the devil, must first be defaced before the image of Christ can be formed in us, that so we may endeavour to come to perfection,

4. As the Israelites were commanded, not once in a week or once in a month, but every day, to gather manna, except only the Sabbath-day: so we must never stand still, but every day be doing somewhat till we come to the Sabbath of our everlasting rest in heaven.

Exod. xvi. 26.
Isa. xxviii. 10.
Gen. xvii. 1.

5. Even as they who run in a race bend forward their breasts and stretch out their arms, to show they have a desire to run faster than possibly their feet can follow them: so, in like manner, we who run in this course of Christianity must cast away everything that presseth down and sin which cleaveth so fast, that we may endeavour and stretch ourselves to those things which are before.

Heb. xii. 1.

6. Like as Æolus left all other winds which might have been a trouble to him with his friend Ulysses, to be packed up in a mail, and kept only the western wind for his own use, to bring him home to his country: so we must reject all other things which may be as contrary winds to drive us from the shore of salvation, and retain only the western wind of the Spirit of God, whereby we may labour and exert ourselves toward that which is before, and stretch out our sails and so come safely to the haven of heaven.

7. As the silkworm keeps her body spare and empty, and is wont to fast two or three days together, that she may stretch out herself the better and spin her thread the finer: so, likewise, we must endeavour to bring under our bodies, and diet them for the nonce, that we may not any longer weave the spider's web, but, with the silkworm, spin a new thread.

1 Cor. ix. 27.
Isa. lix. 5.

8. Like as the viper, perceiving her old skin to be so stiff that she cannot easily stretch out herself in it, strips it quite off: even so, after the same sort, we, who are by nature a generation of vipers, must strip off our old skin, and perceiving we cannot well do our endeavour and stir ourselves in the armour of Saul, we must, with David, put it off, and put on the armour of light, that so we may come to perfection.

Col. iii. 9.

9. Even as when long war had been between the two houses of Saul and David, at length the house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker, and the house of David waxed stronger and stronger: in like manner the spirit must always endeavour (exert) itself to that which is before, and never leave fighting with the flesh till the house of Saul, which was a limb of the devil—that is, the flesh—wax weaker and weaker, and the house of David, which was a figure of Christ—that is, the spirit—wax stronger and stronger.

2 Sam. iii. 1.

10. As Abraham did run from the door of his tent to meet the angels: so must we endeavour to run forward, not only looking for, but also hastening unto the coming of the day of God, that we may (if it be possible) meet the Lord in the air, with all His holy angels.

Gen. xviii. 2.
2 Pet. iii. 12.

11. As the cherubims spread out their wings on high and covered the mercy-seat: so must we spread our wings, stretch out and endeavour ourselves, and be always pressing and ready to fly, as it were, to do the will of God, if we would have His will done on the earth as it is in heaven.

Exod. xxxvii. 9.

12. As he that hath the thumbs of his hands cut off may, perhaps, do something, but he is so long about doing a little, that it were better for him to sit still and do nothing than be so long trifling about nothing; or as he that hath the toes of his feet cut off may, peradventure, go forward, but it is at such a snail's pace he goes, that it were better for him to stand still and not go at all than go so slowly: so we, likewise, must not go forward as though the thumbs of our hands and feet were cut off, but rather we must strive to come to perfection, and to run as fast as it is to be supposed that that mighty man could who had upon every hand six fingers and upon every foot six toes.

2 Sam. xxi. 20.

13. Even as those living creatures in Ezekiel did run and return as lightnings: so must every one who is enlightened with the Spirit of God follow as swiftly as lightning, which doth not more rapidly flash down from heaven than he must in affection mount up from earth to heaven.

Ezek. i. 14.

Exod. xii. 17.

14. As the Israelites were commanded to eat the Passover in haste : so, in like manner, all we who are true Israelites must gird up the loins of our minds, and follow hard, and run apace towards perfection, and redeem the time, that both the wrath of God may pass over us and the mercy of God may abide with us.

Isa. xl. 31.

15. As the ostrich never flies with its wings, but only lifts up its body with them when it runs, and in the pinion of each wing he hath a sharp spur, wherewith he pricketh his own self, that so he may run the faster : so we ought, by all good means, to quicken our dull dispositions, that we may follow hard, even as we see the ostrich eggeth itself forward with the flapping of its wings.

16. As Pindarus writeth, that King Theron's coursers were such as would never be weary of going : so we must follow and still endeavour to come to perfection, and never be weary of well-doing.

17. As Atalanta, ranging out on the right hand to gather up those golden apples which Hippomenes, for the nonce, threw forth before her, did lose the wager she ran for : so, likewise, they who are not thankful to God for the glorious peace and prosperity of His Church, but run after every fond and strange-devised doctrine, and take up all pretty novelties—as golden apples—which every man lets fall, shall miss the mark and lose the garland of glory, and so never attain to perfection.

Acts xxi. 3.

18. As Paul left Cyprus on his left hand when he sailed toward Syria : so we must (if we will run towards the mark of perfection) leave all atheism, all Gentilism, all Popery, all profaneness, all lewdness, on the left hand ; and, also, we must forsake all those worldly affections which may draw us any way from the mark of true godliness.

Judges xx. 16.

19. As gunners wink with the left eye that they may level more truly : so, likewise, we must not behold any ungodliness or sinister dealing with our eyes, but we must aim directly toward Christ, and either, if it be possible, hit the mark of perfection, or at leastwise, with those left-handed Benjamites, come within a hair's-breadth of it.

20. Like as when Diogenes, seeing a bungling archer shoot, ran as fast as he could to the mark, the lookers-on demanded what he meant in so doing, he answered, to make sure that he might not be hit ; “ for this fellow,” says he, “ means never to come near the mark ” : so, likewise, when we see profane stragglers starting aside like a broken bow, and roving a great way on the left hand, we must rather labour to attain to perfection, that so we may not only keep ourselves safe from the danger of their ill example, but also may give aim, as it were, to others by our good example, and so direct them that they be neither wide nor short from the mark of perfection.

Gen. xliii. 10.
1 Kings xix. 20.

21. As Joseph's brethren stood so long dallying and delaying and trifling out the time, that, having a journey to make to buy corn, they might have returned twice before they went once ; or as Elisha, when Elijah called him, went about the bush, as we say, and would needs go bid his father and his mother farewell before he would follow the prophet : so, when we are called of God to profess His religion, we may not stand temporising and circling, and consulting with flesh and blood, before we follow toward the mark of perfection ; neither must we fetch a compass, but rather endeavour with a straight course to come to Christ at once.

Eph. iv. 14, 15.
Luke vi. 24.
Heb. xiii. 9.
Matt. vii. 25.

22. As the bee, when about to fly home to her hive, and fearing lest, if she should be taken by the way with the wind, she might perhaps be blown about in the air, counterpoises herself with a little stone, and so flies straight home : so, likewise, we must not be wavering, and carried about with every blast of doctrine like a reed shaken in the wind, but must be built upon the chief corner-stone, and grounded upon the rock, and established with grace, that howsoever the rain fall, or the floods arise, or the wind blow, or what times soever come, we may stand fast and always follow Christ directly till we come to perfection.

23. As Theseus, being guided by Ariadne's thread, which she tied at the entrance into the labyrinth of Dædalus, escaped all the danger and error of it: even so we must make Christ the door by which to enter into the labyrinth of all our affairs, and tie Rahab's thread at this entrance and follow it all the way, that so we may be safe, and go in and out, and find pasture, and come to perfection.

Josh. ii. 14.
John x. 9.

24. Like as a lusty hound of a good kind ordereth his going so well that, though he have run over many fields and through a thousand thickets already, yet he never remembereth any labour which is behind, but forgetteth it; and, if he chance to lap water in some brook by the way, yet even while he lappeth he lifteth up his head and still goeth on, and plieth him forward to his game: so must we do in this pursuit of perfection. Seeing Christ hath now sprinkled all the way between heaven and earth with His blood, and so hath made it a fresh and living way, therefore we, who have noses like the Tower of Lebanon, must, as bloodhounds, trace Him by the foot, and run after Him in the smell of His ointments, and hunt hotly upon His fresh and living way with a fresh and lively faith, and, though we have gone very far, and done a thousand good deeds already, yet we must always forget that which is behind, till we have gotten, if not the children's bread, yet at the least some little crumb of mercy that falls from our Master's table—some little drop of blood that falls from our Lord's side—which will be sufficient to make us perfect men in Christ.

Heb. x. 20.
Cant. i. 4.

25. Even as that altar of perfume was placed, not in any common room or in any odd corner of the tabernacle, but in the sanctuary itself, somewhat beyond the veil, close to the golden censer, very near the mercy-seat: so a Christian heart, which is a spiritual altar of perfume and of a sweet savour to God, must daily endeavour itself to that which is before, and still more and more aspire to heavenly things, and always nearer and nearer approach unto perfection and unto the throne of grace, and continually higher and higher advance itself to Him who is the highest and holiest of all.

Exod. xxxvi. 6.
Heb. ix. 4.
2 Cor. ii. 15.

26. As the Israelites, so soon as they had pitched in Mithcah, which signifies sweetness, by-and-by removed their tents to Hashmonah, which signifies swiftness: so we must join sweetness and swiftness both together, and, as soon as we have tasted and seen how sweet the Lord is, presently we must remove our tents from thence, and follow hard and run, not only sweetly, but also swiftly, in the way of peace, which leadeth unto perfection and life.

Numb. xxxiii. 29.

27. As a pomegranate hath many grains within its case, and a little round circle or crown without it upon its head—now these grains, being sweet in taste and red in colour, are orderly set one by another and point up, or, as it were, look up altogether to the crown: so, in like manner, we who are plants of the Church, as an orchard of pomegranates, must grow and go on still to perfection, not only when we enjoy the sweet taste of pleasant prosperity, but also when we bear the red colour of bloody persecution, and, consenting in a kind of conformity and perfect peace and unity one with another, we must point up altogether with the finger of faith to Christ, and look up continually with the eye of love to our Head, who, by being first crossed, is now come to be crowned with honour and glory.

28. As Jacob wrestled all the night long, and never gave over till about the breaking of the day, when he was called "Israel": so, likewise, we must wrestle all the night long of this life, and never give over till the day break, and the shadows fly away, and we come to the marvellous light and sight of God by perfection.

Gen. xxxii. 24.
Mark xiii. 35.
Cant. iv. 6.

29. As Joseph signifieth increasing, and Arimathea signifieth getting the reward: so we must always increase and go on to attain perfection till we get the reward.

30. Like as they who run their horses for a wager spur them hardest at the race's end: so, seeing our salvation is nearer now than ever it was, therefore we must run faster than ever we did, because the very horse and mule and divers other brute beasts, which have no understanding, though they have been never so much wearied and tired before, yet, when they come near home, they will mend their pace ; and, therefore, the more to blame should we be if, having travelled thus far already in the way to perfection, and being come by this time almost to our journey's end, we should now go no further, when, indeed, we ought, if it be possible, to run much faster to our everlasting home in heaven.

A Treasury, or

31. As the holy angels blush and hold down their heads when they see us stumble or trip never so little : so, on the other side, they shout and clap their hands when they see us run cheerfully in a good course and come away apace to perfection.

32. Even as a royal king, when one of his nobles returns home who hath in a foreign country, by chivalry or feats of arms, or other like excellent parts, achieved and gotten great renown to his realm, presently sendeth for him to his court, and in open audience giveth him words of grace, and advanceth him to high preferments and honour : so Christ, our most magnificent King, immediately upon our arrival and entrance into heaven out of the foreign country of this world, will reach forth unto us His holy hand, conducting us to the eternal tabernacles of rest ; and as for all the prayers that we have made, all the tears that we have shed, all the alms that we have given, all the other exercises of Christian life that we have performed, though never so secretly, in this pursuit of perfection, He will openly reward them and most gloriously crown them, when all the host of angels shall triumph for our coronation, and the blessed saints shall think themselves more perfect for our perfection, and all the court of heaven shall applaud our praises, and God Himself shall say " Amen " to our felicities.

33. As they who, by the counsel of Hesiodus, do often add small things to small, and so at last become rich : so he who groweth in virtue more and more at last becometh perfect.

Performance of God's Commandments.

Matt. xviii. 24.

LIKE as, if a debtor were bound to pay a thousand pounds which he oweth unto his creditor, if the same creditor did demand this debt of him being due, and he were not able to satisfy or pay him, yet this creditor should not do unwisely to ask of his debtor his thousand pounds : even so no more is God unrighteous to ask and require of us the performance and due observation of all and every part of His commandments at our hands, although we cannot satisfy it accordingly.

Persecution.

Ps. civ. 6.

1. As waters raised by great rains pour down suddenly with great rage and peril of drowning to many : so, also, are the persecutions of the Church, if God do not miraculously rescue it from them.

Phil. iv. 13.
2 Cor. xii. 10.

2. As, by running in the course, the agility or swiftness of a horse is known ; as the strength of a man is known by combat ; as the savour of many drugs is known by rubbing or bruising of them, or casting them into the fire : even so the constancy, faith, zeal, and other virtues which God communicateth, by His free election, to His elect are manifest by persecutions, which otherwise should be hid.

1 Cor. vi. 19, 20.
2 Cor. vii. 1.

3. As even the most careless husband will not in any wise content himself if his wife, giving over her body to whoredom, should say unto him that she keepeth, nevertheless, her heart for him : even so every faithful Christian ought to shun such false Nicodemuses as those who, to avoid persecution, will abandon, by a sacrilege intolerable, their bodies to idolatry, and so consequently to the devil, at the same time reserving, as they say, their hearts unto God.

4. Like as, in the vineyard of Engedi, there is a kind of wood which, if a man prick it or cut it, it sendeth forth a sweet ointment ; but if it be not cut or pierced in some way, it doth not smell so sweet as otherwise it would do : so it is with men and Christians that are persecuted undeservedly.

5. As the sun, when in the midst of the day he is highest, is then hottest : so, likewise, persecution is the companion of the pure and uncorrupt religion of Christ.

6. As the inhabitants of the city of Meroz were accursed by the angel of the Lord, Judges v. 23. because they came not forth to help the Lord, &c. : even so such as are slack and negligent to assist the Lord in the time of persecution, in not suffering for His sake, shall be cursed.

7. As he who runneth for a prize or wager doth not look and fix his eyes on them that stand by, or on such as go this way and that way, but casteth his eyes altogether, and bendeth his force to come first to the goal, and looketh on them that run with him, and endeavoureth that those behind him may not overcatch him, and striveth that he may overtake those that are before him : even so should we leave off looking at those that will not cheerfully run the race for heaven's bliss by the path of persecution with us, and cast our eyes toward and on the end of our race, and on them that run before us, that we may overtake them, and on them that run after us, that we may provoke them to come the speedier and faster after us.

8. Like as, when a man shooteth for a great wager, he will not cast his eyes in shooting either on them that ride by the way or upon the standers-by, but rather on the mark that he shooteth at, otherwise it were not likely that he should win the game : so, likewise, in time of persecution, we must set our eyes on the mark that we shoot at, even Jesus Christ, who, for the joy which was set before Him, did joyfully carry His cross, contemning the shame thereof, and is now seated on the right hand of God His Father. Heb. xii. 1-3.

9. Even as in times past the people of Gog and Magog did sore molest and afflict the people of God : so, in the time of Antichrist, persecutions and most grievous wars shall arise, wherewith the Church of God shall be shaken and laid waste. Rev. xxi. 7, 8.

The godly profit much by cruel Persecutions.

As, if a man much moved with anger, and through indignation and wrath, intending to kill his brother, should throw at him precious stones, goodly pearls, and rich jewels, it would not damnify nor hurt his brother, because he would gather them up, keep them, and enrich himself with them : even so tyrants disposed to kill, and with fire and sword put to death the saints and servants of God who do excel in true piety and unfeigned love to God and man, do persecute and torment them with divers sorts and kinds of martyrdom, of which things the children of God are glad and do rejoice and grow stronger and richer in Christ ; for being thoroughly armed with a godly patience, they do take and bear persecutions most quietly for God's sake, without murmuring or grudging, even as their cross, wherewith most willingly they follow their Lord and Saviour Christ, and do account such tortures inestimable riches, and themselves happy, that they be thought worthy to suffer such things for the truth's sake and in the Lord's quarrel. Acts v. 41.

Persecutors are often given over themselves.

As God, in great mercy, often stayeth the rage of our enemies, that they cannot so spoil and make waste the bodies and lives of the godly-minded and such as daily labour and profit in the true fear of God as they would ; nevertheless, they remain unchanged, even as men who have vowed and given themselves over to the will of Satan, having their hearts set on those things that are evil and their feet swift to commit sin. Prov. i. 16

Obstinate Persecutors irrecoverable.

Matt. vii. 6.

As it is mere madness for men to go about to cherish the dog that they know to be mad, seeing they put themselves in danger of his rage, and yet do him no good : so, likewise, is it a great folly for a man to go about to convert by the Word of God those who, by plain tokens, have shown themselves persecutors of the truth, not of zealous ignorance, but of wilful and malicious obstinacy.

Proud Persecutors who think that, without God's leave, they may deal as they list with Christians.

Ps. lxxv. 6, 7;
cxxxvii. 1, 2.
Prov. x. 22.
Luke v. 5, 6.

LIKE as Canute, some time king of this realm, standing by the water side after a great rain, and marking how the water did rise, and by degrees so increased, that it wet his feet where he stood, thought, being so proud of heart, that whatsoever he said every thing would obey, and straight commanded the water that it should arise no further nor wet its master's feet any more; but when he saw that the water rose still, and would not obey him, but ran into his shoes, he perceived his foolishness, and confessed there was a God and King above him, whom only the waters would obey: even so all greedy churls and covetous cormorants shall well perceive, when they have wrought themselves weary and gotten little, that all increase comes from the Lord and not of themselves.

Perseverance to the end.

1 Cor. ix. 24.

1. As the prize or best reward for running cannot be obtained by those that either run not at all or else give over before they be at the end of their race: so, likewise, none can attain the celestial crown of glory but those who persevere in the right race of Christianity unto the end.

Heb. xii. 1.

2. As they who run in a race, having regard only to obtaining the reward, are careful to make themselves as light and as nimble as they can, and therefore throw away whatsoever is heavy or may hinder their swiftness: so godly Christians, in their course to heaven, having that glory only before their eyes, should throw sin from them, which, like a heavy burthen, hangeth upon them, and whatsoever else also that may hinder them in the way and course to life everlasting.

Persons, choleric.

As it is not usual to curb the horse in his race, but before he begin to run: even so those who be by nature choleric and melancholic are, by reasons and persuasions, to be won and restrained before they begin to be angry.

Persons of men in Christianity not to be regarded.

As echium, or viper's bugloss seed, is like a serpent's head, yet bringeth a wholesome herb and remedy against serpents: so a man uncomely may have good graces and be a help to men against the wicked.

Persons of men not to be regarded in judging of virtues, &c.

As the precious stone is but a small thing, yet is it esteemed above all huge and greater stones : so a little man, but of excellent wit, is more to be regarded than the long, large, and dull dolt.

The Three Persons co-equal in eternity.

As fire is not before heat and light, no more is the Father before the Son and Holy Ghost.

Perverse manners a cause of good laws.

As the sorest sicknesses do cause the most effectual medicines to be made : so, through the occasion of perverse manners, good and laudable laws be ordained.

Philosophy.

As the earth, heaven, and air, and such like, are not to be contemned because some have abused them and worshipped them as if they were gods : so philosophy is not to be despised although it have errors in it, but what profit soever can be gathered out of it, the same is to be applied to the use of our life.

Physic commendable.

1. As pure coral will receive no colouring, and as pure civet will never lose its savour : even so physic is so exquisitely excellent, that it need not have any counterfeit help, and the physicians have their commission so lawful, that they cannot be condemned nor justly disdained.

2. As it can be proved, by God's Word, a damnable sin for a man to kill himself with fire, water, or sword, or such like : so, likewise, it is sin for a man to destroy himself in not seeking after physicians and chirurgeons, when time and opportunity is offered for recovery.

Physician.

1. As every one cannot heal a sore that can make a salve : so every one that makes a profession of physic is not a physician.

2. As a blind man cannot see the fault of another's eyes : so an unskilful physician cannot perceive the defect of the body.

Plague or Pestilence.

1. As the lion is a most ravenous and cruel beast, who teareth all other beasts in pieces, especially the lioness, when she hath young, spareth, as they say, no prey : even so the plague or pestilence spareth no sort of men.

2. As there is no beast comparable in strength to the lion : even so the plague or pestilence is, of all diseases, the most strong and deadly, and brings down to the earth the mightiest as well as the weakest.

3. As the lion is a beast of a most hot and fierce nature : even so is the plague, as a disease, for the infected complain much of their extreme burning.

Plants.

Matt. xv, 13,

As the gardener doth root up and throw out of his garden all such plants as are unprofitable : even so such plants as God hath not planted shall be rooted out of His Church.

Pleasures.

As affliction and misery do strike at the faith of a Christian : so doth the enjoyment of worldly pleasures in the time of prosperity, or the immoderate and unlawful seeking and using of earthly pleasures, diminish the other parts of sanctification.

Vain Pleasures.

1 Pet. ii, 10.

1. As pilgrims and strangers are not wont to delight themselves with the pleasures of the country through which they travel as strangers, but so use them that they set not their hearts on them, and are ready and willing to leave them, if it were to-morrow : so also must we, being pilgrims here on earth, never set our hearts or affections on the vain pleasures of this life, but use this world as though we used it not.

2. Even as there is a kind of tickling in the flesh which causeth laughter that is both uncomely and unseemly, and like unto a convulsion and shrinking of the sinews : so, likewise, all those pleasures of the body which are provoked only by fantasy and conceit of mind are sottish, feeble, troublesome, and differing far from nature.

3. Even as the affection which a wicked person beareth to a strumpet doth exceedingly diminish the love which he should bear unto his lawful wife : so, likewise, the love we bear to these vain and transitory things, and especially unto pleasures, which, like unto an old and common whore, doth draw us exceedingly from our duties, and diminishes that zeal and affection we should bear towards our Spouse Christ Jesus and to those things which He commandeth us.

Prov. v, 3, 4.

4. As bees do first give honey, but afterward prick with their sting : so bodily pleasures (of which the epicures make three sorts—namely, to feed delicately, to drink pleasantly, and to live lecherously, the rest serving hereafter, whether they delight the eyes or provoke the body by what means soever unto pleasure, they call appurtenances) bear a show of goodness while they tickle the mind by their enticements, but in the end bring most bitter sorrow.

Jer. xlii, 23.

5. As drunkards by drinking do not quench their thirst or satisfy their appetite, but only increase the burning desire of their bodies and the insatiable intemperance of their minds : so, also, all other worldly pleasures, the longer they are enjoyed, the more greedily they are desired, and the more obstinately preferred before God and spiritual graces.

6. As the bough of a tree, being, by the growth of many years, become stiff and strong, is now far more easily broken than bowed : so, for the most part, men of age, experience, and worldly wisdom do sooner lose their lives than leave their vain pleasures and carnal desires, which they have carefully nourished and strengthened all their lifetime.

Poetry.

1. As, in slaughter, massacres, or murders painted on a table, the cunning of the painter is praised, but the fact (deed) is utterly abhorred : so, in poetry, we follow elocution (composition) and the proper form of words and sentences, but the evil matter we do worthily (justly) despise.

2. As in those places where many herbs meet for medicines do spring there also grow in great plenty herbs unwholesome and naught : so in poets and poetry are sundry things worthy and good, but there are also some other things that be very pestiferous poison.

3. As in our feeding we seek not only pleasure but health also : so is the like regard to be had in reading poetry and profane writers.

Poison.

A WICKED sentence mixed with things profitable and pleasant is like unto poison put into meat.

Poor men, although they fear God never so much, are little set by in this world.

EVEN as doves love and do delight in houses that be whited and fair to behold, and do willingly frequent sweet and pleasant places, but contemn and fly from black, foul, and unsavoury (disgusting) cottages : so, likewise, faithless and untrusty friends do hunt and seek after the friendship of those men by whose wealth and riches they may be holpen, relieved, and enriched ; but men in poverty or distressed persons, unable to fill their bellies, clothe their backs, or otherwise to pleasure them with some worldly things, they utterly despise and care not for their company, their love, nor friendship, fear they God never so much.

The duty of the Poor.

As the prodigal son, who had goods, but in wasting of them gave himself to the world and the flesh, having fallen into poverty, thought upon his father's house and returned thereto : so should the discommodities (disadvantages) and wants which the poor do find in their estates loosen their hearts from the earth and cause them to aspire to the house of their heavenly Father, where they shall enjoy all spiritual and everlasting treasures.

Luke xv. 12, &c.
Lam. ii. 5.
1 Cor. iv. 11.
Heb. xi. 24, 25.

Poorness of spirit.

1. As the first step unto health is for a man to know his disease, because he that knows his disease seeks convenient remedy : even so the first step to the heavenly riches is pooriness of spirit, because he that feeleth this seeketh riches elsewhere.

Matt. v. 3.

2. Like as sickness is by nature a step unto death, if the physician help not : so, likewise, this pooriness of spirit would send a man the straight way to hell were it not that Christ imparteth His riches unto us.

3. Like as the pooriness of beggary is not only extreme neediness, but also the open profession of the same : even so pooriness of spirit is not only the uttermost want of heavenly riches—that is, of righteousness, holiness, and innocency—but also the profession of the same want before God, of whom we desire relief in our neediness, for Christ's sake.

The Pope no Christian.

1. LIKE as Judas bare the name of a disciple and an apostle, and called Christ "Master," at the very time he endeavoured to spoil Christ both of His authority and life : even so the pope and all his confederates, although they boast themselves to be true Christians, pretending the name of Christ, yet they both rob Christ of His authority and also men of their salvation.

Matt. xxvi. 49.

2. As the lords who made the last rebellion in the North charged the inferior sort of people, in the name of the Queen's Majesty, to put on armour and to come into the field, as though it had been in defence of Her Majesty, whereas their purpose was the destruction of her royal estate and the subversion of her kingdom, that they themselves might have reigned : even so, in like manner, dealeth the pope and his affinity concerning Christ and His kingdom.

The Pope, that whore of Babylon.

Rev. xvii. 4-6.

LIKE as Christ was said to come out of Edom coloured with the blood of His enemies, noting thereby the revenge He should take on the Edomites : even so the pope, the whore of Babylon, is dyed and coloured with the blood of God's children ; yea, that whore is said to be drunk with their blood as with drink, showing that she makes no more account of shedding the blood of the servants of God than the drunken man makes of taking in drink, or the fishes of water.

Popery.

As a stick that hath been lying long in water will very hardly burn when it cometh to the fire : so, likewise, those who are plunged into the dregs of Popery will hardly be set on fire with the zeal of God's Spirit.

Popish priests.

As magicians, witches, and sorcerers, knowing their doings to be but mere guile and deceit, yet will, with certain prescribed ceremonies and dotings, amaze the minds of their inferiors : so some Popish seminary priests (blinded in ignorance, and all void of good learning and godliness) go about to entangle the rude and simple people with a sort of superstitious ceremonies, thereby to make them more subject unto them.

Posterity degenerating.

EVEN as thick and black clouds do obscure and darken the bright and glittering stars : so degenerating posterities, and such as be polluted and blemished with treachery and iniquity, do dishonour their ancestors, and do extinguish the clear light of their noble virtues, and do put upon them the ugly darkness of their own vices, that, although they be noblemen by birth and descent, yet they fall into oblivion, and by little and little are quite forgotten.

Poverty.

1. As riches and wealth oftentimes make men forget themselves, and God too : so, contrariwise, poverty putteth men forward to learn arts whereby they may both help themselves and theirs.

2. As riches, for the most part, engendereth idleness and contempt of learning and learned men : so poverty causeth sobriety and maketh men virtuous and discreet.

3. As Phidias could make the same images as well of brass as of marble or of ivory: so can a godly man show his virtues and good actions as well in poverty as in riches and wealth.

Spiritual Poverty.

LIKE as, if a king should have a certain house fast locked and close shut up, full of gold, precious stones, and costly jewels, and would promise all those treasures to one that should open the same, and would offer unto thee two keys, one of pure gold, hanging at a costly string made of silk and golden threads, but that would not open the same lock, that thou mightest go into the house, and the other of iron, rusty and ill-favoured to see to, hanging at a thong of leather or whiplcord, the which, notwithstanding, would open the door and let thee in, and thou mightest choose which of the keys thou wouldst, it were, no doubt, better and more profitable for thee to choose the old rusty iron key than the key of gold—the golden one, indeed, is more precious, but what availeth that when it will not open the door and bring thee to the treasures? The iron one is the viler, but yet it is the better: even so such a King is our God, and such a house is that heavenly habitation of His saints, wherein are inestimable treasures, endless joys, and unspeakable good things, which are worthier and more excellent than man is able to express—all which heavenly treasures God hath promised to all them that shall enter into His holy hill or house of saints. The golden key which the most part of this world do choose and trust to, that they may enter into heaven, is worldly wealth and abundance of riches, joined with covetousness, which will never open the Lord's house, where are kept His celestial and inestimable treasures; but that key doth open a foul and vile house of this world, which is full of all filthiness and abomination. The iron key is spiritual poverty, against the which the kingdom of heaven is never shut, but standeth ever wide open to all them that bring with them that key. Therefore let us make no account of the golden key, but let us, for Christ and His kingdom, forsake and dispose of the deceitful riches of this world, which are desired and sought for far and near, by sea and land, with dangers and loss of the bodies and souls of many thousands, as though men could bribe God for their sins and purchase heaven with their worldly trifles; and let us, without murmuring and grudging, with all patience of heart and mind, bear and embrace poverty and all those crosses and afflictions which unto the world seem bitter and intolerable, of which kind very many do happen in the life of men. Let us earnestly seek after the riches of the Lord's kingdom and everlasting life, for they be stable and permanent; and let us not set our hearts and affections on this world, for it waxeth old and rotten—it staggereth, is ruinous, and ready to fall.

Job xxi. 13.
Prov. xi. 4.

1 Cor. ii. 9.

Matt. v. 3.

No Power against God.

1. As an earthen bottle, when it is broken to pieces, the shards (fragments) thereof cannot be set together again: so, likewise, when God is disposed to punish wicked people, no man can help or heal them.

Jer. xix. 10, 11.

2. As water runneth and falleth away: so shall all hands be weakened and knees shall shrink when God shall punish impiety and wickedness.

Ezek. vii. 17.

Power or ability.

1. As there is a kind of serpent, having much poison, yet, for want of teeth, cannot annoy anyone: even so many do imagine mischief, but for that they lack power or ability they do no hurt,

Rom. xxi. 1.

2. Like as the marriage of man and wife is of God, but the abuse of wedlock is not of God, but of the devil : so, likewise, all power is of God, but the abuse of power is not of Him.

Praise.

As they who give unwillingly seem to have but little themselves : so they who praise other men slenderly seem desirous to be praised themselves.

Praise, or honour.

As every manner of crown is not ordained nor fit for every victor and he that vanquisheth : so some kind of praise or honour is not meet for all men.

Praising God.

1. As in a garland it sufficeth not that the flowers be fine, unless the hands of him that maketh it be fair and clean : even so, in praising God, it is not sufficient that our words be godly and religious, unless our hearts agree with our words.

Deut. xxxii. 1.
Judges v. 1, &c.
Luke i. 46.
Ps. xcvi. 1; ciii. 1.

2. As nothing is more tedious and displeasing to the ears of a good musician than jarring of strings : so nothing, in the ears of the Lord, can be more displeasing than not to sing and utter praises unto Him with the understanding.

Praises by another.

Prov. xxvii. 2.

1. As pleasant tickling, or rubbing by other men's hands, doth more delight us than tickling or rubbing by our own hands : so it is more commendable to be praised by those who are neither of our kin or familiarity (intimate acquaintance).

2. As they must not be tickled who of their own nature are overmuch given to laughter : so must they not be praised who of themselves are prone to desire praise.

3. As we are warned to take heed of a perilous place, or else therein circumspectly to behave ourselves : so ought we either not at all to praise ourselves, or else to do it moderately.

Prayer.

1 Tim. ii. 8.
John 16. 21-24.

1. LIKE as, in worldly things, it makes no matter concerning the sustentation of our bodies where we eat or drink, so it be wholesome, profitable, and convenient : so, in religion, it skilleth not (maketh no difference) where any man prayeth so that his prayer be devout, zealous, and godly in spirit and truth.

2. Like as, if a man should tell a tale before a king, he had need chiefly to be careful, if he intend to speed his suit, that he do not only speak that is true, but that he do also behave himself after a modest and comely manner in telling his tale, without either gazing about or running into by-matters : even so much more ought we to have regard, when we speak unto God, that our speech and prayer be so adorned and garnished with all circumstances of good means and behaviour, that it may be acceptable to the eyes and ears of God's majesty, not suffering our hearts to be carried away with wandering thoughts and worldly imaginations, or to be otherwise occupied in mind, and thus to forsake Him in the midst of our prayer; for how shall God hear us when we hear not ourselves? or how would we have Him to remember us when we do not remember ourselves? This is even to watch with our eyes while we sleep with our hearts.

3. Like as the comeliness of a father is to give unto his children all such things as becometh a father to give, and the seemliness of a prince is to deal favourably with his subjects in those things which are seemly and meet for a good prince to do; and like as it falleth out divers times that children do unadvisedly ask some things of their fathers, and the subjects of their prince, which cannot be granted, if the countenance and comeliness of the persons of whom they be requested shall be saved: even so, also, it falleth out oftentimes that we do ask those things of God by prayer which He cannot as God give unto us with the countenance and comeliness of God.

4. As none who is a suitor to another will do or use anything which might offend or hinder his suit: so no man who useth prayer will flatter (encourage) himself in any thing that may or will displease God, to whom by prayer he moveth suit when and so often as he prayeth.

5. Like as it happeneth oftentimes that those who be sick do wish and desire to have of their physician those things that be unwholesome and unprofitable for them: even so many times we desire by prayer of God some things which, if they should be given us, would be contrary to us—cause our great hurt and utter ruin.

Matt. xx. 20-22.
John v. 14.
James iv. 3.

6. As men do eat and drink, which are means ordained by God for the conservation of their lives, not looking thereby to lengthen their days above their bounds which already the Lord hath appointed, but as becometh them to use that means which He hath ordained to serve His providence: even so do the godly (as men not curious to know God's providence further than He revealeth it) use prayer as a means by which He is accustomed to grant many of His children's desires, according to His good will, He having disposed them to ask the same.

7. Like as a loving and well-mannered wife will not take upon her to ask anything of her husband at all but that which she hopeth he will take in good part and do of his own free will, as if she had spoken nothing thereof; and when she knoweth what her husband's will is in things, she gladly talketh with him thereof, and accordingly as she seeth him disposed to do, she will often desire him to do it: even so godly Christians who unfeignedly love God, and know His wisdom and will is best, cannot forbear but often pray and talk with Him, and desire Him to do that which He knoweth is best, and which they know also He would do if none should ask or pray for the same.

8. As Rebekah, when twins strove in her womb, was troubled, and said, "Why am I so?" wherefore she went to ask the Lord—namely, by some prophet: so, when we feel this inward fight betwixt the flesh and the spirit, the best thing is to have recourse to God by prayer.

Gen. xxv. 22.

9. As the children of Israel, by compassing the city of Jericho seven days, and by sounding rams' horns, overturned the walls thereof: so, by serious prayer and invocation of God's name, the spirit is confirmed, and the turrets and towers of the rebellious flesh battered down.

Josh. vi. 20.
Matt. xxvii. 47.
1 Pet. iv. 7.

10. As the preaching of the Word serves to declare and convey unto us God's graces: even so in prayer we come to have a lively feeling of the same in our hearts, for it is the key whereby we open the treasures of God and pull down His mercies upon us.

Ps. cvi. 23.
Eph. vi. 18.

11. Like as, if a man be commanded to come before an earthly prince, he will order himself in apparel, gesture, and word, that he may do all things in seemliness and dutiful reverence: even so much more are Christians to order themselves when they are to appear before the living God in prayer.

Eccles. vii. 1.

12. As a child cannot, without blushing, call him father whom he cares not for, but doth continually displease through lewd conditions, and neither can a father delight in such a child: even so with what face dare any man in prayer call God his Father, whom he makes no conscience to please, but, on the contrary, doth offend and displease Him most rebelliously by word and deed?

13. As that city which is not fenced with walls may be easily brought under subjection to the enemy, because it wanteth that which should withstand the force and encounters of the enemy: so, likewise, the devil will easily bring our souls in subjection unto him, and with no great pains lead them to all kinds of lewdness, unless they be fenced by often and fervent prayer unto God.

14. Like as the sun gives light to the body: so prayer giveth light to the mind; for as it is dangerous for a man never to see the sun, so it is much more perilous for a Christian man never to pray.

15. As trees bring forth no fruit unless they receive sap and nourishment from the roots: even so we can never increase in godliness unless we be continually watered by our prayers.

16. As thieves and robbers, beholding a man flourish his sword about his ears, will not then set upon him: even so the wicked spirits, seeing us fenced by our prayers, will straightway give back and leave us unassaulted.

James i. 6, 7.

17. As waves of water are tossed and carried away by force of wind: so, likewise, he that prayeth without faith must needs be carried away by every forcible affection, and therefore cannot look to obtain his petitions.

Luke xviii. 3, 7.

18. As women prevail with men in their suits by great importunity: even so godly Christians, by prayer without ceasing, do obtain their requests of God.

19. Like as the poor captive is always creeping to the prison door, often labouring to get off his bolts and fetters and to escape out of prison: so, likewise, must we always creep to the Lord for His Spirit by prayer, to free us out of this bondage and prison of sin and corruption, and every day come nearer the prison door, looking when our blessed Saviour will unbind us of all the fetters of sin and Satan, and fully erect His kingdom in us.

20. As a mother that carrieth her child in her arms, if it cry for the breast and suck the same, it is alive; but, being observed many days together, if it neither cry nor stir, it is dead: so, in like manner, it is an infallible note of a true child of God to cry to his Father in heaven by prayer; but he that never crieth nor feeleth himself stirred up to make his moan to God is in a miserable case, and he may well be thought to be but a dead child.

Isa. xxxviii. 14, &c.

21. Like as we see green wood lying in the fire sobbing and smoking long before it will burn: even so, no doubt, all God's children do feel a strife and combat in their spirits in many of their prayers.

Ps. xxxii. 6.

22. Like as every fencer or flourisher proveth not a valiant and courageous man when he cometh to fight in good earnest: even so no more are prayers without faith found effectual, neither can unbelieving men speak a word to the purpose, when affliction hath laid hold on them indeed; whereas a true Christian never showeth his manhood nor his cunning in this weapon of prayer more than when he is to fight for life or death, and the greater the danger is, with so much the stouter courage is he endued.

Dan. vi. 10.

23. As he who truly loveth another delighteth in nothing more than in often talking and conferring with him whom he loveth: even so where there is true and unfeigned love to God, there is a burning desire, by frequent prayer, to talk with God, such as no peril nor danger—no, nor loss of life—can stay or hinder, as may appear by Daniel.

24. As the more wood is laid on the fire the greater is the flame: so, likewise, is the continual talking with God, by prayer, a great increasing of our love towards Him; as, on the contrary, the seldomer we commune with Him by prayer, the more doth our love toward Him from time to time abate and slack, until, in the end, it be clean quenched.

25. As a certain kind of serpent, when it cometh to drink, doth vomit up all its poison : so a godly Christian, when he cometh to pray, must banish and cast away all anger, malice, and hatred out of his heart.

26. Like as a ship, with prosperous wind, is speedily carried in her course : so our prayer is more profound and is better heard when our minds are fervent with some desire. Ps. xvii. 1.

27. As Elisha did cast salt into the waters of Jericho to make them sweet : so must we salt and season our prayers with tears, to make them savoury and delightsome to God. 2 Kings ii. 21.

28. Like as, if men of great and lofty spirits, who to God are as filthy worms creeping on the earth, stand so much upon their reputation, that, as it is recorded of the senators of Rome in old time, they think it a disgrace unto them that any man should say that he had in vain asked help at their hands : even so much more will God, the great King of heaven and earth, who is as able as the richest, and as willing to give as the frankest—yea, and hath as great care, and that not without cause, of His glory as any man hath of his worldly worship and renown—think scorn that any man should say, “There is no help for me in God ! I have in vain afflicted my soul, humbled myself at His footstool by prayer, cleansed my ways in His sight, repaired to the place of His presence, and called upon Him ; there is nothing to be hoped for or gotten at His hands.”

29. Even as the smith striketh the iron while it is hot and fit to receive any form or impression : so God, although He could imprint His grace in the coldest, hardest, and flintiest disposition of the heart, yet He doth it rather when the affections of men are stirred up and inflamed, either by the ministry of the Word and public prayer, during the which regeneration is ordinarily wrought in men, or else by some private Christian exercise, as reading the Scripture and serious meditation, but especially by praying and singing psalms to God. It is in the time of such actions it pleaseth God sometimes to send His Spirit into the hearts of His elect.

30. Like as a medicine or plaster cannot heal a wound if there be any iron sticking in the same : so, in like manner, the prayer of a man profiteth him not as long as there is sinful sorrow in his mind or hatred in his breast ; for if charity be wanting all things be void.

31. Even as a child, when he feareth any evil or harm is likely to happen him, runneth to his father for help and succour : so, in like manner, the children of God run to God by prayer in all their dangers and distresses. Gen. xvi. 11 ; xxi. 17.

32. As a loving father, in regard of his ignorant and sometimes negligent child, doth give him things unasked, but not to the rebellious : even so God doth oftentimes bestow His graces and benefits upon us without prayer.

33. As parents take more pleasure to hear their children stammer than to hear some others speak eloquently : even so doth the Lord take pleasure in the prayers of His saints, because in Christ He taketh them for His children.

34. As the knowledge of God ought not to be imperfect or doubtful : so prayer should not be faint or slack, without courage or quickness.

35. Like as he that is in prison desireth ever to be delivered, whether he be eating, drinking, or sleeping ; and as he that is sick desireth always to be whole : even so doth every Christian man pray continually—yea, even when he seemeth not to pray ; for prayer consisteth not in much babbling, but in spirit and verity, and in vehement desire of the heart towards God. Matt. vi. 7.
John iv. 24.

36. As a son, being pinched with any grief or want, doth straightway run to his father for relief : so do the faithful, in the manifold miseries and crosses of this present life, seek for help at the hands of their heavenly Father by prayer. Eph. v. 2.

37. As the exercising of the body doth not only preserve it in natural vigour, but also increaseth its strength and keepeth it from sickness : so, by the daily use of prayer, we Eph. vi. 18.

shall find that the Lord will increase in us all spiritual graces, far above our own expectation or the opinion of any other.

Prayer before holy exercises.

John iv. 14; vi. 27.

LIKE AS a man diseased in his body seeketh and taketh the counsel of a physician, that, by receiving a medicine of him, he may recover his health, and so have a good stomach to his meat : so we, whensoever God's Word goeth against our stomach and that our souls loathe it, must by prayer seek to Christ, our heavenly Physician, that He may make our souls to like God's Word, which is the bread of salvation, lest we starve for want of the same.

Against Prayer for the dead.

Rom. xiv. 23.
2 Cor. v. 10.
John iii. 18.

As they who have departed out of this life be past our prayers, being either in joy or misery : even so we, having no word of God, whereupon faith leaneth, to pray for the dead, cannot but sin in doing it, seeing we do it not of faith.

Prayer morning and evening needful to be used in families.

Gen. xxviii. 18.
Exod. xvi. 21.

1. As the morning and evening is a fit and convenient time for suitors to attend upon great men ; and as the morning was a fit and convenient time to gather manna : even so the morning and evening is a fit and convenient time for Christian householders to become suitors unto the great majesty of God for spiritual manna, the food of their souls, and also for all necessities for their bodies.

Exod. xxxiv. 1, 2.
Ps. v. 3.

2. As Moses was commanded to come up to Sinai with the two tables of the law early in the morning : even so are we commanded to appear before God in our chambers early in the morning before we go abroad, having the two Testaments of God in our hands, learning how to honour His majesty in the one, and how to use our brethren charitably in the other, both which are the two principal duties of every Christian.

Prayer must be made to God alone.

Ps. l. 15.

LIKE AS, if a king would send out a proclamation that all his subjects, whensoever they had any suit or trouble, should come to himself and let him understand their case, to the intent to win his subjects' favour and to make known his good-will towards them, then that man might well be counted foolish that, knowing this, would seek and sue to some nobleman to get him to speak to the king for him, and this king might justly be offended and displeased at him for so doing : even so it standeth betwixt God and us, who hath commanded us to call upon Him in the day of trouble, so He will deliver us ; and, therefore, those that make saints their mediators do rob Him of the honour and glory due unto Him, &c.

It is our duty to be present at public Prayer.

Matt. xviii. 19, 20.
Acts xvi. 13; xx. 5.
Zech. viii. 21.
Ps. lxxv. 2.
Joel ii. 15

LIKE AS, when all the burgesses of a city do come before their prince, and with one voice crave pardon for some offence or beg some grace or favour, the prince will be more moved than if they, being absent, some one man should speak for the whole : even so, when the whole Church assembled together doth with heart and mind, in presence of God, accompany the prayers which the preacher, as the mouth of the congregation, poureth forth, let them be assured that those prayers do penetrate the heavens and that God is moved to hear them.

Perseverance in Prayer.

As the heathenitish woman of Canaan, having abandoned all hope and comfort in the remedies and counsels of man, desired help and succour of Christ; and, although the Lord gave her at the first a rough and sharp answer, yet she was nothing abashed, nor would be so answered: even so hold thou on likewise with this Canaanitish woman, saying and crying still, "O Thou Son of David, have mercy upon me!" and so shalt thou hear at length this comfortable Gospel and absolution, "Thy faith is great! Be it unto thee as thou desirest."

Matt. xv. 22, &c.

God hears not our Prayers always.

As the physician who goes on to lance the wound hears not the patient though he cry never so till the cure be ended: even so God hears not our prayers always according to our wills and desires, but according as the things asked shall be for our salvation.

Preacher.

1. As one piece of wood cannot possibly kindle another unless the same be first kindled itself: so, likewise, no preacher can inflame his hearers with the love of religion who is not himself first inflamed with the love of God and a care of His glory, nor can he convert or teach another rightly that is not truly converted and taught himself, &c.

Luke xxli. 32.
Rom. ii. 21.

2. As an abundance of fruit or as a plentiful harvest procureth (induceth) the painful (laborious) ploughman to labour afresh and with a future hope to put his hand to the plough, bend his back to the burden, and most willingly abide the brunt of every blast, because he seeth such store of fruits from his former labours: so, surely, every godly preacher, perceiving his former practice to bring forth such profit, he is pricked forward to labour more diligently in his calling, accounting those pains his only pleasure, and making his careful hearers his daily delight, saying, "Lo! these are the trees of righteousness; these are the planting of the Lord, in whom He is glorified," &c.

Prov. ii. 30.
Isa. lxi. 3, 9.

3. As the young crab-fish, being checked on a time by her elder for going so crookedly, said, "First go you straight before us, and then we will the straighter follow your steps": so, if the preacher will have his hearers to do and practise that which he teacheth them, then he himself must do and practise that which he teacheth them, that so his good behaviour may be their example; otherwise, they will cast his own faults in his face, and say, "Physician, heal thyself!"

Luke viii. 16; xi. 33.
1 Pet. ii. 12.
Matt. xxiii. 13.
Mal. ii. 9.
Luke iv. 29.

4. As those foolish carpenters, who, building and preparing the ark for the safeguard of Noah and his family, were drowned themselves in the flood; or as a grinding-stone, which, by giving an edge to the tools, becometh itself more blunt than before; or as a candle, which, by giving light to others, is consumed itself; or as a mere stone, which directeth the poor travellers aright in their way, but yet standeth itself at a stay; or as that miserable husbandman who selleth all his best corn and keepeth the refuse to himself; or as Cyrus, the foolish wine-seller, sold others the best wine, and did drink the lees and dregs himself; or as a firebrand, which kindleth and setteth other wood on fire, but it is consumed and burnt itself; or as a sick captain, who may give his soldiers good counsel, although he himself be unable to strike a stroke; or as an alabaster box, which containeth very precious ointments for such as are sick, but itself knoweth no savour thereof; or as a library full of

Gen. vi. 21.
Matt. xxiv. 38, 39
Luke xvii. 26, 27
1 Pet. iii. 20.
Gal. ii. 18.
Ps. l. 17, 18.
Rom. ii. 21-23.

singularly good knowledge for such as are desirous to learn, but hath neither use nor profit thereof itself; or as a golden cup, full of very wholesome wine for the comfort of those that are dry, but yet it remaineth itself athirst; or as a foolish minstrel, who singeth one thing with the mouth and harpeth another with his hands: even so that minister who giveth good counsel to others, but followeth it not himself; who buildeth up with one hand, but breaketh down with the other; who preacheth soundly, but liveth licentiously; who reproveth others for stealing, and yet stealeth himself; who blameth others for adultery, but yet breaketh wedlock himself; who condemneth the ill-doings and dealings of others, and yet doeth the same things himself. Such a one may assure himself that, without speedy repentance, he shall never escape the judgment of God.

5. As there is only but one means to salvation for all, whether prophet or apostle, preacher or people, Jew or Gentile, bond or free, or of what condition soever: so, surely, those are the best kind of preachers indeed who deliver the doctrine of Christ with some experience and feeling thereof in themselves, who verily add a marvellous efficacy and force to that doctrine delivered.

6. As the sick man seeketh not a physician eloquent, but expert and cunning: so of a preacher there must not be required a phrase of speech adorned and affected, but plain, wise, and for edification.

7. Like as some men, entangled in over many turnings, do make a short way very long: so, likewise, some preachers, in teaching trifling questions and matter that edifieth not, do greatly hinder their hearers from profiting in wisdom and knowledge.

8. As a blind, sore, and wounded eye, which cannot direct and lead the body, is rather a blemish and a burden to the natural body than a commodity (advantage): even so a man allowed and appointed to be a spiritual pastor and preacher, who hath not knowledge and grace to preach the law and the Gospel, is but a blind and sore eye, not able to direct and guide the spiritual body—the people of God—of whom he taketh charge.

10. As a family or household left without a guide or steward waxeth disorderly; as scholars wanting a schoolmaster cannot be learned; as a ship destitute of a pilot is unlikely to be preserved: even so is the state and condition of such churches and parishes most woeful and lamentable which are deprived of and lack true and faithful preachers, who are the Lord's stewards to dispose His secrets, the Lord's schoolmasters to teach His people, the Lord's under-guides to direct His flock of sheep into the sheep-fold of Christ Jesus.

11. As the surgeon is accustomed first of all to lay to a sore very sharp plasters, and, after the wound being opened, then those that be more gentle; or as a father, seeing the corrupt manners of his child, first correcteth him with stripes, and afterwards comforteth him: even so must the preacher of the Word deal with his auditory—after he hath denounced judgments and threatenings, he must then minister comforts and promises.

12. Like as there be two duties or properties belonging to a good shepherd—to wit, first, to feed his sheep; and secondly, to preserve them in safety from wolves and foxes: even so a good pastor and minister of Christ's sheep, first, ought to feed them with the fodder of the pure and wholesome doctrine of Christ; and secondly, to defend them from wolves and thieves—that is, against deceivers.

13. Like as the fountain, though no man draw of it, doth still send forth its springs; or as a river, though no man drink it, yet doth it keep course and flow nevertheless: even so it behoveth him that preacheth the Word of God to do what lieth in his power, though no man give any attention or have any care to follow the same.

14. Like as that man who goeth about to cut down a tall and mighty cypress, a barren, unprofitable, idle tree, that other fruitful plants, which are hindered through the noisome shadow of it, may increase and prosper, doth not despair, though at the first and second blow he felleth it not, but by little and little he striketh with the axe, until at length he lay it along: even so a preacher of the Word of God, although he see no profit follow his preaching, no

Gal. ii. 6.
Eph. vi. 9.
Col. iii. 3.
1 Pet. i. 17.

Matt. vi. 23; xv.
14.
Acts viii. 31.

Prov. xxix. 18.
1 Cor. iv. 1.
Matt. xxviii. 19.
John x. 16.

Acts xx. 28.
John xxi. 15, 16.

Jer. vii. 27.
Ezek. ii. 33; iii. 9,
11, 17; xxxiii. 2-4.

faults amended, no sins abated, yet, for all that, he ought not to despair, faint, or hide his talent in the ground ; but rather he ought to continue his preaching and never give over, that at length, with a two-edged sword of the pure Word of God, he may hew and fell down the huge and monstrous tree of sin and all abomination, and thus the new plants of virtue, holiness, and righteousness may grow, prosper, and increase.

15. Even as the precious stone called a jacinth is turned and changed with the air, for in a clear air it is bright and in a cloudy season it is darksome and not so pleasant : so the preachers and teachers of the Word of God, in their teaching and preaching, ought to frame themselves to meet with the manners, ages, and qualities of all their hearers.

1 Cor. ii, 6 ; iii, 1, 2, &c. ; ix, 19.

16. As one and the same medicine is not used and ministered to all that be diseased and sick, but divers medicines, according to their divers diseases : so, likewise, one and the self-same doctrine is not agreeable to all hearers. The teaching, therefore, and preaching of the ministers of Christ must be ordered and divided, that, having divers and sundry hearers, whose cares differ much and are not all alike, everyone may have his several portion, that not one, through want of discretion in the minister, go empty away.

17. As a diligent and learned physician, before he minister any physic to his sick patient, ought not only to seek out and to know the disease of him whom he proposeth to cure, but also his manners, his usual behaviour, the nature of his body, and his qualities : so, also, a godly wise preacher of the Word must do his best endeavour to know the infirmities, manners, and disposition of his auditory, that spiritual physic fit and meet for everyone may be ministered in due time.

18. As the people were roused and stirred up to wars and to celebrate certain days wherein sacrifices were offered unto God by the priests in the sounding of trumpets : even so every preacher of the Word of God ought to call upon sinners to remove their tents from this wicked world, and the manners and fashions of the same, and so much as in him lieth to bring the people that are blinded in their sins and falling from God out of their errors, perils, and dangers, and with all their force and skill to move and stir them up to be that indeed which true Christians do require.

Numb. x, 2, &c.
Joel ii, 1.
Isa. lv, 6, 7 ; lviii, 1.
Rev. xviii, 1.

19. As an expert and skilful husbandman doth first draw out of his fields or lands, pulling up by the roots, thistles, briars, brambles, and all other venomous and wild weeds, and afterwards committeth unto them his good seeds : even so a wise and skilful teacher of the Word of God ought first to root out sin and vices, and to till, as it were, the minds of his hearers, and as much as in him lieth to draw and pull out of them both root and rind of all manner of evil and wickedness, and so prepare and make them meet to receive the good seeds of the holy Word, and to sow in them those things which, being rooted and grown up, may bring forth both pleasant, profitable, and plentiful fruits.

Ezek. xvi, 2, &c.

20. As a sieve or a bolter wherewith meal is sifted or bolted, which sendeth forth the finest flour and best of the wheat, and keepeth the bran and worst to itself : even so that preacher who instructeth others with the wholesome doctrine, and doth so stain and blemish himself with vile and naughty vices that his life and doctrine be opposite and clean contrary the one to the other, so that it is seen and perceived of all that there is no agreement between them.

Exod. xxviii, 30.
Ps. xv, 2.
Ezek. xviii, 8, 9.

21. As the looking-glass doth show very plainly to them that behold it the likeness of such men or women as are before it, that they may dress and trim themselves, and yet doth not see itself : so that preacher or master who very copiously and eloquently doth teach others virtue and all other good things, and yet is himself given to sin and wickedness, doth indeed teach others, but he teacheth not himself.

Rom. ii, 1, 21.

22. As the sower doth fill his hand with seed, and then casteth it abroad upon the ground, not setting it seed by seed, or choosing a place for every seed, but where it lighteth there it remaineth : even so the preacher doth cast forth the Word among the people, and as is the ground into which it falleth so doth it prosper; for men's hearts are the ground upon which the Word is cast, and everyone hath a heart, upon whom the seed is sown.

Matt. xiii, 3.

23. As God commanded His priest Aaron to have the breast-plate upon his heart, the Urim and Thummim, the one signifying light and the other perfection—meaning also by Urim, knowledge, and by Thummim, holiness: so doth He hereby declare what virtues are required in a preacher—to wit, knowledge and understanding in the Word of God, and godliness in living, manners, and conversation.

24. As the cock, in the darkness of the night, foretelleth the light to come: so the preacher, in the darkness of this present world, foreshoweth the light of the joys of life everlasting to come.

Isa. lviii. 1

25. Like as, when a man lies in his dead sleep, he cannot awake except some noise waken him, or some other call him: so, in like manner, we cannot arise out of sin except the Spirit of God, or His preachers, who are His watchmen, with often crying unto us, awake us up.

Preachers of the law, when need requireth, are no disturbers of the peace of the Church.

Num. xi. 4. 5.

As the skilful physician who giveth a sharp purgation to his surfeited patient, which for a time doth disquiet all the parts of his body, may not truly be accounted a distemperer of his patient's health; for although as a purgation maketh much rumbling in the patient's bowels, and seemeth for a time to disturb all the members, yet afterwards procuring perfect health to his body, it cannot in truth and in deed be called the disquieter thereof: so, surely, those ministers, notwithstanding they minister some bitter purgation out of the Word to such silly poor patients in Christ as have surfeited long upon some points of idolatry and superstition, whereby their ignorant minds and weak consciences are much disquieted for a time, yet seeing that they procure in the end their former health, and seek only to restore them aright to their perfect liberty in Christ, they cannot be truly termed disturbers either of the outward or inward peace of the Church, but rather the faithful defenders thereof, for that they do daily admonish their people to conform themselves to the right manner of serving and worshipping God according to His Word, and to beware of such stinking garlic and onions of Egypt as naturally they are apt to surfeit upon.

Preachers.

Rom. x. 15.

As they are very welcome and received joyfully by us who bring us tidings of that which we greatly desire: so, likewise, ought the feet of our preachers to be esteemed beautiful who bring us the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation with God.

Preachers must be faultless.

As, when the priests did offer, they did especially provide that their sacrifice should have no spot on it, lest it should not be acceptable to God: so the preachers of the Word must have a special care that there be no blots in their lives or sermons.

Preachers should be maintained.

1. As it is reason that he who planteth a vineyard should eat the fruit thereof : so, also, 1 Cor. ix. 9. it is reason that he who preacheth the Gospel should have a living of them whom he teacheth for himself and his charge.

2. As soldiers live by their wages, and husbandmen by the fruit of their labours, and shepherds by that which cometh of their flocks : so, in like manner, the minister that laboureth in preaching the Word is to be maintained by them to whom he preacheth.

Preaching.

1. As it was decreed by God that St. Paul should appear at Rome, and not perish with his company in the sea, and therefore it was impossible that he or they should perish, yet, notwithstanding, he truly said that they could not be saved unless the mariners did abide in the ship : even so it is truly said that it is impossible to take God's sheep out of His hand, and yet it is impossible for them to be saved without preaching and continuance of feeding by the Word of God, for as that—namely, the continuance of the mariners in the ship—was the ordinary means to save their lives and to deliver them from shipwreck, so this—namely, continuance of preaching, catechising, and often feeding by the Word—is the ordinary means to deliver us from spiritual destruction.

Acts xxiii. 12 ;
xxvii. 23-25, 31.
John x. 29.

2. Like as our spiritual meat doth not nourish us—I mean the preaching of the Word of God, the food of the soul—unless it be received and by faith we receive it ; it cannot cherish us unless it be digested and by the heat of faith it is concocted ; it cannot profit us unless it be kept in our hearts and by faith we retain it ; it doth no good unless we have life, and the just shall live by faith : so that it is most requisite that we labour by earnest prayer to attain unto faith, whereby we may be perfectly nourished with this meat, the preaching of the Word of God.

Heb. ii. 4.
Rom. i. 17.

3. Like as profane and wicked people have wit enough to say that, if a man be fallen into a ditch or brook, he may cry long enough, " Lord, help me ! Lord, help me ! " if he do not endeavour and strive to come out by taking hold of such things as he may escape and clamber up by ; and yet they are not so wise as to consider the means by which God, in mercy, doth reach forth His mighty arm unto them, to draw them out of the puddle and mire of sin, and to save them, which is only by the preaching of His Word : but this they do not seek to lay hold of, but, contrarily, they cast themselves headlong into the snares of temptation by joining in fellowship with the workers of iniquity.

1 Cor. i. 18-21.
Rom. i. 16 ; x. 17.

4. As there is not a greater blessing given of God to any nation or people than the gift of His Holy Word, there to be sincerely taught and preached : so, likewise, no greater curse from God can be laid upon any nation or people than when the Word of God, and the true preaching thereof, is taken away from them.

Amos viii. 11, 12.

5. As there is much difference betwixt a drawn plan and the builded house, betwixt the figure and the thing figured, the natural and the thing presented : so is there much more difference betwixt the hearing of a sermon preached and the reading thereof afterward in writing, for the heart is more moved by hearing the Word preached than read.

6. As the hen clucketh and calleth her chickens together, and lovingly spreadeth her wings to keep them under and to protect and defend them from all things that would hurt or harm them : even so the Lord most lovingly, by the continual preaching of His holy Word, doth call men to the embracing of His mercy.

7. As Christ, when He raised up dead men, did only speak the Word and they were made alive, and in the day of judgment, at His voice, when the trumpet shall blow, all that are dead shall rise again : so is it in the first resurrection—they that are dead in their sins, at His voice, uttered in the ministry of the Word, shall rise again,

8. As Christ raised three from the dead—Jairus's daughter, newly dead; the widow's son, dead and wound up and lying on the hearse; Lazarus, dead and buried and stinking in the grave—and all this He did by His very voice: so, also, by the preaching of His Word, He raiseth all sorts of sinners, even such as have lived long in their sins as rotten and stinking carrion.

Mat. iv. 16.

9. As the days of our life arise with the sun, and go down again with it: so the day of our salvation springeth in the preaching of the Gospel, and is shut up again with the ceasing of that voice.

10. Even as a fruitful field bringeth two kinds of fruit for man's bodily sustenance, whereof one must be dressed, sodden, baked, or roasted, &c., the other may be eaten raw as it cometh from the ground: so God's Word hath two kinds of food for the soul, whereof the one must needs be dressed and minced, as it were, by preaching, and, rightly dividing it, the other may be understood and digested by reading.

11. As a mother doth not give her child a whole nut in the shell, but breaketh and cracketh it, and so giveth it the kernel: even so must a minister do with the Word, and open it by plain preaching.

12. Like as they that refuse pearls because they are brought and offered unto them in homely and base vessels; or as they that had rather sit in the dark than to have a light brought unto them unless it were put in a silver candlestick; or as the baker that refuseth good and pure wheat because of the baseness of the bag in which it is brought;—may all be accounted fools: so, in like manner, such men as refuse to hear the preaching of God's Word, because it is preached by simple and base men, in regard of the countenance of the world, are much deceived.

God revealeth His will unto us by Preaching.

1. As a man, if he be of credit, maketh the hidden thoughts of his heart to be known by speaking: even so God, who is the Truth itself, revealeth unto us, by the preaching of the Gospel, His counsel and His will touching our adoption and salvation, and confirmeth this revelation by the use of the holy Sacraments.

2. As a ship is held fast by the anchor that it might not be carried away by the wind: even so God would that the revealing of His counsel by the doctrine and preaching of the Gospel should hold us fast, and assure us against all doubts of our adoption—yea, and to pierce even into the very heavens, with assurance whereof our Forerunner Jesus Christ hath taken possession both for Himself and for us.

Instrumental cause of Preaching.

As a builder must have not only an exquisite skill in building, and an ability to accomplish his skill, and faithfulness to perform it, and meet matter or stuff to work upon, but apt instruments, also, or tools, to try forth and fashion the building: so, likewise, a preacher must not only have the Spirit of God to direct him in preaching and utterance to publish the same, and faithfulness for the performance thereof, and matter to practise upon, but fit instruments also to proportionate the work very aptly in every point, namely, logic and rhetoric, with other artificial helps, which be, as it were, the instrumental cause of preaching.

Preaching killeth sin.

As the walls of Jericho did fall down flat at the sound of the trumpets and the shouts of the people : even so sin and wickedness will fall flat down and decay in the people when ministers shall faithfully and carefully execute their office by diligent preaching and catechising.

Josh. vi. 20.
Isa. lviii. 1.
Hos. v. 8.

Preaching little availeth without Christ's Spirit.

As the crowing of the cock was not sufficient to move Peter to repentance until Christ, in token of favour towards him, looked back upon him : even so ministers may preach to the people, but, unless Christ open and mollify their hearts and work by His Spirit in them, they cannot receive profit by their hearing.

Luke xxii. 60, 61.
John vi. 44, 45.
1 Cor. iii. 6, 7.
Acts xvi. 14.
Jer. xxxi. 33;
xxxii. 40.

Preaching maketh a separation.

LIKE as, in a barn, he that maketh clean the corn with his fan doth sever the wheat and the chaff asunder, and layeth up the wheat into the garner : even so Christ, by the preaching of His Word, doth dis sever His elect from the reprobate, and His elect He will take home to Himself, but the reprobate He reserveth to everlasting fire.

Matt. iii. 12.
Luke iii. 17.

Preaching required before the receiving of the Sacrament.

1. As the print in wax is more fitly received and fully expressed when the wax is wrought and warmed first : so, likewise, the effect of the Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is more lively felt and seen when the people repair and resort thereunto with minds and hearts well instructed, catechised, prepared, and thoroughly examined.

2. As it is a good conclusion, that, forasmuch as Peter, in that he is a man, is born to have, and by common course of nature hath, two legs, therefore John and Thomas, and all the rest of men, have two legs likewise : even so, forasmuch as John the Baptist, by reason of his ministry, had need first to preach and then to baptize, it followeth that all others who have that ministry committed unto them must do the like.

Matt. iii. 1, &c.
Acts xix. 4, 5.

Vain-glorious fools in Preaching.

As some physicians, to the intent they may appear the more learned, do mingle sometimes together divers kinds of herbs fetched from the sundry parts of the world : so some vain-glorious fools do think no sermons or orations learned enough unless they rehearse therein the authority and sayings of poets, orators, and philosophers, together with sentences in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin.

Precepts of godliness.

LIKE as, to sick persons, there is not only ministered medicines, but there be also precepts or diets prescribed unto them to follow, lest the operation of the medicine should be hindered : even so Christ commanded that His precepts, which do serve to the following of true godliness, should be laid upon them that be baptized, lest they should fall from His grace in the Sacrament whereto they be admitted and consigned.

Preparation of the heart before holy exercises.

LIKE as honesty and civility require that our body be well ordered and settled when we shall have talk and communication with men of more honour than ourselves: even so it is much more meet that our mind be very well disposed when we shall pray and speak before God in the sight of His angels.

It is no Presumption to be assured of our salvation.

II-b. A. 17, 18.

1. LIKE as, if a king should make a promise unto some one of his servants whom he favoureth, and the same party should answer again, "I stand in doubt of your promise," or, "I hardly believe the performance of your promise," might not the king well think himself greatly dishonoured to have it doubted whether he be a man of his word? But if he should swear for the performance of his promise, and yet the party would not credit him, he would never put that up or suffer such an injury: even so, after the same manner, it must needs follow that, seeing God hath bound Himself both by promise and by oath, it is great presumption for us not to believe Him—yea, it is all one as to think that God may lie, or that He may be forsworn, which is horrible blasphemy.

Mark xvi.
John iii. 16-18; v.
24.
Acts xv. 11.

2. Like as it is all one if a man condemned for treason have his pardon sent him, being but one man alone, as it is if a great number condemned to death with him have a general pardon sent to them all: even so it is betwixt God and us. We were all condemned; He hath sent a general pardon to as many as believe His promises, which He offereth and sendeth unto all in general, as He also offereth and sendeth unto every one in particular, saying that whosoever believeth and trusteth in Christ shall be saved. God, therefore, hath told some men—that is, such as believe—that they shall be saved, and such as doubt of His promise and His oath, that they shall be damned; so that it is no presumption to be sure and certain of our salvation.

Pride corrupteth all our works.

1. As a little wormwood will quickly mar a whole vessel of wine: so, in like manner, were our life most perfect and godly—yea, most divine and angelical—the least pride that may be will wholly corrupt it and make it worse, and more imperfect than ever it was good.

2. As it were a lamentable thing to see a merchant, after a long and prosperous navigation, suffer shipwreck in the haven, and loss of all in that place, where he hoped to repose himself and enjoy the fruit of his labours: so, in like manner, it is when a man, like unto the pharisee, hath lived well in this world, having carefully observed the commandments of God, and wisely and politically carried himself among men, and yet, in the end, through presumption and pride in himself, or contempt of his neighbour, he utterly casteth himself away.

3. Like as, when we are on the top of a hill, or of some high place, we take good heed of our feet, and we walk warily for fear of stumbling: so, in like manner, must they behave themselves whom God hath exalted above others, either in authority, knowledge, virtue, or wealth, or any other grace whatsoever it hath pleased Him to bestow upon them in a particular manner, considering that the means to be preserved and continued in that estate wherein they are is to trust in Him, and continually to cleave unto Him, to the end that they always may live in His fear, and in a humble manner retain and keep their minds in His obedience, in remembrance and consideration of His goodness, and not to be proud and arrogant.

4. As the peacock, beholding his gay and goodly feathers, waxeth forthwith very proud thereof, but as soon as he casteth down his eyes and looketh upon his feet, which are far from beautiful, his pride is quickly abated : so, likewise, if, in respect of some prerogatives and pre-eminences which God hath given us above other men, we find ourselves solicited by our flesh or enticed by the devil to become proud, let us consider that we are but dust, corruption, and vanity, the better to repress this pride.

5. As we would laugh at a beggar who, having borrowed princely apparel to play the part of some king upon a stage, will need afterward retain and keep his apparel still, proudly and gloriously behaving himself in them as if they were his own : even so, in like manner, if a rich man would glory in his wealth, a philosopher in his knowledge, a strong man in his force, a merchant in his wealth, a woman in her beauty, or a hypocrite in his virtue, they all deserve to be laughed at : for this world is, as it were, a theatre, and all the honours and dignities which men have therein are, as it were, several attires, which God hath distributed and given to every one as is most requisite to play his part in, which is not to the end that he may attribute them unto himself, or glory in them ; but, contrariwise, to honour Him who gave them, and to help his neighbours.

6. As pride was the first vice that entered into our nature, for the corrupting and defacing of that image which was in us : so, likewise, is it the last that cometh out of us ; and before we be wholly cleared thereof we cannot attain unto our former perfection and integrity.

Pride maketh God to take His graces from us and bestow them upon others.

1. As the slave who hath stolen from his lord and master, and will acknowledge no duty, no rent, nor any service wherein he is bound unto him, doth deserve to lose all such goods, lands, &c., as he holdeth of his master : so, in like manner, if God, who requireth nothing of us but a confession and acknowledgment of the good He hath done for us, seeth us to refuse this, He dealeth justly with us if He shut up His liberality from us and bestow the same upon others.

2. Like as, if a great lord should receive some poor man into his house, giving him nothing but wherewithal he might maintain himself in mean estate, and should perceive that within two or three years after he purchased lands, put money to usury, kept a great port, and was at other excessive charges, his lord might have good occasion to think he were a thief, seeing that he had nothing when he took him into his service : so, likewise, we, considering how poor we are by nature, and that we came into the house of our God all naked, laden, as it were, and covered with filth and beggary—if, being there, we will vaunt ourselves in so doing, we rob God of His glory and give Him just cause to take them from us and give them to others.

The Pride of idolaters.

As the morning dew, soon after the sun-rising, vanisheth away : even so the strength and glory, prosperity and pride, of idolaters is by God soon brought to nought. Hos. xiii. 3.

The Pride of man's heart.

1. LIKE as Adoni-bezek did put divers kings under his table, having cut off their thumbs and toes : even so men in their heart do think basely of all other men, putting them under their feet, and detracting and diminishing the graces of God in them.

Judges i. 7.
Gen. xvi. 4.
Esther i. 4; v. 11.
Dan 'A. 27.

2. As when two wrestle together, if the one can lift the other's feet from the ground, he will easily give him a fall : so the devil, if he by pride can lift up our feet from the ground, he will easily give us a fall.

Exod. ix. 8-10.

3. As when Moses and Aaron threw the handfuls of dust into the air, thereof came blotches and boils : even so when we that are but dust and ashes are exalted in the pride of our heart, thereof cometh blotches and boils in our hearts.

Prince or pastor.

1. As the flowers of sysynrichion be many, whereof one always is open that standeth at the top : so though in a commonwealth or Church there be many, or though all be good men, yet they which are in the chiefest places, as the prince and pastor, must be most vigilant.

Exod. xxlii. 3.
Lev. xix. 15.

2. Like as the sun shineth not more unto the rich than unto the poor, but is unto all alike : so a prince or magistrate ought not to have respect unto the person, but unto the cause or controversy.

3. As a horse for his leanness is not to be blamed, but the horsekeeper : so the rudeness and ignorance of the people are to be imputed unto their prince and pastor.

4. Like as a little wart or blot is sooner perceived in the face than a great bunch or wound in the other parts of the body : so a small offence is evident and seemeth great in a prince or preacher whose life the whole people do behold.

Princes.

1. As princes seek for nothing but to be honoured, served, and obeyed by their subjects : so there is no better nor readier way to attain this their desire than to show themselves mild, gentle, and merciful, even in those punishments which are due to offenders.

2. As skilful surgeons, who, when they will sear or cut off any putrified or rotten member, are wont to deal tenderly, gently, and in as mild a manner as possibly may be, thereby to comfort their patient and to diminish his pain : so, likewise, a prince, to mitigate the sharpness of the pain which is often due by rigour of law, must mix equity and moderation therewith, showing both in his words and countenance a commiseration toward the offender, who, notwithstanding, by reason of his evil deserts and force of law, must needs be condemned.

3. Like as Scipio the Great, the paragon of all nobility in his time, answering one of his captains, who told him that with the loss of two or three hundred of his men he might win the city which he then besieged, said he had rather save one citizen than destroy a thousand enemies : so, in like manner, it is the duty of a good prince to defend, cherish, preserve, keep, support, and comfort all poor and desolate persons, and to be, as it were, a sanctuary to such as are pursued, whereto they may retire without danger.

4. As the head giveth movement to the whole body and all the parts thereof, but to the principal parts in the head—the eyes, tongue, ears—it giveth besides the faculty of moving, the sense also of seeing, tasting, hearing : so, in like manner, in the commonwealth, by the prince's authority, all persons are kept in order and urged to look to their charge, both civil officers and spiritual.

Princes and magistrates are especially to eschew vices.

1. As the eclipse of the sun is the cause of death and destruction : so is an error or vice, which is an eclipse of virtue in a prince, a great calamity and a pernicious plague unto the people, and presages the like fall in the apish imitating multitude.

2. As the hart, when he can find no pasture, is poor and bare of flesh, and void of strength when he is hunted and pursued : even so are the princes and rulers of those countries which, by the just judgment of God, are oppressed and overrun with foreign nations.

Ps. xlii. 1.

3. As a great branch cut from a tree bringeth down a number of small ones with it ; or as, when a great prince cometh forth of his palace, a multitude do follow him : even so do subjects ordinarily follow the example of their prince and magistrate, whether good or bad ; for whatsoever he doth it seemeth to them as if he commanded it.

Deut. xvii. 16, &c.
Josh. i. 8.
1 Sam. ii. 30.

4. Even as from the sap of a tree doth proceed that strength wherewith the boughs do flourish and bring forth fruit : so, from a godly prince and magistrate, such justice, virtue, and godliness do proceed, that thereby all the people are mightily moved to true religion, a right worshipping of God, due obedience, and honesty of life and conversation.

5. Like as when, in a man's body, the heart doth not impart unto the members the vital spirits, but the arteries are stopped and shut up and the blood forsaketh the veins, it is a sign of death, and that the party in this case is either already dead or will die shortly : even so, when kings and princes of the earth are tyrannical toward their loyal subjects, withdrawing from them pity, mercy, love, and liberality, it threateneth and doth prognosticate the ruin of their kingdoms ; but, through the mercy, clemency, and love of princes, their kingdoms do mightily flourish, and the princes themselves do enjoy great tranquillity, security, and peace.

Prov. xx. 20.
Isa. x. 3

6. Even as, among the pretty sweet bees, that bee only which leadeth and ruleth all the rest either hath no sting or, at the least, doth not use it : so clemency and mercy agree with none more in all the world than with a prince.

Principles are necessarily to be known.

As in an apothecary's shop, where the knowledge of such things is set forth and professed, it is a great shame if common and no less profitable simples should be unknown : so, in a Church or family of the faithful, where the knowledge of such matters is professed, it is a great shame if common and no less needful principles should not be well and rightly understood.

Private men and women may greatly further the Church.

1. As women did work divers things for the tabernacle in the days of Moses ; or as the temple was built by men of all sorts in the time of Solomon, and the walls of Jerusalem under the guiding of Nehemiah : so may private men very much further the building of the spiritual temple, which is the congregation of Christ.

Exod. xxxv. 25.
1 Kings v.
Neh. iii.
Josh. xxiv. 15.
Acts x. 2, 7.
Gen. xiv. 14 ; xviii. 19.
Rom. xvi. 20.
Jer. xxxv. 1, &c.

2. As out of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob's house sprang forth the Churches of the Jews : so the glorious congregations of the Gentiles in like manner began in the families of private men ; for as servants well nurtured may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things, and husbands obeying not the Word may, without the Word, be won by the conversation of the wives : even so much more may the master of the family do unto God and His Church honourable service, not only by sanctifying his house by the Word of faith, but also by having always in readiness very notable matter to further the building of God's dwelling-place.

Tit. ii. 10.
1 Pet. iii. 1.
2 Tim. i. 5 ; iii. 15.
Acts xvi. 1.

Judges xvii., xviii.

3. As the disorder of one private family—namely, of one Micah of Ephraim—was an occasion that idolatry did spread through the whole tribe of Dan, and so continued many years : even so, contrarily, Gideon, being stirred up by the goodness of God to the reformation of one mean family in Manasseh, was the cause of a great deliverance to the whole nation from most mighty and cruel enemies, and most abominable idolatry, for a space of forty years.

Judges vi., vii., viii.

Private Prayers, reading, meditation, and conference at home.

1. LIKE as most men be careful enough in finding their provision, curious in marking what is wholesome or hurtful to them, precise and constant in keeping their hours for dinner and supper—yea, and willing to keep themselves to some kind of meat : so, contrariwise, many refuse the food of their souls as a fruitless and unsavoury thing, which chiefly consisteth in the pure use of God's public worship, and partly in holy prayers, meditations, and readings in private. Although the most be content, for some carnal respect, to show themselves in public assemblies, yet few there are that are careful to redeem the time and to make themselves, by private reading and meditation, more fit to reap fruit by the public ministry of the Word and Sacraments.

2. As they who, through error, prejudice, or self-love, are so addicted to their private studies, that they dispose (part with) or neglect the public ministry, shall, without speedy mercy from God, fall into divers fond (foolish) opinions and dangerous errors, and pine away in their ignorance and sins : even so to little purpose is our hearing of sermons abroad, if there be not a settled and constant course of private praying, reading, meditation, and conference at home.

3. Like as natural men, who are most greedy of the world, will not miss scarce once a year their ordinary hours of eating and drinking : even so much more ought Christians not to be fickle or unfaithful, forgetting and omitting the times of reading and praying unto God, meditation, and conference at home.

Proceeding in religion.

Heb. v., 13, 14.
1 Pet. ii., 1-3.

LIKE as the young child must not look to be fed always with the teat or pap, but, as it groweth in years, so to feed on stronger meats : even so good Christians must not content themselves to have learned the principles of religion, but they must labour also to proceed and come to perfection by learning the substantial and higher points of religion, and not to be like truants, always sticking at one lesson.

Profession abused.

As we do not condemn the art of physic because some physicians have given poison for apothecaries' drugs, but those that abuse the art ; or as we do not condemn the art of navigation because some have made shipwreck, but their want of knowledge that have so done : so, in like manner, we may not condemn the profession of Christianity because some, making show of Christianity, have committed grievous sins, but those that have abused the good profession.

Carnal Profession.

LIKE as all those that were born of Abraham were not the children of Abraham : so, likewise, all that profess the Gospel are not partakers of the Gospel.

Counterfeit Professors are the greatest enemies to the Church.

1. EVEN as, of all the enemies that Judah had, the ten tribes of Israel, that were their brethren, and made an outward profession of the name of God with them, were the greatest and most dangerous : so, likewise, among the enemies that Sion, God's Church, hath, the most vehement and bitter are the false-hearted and counterfeited Israelites, carnal Protestants, Papists, heretics, and other profane men.

2. As one enemy within the city is more dangerous than ten without : even so careless professors and profane men, as they have most power to hurt, so are they furiously enraged against the truth and ways of God, and, being set on fire to remain in their sin, will even sell themselves to work wickedness.

Outward Professors are often hypocrites.

EVEN as many men are much delighted with music, and will most gladly hear musicians make songs of the noble acts and singular virtues of great and good men, but never care to imitate one virtue of a thousand which they hear with praises extolled unto the skies : so very many men, in these our days, are outwardly very forward to hear sermons and the Word preached, and, like Ananias, will be willing at some cost to maintain preachers, and yet, in many, all is but mere hypocrisy. To please their own humours with strange and new matter, they look for some logic, rhetoric, or bravery of words, without any purpose to frame their lives after such doctrine as the preacher delivereth.

Professors that seek themselves and not God.

As the foolish virgins went forth to meet the bridegroom with lamps in their hands, as well as the wise, but they never so much as dreamed of the horn of oil till the coming of the bridegroom : so, likewise, many men live in the Church of God, as members thereof, holding up the lamp of glorious profession, but in the mean season they seek only for the things of this life, never casting how they may assure themselves in conscience, touching their reconciliation with God, till the day of death come.

Mat. xxv. 1, 2, &c.

Such have most Profit as are farthest from great men.

As the moon hath so much the less light by so much as it is nearer the sun : so have they most profit and honour who are far from great lords and princes.

Keeping of Promise.

LIKE as the mulberry-tree is said to be the wisest of all trees, because it buddeth last of all, and not till the cold be past, and bringeth forth fruit first, which is ripe before the cold cometh again : so we must be slow in promising and quick in performing.

Fair Promises.

As they who have nothing to feed on but the wind do famish and pine away, and so perish : so, likewise, they who are fed with fair promises, and set their hope and confidence in the defence of men, are deceived and left destitute in their utmost need.

Faith and God's Promises must be joined.

LIKE as the spear and shield, sword, helmet, and dagger, are not profitable weapons unto him that cannot use them, or will not when good occasion is offered : even so the promises of God do nothing profit them that cannot rightly apply them, and will not believe thereon, or will not use them.

God's mercy in His Promises.

1. LIKE as, if I owe to a creditor, upon a very formal bill, a hundred pounds, he will not (to the end to induce me to pay the same) faithfully promise to give me ten times so much more : yet thus doth God deal with us. He is so wonderful in His goodness, that He vouchsafeth to promise us so many benefits if we amend our lives—that is to say, if we perform the things whereto we are already bound.

2. If he that is free bindeth himself to serve another, then it is reason that his master should promise him some wages and reward for his service : but we are not free, but already bound to serve our God, yet doth He promise us great benefits if we employ ourselves faithfully in His service by amending our lives.

Promises made to particular persons appertain to their successors.

Amos ix.

LIKE as whatsoever league, truth, or promises of favour be made to any king, in the same is his kingdom contained, and his subjects are also partakers of the same : so the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and David belong not to them only, but to their children also, their successors, heirs, people, and subjects.

Promises of God.

As it is a fancy of the physicians that he who carrieth mugwort in his bosom will not be weary in his travel : so, also, it is a truth of the Lord, that he who carrieth the sweet promises of the Gospel in his heart shall not faint in his troubles.

Prophets.

As we, looking on those things which are before our eyes, do see them no otherwise than they are : so the prophets did foresee things to come as though they were present and as they were indeed.

False Prophets.

1. As spots deface the things they light on, which ought to be clean : so, also, false prophets and false brethren defile and stain the society and fellowship of Christians.

Judges i, 12.

2. As shipmen cannot guide themselves by wandering stars without danger of shipwreck, their course is so uncertain and wandering : so no Christian can, without assured destruction, make such prophets his guides as stay not themselves upon the only and infallible rule of truth. Judges i. 13.

3. Like as wolves, breaking into a flock of sheep, do devour some and scatter the rest : so, also, do false prophets and false teachers who creep into the Church of God. They bring to destruction those whom they can allure within compass of their nets, and divide and separate the rest by dissension and debate. Acts xx. 29.

Lying Prophets.

As daubers who daub walls with mortar which was never tempered cannot make those walls continue, for that the mortar crumbleth away : even so false and lying prophets, who speak in the name of the Lord that which He never commanded them, cannot make their words true, or to come to pass as they have promised. Ezek. xxii. 28.

Prosperity and wealth make not a man truly happy.

1. As children do much wonder and praise those players which on the scaffold be apparelled in pied and peevish (childish) garments : so fools they be that will deem them happy who be laden either with wealth or brave attire.

2. Like as we see horses, when they be much pampered, they kick, and be fierce, and will not abide the rider : even so prosperity maketh men drunk, and, as it were, bringeth them into a sleep ; and no marvel, for, as the common saying is, fullness engendereth fierceness. Dan. iv. 1.
Ps. xxx. 6.

3. As a morning cloud that, at the sun-rising, vanisheth away : even so shall the prosperity of the wicked be.

4. As the grass on the house-top, which, for lack of root, withereth before it can grow up to be mown, or to serve to any other good use : even so, also, is the flourishing prosperity of such men, cities, and lands as, by manifold wickedness, provoke God's wrath and indignation against them. Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2
cxix. 6, 7.
Isa. xxxvii. 27.

Prosperity argueth not a man to be saved, and contrariwise, &c.

1. As hawks of the best kind, while they live, are highly esteemed and made much of, and are daintily fed, and tenderly looked unto, and are carried upon the fists of great and mighty men, but when they be dead they are thrown out upon the dunghill ; and, on the other side, the partridge, when she liveth, is troubled, afflicted, and pursued of all—every carter and ploughman is ready to fall upon her to do her violence, and to kill her ; but when she is dead she is brought to the tables of princes, and is honourably set before them : so many that, in this life, are counted very famous and notable men, and do lead their lives in great prosperity and worldly wealth, and have all things at their wills and pleasures, when they remove hence and depart this life, they shall be hurled upon that most foul and filthy dunghill of hell, to be tormented in the stench and abomination for ever ; but others, who, in this life, are encumbered, tormented, and afflicted with divers and sundry calamities, and even, for their virtues' sake, are hated of the wicked and condemned of the world, when they shall depart out of this life, they shall be brought and presented before the Lord with great honour, and placed with the King of heaven in everlasting glory—that is, full of honour and full of unspeakable joys.

2. As the skilful physician doth give to a patient of whose recovery he despaireth all things that he requireth, but he denieth many things to him of whose health he hath hope : so God many times bestoweth His blessings of worldly things upon the reprobate when He (for divers respects) refuseth to give them to the godly.

In Prosperity we must provide for adversity.

As a waterman or mariner will never let out his sail so far but that he may soon pull it in again : even so every man, as long as all things stand well and upright with him, ought to foresee and prepare in time for the contrary.

Prosperity is sometimes hurtful.

1. As it happeneth to him that is quiet and at ease that he falleth soon asleep, and having an apple or any other thing in his hand, it falleth, or is easily taken from him : so the ease of the flesh bringeth us asleep in the world, and causeth us to lose the spiritual good things, and to suffer them to fall to the ground.

2. As the great lake in Palestine called Asphaltites is never troubled with any waves, storms, or tempests, but is ever quiet : even so such are they who lead their lives in tranquillity, peace, and quietness, and are never pressed nor broken with any calamities, nor tossed and troubled with any sorrows or miseries in the world, but are ever at heart's ease, and live as they list.

3. Even as a stranger in a far country, having and enjoying all things, serving either for necessity or pleasure, careth little for returning home : so he who hath all things needful for this life in abundance, and at his heart's desire, little careth for heaven or heavenly things.

Prosperity maketh men rebellious.

Deut. xxxii. 15.

As cattle, the lustier they are kept and the fatter they are fed, are the more unruly and ready to kick against their keepers : even so is it with very many men. The more temporal blessings and worldly commodities God heapeth upon them, the more they kick against Him, and will be the less ruled by His ministers and Word.

Prosperity most pleasant after adversity.

Matt. xviii. 12, 13.
Luke xv. 22-24.

As the spring-time, following and coming immediately upon the rough and hard winter, is the more acceptable, pleasant, and welcome unto us ; or as a battle, the sorer our enemies do assault and fight against us, the greater is the joy and triumph at the victory and overthrow of them ; or as he that hath kept his bed a long time, and lain sick a great season, afterward, when he is recovered, health is a more precious treasure unto him than ever it was before he felt what sickness was, and also such as mourned and were sorry for his sickness do receive an infinite joy and an exceeding rejoicing at his restoring unto health again : even so doth God deprive us for a time of riches, wealth, prosperity, our natural country, bodily health, and such other transitory benefits, for this purpose, that when He giveth them again unto us we may the more rejoice and be glad of them.

The Prosperity of this world.

As the clearness of winter weather, the calmness of the sea, and the stability of the moon do waver and be suddenly changed: so, likewise, the state of wealth and worldly things hath no firmness, no perpetuity, and no constancy. Job viii. 9; xiv. 2

Prosperity or adversity maketh not a good or bad man.

As we may not take it for a sure token and good argument that the doings of wicked men do please God, or that they be in the favour of God, because they have good and prosperous success in their affairs: even so we may not condemn the godly because they sometimes want necessities and be in adversity; for if the success be evil, the cause is not therefore straightway evil, neither, if the success be good, is the cause therefore straightway good; yet, no doubt, there is great difference between the having of a good cause and the having of an evil cause. Job xxi. 7, &c.
Jer. xii. 1, &c.
Mal. iii. 14, 15.
Ps. xxxviii. 1, &c.
2 Cor. xi. 25, 26.
Gen. xxxix. 20.
Judges xx. 21, 25
2 Kings xxiv. 1, &c.
Jer. xxvii. 19, 20

Proud and obstinate.

1. As certain lightnings do melt both brass and iron, whereas they leave soft wax unannoyed: even so God's might or the king's power do worthily suppress and beat down the proud and obstinate, whereas the meek and humble they most favourably and graciously do use. 1 Pet. v. 6.
Luke xviii. 14.

2. Like as tempests when they arise and lightning, quickly and in a trice, hurl down and overturn mountains and the highest trees: even so doth the Lord bring down with a break-neck fall the proud, haughty, arrogant, and insolent, who set themselves against God, and seek the spoil of those that be quiet and godly. Isa. ii. 12, 13.
Ps. xxix. 5, &c.

Proud men.

1. EVEN as wild beasts, being about to invade and set upon their prey, will stoop low and bend themselves, that they may rush and fall upon it with the greater force and more violence: even so proud and mischievous men, being sly and subtle, will sometimes crouch and bear themselves very lowly, that, under the colour of dissembled virtue, they may supplant and deceive the simple and godly honest man, advance themselves, and work mischief to others. Ps. x. 4, 9, 10.

2. As, in a threshing place, chaff is seen above the wheat, not because it is better, but because it is lighter—it is vile and of little value, yet, notwithstanding, it getteth the higher and worthier place: even so, in this life, a proud and vain man is exalted above the humble and lowly, not for any worthiness, just desert, or true virtue that is in him, but for his vanity and false opinion that he hath conceived of himself; and whereas he is of very little or no value, yet he putteth himself before others who are beyond him in virtue, wisdom, and nobility, but the lowly, though the worthier and more excellent man, doth ever humble himself, not because he is of less value, but because he hath in him greater weight of wisdom, understanding, and true nobility.

3. As hawks, trusting to their wings, will fly exceeding high, as though they would pierce the clouds themselves, but for their too high flying they are oftentimes lost: so men, depending on the wings of prosperity, being puffed up and swelled with pride, the higher they fly the more mischievous is their fall, and with the greater disgrace are they hurled down headlong.

Proud through honour.

1. LIKE as Bucephalus, the horse of Alexander the Great, being unsaddled, would receive on his back the horsekeeper, but, being adorned with trappings and barbs, he would suffer none other than Alexander himself to ride him : even so many, being poor and base, will suffer many things which, if they were in prosperity, they would despise and contemn.

Luke i. 52, 53.
James iv. 6.

2. As a tree set upon the top of a mountain is mightily shaken and easily rent up by the roots with every blustering blast and storm of wind : even so man in this world, the more and higher he is exalted to honour, the more and greater dangers is he subject unto.

Providence of God.

1. LIKE as, when the staff or crutch of an aged man is taken from him, he thereupon falls : even so, when God's blessing is taken from our bread and sustenance, which is as it were the power of the nourishment and staff of our life, our food becometh unprofitable and ceaseth to nourish.

Ps. xci. 1.

2. As a shadow doth protect and defend us from the beams and heat of the sun : even so God doth protect us from dangers.

Ps. iii. 4.

3. Like as, in high and defenced towers, we are safe from the enemy : so, likewise, by the providence of God, we are in safety from our foes.

4. Like as, in a clock, there be divers wheels, whereof some be moved slower, some faster, and yet all are directed by one spring : so, also, in this world, though there be many creatures and divers actions, yet they are all guided and governed by one and the same providence of God.

Ps. iii. 3-5.

5. As Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, being reproved for that he slept too long in the morning, considering the multitude of those affairs which he had daily to dispatch, answered that he might safely sleep so long as his lieutenant Antipater was awake : so, in like manner, may we rest at our ease so long as the heavenly eye of the providence of God, which seeth all things, is open, and careful to guide us and our affairs whensoever we commit them into His hand.

Rom. viii. 28.

6. As God's providence doth first work and bring to pass good things ; secondly, it permitteth evil things to be done ; but then, thirdly, it directeth and ordereth all things, both good and bad, for His own glory and to the salvation of His children : so God turned Adam's fall to the manifesting of His own glory and to Adam's good, for by this means had Adam experience of God's great and infinite mercy, and might say, "By this I know that Thou favourest me, because Thou forgavest me, and didst not suffer the devil to triumph against me." So all the slips and falls of God's children are turned to their good, inasmuch as by them they are made more fearful of sin and more watchful over their ways, as the child is fearful of the candle when it hath once burnt its finger in the flame.

Ps. xli. 11.

Prudence and providence in worldly affairs.

As, in times past, it did suffice if men were not hurt or annoyed by brute and wild beasts, but afterwards men so used them for their gain and commodity as to be covered with their skins, to feed on their flesh, and to be healed with their gall or inward parts : so ought we not only to beware lest our enemy do hurt us, but also to use him for our utility and profit.

Eternal Punishment.

As there is no comparison betwixt the painted fire and the true fire : so there is none betwixt the punishments of this present life and those to come ; for the torments of the life to come are eternal, and therefore unspeakable.

Men long escaping Punishment a hindrance that many do not repent.

As an old thief that hath stolen for a long time, and escaped both prison and gallows, is animated and encouraged more boldly to proceed in his wickedness, thinking he shall always so escape : so many filthy and loose livers go forward in their abominations without repentance, thinking that, because God doth not incontinently punish them, and show some manifest judgment and sign of his wrath upon them, therefore they shall be acquitted altogether ; whereas, contrariwise, if God should by-and-by strike them down as soon as they had sinned, by thundering upon one, and lightning upon another, and raining fire and brimstone upon a third, it would make them afraid.

Pure mind.

As the sun is not defiled by shining upon a puddle or dunghill, but doth rather dry up and drive away the stink : even so a pure and chaste mind striveth against the uncleanness of the world and overcometh it, but is not defiled itself.

Purity of soul and body necessary to entertain God offering to dwell with us.

1. LIKE as, if a man were certified that a prince would come to his house, he would dress it up and have all things in good order as might be : even so much more we ought endeavour to purify and cleanse our souls and bodies from all sin, that they may be fit temples for the entertainment of the Holy Ghost, whom Christ Jesus hath sent to be our Comforter.

1 Cor. vi. 9.
John xiv. 16 ;
xvi. 7.

2. As the Shunammite was careful to entertain the man of God, Elisha, for she said to her husband, " Let us make him a little chamber, I pray thee, upon the wall, and let us set him there a bed, a stool, a table, and a candlestick " : so, likewise, much more careful ought we be to entertain God Himself, who is content to come and dwell with us, and therefore we must adorn our bodies and souls with grace, that He may lodge and sup and dine with us, as He hath promised ; but, on the contrary, if we defile our bodies with sin, we banish the Holy Ghost out of our hearts and invite the devil to dwell in us.

2 Kings iv. 10.
Rev. iii. 20.

Curious Questions to be avoided.

1. As it is sufficient for one that would be heated or warmed by the fire that he stand near it, for if he put his hand into it he shall surely be burned : so they who presumptuously dispute and question about God, future punishments, &c., and rashly rush beyond what the Word revealeth, fall into blasphemy and into danger of hell-fire.

2. As a boisterous noise or hideous sound grieveth the hearing, as over-abundance of meat annoyeth the stomach, as grievous burthens be wearisome to the bearer, as continual rain hurteth the earth, and as overmuch of any thing is noisome and hurtful : so do difficult questions quickly overcharge weak and mean wits.

Rage.

As a fire, being kindled but with a small spark, worketh oftentimes great hurt and damage, because the fierceness thereof was not at first abated : so anger, being harboured in the heart, breaketh forth oftentimes into much cruelty.

Rashness to be eschewed, especially of the godly.

1. As he is soonest wearied that knoweth not how far his journey is : so he who knoweth not the estate and manner of his business beforehand worketh with tediousness, and repentance overtaketh him.

2. As the enemy lying near the walls is the cause why the city doth watch and take diligent heed : so, when your enemy diligently watcheth and marketh you, then will you do nothing rash or void of reason.

Reading of authors.

1. EVEN as amongst healthful and medicinable herbs springeth forth some weeds unprofitable and venomous, but the herbs meet for medicines the wise physician only doth gather : so, in reading of authors, although there be some things contained in them not only unprofitable, but also wicked, yet it is the part of good students not to neglect them, but rather to collect such sentences and doctrines as may be profitable for them.

2. As dastard and cowardly dogs do bark at home at the skin of the wild beast, but in hunting they will not come near the same : so some students will proudly prate of things vain and foolish, but the fruits of learning they will not labour for.

Reading of books.

1. As they who be thirsty do first drink, and at leisure afterward behold the fashion of the cup, if it be engraven or be marked : so ought we to read, first, things that be most profitable, and then, if leisure will serve us, we may note and consider things elegant and trim.

2. As it is more profitable often and moderately to dung the ground than to lay on much at one time : so is it more useful to read with moderateness daily than greedily to read much at one time.

3. As a drop of water pierceth a stone not so much by strength as by often falling : even so a man may become wise and learned, not so much by his force, or by himself only, as by his diligent and often reading.

Reading of the Scripture or Word.

As he who knoweth his letters perfectly and can spell cannot but read if he be diligent ; and as he who hath clear eyes, without impediment or let, and walketh thereto in the light and in open day, cannot but see, if he attend and take heed : even so a man, having the profession of his baptism only written in his heart, and feeling it sealed in his conscience by the Holy Ghost, cannot but understand the reading of the Scripture, because he exerciseth himself therein, comparing one place with another, and marking the manner of speech, and asking here and there the meaning of a sentence of them that be better exercised than himself, for he feeleth in his heart, and hath a sensible experience of that inwardly, which the Spirit of God hath delivered in the Scriptures, so that he findeth his own feeling as a good commentary unto Him.

Reading of the Word.

1. LIKE as the busy bee, when she flieth into some fair and pleasant garden, and lighteth sometimes here and sometimes there, as it falleth out, sucketh some sweetness out of every flower and herb whereon she sitteth: even so a Christian, looking into the volume of the sacred Scriptures, and reading sometimes this parcel thereof and sometimes that, shall receive by every book therein some comfort and profit as will cause him to prefer the same before the honey and the honeycomb.

1 Tim. iv. 13-16.
Ps. xlix. 8-10;
cxix. 72, 103, 104.

2. As the use of meats is not sufficient to the nourishment of man's body, except they be dressed and prepared: even so the hearing of the Word of God read is not sufficient to bring men to sound knowledge and salvation, except the same be preached and rightly divided.

Amos viii. 11.

Reading is not preaching.

1. As the smell or sight of meat doth good to the hungry man, but it will not feed him, except he taste of it: so, by reading of the Scriptures, men may have some smell and sight of religion, but they shall never thoroughly taste of it without preaching.

2. As meat that is raw and fat may be called good, but it is not to be eaten before it be made ready and dressed: so are the Scriptures read good, holy, and pure, but not sufficient food for the people without preaching.

3. As is a whole loaf set or cast before children who want strength to cut it: even so is reading without preaching, which, indeed, is a right cutting and dividing of the bread of life, that every one may have his several portion.

2 Tim. ii. 15.

4. Like as, if one should offer good treasures to his friend which yet were hid, shut up, fast locked, and could not be come by, in thus doing he would mock his friend: even so is bare reading without preaching, because preaching is an opening of the treasures of Divine Truth, to the joy of God's children.

5. As fire covered with ashes doth little or nothing heat or profit them that stand by it: even so bare reading doth little avail to the people without preaching, for preaching is an explaining and discovering of hard and dark places.

6. Like as, if the husbandman should cast whole strikes and bushels of corn on his land together in heaps, he should both lose his labour and his seed: even so that minister who only readeth the Scriptures in the church and preacheth not doth lose his labour and deceiveth his auditory.

7. As that fisher catcheth no fish who shuffleth his nets in heaps, and doth not open them: even so that minister who contenteth himself with the simple reading of the Scriptures in the congregation winneth no souls to God.

The Real presence.

1. LIKE as, when a word is uttered, the sound comes to the ear, and, at the same instant, the thing signified comes to the mind, and thus, by relation, the word and the thing spoken of are both present together: even so, at the Lord's table, bread and wine must not be considered barely as substances and creatures, but as outward signs in relation to the body and blood of Christ; and this relation, arising from the very institution of the Sacrament, stands in this, that when the elements of bread and wine are present to the hand and mouth of the receiver, at the very same time the body and blood of Christ are presented to the mind—thus, and no otherwise, is Christ truly present with the signs.

2. As one candle is lighted by another, and one torch or candle-light is conveyed to twenty candles: even so the inherent righteousness of every believer is derived from the storehouse of righteousness, which is the manhood of Christ: for the righteousness of all the members is but the fruit thereof, even as the natural corruption in all mankind is but a fruit of that original sin which was in Adam.

Reason.

As, if the sun were not or did not shine, all our life would be led in night and darkness: so, if reason were not or did not manifest itself, all our senses would be no better than those of brute beasts.

No Reason for a man to find fault with another who is more faulty himself.

Matt. vii. 5.
Ps. i. 16, 17.

1. As it is against reason that a blind man should take upon him to lead another man who sees: even so it is an unreasonable and impudent thing for any man to offer to pull a mote out of his neighbour's eye when there is more need that his neighbour should say unto him, "Nay, rather suffer me to pull out the beam that is in your eye."

Matt. xxvi. 27.

2. It is a very usual thing with Papists to condemn as a great fault in Protestants leaving off any of their popish ceremonies: yet they account it no fault in themselves to cut off and defraud their people of the cup in the ministration of the Lord's Supper, which Christ our Saviour Himself hath commanded to be taken and drunk of by all.

Deut. iv. 2; xii. 32.
Prov. xxx. 6.
Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

3. Papists cry out against us for not prescribing and reprovng in all points according to their writings and determinations: yet they themselves refuse to subscribe to and allow the universal authority of the Word of God—yea, even adding and taking from it at their pleasure.

4. Like as it is too common in all sorts of men that have great beams in their own eyes, whereof they make no conscience, to be marvellously curious and careful in drawing motes out of the eyes of others: even so he that of all the rest in the parish is the worst observer, either of God's law or his prince's, will be most ready to find fault and to quarrel with painful (laborious) and faithful ministers for omitting the least rite or ceremony, as though he, of all others, were the most desirous that the king's proceedings should exactly be followed, whereas, in very deed, he could find in his heart rather to have Popery fully established.

Rebuke.

As physicians with their bitter drugs do mingle sweet spices, that the sick patient may the more willingly receive them: so ought bitter rebukes to be mingled with gentle admonitions, that the offender might be the better brought to amendment.

Recreation.

As the land which is sown but every other year is all the more fertile for the rest it enjoys the year it lies fallow : so quick wit and daily studies do sometimes desire recreation and rest, wherewith they be much refreshed again.

The Redemption of Christ universal.

1. As the sun is the general giver of light to the whole world, although there be many who do receive no light at all of it ; or as there was among the Jews, upon the year of jubilee, a general delivery of all bond men, although many abode still in their bondage and refused the grace of their delivery : even so the redemption of mankind by Christ is available for all, although reprobate and wicked men, for want of the grace of God, do not receive the same ; yet there is no reason that it should lose its title and glory of universal redemption because of the children of perdition, seeing that it is ready for all men and all be called unto it.

1 Tim. ii. 6.
Col. i. 13, 14.
1 Pet. i. 18.
Tit. ii. 14.

2. As they who, being taken in war, are wont either to be slain or to be condemned unto perpetual bondage, except they be redeemed and ransomed : even so such were we all, being taken prisoners of the devil, who had us body and soul in his own power, from whose kingdom and tyranny Christ hath most mercifully redeemed us.

Rom. xiv. 8.
1 Cor. iii. 23.
Phil. i. 21.
1 Pet. i. 18, 19, 22.
9.

Reformation.

As elecampane, being green, hath in it a superfluous moisture, which must be first consumed before it be occupied about the body : so many men have a superfluity of evil, which must be first reformed before they be employed in matters of the Church.

Refusing the means.

1. As we see many sick men, sometimes, not so much grieved for the sickness itself as for that they have willingly neglected the means which might have preserved their health, or else for that they have abused the physic which might have restored their health to them again : even so, in like manner, it fareth with those who have either irreverently refused the means which should have kept their souls from surfeiting, or else unthankfully have abused those helps which might have recovered them again.

2. As a rich man is sometimes humbled for not giving money to the poor which he might have done : so, likewise, some are much grieved for not using their good gifts to the benefit of God's Church ; and others, also, are troubled for abusing their gifts to the hurt of God's Church.

A Regenerate man falleth not finally.

1. As with a man in travelling from Berwick to London, it may be that now and then he doth go amiss and out of his way, but he speedily returns to the way again, and his course generally shall be right : even so it is the property of the regenerate man to walk according to the Spirit, which does not mean now and then to make a step forward, but to keep his ordinary course in the way of godliness.

Rom. viii. 1.
1 John v. 19.

2. As it is the practice of a sick man, who, having recovered of some grievous sickness, walks a turn or two about his chamber, to say, "Ah ! I would fain walk up and down, but

Rom. vii. 15, &c.

I cannot!" meaning that he cannot walk as he would, being soon wearied through faintness; or as a soldier that, with a blow, hath his brain-pan cracked and lies grovelling, astonished, not able to fight; or like him that hath a fit of the falling sickness, who for a time lies like a dead man: even so the regenerate man, although the flesh for a time vanquisheth and subdueth the spirit, not only in thoughts, in inward motions, and in some particular offences, but also in the general practice of his duty or calling, and through the whole course of his life, yet the spirit prevails in the end and getteth the mastery.

2 Kings xxiii. 25.

3. Like as a prisoner who has gotten out of the jail, that he might escape the hand of the keeper, desires and strives with all his heart to run a hundred miles in a day, but, because he hath strait and weighty bolts on his legs, cannot for his life creep past a mile or twain, and that only by chafing his flesh and tormenting himself: even so a regenerate man, the servant of God, doth heartily desire and endeavour to obey God in all His commandments; as it is said of King Josiah, "That he turned to God with all his heart, with all his soul, with all his might, according to all the laws of Moses," &c.; yet, because he is clogged with the bolts of the flesh, he performs obedience both slowly and weakly, and with divers slips and falls.

Regeneration.

1 Tim. i. 9.
Rev. vi. 14.

1. As there is need of no law to compel the body to eat or drink, to digest, to sleep, to go, to stand, to sit, or to do the works of nature, for it is ready to do them of itself when the case so requireth and when it is meet, without respect either of reward or punishment, and may not unjustly be said, as concerning these things, not to be under a law: even so, after the same sort altogether, doth the godly man behave himself concerning the works of godliness. He is carried to the doing of them by his new nature, which is of the Spirit, albeit there were no law at all, and all, both hope of reward and fear of punishment, were taken away.

Rom. viii. 14.
Gal. v. 17.

2. Like as, if a man have all his mind set upon drinking and swilling of wine and strong drink, having little delight or pleasure in anything else, it argues a carnal mind and unregenerate, because it affects the things of the flesh, and so of all the rest: even so, on the contrary, he that hath his mind affected with a desire to do the will of God, in practising the works of charity and religion, he, I say, hath a spiritual and a renewed heart, and is regenerate by the Holy Ghost.

John iii. 5.
Matt. xvi. 17.
John viii. 36; xv. 5.

3. As God, in the beginning, created us after His own image: so, also, must He regenerate us according to the same, which He doth by the Holy Ghost, the Third Person in Trinity, one and the same everlasting God together with the Father and the Son.

4. As a living body, although naturally it be the subject of sense, yet some one part of it may be benumbed and senseless: so the soul of one regenerate person hath in it at least the beginnings and seeds of all graces, howsoever some of them sometimes do not work or appear; whereas a carnal man is altogether destitute, yea, incapable of them.

5. Even as we know that the trees have heat and life in their roots in the midst of the coldest and sharpest winter; yea, as many beasts lie all the winter long in holes of the earth without eating, drinking, stirring, or having any jot of heat, sense, or life, in any of their outward parts, and yet there is a remnant of life and heat lurking in their heart, which, being in summer stirred up, doth revive the beast, so that it is able to go or run up and down, and to perform all natural actions in the manner as it did before: so, likewise, a total decrease or an utter decay of holiness, whereby nothing is left, cannot happen to any one who is truly regenerate, and in whom, in the greatest extremity and depth of his fall, remaineth some relics of God's Spirit and of grace received—yea, some life of faith—whereby he liveth to God in Christ, however, to the eyes of all men, and even in his own conscience, he may appear a dead and rotten stock.

6. Even as a man, being suddenly taken with the plague or any infectious sickness, saith he knoweth not how it happeneth, only he seeth the effects of it: even so the action of regeneration in itself is secret and unknown, but manifest in the effects which follow it.

Regeneration increaseth by degrees.

1. As seed cast into the earth doth not immediately sprout, increase, and come to maturity, but by space and length of time it attaineth to perfection and ripeness in that season that God hath appointed; as a tree, likewise, is not perfect as soon as it is planted; nor an infant upon the sudden, as soon as it is conceived in the womb of its mother, becometh a man, but with time: even so we are not at the first dash regenerated; but this regeneration riseth by degrees, and, being once begun, then it proceedeth fair and softly, and by little and little increaseth every day till we come to everlasting life in the heavens.

2. Even as that beggar who hath but a patched or an overworn robe had ever need to be careful in piecing and mending the same, lest otherwise his nakedness appear unto all: so, surely, this regeneration or righteousness of ours, being in respect of ourselves but a torn and tattered robe, we had need every hour to labour and exercise ourselves in the repairing thereof, lest our filthiness should break forth, and even to sigh and groan until we be clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven.

2 Cor. v. 3.
Rev. iii. 18; xvi.
15.

Regeneration necessary in all men.

As trees growing on the tops of hills have a rough bark, crooked knots, long boughs, and therefore unmeet for any building until they be cut down, peeled, squared, drawn home, and yet can do nothing of all these themselves: so, likewise, as long as we be wandering in the mountains and wild woods of this world, being highly-minded and in great wealth and authority above others, as on a hill, we, by nature, have froward and proud minds, and not meet for God's house, until we be made lowly in our own sight, and fall flat down at Christ's feet, and having the rough bark of our old Adam pulled off, and our crooked affections cut away, be mortified, and drawn home by the preaching of His Word and the working of His Holy Spirit.

Hag. i. 8.
2 Cor. iii. 5.
John vi. 44.

Regeneration not without sin.

LIKE as the Israelites suffered the Jebusites to dwell amongst them, to their great harm: even so sin remaineth in our mortal bodies, conquered indeed, that it doth not reign over those that serve the Lord, yet not clean taken away, but left to exercise us spiritually. Having our mortal enemy dwelling in us, we should fight against sin under the banner of faith in Christ Jesus, who only hath, can, and will continually defend His people, subdue their enemies, and give His children the victory.

The Register of our salvation.

As the pen of a man serveth to commit to writing those things whereof he would have the remembrance continued: so the Holy Ghost registereth in the hearts of the children of God those things which God seeth necessary for their salvation to be recorded in them.

2 Cor. xii. 3.

To Relieve the poor.

Lukes xvi. 1, 2, &c.

1. As he that gathereth up the queen's rents, if he bestow them not in that good manner that he is appointed to, but wasteth and spendeth them riotously, shall be sure to suffer due punishment for so doing: even so, likewise, he to whom God hath given riches and great wealth for the relief of his poor brethren, if he neglect them and spend his goods lasciviously on his back or belly, or other ways, God will punish him most severely at the day of his account.

2. As the clouds that are full pour out rain: even so the rich that have abundance ought to distribute.

Religion.

LIKE as, in labour or work, he that hath begun last ought with the more diligence to redress his slackness and recompense his late coming: so he who lately began to profess and embrace religion, virtue, or godliness, ought with the more ferventness and zeal to endeavour to attain the same.

Our Religion is not new.

Acts xvii. 18.

As a man, in travelling, calleth it a new way which he never went before, though the way itself be of long continuance and known of old: even so may this our way and doctrine be well called a new religion, not as though it were not before Popery, which the Papists count so old, and yet is not, but because that men, through the misty clouds of their errors and abuses, neither so generally nor so perfectly did know or trace it before.

Where Religion is not, there is no wisdom.

1. As one eye of the body so assisteth the other for the making perfect of our sight together, that, having the use of both, we attain thereunto; and, otherwise, the one being blinded, the light of the other is somewhat dimmed and shadowed, and perhaps, in the end, fadeth away and leaveth us altogether in darkness: even so standeth the case between religion and wisdom, the lights of the soul. They are linked and placed together in the mind of man, as the eyes thereof, to give light to his whole understanding; so that no wisdom is to be allowed without true religion, and where religion is not there is no wisdom.

2. As we account him rather blind or blinking who shall say he hath eyes sound, pure, and perfect, and yet in the open day will never show use of them in the presence of men, but continually be wimpled and wear a veil, so that no man can perceive whether he do see or no: even so what is called wisdom is no wisdom, and not to be accounted of in any, so long as it is dissembled and not employed, that other men may see good proof thereof; for that religion is no religion that showeth not itself by its plentiful fruits: so that whatsoever choice they that seem wisest or holiest make of religion, if they do it so that other men shall not be able to discern it in them nor to be witnesses thereof, they are indeed to be esteemed neither wise nor religious.

3. As the sun, which hath his globe, his light, and his heat, which are so conjoined, that wheresoever the one shineth the other cannot but warm; or as the soul and body are so compact in one, that the body cannot but perform the pleasures of the soul: even so in whomsoever true righteousness in Christ is, in him also there cannot but be true religion, the true fear of God and holiness of life, which is the singular serving of God in the inward desire of the heart unfeignedly.

Luke i. 6.
Ps. cxvi. 10.
Acts iv. 20.
Jer. xx. 9.

A Remnant reserved.

As in the time of gathering of olives a few berries escape here and there ungathered : so, when God doth bring general destruction upon any land, for the impiety of the people therein, and for the contempt of His Word and ordinances, a few here and there shall escape.

Isa. xvii. 6 xxiv. 13.

A Remnant saved.

1. As a number of things would yearly decay and come to nought, except seeds of them werè saved, whereof they are by sowing renewed: even so the people that bear God's name upon earth should, in the day of visitation of their sins, be clean and utterly destroyed, as Sodom and Gomorrah, but that God spareth some remnant to be, as it were, a seed, for the increasing of His Church and people again.

Rom. ix. 29.

2. As great and mighty vapours, with the force and power of the sun, are taken and lifted up from the earth and do seek after the sun, by whose strength and virtue they are carried up on high, and, growing into clouds, do even follow the sun: so there is a remnant and a little flock of Christ's that, in a true and unfeigned and sincere love of God, are lifted up from the love of the world and from all earthly and fleshly affection, so far as is possible for a man in this life to be, and do seek the Lord and His kingdom in the singleness of their hearts; and thinking the time of their abode here in this vale of all miseries too long, they daily sigh and groan for dissolution and for the coming of Christ, to judge the quick and the dead.

Isa. lx. 8, 9.

Remission of sin.

As it is meet and needful that the inferior seek to the superior, the beggar to him that is rich and liberal, the sick man to the physician, the offendant to the merciful prince: so it is the duty of a man to seek for remission of sin, for spiritual life, health, and wealth, at the hands of God, the only Giver of all good things.

Matt. vi. 5; xl. 28.

Remitting of trespasses.

LIKE as, if we see one eat or drink a good deal, we say he was hungry or thirsty, because we see him eat or drink so much or so greedily; so do we say that one is hot, because we see him sweat, yet do we not say that his eating or drinking is the conditional cause of his hunger or thirst, nor yet the sweat the cause of his heat; but, contrariwise, we say hunger, thirst, and heat are the cause of eating, drinking, and sweat: even so the turning from iniquity and remitting of trespasses are not the causes of forgiveness of our sins, but the fruits thereof and trial of our estate.

Ezek. xviii. 21.
Matt. vi. 14.

The Renewed happiness of man.

EVEN as when Saul turned his back to go away from Samuel, God changed him and gave him another heart, and made him another man: even so doth God, by changing the minds and wills of His elect so secretly, that they themselves know not which way it is done, make them new men and prepare them for His everlasting kingdom.

1 Sam. x. 9.

Renewed holiness.

As in the natural birth of a man, his body cometh into the world not so great and strong as afterwards it becometh, but little, weak, and impotent: so, in the spiritual birth of regeneration, the soul of man is not in the first moment endued with perfection, but with a small measure of renewed holiness, from the which it is to grow and go on forward to a perfect estate.

Some Repent to have eaten too much.

As many repent that they have spoken too much, but few that they have been too silent: so, likewise, it is true that many repent themselves that they have eaten too much, but no man sorroweth for his temperance and sobriety.

Repentance.

Rom vi. 4.
Gal. v. 24.
2 Tim. ii. 19.
Tit. ii. 11, &c.
Luke i. 75.
Eph. i. 4; ii. 10.
1 Pet. i. 15; iv.
17, 18.
Jer. xxv. 12.
Jonah i. 12.

1. LIKE as, if a nobleman's or gentleman's servant were, for committing of treason, felony, or murder, condemned and going to the place of execution, and his lord or master, of mere favour and good will, should not only, by suit to her majesty, procure a pardon for his life, and so deliver him from that villainous death which, for his offence, he had worthily deserved, but also should adopt him for his son and heir; should this fellow, after his deliverance, go and say, "I will now be idle and take my pleasure, and follow mine own fantasy, and never endeavour to please or pleasure my lord or master, but rather I will seek to hurt and displease him every way that I can!"—what shall we say in this case? Be not these most wicked and desperate words? And doth not such a fellow deserve most grievous punishments? Even so the like do they who, either by word or deed, say that "Christ hath redeemed us, and by His death hath purchased for us forgiveness of sins and righteousness, and hath delivered us from hell, and made us the sons of God and heirs of heaven, wherefore we will stand like idle persons, or rather do more wickedness and live as we list," &c. Christ our Saviour doubtless died not for such nor satisfied for their offences—no, nor yet merited heaven for them—to the end that they should spend their days in idleness, and heap sin upon sin, and become altogether wicked; but that they, seeing His great love and how greatly sin displeased Him, seeing He was willing to redeem them from sin, Satan, death, and hell, should no more commit sin, but love, honour, and obey Him, thank Him, put their trust in Him, and work virtuous and good works plenteously, not as bond-servants, to escape hell, for so much as Christ hath delivered them, neither yet thereby to win heaven, which He by His passion hath purchased for them, but as natural sons for the glory of God, moved thereto by motion of the Holy Ghost and by faith and love; for godly Christians do undoubtedly fear to sin so much more than the wicked doth, by how much more they know that God doth in this present life punish His legitimate children more than bastards.

2 Pet. i. 10.

2. Like as, for example, if an astrologer should tell an ambitious cardinal that he should be pope, although he did put an undoubted trust therein, yet, for all that, he would not be idle, but would use all means possible to attain and come to that dignity: even so the children of God, the surer they are that Christ hath redeemed them, so much the more they understand the great good will of God towards them, and therefore they are always forced more and more, by repentance and godly conversation of life, to make certain unto themselves the knowledge of their election and redemption in Christ.

Luke xix. 8; xxiii.
40-42.
Acts ii. 37; xix.
18, 19.

3. Like as a fire without heat or warmth is no true fire: so is it a clear matter that faith without repentance is no true faith.

4. As it is the nature of some cloth, if it be stained when it is wet, the stain will seem to be easily washed out, but, being dry, it will appear again : even so some men think that they have repented when they have done it in halves, and therefore they are to repent again, as those that break out of prison are brought thither again. Ps. li. 2.

5. As bleaching and whitening weareth the cloth : so a man must be worn before he can be clean washed by true repentance.

6. Like as, in an assurance or evidence, a man may leave out such words as be effectual in the conveyance to their great prejudice : even so sure it is that many things in repentance may be found out to a man's hindrance which were forgotten at the first. Ezra x. 2, &c.

7. As it is the nature of the children of God, in the reading of the Scriptures, to take all with them, not a piece only, but as well that which humbleth them as that which lifteth up : even so it is the part of them who will repent truly not to play the mice and rats, to nibble a little so much as maketh for them, but to take all, and not to leave out that which maketh against them.

8. Like as a man who has strayed far out of his way must turn quite back again the contrary way : so those who have strayed from the ways of godliness to the way of sin must, by unfeigned repentance, turn quite back again into the right way.

9. As it makes a glad father and delights him to have a child like himself, especially both in place and lineaments of body : even so more glad is God when one is spiritually born and showeth himself like unto God in all his actions by unfeigned repentance.

10. As dead men in their graves, although they be helped never so much, cannot rise from thence : even so men that are weak, being dead in trespasses and sins, can do nothing that may further their repentance or conversion, though they be helped never so. 2 Tim. ii. 15.

11. Like as, if a man build a house which doth cost him much labour and great charges, and, not having laid a sure foundation, when a tempest cometh his house doth fall, then will he be very sorry, and repent that he hath so unadvisedly bestowed his money and labour ; notwithstanding for all this his great sorrow and repentance, yet it cannot set up his house again which is fallen, but the ruin of the house only serveth to teach the owner more wit against another time, that, when he buildeth again, he may make a sure foundation : even so, though thou repent never so much, yet that cannot get remission for thy sins that are past, but thou must be pardoned only by the faith of Christ's blood ; nevertheless, it doth teach thee wit, and learneth thee to tame thy body and subdue it, and to cast a low foundation, that in time to come thou mayest the better resist the assaults of the devil, the world, and the flesh.

12. As the angels in heaven do rejoice over a man when he repenteth : so the devil is thoroughly imbrued with highest delights and, as it were, with most pleasant pleasures when he seeth men, specially those who have given their names unto Christ, to live without repentance.

13. As a prisoner will strive to get out of prison by all kinds of means he can, though he grate off some of his flesh : even so a man that is out of the favour of God must try, by all kinds of ways, to obtain it again, that if he cannot come to God's favour by one way, he may yet by another. Ps. li. 1, &c.

Deferring of Repentance.

1. LIKE as if a malefactor, for his punishment, should be appointed to carry every day a stick of wood to a heap, to burn him twenty years after : even so men, by deferring repentance, do treasure and heap up wrath against the day of wrath. Rom. ii. 4, 5.

2. The longer a man goes and continues in his sickness without any physic, the harder is the recovery : even so, the more the time is prolonged, the harder it is to repent ; for where the devil dwells long he will hardly be removed.

3. As the case is dangerous if a man fall into the relapse of an ague or any other strong disease, it may, peradventure, cost him his life, and the recovery will be very hard : even so it is very dangerous, after repentance for some grievous sin, to fall into the same again, for it is most difficult to come to repentance the second time.

John v. 14.
Luke xi. 26.

Repentance requireth confession.

1. As the beginning of health is the feeling and perceiving of the sickness : so the beginning of repentance is to acknowledge the offence.

2. As they are most hardly healed who in their sickness be void of all reason : so it is hard for them to repent and amend who will not acknowledge their own sin and wickedness.

3. Like as, when a man is sick, the first step to health is to know his disease : even so, to true repentance and salvation, the first step is to know the damnation due for our sins.

Repentant.

Hos. xiv. 6.

1. As the lily doth flourish and spring in the field or garden : so God doth make the repentant man, whose sins He forgiveth and pardoneth, to grow and flourish.

2 Cor. vii. 8.

2. As it is often needful, for the preservation of the bodily life, that the patient be by detraction of blood brought to a swoon, and so even to death's door : so, likewise, it is sometimes needful, for the spiritual life of the soul, that the repentant be by sorrow and fear cast down, even to the gates of hell, as one forlorn and in a most wretched state.

Eccles. xi. 6.

3. As the wise man exhorteth the good husbandman to be sowing his seed at all hours, times, and seasons, because he knoweth not whether this or that will prosper : so, likewise, a repentant must take all occasions of hearing God's Word, for he knoweth not but that God will, even at that time which he might have bestowed on worldly profits or pleasures, bestow His unspeakable blessing of regeneration upon him.

4. As that offendant is more likely to obtain mercy at the hands of his prince who standeth at his very gates in his presence, attending when he will beckon or call unto him, than he who, having addressed himself to come before the king, keepeth himself aloof far out of his sight : even so it is more likely that God will behold that repentant with the eye of mercy who is in His presence, hearkening to His voice and attending His pleasure, than he who is out of His sight and employed about other matters.

Reprobate.

Matt. vii. 7.
Gen. iv. 4.
Matt. xxvii. 5.

1. LIKE as a man upon a rack crieth and roareth out for very pain, yet cannot desire his tormentor to ease him of his pain : even so the reprobate, when he repenteth, he cannot come unto God and seek Him—he hath no power, no, not so much as once to desire to give one little sob for the remission of his sins ; if he would give all the world he cannot so much as give one rap at God's mercy-gate, that He may open to him.

2. Like as, if a man that, having made to himself a great burden to carry, should assay it on his back, and, for that it sat and lay uneasily and pressed him much, should cast it down again and put a great deal more unto it, and then begin to lift it again, but when he felt it more heavy than before he should fall into a great rage and add twice as much more to it, thereby to make it lighter : even so do the children of this world, who, finding it somewhat loathsome and unpleasant to resist one or two vices in the beginning, do defer their conversion and repentance, and do add twenty or forty more unto them, thinking to find the matter more easy afterward.

3. Like as a man, having tasted a good piece of wine, maketh show as if he would buy it, but, understanding the price, and not willing to give so much, he leaveth it there without buying or drinking of it any more : even so the reprobate, having tasted the heavenly things, finding them good and praising them exceedingly after they understand the price—that is, that they must renounce themselves and bear the cross of Christ, if they will go to take possession of the kingdom of heaven, which He hath purchased for them with His precious blood—they will none of it at this price, and so renounce these good things without drinking of or enjoying them. Heb. vi. 4.

4. As those that have their stomachs charged with evil humours cease not to eat sometimes for all that—yea, and to find taste in some good meats—but are constrained after, through the evil disposition of their stomach, to cast it up again and to vomit : so some reprobates, having within them an evil conscience, nevertheless, may taste the good heavenly gifts, but this evil conscience, not being able to agree with the true and sure faith of the heart, stoppeth it so that these gifts take no root to fructify to salvation, and hence, finally, they cast them off or let them wither and come to nothing. On the contrary, those who have faith are assured that though the graces of the Holy Ghost are often weak in them, and like fire covered with ashes and trees in the winter, yet can they never come to nought nor die, but rather they recover strength at the last, whereby they are certain to be and to continue the children of God and heirs of everlasting life.

5. As those whom God hath chosen before all time in time He calleth, and that of purpose, to Christ Jesus His Son, and those whom thus He calleth He justifieth, and that more and more, until that flesh and the corrupt affections thereof, being mortified, they attain to their glory : so, by the contrary, is the state of the reprobate. They are either left altogether in blindness, never called to the light and knowledge of God's free mercy, or, if they be called, they either do condemn it or else suddenly fall from the same, and so, abiding in their corruption, do still heap sin upon sin, till at the last, their measure being full, God executeth His most just judgment against their continual rebellion.

6. Like as assured trust of the mercy of God promised for Christ's sake following straightway the hatred of vice and sin, joined with full intent and purpose to live after the will of God, doth, so long as a man remain and continue therein, give assurance that He is the elect child of God : even so the love to live ungodlily, to wallow in all kinds of vice, and to lie still in impurity of life, declare to him that is such a one, for that same season, that he is nothing else than a reprobate, the child of wrath, cursed of God, hardened as was Pharaoh.

Reprobate and ungodly men often in the greatest prosperity.

As the butcher will suffer those beasts which he appoints to be killed to go where they list in his best pastures, and to break his hedges, that, in so doing, the sooner they be fat the sooner he may kill them : even so the Lord lets reprobate and ungodly men, whom He loves not in His Son Christ, take their pleasure, corrects them not for their amendment, but lets them work their just condemnation in giving them up to their own lusts, and into a reprobate sense, as He did Pharaoh, Saul, Judas, Herod, Antiochus, Nero, &c.

Reprobates are in perpetual remembrance.

Jer. xvii. 1.

As the letters carved in stone or other hard metals with tools of iron and steel are wont to be set up for a perpetual memory of that which man will have remembered : so God never putteth out of memory the froward sins of obstinate and wicked men.

The portion of Reprobates.

Ezek. xv. 2, &c.

LIKE as of the shreds of the vine cometh no profit, neither can they serve for any other use but for the fire : so those whom God cutteth and casteth off from His Church can serve for no other end but for hell-fire.

*No Resistance against God.*Jer. xlviii. 40.
Lam. iv. 5-9.

LIKE as the eagle, when she hath taken her prey, standeth with her wings spread over it : even so those whom the Lord raiseth up to conquer any country and to destroy it spread themselves all over it, so that there is no hope in resisting nor refuge in running away.

Resurrection.

1. As a cunning goldsmith knoweth what difference there is betwixt a piece of earth digged out of a gold mine and other common earth, but ask an ignorant man, and he will say there is no difference at all betwixt them : even so, at the day of judgment, God will know the dust of men's bodies from common dust, which men cannot discern.

2. Like as, if a gardener mingle divers seeds together, and cast them into the ground, yet they will not be confounded one with another, but every seed will have its proper herb : even so the bodies of men, although they be mingled together, yet every body shall receive its own flesh at the general day of judgment.

3. Like as seed cast into the earth during the cold and storms of winter smally appeareth or not at all, but as soon as the spring cometh, it sprouteth forth and flourisheth, growing more and more until the harvest come, and then it recompenseth the husbandman's labour with plentiful increase : even so our bodies, though they fall as seed into the ground, are not neglected of God, who regardeth the smallest grain and vilest seed, but shall one day bring them out of the graves, where they were laid in a far better case than they were before.

4. As in winter time, by the nipping frost, the trees lose their leaves and the grass withereth, but at the spring they both receive that which they before seemed to have lost : so, likewise, though men die, each in his order, now one and then another, yet they perish not, but shall live again at the last day, when the everlasting spring shall be without either autumn or winter.

5. As God giveth life unto the infant enclosed in the mother's womb, and maintaineth the same after a secret and wonderful manner until the tenth month, when it can be there retained no longer, but must be brought forth into the world : even so God, in whose hand is life and death, keepeth us alive in the midst of death ; for the bodies which were cast into the earth, at the sound of the last unknown trumpet, living until then after a wonderful sort, shall arise, at which time the graves and every place where the bodies died shall yield up the dead that are in them, when they shall truly live and that for ever.

6. As the ashes in the night time so covereth the fire that no spark thereof nor any light appeareth in the house, but yet it may easily be kindled and revived by dry straw or a small match: even so our life, that cannot die, lieth as asleep in our mortified bodies, which God in His good time, by His mighty word and power, can and will awake.

7. Like as, in sleep (which is as death's kinsman), no part doth its duty—the eyes see not, the ear heareth nothing, we can neither feel nor walk, but every member is as dead, overwhelmed with sleep, whereas, in the meantime, the mind liveth and ever moveth, and, the next morning approaching, raiseth up the body, when every member and part performeth its wonted work, and more lively, refreshed by sleep: even so, though our carcases, being interred, seem to be deprived of all sense and motion, yet they perish not; but when the great and everlasting morning shall dawn upon them, at the end of the world, they shall rise again, and the earth shall yield them up far more glorious when God hath purged away the corruption and filthiness of them, as by the means of sleep.

8. As, in the law, by the offering of the first-fruits, all the fruits of the earth were sanctified: so, also, by Christ, the first-fruits of them that sleep, the promise of the rising again of our bodies to life everlasting is to us confirmed and assured.

Exod. xxiii. 16;
xxxiv. 26.
Lev. xxiii. 10.
Deut. xxi. 4, &c.
1 Cor. xv. 20.
Col. i. 18.
Rev. i. 5.

9. Like as it would make glad the heart of a lame man or cripple to hear that all his limbs should be restored again perfectly as they were at the first; or as it would greatly rejoice the heart of a poor naked beggar to hear that he should be clothed with most precious garments of silk and gold: even so much more ought all Christians to be joyful and glad to hear that they shall be restored to all integrity of body and soul at the general resurrection, and so be clothed with most perfect and pure innocence of life for ever and ever.

10. As herbs, dead in winter, flourish again by the rain in the spring time: so the dead corpses that lie in the dust shall rise up to joy when they shall feel the dew of God's grace.

Isa. xxvi. 19.

11. As the same seed in substance that is sown springeth again, yet altered in form and fashion: even so our bodies shall rise again, the same in substance, but marvellously altered in qualities.

1 Cor. xv. 37, 38.

12. As our bodies while we live continue the same, yet altered in form and fashion: even so, at the resurrection, our bodies shall rise again the same in substance, but marvellously altered in quality.

13. As often as we rise from sleep, having our weary limbs refreshed and, as it were, revived, so that we feel ourselves in better case and ability to do any manner of thing than before: even so we should often remember that death unto the godly is but a resting of their weary bodies and bones, till they rise again exceedingly bettered by immortality and glory, and is therefore termed (called) by the name of sleep.

1 Thes. iv. 15, 14.

14. So bright and so glorious as one star appeareth above another: so much shall the state and condition of our bodies, at their resurrection, excel the state and condition that they are now in during this time of mortality.

1 Cor. xv. 41.

15. Like as the husbandman taketh no thought nor sorrow for the seed that is cast into the earth, because he hath a sure trust and hope that it shall come again with a plentiful and exceeding recompense: even so the faithful are not so immeasurably heavy and sorrowful for the death of their faithful friends as the heathen and unfaithful are, who have no hope or belief of the resurrection.

Rev. xiv. 13.
2 Tim. ii. 13, 14.

16. Like as, if impotent and miserable men, as experience showeth, can by art even of ashes make the most curious workmanship of glass: even so we may in reason think that the omnipotent and everliving God is able to raise men's bodies out of the dust.

17. As the goldsmith, by his art, can sunder divers metals one from another, and some men out of one metal can draw another: even so much more may we think it possible for the Almighty God to raise men's bodies being dead and turned into dust, and mingled with the bodies of beasts and other creatures, or one man's body with another.

Acts i. 9.
1 Thess. iv. 17.

18. As the cloud took up the very true body of the Lord, yea, even the whole perfect Christ : so, likewise, shall all godly persons be taken up into the air to meet the Lord their God, that they may live with Christ their Lord and Head for evermore.

Isa. xxvi. 19.
1 Pet. iv. 6.

19. Like as the root giveth all virtue and sap unto the tree : even so is the matter of the resurrection of the dead through Christ the chiefest, greatest, and true principal point of the Word and affairs of God.

Matt. xxv. 41, &c.
2 Cor. v. 10.
Acts xxiv. 15.
John v. 29.

20. As the wicked and unbelievers have in this life with their bodies taken their own pleasures, joy, and delight : even so in the life to come, at the resurrection of the dead, they shall be plagued and punished with everlasting pain and torment in the same bodies.

1 Cor. xv. 36, 37.

21. Like as, when the corn is cast into the ground, it seemeth to be lost, for it rots and wasteth in the ground, but afterward it springeth fair : so, when the body hath been corrupted, it tarrieth the time appointed by God to come out of the earth and to be altogether perfect.

22. As the corn, by means of the seed, taketh again a new shape, and that more fair : so the faithful who die and go to rest with the seed of Jesus Christ, which is the Spirit of God, are raised again by the same Spirit which raised the Son of God from death.

23. Like as Christ rose again in the self-same body in which He suffered : so we, also, shall rise again in the self-same body which we carry about with us.

24. Even as Christ, after His resurrection, had another glory much greater than He had before : so we shall be far otherwise after our resurrection, and so renewed into a more glorious state.

25. As the sun and the moon, being of one substance, differ in dignity and excellency : so, likewise, in the resurrection, our bodies shall have more excellent qualities than they have now.

The Resurrection a woeful day to the unrepentant.

John v. 29.

1. If a man were bidden to go to bed, that, after he had slept and was risen again, he might go to execution, it would make his heart to ache within him : yet this—yea, a thousand-fold worse—is the state of all impenitent sinners. They must sleep in the grave for awhile and then rise again, that a second death may be inflicted upon them in body and soul, which is the suffering of the full wrath of God, both in body and soul, eternally.

2. Like as, if a traveller were to come into an inn, having but a penny in his purse, and, sitting down, call for all sorts of provisions and dainties, his behaviour and doing may be thought in the judgment of all men to be foolish and mad, because he spends so freely and hath no regard to the reckoning which must follow : even so much more foolish and mad is the practice of every man that liveth in his sins, and, bathing himself in his pleasures in this world, never bethinketh how he shall meet God at the last day of judgment, and there make a reckoning for all his doings.

Resurrection of all at the last day.

Isa. lxvi. 24.
Mark ix. 44.
Matt. xxv. 30, 46
John v. 28, 29.
Acts xxiv. 15.
2 Cor. v. 10.
Dan. xii. 3.
Rev. xx. 13.
2 Pet. ii. 4-6.

1. LIKE as, at the last day, the bodies of the righteous and faithful shall rise again unto immortality, glory, and honour, the greatness whereof the eye hath not seen nor the ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived : so the unrighteous and reprobate shall rise again with their very bodies unto everlasting shame, and both body and soul shall go into hell with the devil and his angels, there to abide everlastingly.

2. Like as the ungodly in this world have with their bodies taken their own pleasure, joy, and delight: even so, in the life to come, they shall be plagued and punished with everlasting pain and torments in the same bodies.

3. Like as when we see seed sown, although we know it will putrify and corrupt, we are yet in good hope that it will spring up again with fruit, for unless it be dissolved it cannot rise again: so, in like manner, we must hope of our own bodies. When we think of them being buried and fallen into corruption, we must then be most certainly persuaded that they shall rise again, for death doth not so much waste the body as the corruption of it.

1 Cor. xv. 1-4, &c.
John v. 28; xl. 24.
Acts xxiv. 15.

Resurrection of our bodies.

1. LIKE as the body of Christ, which He took in the Virgin's womb, was, by His almighty power, raised up again, immortal and glorious, all infirmities that it was subject unto being clean put away and taken off: even so these mortal bodies of ours, even the same that we took of the substance of our sinful and mortal mothers, shall, at the day of the general resurrection of all flesh, be raised up again according to the mighty working of the Lord, whereby He is of power to subdue all things unto Himself.

Isa. lxvi. 24.
Ezek. xxxvii. 1,
&c.
Dan. xii. 2.
Matt. xxv. 41.
John v. 29.
Job xix. 25.
John xi. 25.
1 Cor. xv. 1, &c.
2 Cor. v. 10.
1 Thess. iv. 13, &c.

2. As swallows, worms, and flies, which have lain dead in the winter season, in the spring, by virtue of the sun's heat, revive again: so, likewise, men fall into swoons and trances, being for a time without breath or show of life, and yet afterward come again; and so is the resurrection.

A Reward.

1. As a reward is given to a workman after his work is done: so everlasting life is given unto the faithful after the travails and miseries of our life are ended.

Rom. vi. 23.

2. As he who runneth a race must continue and run to the end, and then be crowned: even so must we continue to walk in good works unto the end, and then receive our reward—eternal life.

2 Tim. iv. 8.

Rich men.

1. As it is impossible for a camel to go through the eye of a needle: so, also, is it impossible for such a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven as is possessed of his possessions, for he hath made his gold his god, though he do not so think nor persuade himself.

Mark x. 24, 25.

2. As those fishermen who, when they had sped well, did go and burn incense and offer sacrifice to their nets instead of praising God, who had blessed their endeavours: so, likewise, some profane rich men do ascribe their wealth and other blessings of this life to the outward means and instruments, whereby they have gotten those things, forgetting wholly that God is the only Author and Giver thereof.

Hab. i. 16.
Ps cxxvii. 1, &c.
James i. 17.

3. Like as, if a cable be untwisted and drawn into small threads, it may be drawn through the eye of a needle: so, likewise, he that is rich, if he deny himself, abase himself, and lay aside all confidence in himself, in his riches and honour, and be, as it were, made small as a twine thread, and, with Joseph the good senator, become the disciple of Christ, he may enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Matt. xix. 24.
Luke xxiii. 50, 51.
John xix. 38.

4. As sheep that go in fat pastures come sooner to the slaughter-house than those which are kept upon the bare common: so, likewise, rich men, who are pampered with the wealth of this world, sooner forsake God, and therefore are sooner forsaken of God than others.

Rom. ix. 22.
Eccles. ix. 1.

5. As that is not always a good horse which hath his bridle and saddle adorned with gold : so, also, may not a rich man be accounted blessed because he hath rich attire, sumptuous buildings, and costly moveables.

6. Even as a fly, coming to a platterful of sweet and pleasant honey, if she thrust not herself altogether into it, but only touch and taste it with her mouth, and take no more than is necessary and needful, she may safely go away and fly to another place ; but if she wallow and tumble in the honey, then is she limed and taken in it, and whiles she is not able to fly away, she doth there lose her life : even so, if a man, of all his riches, take only so much as may sustain him and honestly maintain his estate, bestowing the rest well and Christianly, his riches then cannot hold him back, nor bar him out of the kingdom of heaven ; but if covetousness shall bewitch him, and still prick him forward to scrape together more and more, and shall make him even unsatiable, then they take him and hold him, and so belime the wings of his mind, that he cannot once in all his life have one flight towards the kingdom of heaven ; and thus, being in thralldom and bondage to wicked Mammon, the end of his pleasures in this world is the beginning of his sorrows in the world to come.

7. As Æsop's dog, who, having a piece of meat in his mouth, and espying the shadow thereof in the water, thinking it had been another piece of flesh, snatched at it, and, through his greedy desire, lost that which before he had : even so rich men, who might peaceably and quietly enjoy the goods they have, and with pleasure the fruits of their labours, by their covetous humour they deprive themselves wholly thereof, and setting before their eyes a fraudulent and deceitful hope of things that seem to be good, forget, for the most part, those things that are good indeed.

8. Like as, when we see a man that drinketh continually, and yet cannot slake his thirst, we conjecture forthwith that he is distempered, and that he hath more need to be purged and his body to be cleansed from corrupt humours than to give him more drink : even so the great desire of rich men, which always eateth, and hath a monstrous belly, and is unsatiable, like unto the grave, doth evidently declare that the mind is very sick, and therefore, to recover itself, it must be first purged and cleansed of the passion that tormenteth it ; this being done, the disease would immediately cease.

Mark x. 25.

9. As it is hard for a periwinkle in the sea to swim, or for a snail upon the land to creep, while they bear their houses upon their backs : even so it is hard for a rich man who trusteth in his riches, with all his big bunches of wealth upon his back, to go through the needle's eye, and to enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Luke viii. 14.
Acts xvii. 26.

10. As the moon, when she is at the full, is farthest from the sun, of whom she hath her light : so, likewise, many rich men, who do flow on every side with the goods and riches of this world, do even then, in the midst of their wealth, withdraw themselves farthest from God, from whom themselves and all their treasures are, and whatsoever hath a being.

11. As the moon is not eclipsed nor loseth any light but when it is at the full : even so some rich men are wont chiefly to be eclipsed and darkened concerning the love of God and their neighbours when they be full of riches and abound with worldly wealth.

12. As the fiercest lightning doth flash upon the highest towers, the fairest oaks come soonest to the fire, and the fattest oxen are first knocked down : even so they who have the most money are subject to the most miseries.

13. As poverty punisheth the poor man : so the rich cannot rest for fear of robbing.

Luke xix. 9.
Gal. vi. 10.

14. As the gouty man, the more he walketh abroad the better is his health : even so, the more the rich man distributeth abroad the more he shall inherit.

15. Like as a river, when it goeth by an empty place, it will not pass until it hath filled that empty place, and then it goeth forward to another empty place and filleth it, and so to another empty place and filleth it, always filling the places which are empty : so, likewise, should rich men fill the poor, the full should fill the hungry, they which abound should fill them which want; for the rich are but God's almoners, and their riches are committed to them of God, to distribute and do good, as God doth Himself.

Rich men are to live godlily as well as the poor.

As God alloweth the rich man nothing more to misuse or misspend than He doth the poor man, for he hath the same baptism, faith, Lord, God, and Father in heaven with him, and hopeth for the same kingdom that the poor man doth: even so hath he the same law given him to live after, and by the same shall be judged as well as the poor.

Riches.

1. As it is the custom to cut the wings of birds, lest they should fly far or away: so must riches be taken away from some as from children, and from others, lest they should exalt themselves overmuch in haughtiness.

2. As the golden bridle maketh the horse neither stronger nor swifter: so riches and costly apparel do nothing advance a man in virtue, learning, and godliness.

3. Like as we, beholding a rich man and a poor man painted on a wall, do neither enjoy the one nor despise the other, and why? because they be but shadows of the substances: even so our minds must never be troubled either for riches, poverty, glory, or ignominy, because they are more fickle and deceitful than any shadow.

4. As oil kindleth the fire which it seems to quench: even so riches come as though they would make a man contented, and yet they make him more covetous. 1 Tim. vi. 6.

5. Like as drink doth not quench the thirst of him that hath the dropsy, but maketh him the more thirsty: so, likewise, although riches be good to withstand need and poverty, yet they oftentimes cause men to be miserable and ever needy; and they that, for the most part, have abundance of goods and riches do covet and greedily desire to have more, and so show themselves to be very needy.

6. Like as they be in great danger of a woe and curse who do not give of their own riches to those that have need: even so in much more danger be they that take from the needy that which they did possess. Hab. ii. 9.

7. Like as if they shall go to hell that have not clothed the naked: even so much less shall they escape hell who, by oppression and unmerriful dealing, have caused them to go naked that were clothed. Matt. xxv. 41-43.

8. As he that walketh in the sun careth not whether the moon shine or no, because he hath no need of her light: even so, when a man hath found the heavenly riches, he careth not for earthly riches. Ps. xxxvii. 16.
1 Tim. vi. 6.

9. As the madman desireth nothing so much as to get water, by reason of his excessive distemperature, yet is there nothing that so much tormenteth him, for only the sight thereof is able to cast him into his fit: even so is it with riches. Every man longeth for them, yet are they the only things that increase his longing, trouble his mind, and replenish his heart with passions. Mark x. 23-25.

10. As those things which agree not with our nature, and have no proportion with it—as fire, sulphur, and such other things—if we should eat them, would not only not profit us, but would also hurt and kill us: so the deceitful riches of this world, too much desired and sought for—the pomp of honour, vain glory, and such like—after the which very many do run too earnestly, do not only not nourish the souls of men to eternal life, nor mitigate and appease the wicked lusts of the same, but also do bring upon them everlasting woe, with utter and endless destruction.

A Treasury, or

Ps. lxxii. 10.
1 Tim. vi. 17.

11. As he that walketh in the rain shall hardly escape wetting, or he that travelleth in the whole sun eschew heat : so is it almost impossible for a rich man to avoid vice and corruption by his riches.

12. As Bucephalus, the horse of Alexander the Great, so long as he was naked, would suffer any man to mount him, but if he were once furnished with the royal saddle, bridle, and other furniture, he grew so proud that no man might ride him but the king : even so many, who, in their poverty were modest, humble, and virtuous, by increase of wealth, have changed their virtues into vice.

1 Tim. vi. 17-19.

13. As those mountains that contain mines of gold and silver are otherwise barren : so they that have riches and veins of gold and silver are, for the most part, in their hearts, made unprofitable to the service of God and man.

14. As musical instruments are of no use to him that cannot play upon them : so are riches unprofitable to him that cannot use them rightly.

15. As a horse is of no use without the bridle : so are riches without reason.

Matt. vi. 19.

16. As fair tapestry covereth foul and broken walls : even so riches may well make a man more honourable in the sight of the world.

17. As rivers and floods, though they be most sweet and pleasant, yet, when they run and enter into the sea, they are most bitter ; keeping their right and due course, they yield pure and wholesome water, but once mingled with the sea, they are, as it were, poisoned with bitterness : even so the wealth and riches of this world, although in the course of this life they do highly delight some men who have them in possession, nevertheless, when they come to the sea of death, whither all floods and riches at the length shall come, they seem to be doleful, sour, bitter, intolerable, and, as it were, poison itself.

18. As riches be unto the ungodly and wicked hindrances of virtues : so, contrariwise, riches are to the faithful servants of God helps and furtherances of many good things, godly actions, and very charitable works ; so that riches of themselves are not evil, for godly men do possess their riches, be they never so ample and infinite, and are not possessed of their wealth and goods, because their riches are drudges to them, and not they to their riches.

19. Like as gold is tried with a touchstone : even so is man tried by having gold and much riches, which most easily bewrayeth what manner of man one is.

20. As feathers do lift up and carry on high the fowls and birds of the air : so riches and dignities of this world are wont to extol and carry men into the air and clouds of vanity.

21. Even as corn, laid up and kept in a barn, garner, or other place, doth not increase, yea, many times, is eaten and consumed of weevils and other vermin, but, being cast into the ground, doth bring forth plentiful fruit and great increase, and is very profitable for the owner : so riches, as gold, money, and other jewels, laid up in chests and kept in coffers, are oftentimes in danger of losing by thieves that may break through and steal them, or by fire that may consume them ; but, being dispersed and scattered among the poor and needy saints of God, they bring forth fruit a hundred-fold, and are very profitable both to the giver and to the receiver, discharging a good conscience in the one, and comforting the distressed body and mind of the other.

Ps. xli. ; exn. 9.

22. As pits and lakes of spring water, being stopped and polluted with mire, mud, or other foul and filthy matter, if they be scoured and drawn out, will flow with water that is pleasant, sweet, and wholesome, but, suffered and let alone, are corrupted and do stink : so riches and worldly substance, if they be distributed unto the poor and translated from them that have too much to those that are needy and have nothing, they do greatly increase and multiply ; for a very little is great riches to him that hath nothing, and to him that did bestow them they are instruments and means of God's blessing ; but, being coffered and lying still, so that the poor needy creatures are not relieved with them, they are unprofitable, and will breed the stink of hell and endless woe to those that so do keep them.

23. As the liquor in the pot profiteth not to itself, but them that draw and drink thereof : so worldly goods and riches oft profit not the keeper and owner thereof, but others that come after.

24. As they who are swollen with the dropsy afar off seem fat and to be in good liking, by reason of the abundance of the humours in their bodies, though that for this cause they be sore and dangerously diseased : so do we judge, by the outward appearance, that riches are very pleasant, and such as love and have them very happy, though that for the most part there be nothing more vile and filthy in their houses than themselves.

25. Even as a gold ring, as soon as it toucheth a gouty or diseased finger, causeth great and intolerable grief : so, likewise, riches, honours, pleasures, and profit of this world, do nothing else but molest and trouble our minds either with ambition or covetousness.

26. As an ape or monkey is tied and tethered to his clog : so, likewise, riches of themselves do encumber and entangle men's minds.

Riches and dignities make wicked men worse.

As great floods and swelling rivers, when they overflow their channels and do break through their banks, by reason of their raging and violent streams, and so spread and run abroad, cannot fill and cover the fields with water, but they hurt corn and grass, or what else is in their way : so great riches, mighty powers, and high dignities, when they grow and increase in wicked and ungodly men, do not spread abroad and run over the fields and limits of commonwealths, but they do much harm—to wit, they poll and pill away the riches and substance of the silly, weak, and poor men ; they fill their purses with the blood of innocents ; they build their houses and establish their dignities upon the disgrace and the oppression of the saints and servants of God, and whatsoever is in their way and to their liking, they carry it with them by hook or crook, by right or wrong ; they care not who weep so they laugh, who be empty so they be full, who be undone so they be advanced ; hence come slaughters and murders ;—thus are many brought into great calamities and miseries. But they who do these things to others do hurt themselves most ; for whilst they hurt others in their bodies, goods, or names, they kill their own souls.

Riches make covetous and prodigal men evil spoken of.

1. As we see that flies will stay no longer in a kitchen than there is grease to nourish them : so flatterers and clawbacks, fools and bawds, who are usually in the houses of prodigal men, as soon as their wealth begins to diminish and that they wax poor, they will then straightway give them over ; yea, if they be evil spoken of in their company, the same men, as well as others, will greatly blame them for that they wasted their goods so riotously and so foolishly.

2. Like as men do with springs, so long as they yield water so long they are haunted, but when they be once dry there is no further reckoning made of them : so flatterers and brainless persons, whose tongues are as light as their minds—such as for a morsel of bread or a meal's meat will praise or dispraise whom you will—if the party fall into poverty by prodigality, they will then cast him off and make no account of him.

Riches oftentimes draw men to extreme danger.

1. As, among a flock of sheep, the wolf chooseth out always the best and the fattest, and the eagle, likewise, taketh the fattest goose in the field : even so do those men that live by ruin and spoil. When they are minded to forage and purloin for themselves, they search out the richest and best houses, and those fields wherein there is the greatest store of corn.

2. As we do with sponges, which we squeeze and strain with our hands to make them yield us that water which they have before soaked up : so, also, princes and great men, when they have given their servants the means to wax wealthy, and that they have taken great pains to enrich themselves by a little at once, then afore they be aware, upon the sudden, they lay hold upon them and spoil them of that they have gathered.

Righteousness not in us.

Matt. vii. 17, 18 ;
xii. 33.
Ps. li. 7 ; lili. 2, 3.
Hos. ii. 3.
Luke xv. 18 ; xviii.
13, 14.
Rom. iii. 10-12.

1. As an evil tree cannot bring forth any good fruit, nor a rotten or worm-eaten seed engender anything but like itself : so we, for so much as our thoughts, our affections, our words, our actions, and generally our whole life and nature being examined, it shall be found that in us there is nothing but vanity and the very matter of death and damnation, and that we neither do nor can do anything that may be able to abide the righteous examination of the justice of God, but only to fly to Him for mercy.

• Luke xvi. 15.

2. As they that are sick of the dropsy, who, by reason of the grossness of their bodies, seem to be in good estate, notwithstanding they be full of nothing but water and evil humours, which in the end are the cause of death : even so such as are arrogant and presumptuous, and puffed up with a vain conceit of their own righteousness, though they be in great credit and reputation in the world, yet before God their state is miserable and abominable.

Isa. lxiv. 6.
Dan. ix. 5, &c.
Phil. iii. 8.

3. As merchants, who praise and esteem their wares and merchandise more than they are worth ; and as old images newly gilded over, which outwardly hath some glistening and show, but within are nothing but dust and dirt ; or as counterfeit money, which is nought, how goodly a print soever it hath : even so all our righteousness, virtues, and good works, when they shall be examined and prized by those who know them, as by the Spirit of God and His Word, they are judged as old rags, torn, tied together, and patched up again.

Jer. ix. 23.

4. Like as, if a man would boast of his strength and health, and yet were subject to a thousand diseases ; or of his knowledge, and yet were ignorant of all good learning ; or of his riches, and yet were indebted and endangered to the whole world, would not one mock him as an idiot and a fool ? Even so we as well show our ignorance, and what slender understanding we have, when we will attribute any righteousness to ourselves, and boast ourselves in it, be it never so little.

5. As the basest gold, though it be covered with some dirt, is always more precious than the brightest copper or lead that a man can find : even so the righteousness of a Christian man, though it be defiled through many infirmities and imperfections, yet, notwithstanding, is more to be esteemed than all the righteousness of hypocrites and infidels.

6. As there is no man so hard to be healed as he that thinketh himself to be whole, forasmuch as he always refuseth counsel of the physician, and will take no remedies, nor keep any good diet or government of himself, which should be meet and healthful for him : even so, likewise, there is no man farther off from the righteousness of God than he that hath some opinion of himself, for such, commonly, are obstinate, and cannot without great difficulty be brought from the persuasion which they have conceived of their own righteousness.

7. As new wine, with the strength of the working thereof, will break old bottles, so that, if it should be put into them, it would be but spilt and lost: even so they who have placed righteousness in the outward exercises of religion cannot savour, taste, or receive the doctrine of righteousness by faith only in Christ. Matt. ix. 17.

The Righteousness of Jesus Christ, which is one only, may be distributed to all the faithful.

1. As the soul of man is wholly throughout the whole body, and every part alike: even so is the righteousness of Jesus Christ wholly in the body of the whole Church as the soul to give it life and to maintain it, so that it is altogether in every one of the particular members to make them strong, whole, stout, and of courage to do all their offices and duties; or as the voice of a man, which, being heard of a great many persons, is in such sort received of every one of them, provided they be attentive, that the same is wholly understood without being divided or sundered in any respect; or even as the face of a man may be received in many glasses, and wholly represented to all, without any definition or separation of the same.

2. As an old, rotten, tattered garment cannot be comely pieced with new, whole, and sound cloth: even so they that plant and place their righteousness in fasting and other external exercises cannot admit that righteousness which cometh only and wholly by Christ. Matt. ix. 16.

3. As the Israelites were forbidden to clothe themselves with linen and woollen made in one garment: so, likewise, must all true Christians at this day put upon them the righteousness of Christ Jesus only, not mingling it with their own merits. Deut. xxii. 11.

4. As the sun, when he riseth, obscureth and darkeneth the lights of the skies, and dismisseth and scattereth them: even so the righteousness of faith, which, for Christ's sake, is imputed unto us, doth vanquish the darkness and, as it were, driveth away the night of the glory of men's works.

5. As the sin of Adam was the cause of condemnation unto eternal death; so, in like manner, the righteousness of Christ is the cause of justification unto eternal life. Rom. viii. 1, 2.

Righteousness, peace, &c.

As the earth, being fertile and fruitful, and beautified with the gallant verdure of fresh flowers and green herbs, is an argument of the bountiful goodness of God towards us: even so righteousness, peace, tranquillity, and other virtues, wherewith the mind and soul of man is garnished, declare the exceeding great goodness and love of God towards mankind. Isa. lxi. 10.
Gal. v. 22.

Sabbath.

1. LIKE as masters will be displeased with their servants if they spend their time idly which they should apply to their work: even so we may well think that the Lord will not be content with them who, when they should sanctify His Sabbath and do His work, either show themselves as slow-bellies therein or else altogether neglect the same, to serve their own voluptuousness.

2. As the scholar deserveth to be corrected and punished that playeth the truant and so absenteth himself from the school: even so, no doubt, the Lord will punish and be revenged of those that absent themselves, without just cause, from the congregation of His people.

2 Sam. xxiii. 15-17.
1 Chron. xi. 17-19.

3. David would not have his servants adventure their corporal lives for his provision, nor drink the water when they had provided it : even so much less ought Christians, for their meat's sake, to adventure their lives—that is, the souls—of their servants and cooks, in being absent from the holy exercises of the Lord's Sabbath.

4. Like as Christian masters would not be content to see their servants ploughing, carting, or working at their trades on the Sabbath-days, which yet to do is lawful on the six days, lest they should be accounted breakers both of God's laws and their prince's : even so much more ought they to be ashamed to behold and see their children or servants to profane the Lord's Sabbath by dicing, carding, foot-ball, or foot-ball playing, &c., which are more unlawful to be done on this day than working at their trades, but yet forbidden both by God's law and their prince's law.

5. As it is lawful on the Sabbath-day to pull and draw out a sheep or cattle out of a pit or ditch whereinto it is fallen, and wherein it would otherwise perish : even so much more is it lawful to do good and to relieve any kind of necessity of our neighbour the same day.

Deut. v. 12.
Exod. xx. 8.

6. As it is sin not to be careful of the Sabbath, that we might rest upon it : so it is greater sin not to observe it, that it might be a Sabbath unto the Lord by sanctifying it ; and if, for want of heedfulness, anything do compel us to work upon the day of rest, it is our sin in not marking the Sabbath-day : so, if, by our negligence, we cannot sanctify the day of rest unto the Lord, it is a greater sin, of not remembering to keep it holy, which is the first and greatest thing in this commandment.

Exod. xxiii. 12.
Deut. v. 14.

7. As the passover, though it were a sacrament only belonging unto the Jews, and the difference of meats and of clean and unclean things was proper unto them, yet the Lord would have the strangers that dwelt among them be subject to the same laws for the good of His people ; otherwise, He would not have them to have any dealings with them, for He threatneth to cut them off from His people, as appeareth in Exod. xii. 19, Lev. xvii. 12, 15 : even so, likewise, the Lord would have the holy Sabbath of rest without all interruptions and gainsaying, to be duly observed on all sides, when unto the particular commanding of all estates, by name, to rest, He hath adjoined the beasts and the strangers, upon whom He lays the like charge.

Exod. xxix. 44; xl. 13.
Lev. xxvii. 28-30.

8. As some things are called most holy unto the Lord because they are separated from the common use in which others of the same nature are employed, and may not be used but to the Lord's use : so the Sabbath-day, or day of rest, is sanctified and hallowed of us when we do not use it in the affairs of this life, from the which it must be separated, and from which upon it we must rest, but use and make that day proper unto itself, and to nothing principally but that.

Deut. vi. 8, 9.
Gal. iv. 8.

9. Even as the child who is set to read must name every letter apart and distinctly by itself and spell every syllable, that so he might be holpen forward in reading, which, when he hath attained unto, though still he be bound to read, yet he is freed from spelling and naming every letter as he had been wont to do, and which, to bind him unto it still, were a great bondage and wearisomeness—nay, it were altogether ridiculous and childish indeed : so now, though we be charged to rest upon the Sabbath, yet when we are not overcharged with those Jewish ceremonies which they, being children, had given them as furtherances unto them, let us not complain before we have cause, neither murmuring against God because we cannot be so licentious as we would seeing we be at such liberty as we enjoy and as it pleaseth the Lord to bestow upon us, and let us be so much the more careful to rest by how much we have, but this one thing to attend upon and are made free from many others which might hinder us.

10. As they preposterously labour to reform the Church who have no care to reform themselves, and, indiscreetly complaining of wants and disorders there, do not practise better order in their houses, upon themselves and theirs—such hinder reformation and keep it back : even so they that labour for more means to sanctify the Sabbath, and are careless in practising those that they have, do stay such good blessings as God might otherwise bestow upon His Church through those means.

The Sacraments.

1. As the great castle gillofer flowereth not till March and April, a year after their sowing, and mercury violets two years after their sowing : so the grace of God received in baptism doth not by-and-by show forth itself till some years after the infusion.

2. Even as the best medicines do most annoy unless they be rightly administered and received : so the unspeakable wholesome Sacraments of Christ, to the worthy receivers, are all health and life ; but to the unworthy, death and damnation.

3. As a seal is altogether unprofitable—yea, not allowed to be a seal—unless it be bound or set to some instrument or writing, for the confirmation thereof : even so the Sacraments are altogether unprofitable—yea, indeed, are no Sacraments—if they be not joined with the Word of God preached, to confirm the same unto us.

Matt. xxviii. 19.
1 Cor. xi. 26.

4. As they who come to hear the Gospel preached, and want faith, receive nothing but words, and the Gospel to them is no Gospel : even so they who come to receive the Sacraments without faith do, indeed, receive the symbols or signs, but they have not the fruit and the thing signified in the Sacraments.

5. As circumcision, which was a sacrament of the old law, was a seal in that time to our fathers of righteousness : even so be our Sacraments to us, in these days, seals of God's promises unto us, and all have one strength and virtue.

6. Like as the sun, which shineth well for all, but not to all : so it happeneth to those to whom the Sacraments are administered.

7. As there are none but those who have eyes and do open their eyes that receive the light of the sun, which it sheddeth forth to all, but, in the meantime, such as are blind or do shut their eyes do not receive it, for they have not the instrument, without which they cannot receive it : so standeth it between the faithful and the unfaithful in respect of the ministry of the Church, for it representeth unto all the benefits of God. And albeit that the wicked and faithless do not receive them at all, the same letteth (hindereth) not, but that the ministry hath always in itself its virtue. But, in the meanwhile, it is not ordained but to be exercised towards those for whom it was ordained, or otherwise it should not be a ministry, and by consequence should not have its virtue ; for where there is no faith in the heart, there the holy Sacraments or signs do no more profit the soul than the light or shining of the sun do those that are blind.

8. As a corrupt and withered branch which sticketh still fast to the tree, but, for all that, can receive no strength or life from the root or heart of the tree : even so the unfaithful, although they receive outwardly the bread and the wine of the ministers in the Supper of the Lord, yet they do not receive the fat or the inward strength and the treasures—to wit, the life and the Holy Ghost, or, to speak it in one word, the communion of the body and of the blood of Jesus Christ, no more than the corrupted or withered branch receiveth life and strength of the tree in the which it is dead, albeit for a time it cleaveth fast to it.

9. Even as it followeth not that, for so much as the withered branch can draw to itself no strength, nor receive life, that therefore it must needs be also that the sound branches can draw or receive no strength or life of the trunk or body of the tree, or that it doth not communicate its life unto those good and sound branches : even so it followeth not that the Sacraments be vain and bare signs because that the unfaithful cannot lay hold on life nor on that which is offered and sealed unto us by the same.

10. As the fault is not in the tree, but in the withered branches, that receive not from the tree a fatness or a juice: so no more is the fault in God, who offereth and presenteth to all men richly His gifts, that the unfaithful neither will nor can receive and embrace the same, because of their unfaithfulness, through the which they are dead in the body of the Christian Church, as oftentimes a branch doth starve in a good tree.

11. Like as the Scripture of God is an indenture betwixt Him and us, wherein is contained both the promises, grace, and mercy which God offereth to the world in His Son Christ, and also the conditions which He requires to be fulfilled on our behalf: so the Sacraments are the seals set to this indenture, to strengthen our faith that we do not doubt.

12. As it is not enough to write the conditions of a bargain in an indenture except it be sealed: even so God, for our weakness, thought it not sufficient to make us promise of blessings in writing in His Scriptures, but He would seal it with His own blood, and institute His Sacraments as seals and pledges of the same truth, to remain to be received of us in remembrance of Him, and strengthening of our faith, so that we may very conveniently say that Sacraments are as witnesses and solemn oaths, whereby we do, as it were, homage to God, and make profession of our faith and religion.

13. Like as in circumcision there meet four things—that is to say, the promise, the commandment, the sign, and the belief of the promise: so, likewise, in every sacrament, the same things must of necessity meet—namely, that a godly sacrament be a visible sign commanded and ordained by God, whereby, like as God beareth a record of His promise unto men, so man, accepting the sign, doth, on the other side, profess his faith toward God, and confirmeth the same with the use of the sign and by thinking upon it.

14. Like as, if a man would take the bush that hangeth at the tavern door, and should suck it for to slake his thirst, and would not go into the tavern where the wine is, he might be well accounted an idiot and a fool: even so, likewise, may he be reckoned a fool that, seeing the signs of the Sacraments were ordained by God, to be helps to nourish and plant faith in our hearts, and to confirm in us the promises of God, through ignorance thereof, as many do, should preposterously judge of the same, taking the signs for the thing itself.

15. As silver or gold, being not coined, is nothing else but silver or gold, but if, by her majesty's commandment, a new form or stamp be added by a print, it is made current money, which it was not before, although it be the very same substance which it was before; or as, if one take wax which is fastened to a writing or public instrument, it differeth not from other wax of itself, but only because of the use to the which it is appointed—that is to say, to serve for a testimony that the instrument is effectual and available, the which it hath not by nature, but by the ordinance of man: even so the signs of the Sacraments—to wit, water in baptism, and bread and wine in the Lord's Supper—although they be not changed concerning their substance, mean, quantity, or quality, but only in the use of them, and do differ from common water, bread, and wine only in that they are ordained of God to serve unto us as gages and pledges of those benefits which Christ, by His death and passion, hath purchased for us, yet are they ordained of God for an excellent covenant—namely, to represent unto us most great and excellent things. And albeit that this mutation here spoken of changeth not the substance of the signs, neither of bread, water, nor wine, but only the use of them, and is done and wrought by the Holy Ghost according to the ordinance of the good will of God, which is testified to us by that promise whereto the sign is joined, and not by the pronounciation of words, after the manner of sorcerers and charmers, but the promise is the soul of the sign: so, accordingly, the water, the bread, and the wine become sacraments—that is to say, true and veritable signs of those things which the Word promiseth, and which be presented by them; so that this alteration is only in the use thereof, for before and after the administration of the Sacrament it taketh no place, but only during the action and use to the which this change or mutation tendeth.

16. Like as the Word serveth to no purpose except it be so preached that it may be understood, and, further, except that which it declareth and representeth to us—that is to say, Jesus Christ with all His goodness—be received by the faith of those who hear it: even so, also, ought we to understand of the Sacraments. We must bring faith, which is the only means to receive that which is preached, represented, and offered to us in the Word; but, contrariwise, in despising the Sacraments by our incredulity, and rejecting that goodness which God offereth with the same to us, we seal our own condemnation.

17. Like as the Gospel ceaseth not of its own nature to be the Word of life and salvation, although the wicked, through their contempt, turn it into the savour of death and damnation: even so the Sacraments cease not to be true Sacraments, although they be either ministered by unworthy persons or received unworthily.

18. As the seed, how good soever it be, bringeth not forth fruit at the same instant that it is sown, but continueth a certain time in the earth: so it is not meet to restrain the fruit and virtue of the Word of God to the same hour that it is preached, or the Sacraments to the same instant that they be ministered, but the fruit shall be showed in the elect when it pleaseth God.

19. As water is not the water in baptism, nor a sign, nor consequently a Sacrament thereof, but only so far as it is joined with the Word of Jesus Christ, by the which it is dedicated and consecrated to that use, and so applied to those persons who are to be baptized according to His commandment: so the very like is of the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper, for they can no more be the signs thereof than the water of baptism, if, being joined together with the word of Jesus Christ, whereby they are dedicated and consecrated to this Sacrament, they be not given and distributed to those who should be partakers of the same, as doth appear by the express word of Jesus Christ, in that He saith of both the signs, "Take ye, and eat ye;" likewise, "Drink ye all of this;" for it is plain that these words may not be spoken either to the bread or to the wine, but only to the persons who might understand them and execute the commandment, for the bread and the wine can neither eat nor drink themselves.

Matt. xxviii. 19;
xxvi. 27.
Mark xiv. 22, 23.
Luke xxii. 19, 20.
1 Cor. xi. 24.

20. Like as loving and tender-hearted parents are not content to procure for their children costly possessions and livelihoods, but take order that the same may be conserved and come to their use: even so our Lord and Saviour thought it not sufficient to purchase for us His Father's favour again, which is the deep fountain of all goodness and eternal life, but also invented the ways most wisely (by the institution of his holy Sacraments) whereby the same might redound to our commodity (advantage) and profit.

21. Like as, of old time, God decreed His wondrous benefits in the deliverance of His people to be kept in memory by the eating of the Passover, with its rites and ceremonies: so our loving Saviour ordained and established the remembrance of His great mercy, expressed in His passion, in the institution of His heavenly Supper, where every one of us must be guests and not gazers, eaters and not lookers-on, feeding ourselves and not hiring others to feed for us, that we may live by our own meat, and not perish for hunger while others devour all.

Exod. xii. 1, &c

22. As of necessity we must be ourselves partakers of the Lord's Supper, and not mere beholders of others partaking: so we must address ourselves to frequent the Sacrament in a reverent and due manner, lest, like as physic provided for the body, being misused, more hurteth than profiteth, so this comfortable medicine of the soul, indecently received, should tend to our great harm and sorrow.

23. Like as the Supper of the Lord is spiritual meat, and sweet to those that be incorporated and made one body with Jesus Christ and with their neighbour: even so, of the contrary, it is a mortal poison to them who put not their whole trust in Jesus Christ and be separated from their neighbour.

24. As it is not enough for a child to be born, and that he have life by his parents who begot him, if that afterward they do not also nourish him, to conserve him, and to the end that he may grow and become tall and strong : even so God our Father doth not content Himself to have begotten us for His children in His Church by the incorruptible seed of His Word, and to have given us life in His Son Jesus Christ by the virtue of His Holy Spirit, but will also conserve and nourish us in the same by the right use of His holy Sacraments, and will make us to grow and wax strong, and will accomplish the work which He hath begun in us, and all this by His Son Jesus Christ.

25. As it is not enough that a shepherd do only gather his sheep into his fold or sheepp-cote, but also that he provide meat for them and pasture ; or as it is not sufficient that a master do only entertain his servant in his service by giving him his livery, coat, and badge, whereby he is openly known to be his man, but also that he provide to give him meat and drink daily to feed him : so, surely, doth the Lord with us in these Sacraments ; for by baptism doth He admit us into His service, and by the Supper doth He feed us, that we perish not with hunger.

John vi. 32, 33, 35.
1 Cor. xi. 24, 25.

26. Like as man's body is nourished and sustained by bread and wine : so, also, our souls are sustained spiritually with the body of Christ given for us and with His blood shed for our sakes.

John vi. 50, 55, 56.

27. As bread nourisheth our bodies : so thereby we learn that Christ's body hath most singular force spiritually by faith to feed our souls.

28. As with wine men's hearts are cheered and their strength confirmed : so we learn, also, that with His blood our souls are refreshed through faith.

John vi. 54, 63, 64.

29. As surely as we know that we have received the bread and wine with our mouths and stomachs : so surely thereby we are assured that Christ maketh the faithful believers partakers of His body and blood.

30. As those who have eaten sweet comfits and feed for the most part on delicate cates have sweet breath : even so must there needs be found a sweet smelling odour in all the words and works of those who are fed with this spiritual and heavenly food, the body and blood of Christ, and in whom Christ doth dwell ; for they do all things for the profit and edification of their brethren and the glory of God.

31. Even as the Gospel, which of its own nature is the Word of life and salvation, is yet turned by the wicked unto the savour of death : so the Sacraments, also, which are instituted by God unto the salvation of men, are, notwithstanding, received by the faithless and the unworthy communicants unto their condemnation and judgment, and yet they do not desist in respect of God to be true Sacraments still.

32. As a sick man feels no comfort or nourishment when he eateth meat, and yet it preserveth his life : so the weak Christian, though he feel himself not nourished at the Sacrament by Christ's body and blood, yet he shall see in time that his soul shall be preserved thereby unto everlasting life.

33. Like as soldiers, when they receive their pay, do bind themselves to their captain by solemn oath : even so we, when we are partakers of the holy Sacraments which God hath appointed in His Church, by the which He bestoweth upon us spiritual gifts, do bind ourselves to Him by the same oath.

34. As we see with our eyes that the bread is broken for us : so we are certainly confirmed in our faith that the body of Christ was given unto death for us.

35. As certainly as we see the bread and wine to be present : so certainly do we believe that the body and blood of Christ are present with us also—yea, we do not believe that it is the Supper of the Lord except His body and blood be present with us.

36. As things set before the eyes do move the sight : even so the Sacraments move the heart to believe.

37. Even as sure as we take the bread in the Lord's Supper and eat it with the mouth of the body and drink the wine : so verily and certainly, even at the same instant, with the mouth of our faith, we receive the very body and blood of Christ, and it doth as actually comfort and sustain the soul as do the bread and the wine nourish and comfort the heart and the outward man.

38. As verily as the most sovereign plaster and salve laid to a wound or sore draweth out the filth and healeth it : so verily and really do the body and blood of Christ thus received put away the sores and deformities of the soul, and not only make it whole, but also pure, clean, without fear, wrinkle, and spot, and so make it a delectable, lovely, and fair spouse in the sight of God.

39. As, when many windows be opened in a house, more light may come in than when there is but one opened : even so, by the perception and receiving of the Sacraments, a Christian man's conscience hath more help to receive Christ than simply by the Word preached, heard, or meditated, and therefore the Sacraments may well be called seeable, sensible, tasteable, and toothable words.

40. As the devil entered into Judas by the sop which Christ gave him, yet not that he received any evil of Him, but because he did receive it badly and with an evil mind : even so the unworthy communicants eat and drink their own damnation, not by the eating of the bread and wine, which are holy signs, but because they receive the same without faith and repentance, having an evil conscience.

41. As the word "sacramentum" was a form of a solemn oath in war, whereby the soldier did vow and destinate himself to serve his general, and the general in like manner did bind himself to his soldiers : so, also, by the use and institution of the holy Sacraments, after that God hath promised that He will be our God and give unto us salvation, He doth in like manner bind us, as it were, with a solemn oath, before Himself, before angels, and men, that we will serve Him and none other.

Sacrament of the Supper compared with the paschal lamb.

1. As the paschal lamb was instituted and eaten the night before the children of Israel were delivered out of Egypt : so, likewise, was the Supper of the Lord instituted and eaten the night before we were delivered from our sins.

Exod. xii. 1, &c.
1 Cor. xi. 24, 25,
&c.

2. As the paschal lamb was a lamb indeed : even so the Sacrament is very bread and wine indeed.

3. As the paschal lamb was called the Lord's passover, or the Lord's passing by, when He destroyed the power of Pharaoh and delivered the children of Israel : so the Sacrament is called the body and blood of the Lord, by which He destroyeth the power of the devil and delivereth us.

4. As the children of Israel were but once delivered from Egypt, notwithstanding they did every year take a lamb, to keep the deed in perpetual remembrance : even so Christ our Saviour bought and redeemed us but once for all, although the Sacrament thereof be often distributed and broken amongst us to keep the benefit in perpetual memory.

5. As many as did eat the paschal lamb in faith and believed God's Word, as touching their deliverance from Egypt, were as sure of the same through faith as they were sure of the lamb by eating of it : so as many as do eat of the body and blood of Christ by faith and believe God's Word, as touching their deliverance from sin, death, hell, and damnation, are as sure of their deliverance through faith as they are sure of the bread by eating of it, &c.

Receiving the Sacrament.

John xiii. 20.
Mark x. 16.
Matt. xxv. 40.
1 Cor. xi. 27.

1. LIKE as Christ doth recover and impute that to be done unto Him which is done unto His ministers or poor needy members : so also doth He recover and impute that to be done unto His body and blood which is done unto the Sacrament of the same.

Acts ix. 4.
Zech. ii. 8.

2. Like as he that sinneth against a minister or a poor man sinneth against Christ Himself, although in the meanwhile he hath not hurt Christ's person in any point : even so is he also guilty of the body and blood of Christ who receiveth the Sacrament of His body and blood unworthily, although in the meantime he hath not received the very body and blood of the Lord.

3. Like as, if a rebel should tread under his feet the seal, letters, or coin of his prince, although he touch not the prince himself nor tread him under his feet, yet is he said to have done so, and is accused, not for hurting the seal, or defiling the letters, or defacing his coin, but he is charged with treason and accused of treading the prince under his feet ; or if one man should send a gift or token unto another man, although it might be something of small value, if the party to whom it were sent would not take it, but refuse it despitefully or contemn it, the man that sent it might well think he had contemned and disdained him, and not his gift or present ; but what might he think if he should cast it into the dirt and trample it under his feet ? If he did as he ought to do, he would consider, when he received the token, the mind and good will of his friend that sent or gave it, and, according thereunto, esteem and receive it : so, likewise, if we do as we ought to do, in being partakers of these holy mysteries, we should rather consider the mind and good will of our Lover Christ than the bread and wine which we see—yea, if we do not altogether consider Christ's mind and purpose in this behalf, we deal dishonestly and strumpet-like with Him, for it is the property of strumpets to consider the things given and sent them rather than the good will and mind of the giver and sender, whereof the true lovers do not consider in any point the value of the things given or sent, but the mind and good will of the party : so we, if we be true lovers of Christ, must not consider barely the outward things, as the bread and wine which we see and our senses perceive, but rather altogether we must view and consider the mind of Christ, and thereafter and according to it esteem and account of the same.

4. Like as, if a wilful and rebellious subject should no more esteem or regard his prince's seal than other common wax, or have it in no greater reverence than the seal of some private man, it might rightly be said that he maketh no difference of his prince's person—that is to say, that he doth no more esteem him than he doth other men, yet it needeth not that the king's person be there really present : so, when we come to the Lord's table, if we take irreverently the mystical bread and wine as other common meats appointed for the belly, then make we no difference of the Lord's body ; we do not esteem the worthiness, price, and virtue of it, which in the holy mysteries is so freely and so liberally offered unto us ; and therefore, if we receive this Sacrament irreverently, not considering who is the Author of it, nor who it is that offereth Himself so mercifully and lovingly unto us, it is no marvel that the holy apostle saith that we are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord—that is to say, that we are before the seat of the Almighty God, because of our unthankfulness and irreverent handling of the holy mysteries, counted as guilty as if we had slain the body of the only-begotten Son of God, and shed His most precious blood upon the cross ; or it is no marvel that, instead of grace, instead of forgiveness of our sins, and of life everlasting, we do eat and drink our own damnation ; and yet it followeth not that the body and blood of Christ be really present there in the Sacrament.

Sacramental sign.

1. As the Word is all one to the evil as to the good: so the sacramental signs be common as well to the evil as to the godly, but yet neither the one part nor the other doth help anything at all to such as are void of faith.

2. As men bind themselves in obligations, putting to their hands and seals, so that they cannot go back: even so, when God commands us to receive sacramental signs in faith, and withal promiseth to the receivers to give the things signified, He binds Himself, as it were, in bond unto us, to stand to His own Word.

Sacraments be commonly called by the names of those things which they be Sacraments of.

LIKE as, when a nobleman or gentleman delivereth a letter of annuity or rent to any one of his servants, he saith he giveth him an annuity of ten pounds, no man is so simple to think that the letter is the money itself, but an assurance, confirmation, sign, or gage, of such a sum of money, in such sort that, having such a letter, he is fully assured of the money; now, no man is so blockish as to think that he hath evil spoken, inasmuch as every man doth well know that the signs have the names of the things which they signify; after this manner of speech, also, an ambassador of a prince, being demanded of the authority he hath received of his lord to deal in such or such a matter, is wont to show forth his letters of credit or commission, and to say, "Here is my authority," albeit that the letters are not the power itself, but only the testimony of the same: even so the bread and the wine are the remission of sins, or the body and blood of Christ—to wit, they are as seals and letters, whereby we are assured that the body of Jesus Christ crucified, and His blood shed, have purchased unto us the forgiveness of sins and eternal life.

Gen. xxxiii. 30;
xii. 26.
John x. 7; xiv. 5
xv. 1.
1 Cor. x. 4, 16
Ezek. iii. 1; v. 2.
2 Cor. v. 21.
John i. 14.

Sacraments are not corrupted by the wickedness of ministers.

1. LIKE as there is no difference between the self-same image or figure of anything imprinted or sealed with a ring or signet of gold and with a signet made of iron or wood: even so the Word and Sacraments, being administered by a lawful minister, although otherwise a wicked and ungodly minister, be yet the same Word and Sacraments, of the same vigour, strength, and efficacy, as when they be administered by a man of excellent virtue and godliness; for, as the father shall not die for the child, nor the child for the father, so the minister shall not die for him that receives from him, nor the party that receives for the evilness of the minister, for every one who dies shall sink in his own sin, so that the minister who doth so wickedly corrupt the holy Sacraments and holy ordinances of God administereth them to his own damnation and judgment.

Deut. xxiv. 16.
Ezek. xviii. 20.
2 Kings xiv. 6.
2 Chron. xxv. 4.
1 Cor. xi. 29.

2. Like as among men, if a letter be sent, so that the hand and seal of him that sendeth it be well known, it maketh no matter who or what manner of man be the carrier: even so it ought to suffice to know the hand and seal of our Lord in His Sacraments by what lawful minister soever they be brought, for the malice or lewdness of man cannot change the nature of the ordinance of God; and, therefore, the virtue and efficacy of the Word and Sacrament consist and depend not upon the worthiness or unworthiness of the minister, but in and upon the commandment, ordinance, power, and authority of God only.

3. Like as gold is gold of whomsoever it be given or received: even so, likewise, is the Sacrament, whether it be given by a good or a bad minister; for Judas, although he was a thief, yet he preached and baptized, whose doctrine and baptism was as well the doctrine and baptism of Christ as was Peter's and Andrew's, James' and John's.

John vi. 70; xii. 6.

4. Like as, if the treasurer or receiver of a prince do deliver forth false and counterfeit money instead of good, the office whereunto he is called cannot make it other than false and counterfeit money, for he doth not execute his office faithfully, but doth change the good money which he received to distribute by the commandment of his lord and master into false and counterfeit money which he did not receive, and by this means they who shall have taken the same are deceived and spoiled. On the other side, although he were a wicked and unjust man, if he did distribute the good money such as he was commanded, his wickedness and injustice could not hinder at all but that it should be good current money, and that they who should receive it should very well make their profit thereof: even so the minister, although he be lawfully called and have sufficient gifts to preach, yet if he do not administer the Sacraments according to the Lord's ordinance, or do either disguise and pervert them, or do administer some other thing instead of them, in thus doing the case is altered, but otherwise the viciousness of the person cannot hinder the virtue of the Lord's ministry.

5. As the Word of God, although it be preached by mortal men, ought to be received of all good Christians, not as the word of men, but as the Word of God, and, as it were, proceeding out of the mouth of Christ: even so the holy Sacraments, although they be ministered by frail and lewd ministers, are to be received of the godly and religious, not as proceeding from men, but, as it were, from the hand of God Himself, the first and principal Author thereof.

1 Thess. ii. 13.

Sacraments are witnesses of the Truth.

LIKE as the chief end of the Sacraments is this, that they are testimonies to confirm the truth, by which the Lord in His Church even visibly doth witness, that the things now uttered by the preaching of the Gospel, and by the promises assured to the faithful from the beginning of the world, are in every point brought to pass, and are as certainly true, as they are declared and promised in the Word of Truth: even so baptism is the heavenly and public witness of the Church of Christ, whereby the Lord testifieth that it is He who receiveth men freely into favour and who cleanseth from all blemishes, and, to be short, maketh us partakers and heirs of all His goodness.

Salvation.

1. As a helmet saveth the head of a soldier in the day of battle: so salvation, which cometh from the Lord, saveth and protecteth us from the deadly wounds of our spiritual adversaries.

2. As the pismire provideth food in summer time to live by in winter: so, in like manner, we must labour to attain and get salvation with the means thereof in the summer of prosperity, that so we may live spiritually in the winter of adversity.

3. As a supper is made when the day draweth to an end: even so is full salvation given to the godly about the end of the world.

4. Like as the infant cannot live without a nurse: so neither can we have salvation without Christ.

Eph. vi. 17.

Care of the Salvation of others.

As, when one of our friends is ill at ease or sick in his body, we will not stick to ride or run to procure any means whereby to restore his bodily health: even so much more ought we to be careful of the salvation of the souls of our brethren by how much more the soul is of greater price than the body.

Salvation is desired of the godly.

As all men of themselves be sinners, and through sin are under God's wrath, banished far away from Him, condemned to hell and everlasting damnation, and none is clearly innocent but Christ alone: so every soul inspired by God is desirous to be delivered from sin and hell, and to obtain at God's hands mercy, favour, righteousness, and everlasting salvation.

Salvation is from God alone.

As the virtue attractive to draw iron is not in the iron, but in the adamant (loadstone): even so the virtue and power of salvation lieth not in the minister, but in the power of the Word, wrought by the Spirit of God.

Salvation only in the Church.

1. As southernwood will grow nowhere but in gardens, where it is planted: so the godly will not grow anywhere but in the Church and body of Christ, where they are engrafted.

2. Even as it was necessary that they who should be saved from the flood should be in the ark: so, likewise, all they that will be saved from the flood of God's wrath must of necessity be in Christ, and so in the Church. Gen. vii. 1, &c.

The use of all prescribed means to Salvation is necessary.

1. If a king should give unto one of his subjects a princely palace upon condition that he shall go into it in the way which he shall prescribe, he would, no doubt, take what pains he could to know the way, and afterward endeavour to keep and continue in it: so, likewise, the kingdom of heaven is the most glorious and royal palace that ever was, and God hath bestowed the same on His elect, and He requires nothing at their hands but that they would turn their faces from this world and walk unto it in the way which He hath chalked forth unto them in His Word; therefore, if they be desirous to have salvation and life everlasting, they must come forth of the broad way that leads to destruction, and enter into the strait way that leads to eternal life—they must acquaint themselves with the guides, which are the faithful ministers of the Word, who will cry unto them, "Here is the way; walk ye in it!" when they shall go to the right hand or to the left.

2. As Simeon, going into the temple by the motion of God's Spirit, met with Christ: so, if we will be ruled by the same Spirit, and will frequent holy assemblies, we shall meet with our salvation.

Salvation to be preferred before either profit or pleasure.

1. As the eye is marvellously necessary for the guiding of the whole body, and a member that hardly may be spared, yet, if there come danger unto the rest of the body by it, we must rather suffer the loss of it than the whole body should perish for it: even so we are to lose with contented minds our dearest friends, or any commodities (advantages) of this life (though we can as hardly spare them as our right eye), if they hinder us in the way of life and salvation. Mark ix. 47.

2. Like as, when a man's foot is so sore that it cannot be healed, and putteth the other parts of the body in danger to be infected by it it is wont to be cut off, for the preservation Matt. xviii. 3.

of the rest : even so, when our friends or any earthly commodity (advantage) whatsoever shall become hurtful to our souls and endanger us to lose life everlasting, we must then reject them

Salvation is to be sought in and by the appointed means, though God could save us without all means.

Exod. xxxiv. 28.
Deut. ix. 9.
1 Kings xix. 8.
Acts ix. 1, &c.

As God, by His omnipotent power, could preserve alive our mortal bodies, extraordinarily and supernaturally, without natural food and sustenance, as He did Moses and Elijah for the space of forty days, they not receiving in that time any bodily meat or drink, according to the order of nature, yet, nevertheless, no man ought to refuse meat and drink, being the ordinary means that God hath appointed for the preservation of our bodily life : even so God could save us without all means, and give unto us a lively faith, through the wonderful working of the Holy Ghost, and that without either preaching or hearing of His Word, or else without prayer and ministration of the Sacraments, yet, nevertheless, it is His ordinance not so to do.

Sanctification.

2 Pet. ii. 7.
Ezek. ix. 4.

1. LIKE as Lot was vexed and his righteous heart was grieved with the unclean conversation of the Sodomites from day to day : even so ought our souls to be vexed and grieved continually at the wickedness of our time, and to send up prayers to God that men may be brought to the obedience of His holy will.

2. Like as Joseph, Elijah, and Elisha left their garments behind them : even so must the children of God leave their carnal affection, &c., before they can please God and attain salvation by Christ.

3. As worms and flies that have lain dead all the winter, if they be laid in the sun in the spring time, begin to revive by virtue thereof : even so, when we are united to Christ, and are, as it were, laid in the beams of this blessed Sun of righteousness, virtue is derived thence, which warmeth our benumbed hearts dead in sin, and reviveth us to newness of life, whereby we begin to affect and like good things, and put in practice all the duties of religion.

2 Tim. ii. 19-21.

4. As the sight of him that is blear-eyed is hurt by looking against the sun : even so, likewise, it is very dangerous to handle a thing that is pure with hands unwashed. A man should purge himself that he may become a vessel sanctified to honour, meet for the uses of the Lord, and prepared to all good works.

No Sanctification except we be united to the Church.

EVEN as the spirit of man doth not strengthen the members of the body, unless they be fast and surely joined together : so the Holy Ghost doth not revive and comfort the members of the Church when they fall away, and will not continue in league and fellowship with the servants of God. The Holy Ghost doth minister no strength, no consolation, no comfort unto them longer than they are fast bound and knit to the congregation of God's people, in love and peace in Christ ; there remaineth nothing else in such men but a numbness and extreme blindness in heavenly things ; and, whilst in their arrogancy and pride, they forsake and condemn the Church of God, because they cannot draw it into subjection to their fond and fantastical humours, they become, from men, devils incarnate.

Satan.

1. As a raven or carrion crow will seize first on the eye of a beast that seemeth to be dead, knowing that if the eye be out it will the easier get its prey : so Satan will seek first to peck at our eye of faith, and if that be out he will rule us as he will.

2. As a weak and brittle wall is easily cast down and overthrown with every engine, Matt. iv. 1, &c. out a huge fence, a mighty strong wall, or a tower that is firm and fenced on every side doth stand surely and endureth the force that cometh against it without yielding, staggering, or falling, insomuch that the enemies who seek to overthrow it are driven back and constrained to use warlike engines and policy—yea, and to batter and shake it with engines, torments, and ordnances of war, which will send and throw out stones, weapons, bullets, and pellets of iron and lead : even so Satan doth most easily overthrow, with every light temptation, frail and weak men, who are not well settled in virtue, nor grounded in godliness, nor armed with the holy Word and Spirit of God ; but to win and overcome, if he could, men that are furnished with a strong and lively faith, and such as are stayed and do rely upon the Lord's protection, he useth sundry subtleties and most dangerous and forcible temptations.

3. Even as the fisher, when he taketh some great fish, doth not by-and-by violently strike and twitch it, but letteth his fishing line go at the length, until the fish do swallow down the hook and so work its own destruction ; lest if, at the first, he should twitch it too hard, the fishing line or thread should break and, his bait and hook lost, the fish should escape : even so Satan, the devil, when he hath gotten a poor sinner fast upon his hook, and hath entangled and fettered him in the chains of some dangerous and deadly sin, and hath bewitched him with the sorceries of the flesh and the world, doth not suddenly oppress and exasperate him, lest, at the first dash, playing the devil openly and roughly, like a devil as he is, the sinner should break his bands and escape his snares ; but he doth cherish him and make much of him, and doth suffer him now and then both to speak and to do some things that savour of virtue, that by little and little, he being made fast and dead sure upon the hook of sin and wickedness, he may by degrees work his own woe and utter destruction ; so that the devil doth stretch out his angling rod, thread, and all, not that he may let the sinner escape, but that he may make him the surer and hold him the faster.

4. As Achsah, who, when she had begged of her father an inheritance of the south Josh. xv. 18, 19 countries, then she must have certain grounds with wells and springs : even so such a shameless beggar is Satan the devil, who will still have a little sin and a little more, and never leave till, by little and little, he getteth both body and soul into hell.

5. As little children, who know not what is good for them, if they begin to taste honey once, will not leave eating by their good will till they be sick with eating : even so, so sweet hath Satan made sin to the taste of the wicked, that they cry still a little more of it, and find no fault with it but that there is too little and they cannot have enough.

6. As flies are always busy about a sore place : so that is a sport or pleasure to Satan which is a sore or a pain to a man.

7. As an ox will eat no kind of grass but that which is green and fresh : even so the devil will be sure to have his food of the finest and best.

By our words, deeds, gestures, and motions Satan knoweth the secrets of our hearts.

As a man holding in his hand an angling-rod, and with a baited hook fishing in an obscure and troubled river, although he doth not see the fish rush upon the bait, yet he perceiveth very well that the fish is taken and hanged upon the hook, because the cork or

Matt. xv. 19, 20.
Prov. vi. 12.

bark of his fishing-line is pulled down and hid under the water : so Satan, that most subtle and wily fisher, although he seeth not our thoughts, which be in the secrets and bottoms of our hearts, yet notwithstanding, by outward signs, he many times doth know them, as by our words (for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh), by our actions, and by the gestures of our bodies.

Satan called a god.

2 Cor. iv. 4.
John xiii. 31; xiv
30.

As the belly is called a god, because they who are given to the pleasures thereof make more account of it than of God : so, after the same sort, is Satan called a god and the prince of this world.

Satan inflameth wicked cogitations in our minds by his temptations.

As the smith doth not himself make the hot coals that be in his forge, but doth blow the fire with bellows, and thus the coals are kindled and made hot and fiery : so the devil doth blow and inflame those dangerous and wicked cogitations which are conceived in our hearts and minds with the bellows of manifold temptations, and so, labouring to kindle the fire of all iniquity, he ministereth nourishment to all our wicked and damnable purposes ; for the heart of man is like unto a smith's forge, his evil and bad cogitations are hot, burning coals, and he that doth blow the bellows to make them burn up and to consume both our souls and bodies is the devil, that ancient enemy of our happiness and salvation.

Satan's subtlety.

1 Sam. xi. 2.
1 Pet. v. 8.

1. As Nahash the Ammonite, warring against the men of Jabesh-gilead, would not raise his siege but upon condition that he might thrust out all their right eyes : so Satan, the enemy of our souls, who seeketh by all means possible our destruction, never ceaseth to assault us until he has deprived us of the eye of right judgment, that we may not see our salvation in Christ Jesus only.

2. Like as if men, by long experience and observation of natural causes, can attain unto such great knowledge of things to come, that they can tell twelve years before the change of the moon, the eclipse of the sun, what day, hour, and minute it shall be : even so much more Satan (who is of a more excellent nature than man and greater experience) hath knowledge of things to come, for that he hath been practised therein from the beginning of the world, and is also more circumspect in observing of causes, because thereby he deceiveth man, a poor simple soul.

Deut. xxv. 17.
Exod. xvii. 1-9.

3. As Amalek resisted the children of Israel, that they might not enter into the Land of Promise : so doth the devil resist Christians, that they should not enter into heaven.

Satan's craft to deceive Eve and the world.

Gen. iii. 1, 2, &c.
Hos. xiii. 6.

EVEN as a fowler doth lay abroad and spread his net to take the birds where bait is and where they feed : so the devil, when he would take Eve, spread his net in gluttony and tempted her with a beautiful apple, till at the length, to the harm and woe of all their posterity, both she and her husband were taken and entrapped to our woes.

Scholar.

1. As, if Apelles should see the form of Venus, or Protogenes the image of Hyalissus, all with mire and dirt defiled, they would no doubt be sorry : so, if a man see his scholar whom he hath brought up now inclined and given to lewdness, he cannot choose but greatly lament.

2. As there be some women that cannot conceive by their first husbands, and yet, becoming widows and marrying again, they become fruitful and bear children : so there be some scholars that be unapt to learn under some tutors and schoolmasters, but under others they will soon prove of a good quick wit and show the fruits of learning.

3. As the goodness of the ground is not much profitable for corn unless there be a meet husbandman to till and sow the same : so it is not enough to find good towardness in a scholar unless there be added unto him a meet schoolmaster to further the same.

4. As a drop of water, falling from the house eaves, weareth and holloweth the hard stone, not by force, but by often falling : even so a scholar proveth learned, not by power or strength, but by much diligence and great reading.

5. As Apelles became an excellent painter because there was never a day but he applied himself to some learning : so, in like manner, a diligent scholar, by daily applying of his learning and often exercising of virtue, attaineth to perfect honour and virtue.

6. As young men who have bestowed their time in labouring for learning and knowledge happily are apt and prone to come to great honour and preferment : so, contrariwise, those scholars who are given to their own sensuality and appetite are to be avoided of all good men.

7. Like as the goodness of the ground is not sufficient to bring forth corn, except there be a good plougher and good seed : even so a toward and witty scholar is not likely to get good learning except he have a master, a good instructor, and books.

Schools.

1. As a man that hath divers orchards will also have a seminary full of young plants to maintain it : even so schools—which are as seminaries to God's Church, without which the Church falls to decay—ought to be maintained, because they serve to make supply of ministers.

2. As training makes dogs fit for hunting : so schools and learning make nature profitable.

Schoolmaster.

1. As it is the part of a good husbandman to understand the nature and fertility of the ground which he doth till : so it is the part of a good schoolmaster to discern the disposition and nature of his scholar.

2. As Prometheus did make marvellous images, such as none other ever could : so a wise, discreet, and learned schoolmaster prepares to a child of an excellent wit that which an ignorant and unlearned master utterly destroyeth.

Scorners.

LIKE as old men for the most part are wayward, and think scorn to be told of their faults : so, likewise, is this doting age of the world wayward and waspish if a preacher shall reprove men of any vice that they are faulty in.

God giveth us understanding to know the Scripture.

Matt. xvi. 17.
Acts xvi. 14.

EVER as the disciples of our Saviour Christ had no knowledge nor understanding until God gave it them : so fareth it with all the rest of God's children, for although they might hear His very apostles preach never so much, yea, even Christ Himself personally sounding the Word in their ears, yet, except the Lord open the heart and mind, as He did in Lydia, it availeth not to any one.

The Holy Scripture above the Church.

1. As the sun is clear and bright, not because men do judge it to be so, but rather men do judge it to be so because it is so indeed, and they can judge of it no otherwise : even so the Holy Scriptures, contained in the canonical books of the Old and New Testaments, are the infallible Word of the living God, not because the Church doth judge and allow it to be so, but rather the true Catholic Church doth judge and allow it to be so because it is so indeed, and can judge of it no otherwise, no more than clear and bright eyes can judge otherwise of the light and brightness of the sun, of which the blind can give no judgment, even as the unfaithful and reprobate can give no judgment of the Word of God, nor yet allow it.

2. As the laws of princes ruling by justice ought to be received, professed, and practised by all their subjects : even so much more the Church ought to be governed by the laws of Christ, her Lord and King.

Deut. xxvii. 26.
Gal. iii. 10.
John x. 4; 5; xvi.
13, 14.

3. As the laws and ordinances given by Moses, who was but a servant, might not be abrogated, chopped, or changed by any mortal creature without the displeasure of the Almighty : even so much less those laws and ordinances of the Lord Jesus, who is the chief Lord and Ruler over all.

The Scripture not hard.

Deut. vi. 6, 7.
Ps. xix. 7, 8.
Eccl. i. 16.
John v. 39.
2 Pet. iii. 15.

LIKE as, if one should affirm that because there be some bones in a shoulder of mutton, therefore it is nothing but bones and no flesh thereon at all ; or because some places in the river be deep, therefore all the river from head to foot is deep and no shallow to be found therein, which were most ridiculous to affirm : even so is this opinion of the Papists, that because some places in the Scripture be hard, therefore the whole body is hard, so as lay people may not read them.

The Scripture sufficient to confute errors.

1. LIKE as, if a man being taken with a frenzy, and a physician should come and offer him a medicine which is of virtue to purge the superfluous humour that causeth the disease and to make him whole and sound, and the frantic man should refuse it and take another to his own content that would do him no good, were this medicine strengthless and not able to help his disease because this patient desired to have another rather than that ? Not so : so, in like manner, although some men refuse to have their errors and false opinions confuted by the Word of God, desiring rather to be tried by the writings of men, which can do them no good to establish their faith, this maketh not, but the Scripture is sufficient to confute erroneous doctrine and all false opinions, though those men take it not to be so.

2 Pet. i. 19.

2. As in the night season, in darksome places, men are wont to do all their business by randle-light, so continuing until the broad day : even so, in like sort, whilst we abide in this world, where we are compassed about with gross darkness and are ignorant of heavenly things, we must carefully give ear to the prophecies of the Word, take counsel at them, and govern ourselves wholly by them, till the day of the Lord approach and the time come wherein we shall clearly behold those things in the presence of God which now, in this pilgrimage of ours, we can only believe and hope after.

3. As men, interchangeably, are said to be wiser one than another, when one is wiser in divers points and another again in some other points: even so, if man's wisdom be able to do that which the revealed wisdom of God is not, then is God not wiser than man, not simply, but in some points, and man wiser than God, not simply, but in some points; and, therefore, such as avouch that the wisdom of man is able to confute some errors, heresies, and false opinions, which the Word and revealed wisdom of God cannot, is to make man wiser than God.

Isa. xxix. 14.
1 Cor. i. 20, 25,
iii. 19.

4. Like as Abraham said to the rich glutton, being in torments, when he would have had him send even to his father's house to warn his five brethren, lest they also should come into that punishment—"They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them; and if they will not hear them, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead again:" even so, they that will not be persuaded by such reasons as may be alleged and brought either for confirmation or confutation of any point of doctrine or manners out of the sacred Scriptures, surely they will not be moved anything at all, either with the authorities of poets, philosophers, orators, or other profane writers whatsoever, neither yet with the reasons that may be brought out of an ecclesiastical writer, how famous, learned, or notable soever he might be.

Luke xvi. 29, 31.

Scriptures.

1. As the laws must be interpreted, not according to the censure (estimate) and judgment of them to whom they were given, but after the will and meaning of the judge and lawgiver who made them: so the Scriptures must be interpreted by the Scriptures, and the Word by the Word, and that which is spoken obscurely in one place by that which is declared and uttered more plainly in another place.

2. As the carpenter knows his rule to be straight, not by another rule applied unto it, but by itself, for casting his eye upon it he presently discerns whether it be straight or no: so, likewise, we know and are resolved that Scripture is Scripture, even by the Scripture itself, though the Church say nothing, so be it we have the spirit of discernment when we read, hear, or consider of the Scripture. And yet the testimony of the Church is not to be despised for though it breed not a persuasion in us of the certainty of the Scripture, yet it is a very good inducement thereto.

3. Like as the physicians, in their books, do most diligently describe even such diseases as are most filthy, not to the intent to praise and commend them or allow them, but to the end they may be exactly known and the more perfectly cured: so the holy Scripture, in sundry places, doth most manifestly rehearse mischievous deeds, even such as are to be abhorred, not to the intent to teach and command the same, but to the end we might know them the better, and judge thereof, not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit of God, and also that we might warily avoid them.

4. As the precious stone called draconites cannot be polished, and needeth not any art or cunning to make it either trimmer or fairer, for it is both pleasant and bright of itself: even so the holy Scriptures have their glory and brightness of themselves, and need not the artificial colours and shows either of philosophy, rhetoric, or any other art.

5. Even as the cogitations and senses of man are most hard to be known, and yet notwithstanding our friends, whom we fervently love and with whom we are continually conversant, do oftentimes, even by a beck, open unto us the cogitations and senses of their Deut. xxx. 11-14.

Prov. xiv. 16.
Matt. xi. 25; xlii.
11.

minds, without any token of words or speech by them spoken : so it cometh to pass in the Holy Scriptures, if a man but love them and be continually conversant in them, he who seeketh findeth, and unto him that knocketh it shall be opened.

John v. 39; xvi.
13; xx. 30, 31.
2 Tim. iii. 15-17.

6. Like as in a merchant's ship are carried divers things necessary for man's life : so in the Scriptures are contained all things needful to salvation.

Matt. xii. 3-5; xv.
7, 8; xxii. 31.

7. As whatsoever gold is without the temple is not sanctified : so whatsoever sense is without the holy Scripture, although unto some it seem wonderful, yet it is not holy, because it is not contained in the sense of the Scripture.

Our duty to read the Scriptures.

Col. iii. 16.
2 Pet. i. 19.
Eph. vi. 17.
Rom. xv. 4.
2 Tim. iii. 16.
Acts xvii. 11.
Ps. cxix. 105.
Dan. ix. 2.
2 Tim. ii. 20, 21.

1. As artificers, with their tools and instruments, do finish their work : so, by reading of the Holy Scriptures, we ourselves are corrected, formed, and renewed.

2. Artificers cannot transform earth or wood into silver or gold, but only by their art and workmanship can give form and shape unto things : but, by the reading of God's Word, thou mayest of a wooden or earthen vessel make a vessel of gold or silver, as saith the holy apostle St. Paul.

Ps. xxv. 14.
John xvii. 17; vi.
45.

3. Like as there are some spices which, without bruising, do yield no smell, but the more they be chafed, the sweeter perfume they yield : even so is it with the Holy Scriptures. Such as read but little can find no taste, but the more they be perused and read, the more do they yield forth the treasures and pleasant fruits hidden in them.

4. As increase of strength groweth to the body by meat : even so the like groweth to the soul by the reading of the Holy Scriptures.

John v. 39.

5. As a bar of iron, by long lying in the fire, waxeth red-hot and of the nature of burning fire : even so that soul which daily employeth itself in reading and meditating on the Word of God, groweth to be spiritual and divine, and is kindled into a fire of holy devotion and love by the Word of God.

6. As some birds are wont to sit by the water-side, that, seeing the shadow of ravening fowls as they fly in the air, they may escape them by leaping into the water : so must Christians be conversant in hearing and reading the Word of God, that so they may behold, as in a glass, the sleights of the devil, and escape them, and also so make the Word their glass, as to see their own sins in it, all which would, without unfeigned repentance, bring condemnation.

Secrecy.

1. As silence is a gift without peril and containeth in it many good things : so it were better our silence brought our simplicity into suspicion than to speak either inconveniently, idly, or unnecessarily.

2. As the viper is torn asunder when she bringeth forth her little ones : so secrets coming out of the mouths of those that are not able to conceal them do utterly undo and ruin such as reveal them.

3. As we must render account for every idle word : so must we, likewise, for our idle silence.

Security causeth contempt of Christ.

Matt. ix. 11.
Mark ii. 17.
Luke v. 31.

As they that are in health and have no need of the physician do therefore seek little or nothing after him : so they that know not the dangerous diseases of their souls, but think themselves in good enough case, do seek little after Christ and set little by Him.

Security is the highway to destruction.

As the ox, when he is driven to the butcher's stall, goeth willingly, because his hope is, that he shall be driven to some better pasture, and never feareth until the axe be ready to be laid upon his head; or as a fool, when he is led to the stocks, goeth cheerfully, and never feareth until his feet be fast snared therein: so, likewise, many men go securely forward, weltering in the broad way, without remorse of conscience, persuading themselves that that is the perfect way, because the greatest number do walk therein, and never perceive their own folly until they be shared in the traps of destruction.

Sentence of condemnation; why set down.

As a wise father of a family will check his servant and, if the cause require, correct him in his child's presence, that the child itself may learn thereby to fear and stand in awe of his father: so, likewise, Christ, the most careful and wise Governor of His Church, hath set down the sentence of condemnation against the wicked, that the children of God in this world, whensoever they shall hear or read the same, might be moved thereby to stand in great fear of God and more dutifully perform obedience to His commandments.

Matt. xxv. 41.

Servants of sin.

As men are the servants of them to whose commandments they yield all obedience: even so, if Christians obey sin, they are the servants of sin, the wages whereof is death.

Rom. vi. 16, 22, 23.

Impossible to Serve God and riches.

As impossible as it is at one and the same time for one man to serve two different and separate masters, for that he cannot be diligent and employ himself about and upon the business of the one but he must needs neglect the other's affairs: so, likewise, impossible is it for a man to addict himself to serve God and riches, or that which belongeth to them.

Matt. vi. 24.

No Service pleaseth God but such as He teacheth.

As the Lord, in the First Commandment, wholly demandeth the soul, will, understanding, and heart—that is, our faith, love, thankfulness, invocation, and spiritual adoration or worshipping—to be given to Him only and for His sake, as He shall appoint: so, in the Second Commandment, "Thou shalt not make to thyself," &c., He generally requireth for the outward service of Him, that we should follow His Word in serving of Him, and take and account it no less than idolatry or image service whatsoever thing is invented by man, saint, or angel, and not by Him, concerning His worship and service.

Lev. xxvi. 1,
Exod. xxxiv. 13-15.
Deut. iv. 23,
Ps. xcvi. 7; cvi. 36.
Isa. xlv. 19,
Jer. ii. 27.

The Service of God to be preferred before all earthly things.

1. LIKE as, if a servant who is factor for his master beyond the seas, after many years, returning home to give account to his master, should yield a reckoning of so much time and money spent in carding, dicing, dancing—so much in courting and wanton company—we should laugh at so fond (foolish) a reckoning; but being asked by his master what time he bestowed on his merchandise which he sent him for, if he should answer "None at all," nor that he ever thought or studied upon that matter, we might then think him well worthy of all shame and punishment: even so, surely, with much more shame and confusion shall they stand before God at the day of judgment who, being placed here to so great a business as is the worship and service of God, have, notwithstanding, neglected the same, bestowing their studies, labours, and cogitations on the vain trifles of the world, which is as much from the purpose as if men, being placed in a course to run at a golden prize of infinite value, should leave their mark and some step aside after flies or feathers in the air, and some others stand still, gathering up the dung off the ground, we would think these men not worthy to receive so great a reward as this that was proposed and offered to them.

Lev. v. 5, 6.
Numb. xxviii. 9.
2 Chron. vii. 5.
Ps. viii. 2; cxix,
9; cxlviii. 12.

2. Like as doves, pigeons, and lambs were offered in sacrifice and sanctified unto the Lord under the law as well as oxen: even so children and young men ought to dedicate themselves to worship and serve God as well as old folk.

Lev. vi. 13.

3. As the sacrificing fire never went out, but burned continually upon the altar: even so Christians ought to have a continual care of God's service.

Service of man.

1 Cor. xiii. 13;
xvi. 14.
Tit. ii. 14.

As that service of men which is done by constraint, carelessly, and negligently, is justly hated and rejected: so the Lord hateth and rejecteth all service of man which proceedeth not from a cheerful love and earnest zeal of His glory.

Serving against God.

Acts ix. 5

As he that beateth his heels and kicketh against sharp pricks doth nothing but hurt his own heels: so he that striveth against God prevaieth nothing, but only harmeth himself.

How to carry ourselves in Sickness and death.

As a man that is to pass through a great water doth not so much cast his eyes upon the water as on the bank that is on the other side: so we, also, in the time of sickness and death, are not so much to respect the grievousness of the same as that which followeth death—nameily, life everlasting.

Similitudes in the Scripture.

As images and pictures are not in all points alike or correspond to that which they represent, but differ in colours, bigness, or thickness: so the things and similitudes in the Scripture are not in all points alike to that which is likened unto them.

Sin.

1. LIKE as that man's disease is most perilous who lies sick and feels not his sickness, nor cannot complain of one part more than another, for then the disease hath equally troubled the whole body: so, likewise, they who live wallowing in sin, so forgetting God and all goodness that they feel no remorse of conscience for their sins, are desperate, and almost past all recovery.

2. As virtue must be embraced in heart, in affection, in countenance, as in word and deed, or else we are found breakers of the law of God: so, likewise, sin must be abstained from in heart, in affection, and in countenance, as well as in word and also in deed.

3. Like as the dead body lies rotten and stinking in the grave, fearful and loathsome to look on, and grievous to remember : even so, when we lie buried in sin, we stink in the sight of God—He cannot abide to look on us, nor will remember us.

4. As when the body lieth in sleep on the bed, which is an image of our grave, it can neither see, feel, hear, taste, smell, understand, nor yet move out of the place until it be awakened, nor can take any pleasure at all, in any one creature of God : so we, when we lie sleeping and wallowing in sin, we neither see the majesty of God with the eyes of our faith, nor feel His mercies offered unto us in and by His dear Son our Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, nor yet can taste at all how sweet the Lord is ; our ears are stopped from hearing good counsel, we perceive nothing at all of God's goodness towards us, His Word is not savoury unto us, neither yet be we moved nor stirred up to do any one good work of charity. Rom. xlii, 11

5. Like as carrion doth not only smell evilly itself, but infects all that come near it : so, likewise, that man who is defiled with any notorious sin doth not only defile all things that he takes in hand, but also all such as keep him company ; so that sin hath greater force and strength to defile other things than goodness hath to make other things holy. 1 Cor. xiv. 33.
2 Tim. ii. 16, 17.
Rom. vi. 3.

6. As a beast overladen is ready to sink under his burden, except there be present help at hand to ease him : even so we are in danger to sink into the pit of perdition, by reason of our great and grievous burden of sin, except we fly to Christ, who only and alone can unburden us, and ease and refresh us. Matt. xi. 28.

7. Like as, if we do suspect any uncleanness in us on account of which the prince or any nobleman would loathe or abhor the sight of us, we would take great pains to remove and put it away : even so much more we ought, with all diligence and speed that may be, to put away that uncleanness and filthiness of sin which doth separate and make division betwixt us and God, and that hideth His face from us, that He will not hear us. Isa. lix. 2.
Jer. v. 25.

8. Like as, if there were an imposthume about the stomach of a man, or in his bowels, it would be never a whit the worse for him if it were seen, that it might be lanced : even so that man who thinketh himself to be whole and sound, because he will not see his sin and disease, he must needs be void of all wit and reason.

9. Like as a man that hath a disease or sore in his body, before he can be cured of it he must see it, feel the pain of it, and be in fear lest it bring him into danger of death ; after this, he shall see himself to stand in need of physic and long till he be with the physician, and when he is once come to him, he desireth him of all loves to help him, and to show the best skill he can ; he will not spare for any cost ; then he yields himself into the physician's hands, persuading himself that, by God's blessing, he both can and will help him ; after this he comes to his former health again : so, in like manner, every man is wounded with the deadly wound of sin at the very heart, and he that would be saved and escape damnation must see his sin, be sorrowful for it, and utterly despair of his own strength, to attain salvation thereby ; furthermore, he must see himself to stand in need of Christ, the good Physician of his soul, and long after Him, and cry unto Him with deep sighs and groans for mercy ; after this, Christ Jesus will come with a plaster of His own heart's blood, which being applied, he shall find himself revived, and shall come to the assurance of the forgiveness of all his sins. Ps. li. 1, 3, 8, 12,
17.

10. As a man that hath lost wife, goods, and children should be much grieved : so he that hath committed great sins ought to be as a man bruised between the wall and the door.

11. Like as a man is more to be blamed who goeth out of his way in the clear sun at noontide than he who misseth his way by night with a candle : even so are men more to be punished for such foul sins as they commit in the clear light of the Gospel than those who sinned in the time of the law.

Isa. xlii. 22.

12. As of clouds, when they be vanished away, there is nothing seen : even so the sins of God's people, when He forgiveth them, are clearly put both out of sight and remembrance.

13. As opium, henbane, and other things extremely cold, hide not pain, but make the body so astonished for a time that it feelth not the pain, but afterward, when it cometh to its feeling, the disease and pain are commonly more grievous than before : so sin and want of zeal, &c., hide not from torment of conscience, but make the soul so astonished for a time that it feelth not the torment, yet afterward, when it cometh to its feeling again, the torment is more desperate than before.

14. As it would not avail or profit a city diligently to watch at one gate and keep it shut against the enemy if, in the meanwhile, all the rest stood wide open to him : so, likewise, it is to no purpose to keep ourselves from one sin or vice unless we make account and conscience to abandon ourselves from all other vices.

1 Cor. ix. 27.
Gal. v. 24.
Col. iii. 5.
2 Tim. ii. 21.

15. Like as surgeons, when they must cut off any part of the body, are wont to lay plasters to it to mortify it, that, being without sense and feeling, it may be cut off with less pain : even so, in like manner, we are to use all helps and remedies prescribed in the Word, which serve to weaken or kill sin, that in death it may be abolished.

16. As a debt doth bind a man either to make satisfaction or else to go to prison : so, likewise, our sins bind us either to satisfy God's justice or else to suffer eternal damnation.

17. As we see by experience that a ship which leaketh is more easily emptied at the beginning than afterward ; or as a ruinous house, the longer it is let run, the more charge and labour will it require in the repairing ; or as we see that, if a man drive a nail with a hammer, the more blows he giveth to it the harder it is to pluck it out again : even so that man who committeth sin upon sin, and by perseverance therein thinketh to find the redress thereof more easy hereafter than now, is greatly deceived.

18. As a river that glideth and runneth very swiftly until there be a dam or beam put, then it makes a swelling and a roaring, neither by any means will it be quiet : so man's sinful life doth pass quietly without any noise till the beam of God's justice cometh athwart him.

Rom. vi. 23.

19. As a round bowl, thrown down a steep hill, never ceaseth or stayeth till it come to the foot and bottom thereof : so, likewise, man's corruption of itself, as prone to sin as a bowl to run down a hill, never ceaseth to sin till it receive the reward thereof, which is death.

20. As gunpowder or a rotten tree-fired at the root never ceaseth burning till it be all consumed : so the wicked will never give over their sinning till all hope of eternal life be utterly taken away.

21. As tinder catcheth the least spark and is kindled thereby : so, likewise, our corrupt nature is easily provoked and drawn to sin.

22. As the viper conceiveth her young to her own death : so, also, man admitteth sin into his heart, but to his own great hurt.

23. Like as the midwife is busy about a woman in travail to bring forth the child into the world : so busy, also, is Satan until he hath brought forth the monstrous birth of sin in men's conversations.

Rom. xiii. 13.

24. As huge as the sea is, yet one may taste the saltness of it in a drop : so, likewise, in one sin we may see how ill-savoured the rest be.

Gen. iii. 6.

25. As the forbidden tree, when it promised our parents knowledge, took their knowledge from them : so every sin giveth other wages than it promiseth.

26. Like as if a man pass by some high, dangerous place in the night when he cannot see, he is not afraid ; but if you bring him back again in the day, and let him see what a steep and dangerous way he came, he will not be brought the same way again for anything : so it is in sinning ; for men living in ignorance and blindness practise any wickedness, and do not care for God's judgment ; but when God, of His goodness, bringeth them back, and openeth their eyes to see the downfall to the pit of hell and the judgments of God due to their sins, then they say they will never sin as they have done, but become new men, and walk in the way to eternal life.

27. As it is the nature of a canker or gangrene to run from one joint to another—from the toe to the foot, from the foot to the leg, from the leg to the thigh—till it have wasted and destroyed the life of the body : even so, if we give sin but an entrance, it will soon overspread the whole man ; and if the devil may be suffered but to put one talon in our hearts, he will presently wind himself into us, his head, his body, and all.

28. As men who work in mines and coal-pits under the earth are troubled with nothing so much as with damp, which make their candle burn dark, and sometimes put it quite out : even so every man's sins are the damp of his heart, which, when they take place, do dim the light of his judgment, and cast a mist over his mind, and darken his understanding and reason.

29. Like as, if a man should commit such an heinous offence as that he could no other way escape death but by the prince's pardon, he neither would nor could be at rest till, by one means or other, he had obtained the same, and had gotten it written and sealed, which done, he would carry it home, lock it up safe and sound, and many times look upon it with great joy and gladness : even so such is the case of every one of us. By nature we are rebels and traitors against God, and have by our sins deserved ten thousand deaths ; now our only stay and refuge is that Christ the Son of God was condemned for us, and therefore in Christ we must sue for pardon at God's hands, and never rest till we have the assurance thereof sealed up in our hearts and consciences, always remembering that ever after we lead a new life, and never commit the like sins against God any more.

30. Like as, if a man should be so far in debt that he could not be freed unless the surety should be cast into prison for his sake, nay, which is more, be cruelly put to death for his debt, it would make him at his wits' end and his very heart to bleed : so, likewise, is the case with us, by reason of our sins. We are God's debtors, yea, bankrupts, before Him, yet have we gotten a good Surety, even the Son of God Himself, who, to recover us to our former liberty, was crucified for the discharge of our debt.

Matt. xviii. 23, &c.
Ezek. xii. 10.

31. As the ivy by little and little creepeth upon the oak, till at last it doth overgrow and destroy the oak : so, likewise, doth sin by little and little get up, and get the strongest and mightiest men sometimes under it, as it did Solomon, and David, and Peter, and divers others, for all their wisdom, and learning, and judgment, and experience, which they had both of themselves and of the world.

32. As a little leaven soureth the whole lump of dough ; or as a little fire, whereof but one spark is sufficient to kindle a great fire and to burn down a whole city ; or as a tree whose stubs, remaining in the ground, are enough to give one a fall ; or as Jezebel, that painted harlot, whose very remnants, as the skull of her head and the palms of her hands, must be buried, lest they infect the air ; or as a mote in the sun is but a little thing, and yet enough to hinder the sight, to pain the eye, and to trouble the whole body ; or as a hair is but a little thing, yet enough to stifle a man ; or as the flies of Egypt were but little things, yet not the least of the plagues ; or as the lice were less than the flies, yet one of the greatest plagues that came unto Egypt : even so such be our sins which we call little sins and the Papists call venial sins, that, as they allege, may be washed away with a little holy water, &c. We count them little or nothing, and not to be stood upon, nor once to be touched, but in time we may prove them to be the greatest plagues that will trouble us, if securely and rashly we venture upon them.

2 Kings ix. 30, &c.
Exod. viii. 16, 21.

33. As a moth-eaten garment and worm-eaten wood hath no more use but to be cast away, the one to the dunghill the other to the fire : even so no more use with God hath a soul moth-eaten and worm-eaten with sin but to be cast out of God's presence into the fire.

34. As we are loth to have our wounds often grated upon, and cannot well away (endure) to have our sores rifled, seared, lanced, but rather covet to have them fed with healing salve: so, likewise, we are hardly brought to have our consciences ground, or our sins ransacked, sifted, searched, and ripped up, but rather we could wish to have them plastered with sweet promises and bathed in the mercies of God.

35. As it is far safer, before incarnative and healing medicines, to use corrosive and mundifying (cleansing) waters, without which, though some sores may seem to close and skin up apace, yet they prove worse and be rotten still at the core, for they have above a thin skin and underneath rotten flesh: so, in like manner, we would cloak, hide, and cover our sins, as it were, with a curtain; but it is more sound chirurgery and divinity to have our consciences pricked and pierced with the burning iron of the law, and so to cleanse the wound of our soul by sharp threatening, lest that skin, being pulled over the conscience for awhile, we lament the rotten corruption which remains uncured underneath, and so be constrained to cry out of our sins openly.

36. As it is a folly to dissemble our sores whilst they be curable, and afterward to make them known when they be incurable: even so it is a great folly to dissemble our sins whilst they may be remedied, and afterward be constrained to blaze them all abroad when they are remediless.

Gal. iv. 7.

37. As wild beasts, so long as they are sleeping, stir not, but, being awaked, they fly in a man's face and rend out his throat: even so, in like manner, the sins which a man committeth lie at the door of his heart, though he feel them not, and if he do not prevent the danger by speedy repentance God will make him to feel them once before he die, and raise up such terrors in his conscience that he shall think himself to be in hell before he be in hell, and therefore it is good for every man to take heed how he continues an enemy to Christ.

38. As men may be too careful, in seeking after physicians, to remove the diseases of their bodies: so may they be too careless, in seeking after Christ, to remove the sins of their souls.

39. As the body is soon hurt with wounds, but is not cured save with much grief and torments: so the soul is soon wounded with sin, but it is not so soon or easily healed.

40. Like as it is easier for one to hold a stone while he hath it than to recover it when it is fallen out of his hand: so it is easier to prevent and eschew sin than to recall or hide it when once committed.

41. As, in a well, except there be some water in it, we cannot easily see the baggage that lieth in the bottom: so, in the depth of the heart, without tears we cannot see our sins, for the less our sorrows are, the greater are our sins.

42. As he that waxeth pale, and is afraid of the hissing and biting of a viper, and doth run to the physician: even so much more is filthy sin to be abhorred and feared, which hath worse poison than all vipers, and much sooner demandeth medicines and a remedy to be sought for it.

43. As, when we walk and live according to God's Word, and in His fear, we go to God, to heaven, and to everlasting life: so, by sinning, in lieu of going forward, we slip back and draw towards death.

44. As he who flieth from his enemies that pursue him, and in lieu of saving himself in some town, turneth back towards them, and so putteth himself into their hands: even so we cannot turn back—that is to say, offend God—but with this condition, that we shall fall into ruin and everlasting perdition.

45. As he who is fallen into a deep cave cannot so easily get out as he fell in: so it is easy to sin, but not so easy to be rid of it again.

46. As we are all angry with Adam because he obeyed his wife rather than God : so we must be angry with ourselves for our sins, in that we study to obey and please our flesh and men more than God.

47. As God did allow the good things, but ever had somewhat to say for the evil that He found in the seven churches : so will His Majesty reckon with us for all our sins, not only of omission, but commission, although He do find some, yea, many good things amongst us. Rev. ii. 1, &c.

48. As he who taketh a taste of honey is easily drawn on by its sweetness to eat of it to his great hurt : so the pleasure of sin, being once felt and enjoyed, will not afterwards be easily rejected and condemned.

49. As the merchant venturer, having sustained a great loss by sea, or the soldier a great wound in battle, often becomes desperate and careless of his own estate : so, in like manner, a Christian, by committing some grievous sin, is brought to this pass, that he layeth aside the care and study of holiness, and letteth all go at sixes and sevens.

50. As one who has a weak constitution of body, being in safety, and, as we say, out of gunshot, is more likely to live than the strongest man being in battle in the midst of his enemies : even so a weak man, being out of temptation, and avoiding occasions of sin, is more likely to stand than he who rashly rusheth upon the pikes, and hath many occasions of sinning, although in his mind, affection, and purpose, he doth more abhor sin, and so hath a greater measure of the contrary grace than the other.

51. Even as men do most fortify by art those places of their towns and cities which are weakest by nature, and flock thither apace to defend where they see the enemy most busy in assaulting : so care in avoiding sin, by considering the nature and effects of it, and by eschewing the occasions of it, ought to be exercised chiefly in regard to those sins, and the occasions of them, whereunto we know ourselves naturally inclined, to the which we are oftenest tempted, and have oftenest yielded.

52. As that city which is continually besieged and assaulted cannot but be taken at length at one time or other, as they who have the care and defence of it committed unto them cannot but sometimes remit of their diligence, and be overtaken with sleep, drink, forgetfulness, fair promises and pretences, or by some such means : so, where the corruption of sin is continually working in the heart, it cannot be but that it should at one place or other, upon one or other occasion or temptation, burst forth into open sin.

53. As a most naughty (worthless) root, being not plucked up out of the ground, doth continually grow and bud more and more : even so sin, when we cherish it, doth get daily new strength unto it, until a monstrous flood of sins has overcome us.

54. Like as when one man standeth bound to another for the performance of divers covenants, if he break but one he forfeiteth his bond, but if he break two, three, or more of the covenants, then is not only his bond forfeited, but also the law hath more force and vantage against him to condemn him ; or as he that standeth bound to another for the payment of a piece of money at a certain day, and breaketh his day, is yet, nevertheless, still indebted, although the creditor do not straightway sue for his bond, but of good will forbeareth him for a time : even so, by every sin, we increase our debt to God, for if we break one tittle of God's law, and fail in one point, we are guilty of all, and have forfeited our obligation ; but if we of purpose, and willingly, heap sin upon sin, and, as it were, make an art of sinning, our condemnation shall then be the greater. And although the Lord, in His mercy, forbeareth for a time to take punishment of us for our sins, to the end to move us to repentance, yet stand we still debtors unto Him, and are to yield an account for the same at His good pleasure. James ii. 10.
Deut. xxviii. 58.
Rom. ii. 4.

55. As that steward who doth spend and waste His master's substance without regard, and never looketh to his debt book, is commonly laid in prison : even so he that never trieth himself by the law of God, neither in the first nor second table shall be placed, as Christ Mark ix. 44, 46,
Matt. xxii. 13.
Rev. xix. 20.

saith, where the worm dieth not, and where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, for by every sin and transgression we do increase our debts, which God will require of us, except we crave of Him, with a lively faith, pardon of them.

Sin covered by Christ's innocence.

Gal. iii. 27.

As a garment or cloak doth serve to cover our bodies: even so the innocency, justice, and holiness of Christ Jesus doth serve to cover our sins before the judgment of God, to the end that there appear not one spot of them in His sight.

Sin, how carefully it is to be avoided.

1. As the diseases of the body and corporal death do so much disquiet and trouble our minds, that we commonly tremble and quake only at the mention of them: even so how much more ought we to fear the sickness of the soul and death of the same, which cometh by reason of sin, than which there can be no greater nor more fearful calamity come unto us.

2. Like as every man doth avoid, so much as in him lieth, the pain, miseries, diseases, and death of the body: even so how much more ought we to decline and eschew the death of the soul, and the causes of this evil, which be sins and offences, and fear the anger of God, which, by our transgressions, we do so heavily procure.

3. As the physician, seeing by the water in a glass the diseases within the body, doth, by skill and learning, search out the cause of the disease, and minister good things for the same: even so we, in looking into the glass of God's Word, shall soon perceive the diseases and infections of sin which are in us, and the cause thereof, and so wholesomely minister some profitable and comfortable remedies for the same.

4. As little thieves, being let in at a window, will set open great gates for greater thieves to come in at: even so, if we accustom ourselves to commit little sins, and let them reign in us, they will make us the fitter for greater offences, to get the advantage of us, and to take hold on us.

5. As all kinds of wild beasts, escaping out of the snare, will take heed lest they come there any more—yea, even though they should be in bondage unto man, the most excellent of all other creatures; yet man by sin falling into the snares of Satan will not beware, though he shall be in bondage to the most cursed of all creatures.

6. As a drunken man, whilst he gorgeeth abundance of wine, feeleth no inconvenience thereby, but afterwards he seeth and feeleth the inconvenience of the same: so, in like manner, sin, whilst it is in committing, doth darken the light of reason, howbeit, afterwards, the conscience arising sheweth both the ugliness of sin and the absurdity of the fact (deed), and so vexeth the soul more grievously than if all the world accused him of the same.

Sin, how dangerous a thing it is.

1. As it skilleth (differeth) not whether the ship sink by sipping and leaking in of the water in a long time or whether it be overwhelmed by surges at once: even so, whether little sins or great sins work our destruction, it is all one, therefore we must avoid and eschew not only great sins, but little sins also.

2 Cor. v. 19.

2. Like as, if a father should be sick of such a disease that nothing could heal him but the heart's blood of his own child, he would presently judge his case to be dangerous, and would also vow, if ever he recovered, to use all means whereby he might avoid that disease : so, likewise, seeing nothing could cure the deadly wound of our sin but a plaster made of the heart's blood of Christ, it must make us acknowledge our pitiful case and the heinousness of the least of our sins, and stir us up to newness of life.

How Sin dependeth on God.

LIKE as the physician coming unto the sick person doth by medicines draw corrupt humours out of his body, and bringeth them out either by a purgation, or by a sweat, or vomit, or letting of blood, as he judgeth it best, yet doth he not graft in the sick person naughty and corrupt humours : even so God causeth to be brought to light our malice, which was not brought forth before, but lay hid within, to make manifest His justice and to open our sins, and yet He suffereth them not to break forth by chance or rashly, but ordereth and governeth them according to His judgment, so that even by them He doth fulfil the limits of His providence.

Sin in all men.

1. As we see that those rivers which spring out of little wells are of the same nature as the head and spring whereof they come, though they run two or three hundred miles off through divers countries, or as those crabs are sour and bitter this day which grow on a crab tree a hundred or two hundred years old, because the first root and plant was sour and bitter : so, likewise, we all be sinful that are born of Adam, and sour and bitter as he was, because he the first tree was such a one, and the spring whereof we came was corrupt and filthy.

1 Cor. xv. 21, 22.
Heb. vii. 9, 10.
Rom. v. 12.

2. As there is no bread without bran, no corn without chaff, no garden without weeds, no wine without lees, no gold without dross : so there is no wight (person) that liveth, hath lived, or shall live, merely a man, without sin.

Sin is noisome to God's Spirit.

As the smoke of any filthy smelling thing driveth away bees : so the smoke of the dunghill of our corruptions—namely, our sins—will drive away the Holy Ghost out of our hearts.

Sin is to be reprov'd in all estates.

As those who have corn-fields think it not a thing unmeet to be told by their servants of thistles and weeds which would hinder and mar the corn, if they provide not to have them plucked up : even so it is not an unworthy thing to show unto those who are of high calling the hurtful and dangerous weeds which would overgrow and choke the heavenly seed of the Gospel sown in the Lord's field.

Sin increaseth by use of ungodly means to be freed from it.

As a bird, the more she struggleth, having lime twigs on her wings, the faster is she ensnared ; or like a fish taken with a bait ; or as a man who washeth himself in a pool that is muddy in the bottom, the more he washeth, the fouler he becometh : so, likewise, a man being in sin, striving to get out by ungodly means, the more he striveth, the more he infecteth himself with sin.

Sin maketh our bodies the devil's dungeon.

1 Cor. vi. 15.

LIKE as, if a man had a fair house, wherein he must entertain a king, and should make thereof a swine-sty or a stable, all men would say that he did greatly abuse both the house and the king : even so man's body, being at the first made a palace for the everliving God, if a man shall abuse it by drunkenness, swearing, lying, fornication, or any uncleanness, he doth make it, instead of a temple for the Holy Ghost, to be a sty or stable for the devil ; for the more filthy a man's body is, the more fit it is to be a dwelling-place for sin and Satan.

There is no Sin whatsoever but it is forbidden by the law of God, nor any good work but it is there commanded.

Rom. vi. 23.
Rom. iii. 5, 6.
Ps. xix. 7.
James i. 25.

LIKE as, if a king, being resolved to forgive no offence worthy of death, were to set down a law and declare that if his subjects kept it truly in every point, they should escape the edge of his sword, and be well promoted, yet one man for all that doeth or omitteth some matter worthy of death, which being done, the king conventeth him before his judgment seat as a malefactor, layeth to his charge the committing of an evil or omitting of some good not contained in his law, and, upon confession thereof, giveth sentence of condemnation against him. Now, in such a case, the party might well answer his king that he were unjust and his law imperfect : even so, in like sort, forasmuch as the Lord hath decreed death to be the certain reward of every sin, and hath given His law for this intent, to teach man to avoid whatsoever is damnable, and that whosoever observed all things written in His law might live thereby. If there be any sin (that is, anything that He will damn a man for) not forbidden, or any good work not commanded in His law, then is God unjust and the law imperfect, of which neither is true: for, as for God, He is not unrighteous ; and, as for the law, it is perfect.

Preventing of Sin.

Hos. ii. 6.

1. EVEN as a father, when he sees his child too bold and venturous about fire and water, takes and holds him over the fire or over the water, as though he would burn or drown him, whereas his purpose, indeed, is nothing else but to prevent danger for the time to come : so, in like manner, Christ's subjects are bold to sin by nature, and therefore to prevent a mischief, He doth exercise them with affliction, and seems, for a season, as though He would quite forsake His Church ; but His meaning is only to prevent offences in times to come.

2. As beasts, which going in the way see green pastures and desire to enter in, and therefore go to the hedge, but feeling the sharpness of the thorns, dare not venture to go in : so, likewise, God's people, like unto wild beasts in respect of sin, viewing the green pastures of this world, which are the pleasures thereof, are greatly affected therewith, and if it were not for the sharpness of crosses and temptations, which are God's spiritual hedge, by which He keepeth them in, they would range out of the way and rush into sin as the horse into the battle.

Sin of set purpose.

Luke xii. 47, 48.

As he that striketh the king ignorantly, not knowing him to be the king, is nothing like in so much fault as he that striketh him knowing it is the king : even so he that doth offend God of ignorance is to be less blamed than he that wittingly and willingly offendeth Him.

Sin the cause of affliction.

As no man ought to accuse and blame the physician as though he were the only occasion of the corrupt humours within the body, notwithstanding that he hath so brought and driven them out that a man may evidently see and perceive them, but the misbehaviour and intemperate diet of the man himself is the very right occasion and the only root thereof: even so we ought not to ascribe any blame or fault unto God, if He send us heaviness, rain, and trouble, but to think that it is a medicine and remedy meet for our sins, and every man ought to ascribe the very cause and occasion thereof unto himself and his own sins, and to refer blame to nothing else.

Dan. ix. 5-7.
Jonah i. 1-8.

Sin which is committed of frailty differeth from apostasy and backsliding.

LIKE as it is one thing to soil a body's feet after they be washed, and another matter to go tumble all the body again in filth and mire like swine; or as it is not all alike when a woman doth sometimes offend her husband, as when she breaketh her faith and bond of wedlock and setteth herself quite out from all the honest knot of wedlock: even so it is one thing simply to sin, which the children of God also do, and another matter utterly to fall and run back from the grace of God, and to mock and crucify Christ anew, which the reprobate do, and not the elect.

John xiii. 10; ii. 7.
Heb. vi. 4-6; x. 26.

Singing of Psalms.

1. As that is a godly sorrow that driveth us to prayer, a blessed heaviness that maketh us seek unto the Lord: so that is a godly mirth that endeth with singing of psalms, and a heavenly joy that at the least maketh us more fit to serve God.

2 Cor. xii. 10.
Col. iii. 16.
Eph. v. 19.
James v. 13.
2 Chron. xxxv. 25.

2. As no man can truly pray without the feeling of his wants: so no man can sing from his heart unless he have some persuasion of God's favour; and so, as affliction driveth him to pray, mirth moveth him to sing.

Acts xvi. 25.

3. As all knowledge is increased, especially by hearing, reading, and conferring about the Scripture: so all affections are most of all stirred up by meditation, prayer, and singing of psalms.

Ps. cxlvii. 1.

4. Like as, when the light of the Gospel came first in, singing of ballads, that was rife in the time of Popery, began to cease, and in time was clean banished away in many places: so, likewise, the sudden renewing of them and hasty receiving of them everywhere maketh us to suspect lest they should drive away the singing of psalms again, seeing they cannot stand together; and of this we are so much the more jealous because we see that, in other places, where those ballads be not received in, yet even there the singing of psalms is greatly left off from that it had wont to be.

5. As the ungodly have a grace in their wickedness, and are therefore the better liked among the ungodly, though, indeed, they are then most deformed: so this singing of psalms maketh us comely before God and lovely in the eyes of His Church, when we, having prepared our hearts thereunto, do sing with affection, with reverence, and with understanding.

Ps. xxxiii. 1.
Rev. xiv. 3.

6. Even as a costly garment may be comely in itself and yet not become us, unless we be fit for it and it be well put upon us: so, though to sing be never so comely in its own nature, yet it becometh not us except we be prepared for it, and do sing David's psalms with David's spirit.

Eph. v. 19.
Col. iii. 16.
2 Chron. xxix. 30.

7. Like as expert physicians are wont, for the most part, to anoint the brinks of the cups with honey when they minister their bitter potions to sick children, lest they should abhor their health for the bitterness of their drinks : even so the Holy Ghost, perceiving that mankind is with much difficulty trained to virtue, and that we be very negligent in things concerning the true life indeed, by reason of our great inclination to worldly pleasures and delectations, hath invented and mixed in His form of doctrine the delectation of music by the Psalms, to the intent that the commodity (advantage) of the doctrine might secretly steal into us whilst our ears be touched with the pleasantness of the melody ; so that for this end these sweet and harmonious songs were devised for us, that such as be children by age or children by manners should indeed have their souls wholesomely instructed, though for the time they seem but to sing only.

Sinner.

1. LIKE as God is much pleased with the prayer of the just : even so much more doth He delight in the amendment of the sinner ; for it doth little profit for the one to multiply his prayers if the other do not diminish his sins.

2. As an earthly father, when his child is sick, will not cast him away, but take pity upon him : so much more our Heavenly Father, when a sinner humbleth himself before Him and lamenteth his sins, will show his fatherly affection toward him that repenteth.

3. As in the first dawning of the day, in which, though the darkness remain and be more in quantity than the light, yet when the sun hath already cast some beams of light in the air, then the breaking of the day appeareth : even so the conversion of a sinner is not wrought all at one instant, but in continuance of time and by certain measures and degrees ; so that he is in the first degree of his conversion, when the Holy Ghost, by the means of the Word, inspires him with some spiritual motions, and begins to regenerate and renew the inward powers of his soul.

Impenitent Sinners.

Mark xvi. 9.

LIKE as a captain that hath taken some hold or sconse (fort) doth rule and govern all therein, and disposeth it at his will and pleasure : even so it is with all blind, ignorant, and impenitent sinners ; not one devil alone, but even legions of devils, possess them and rule their hearts, and therefore howsoever they may sooth themselves and say, "All is well, for God is merciful," yet their case is far worse than Mary Magdalen's was, who had been possessed with seven devils.

Little Sins to be regarded.

As a man may die as well by a fly choking him as by a lion devouring him ; or as a ship may be sunk as well by too much weight of mustard-seed as of great stones and lumps of lead : so, likewise, little sins will sink a man to hell as soon as great sins.

Notorious Sins.

LIKE as a man is much more to be blamed who goeth out of his way in the clear sun at noon-tide than he who goeth by night with a candle : even so men deserve much more to be punished for committing of foul and notorious sins now under the clear light of the Gospel than in the darker time of the law.

Sins of others are not to be imitated, or to be our excuse.

LIKE as if, in walking, thou shouldest see one fall that goeth before thee, thou goest not to fall with him, but thou art to be so much the more circumspect that thou fall not as he did: even so we are to remember that those foul falls and gross faults of David, and of St. Peter, and of others, are set before us—first, that they should be to us as a mirror of the frailty and weakness of man, to acknowledge that, if we be exempted and freed, it is by the grace of God; and, secondly, that we should so much the more stand upon our guard, and be watchful lest we likewise fall.

Sins are our greatest enemies.

1. As a huge and mighty fire will be assuaged and at length quite put out, if the sticks and other matter that doth cherish and increase it be withdrawn and kept from it: so, in like manner, our afflictions and troubles will come to an end if we do cease to do evil and give over sinning before it give over us, for our sins are as dry sticks and stubble, where-with the fire, not only of the wrath and malice of infidels and heretics, but also of the wrath and indignation of God, is kindled, increased, and most mightily stirred up against us.

2. As we wonder at the Creator, not only in great matters, as heaven, earth, the sun, elephants, &c., but also in such creatures as pismires, lice, worms, flies, &c.: so a soul given to Christ must as well regard little as great matters and sins, knowing that we must give an account for every idle word. Matt. xii. 36.

Slander.

1. As the hairs of the beast tarandrus are not to be pierced with any weapon: so some men are such that they are never hurt with slander or reproach.

2. Like as the chameleon can change himself into all colours save white: even so the slanderer can frame his tongue to speak anything, save for his neighbour's credit, but that he can as hardly be induced unto as the leopard to change his spots, the blackamoor his skin, or the brick its colour.

3. As a good name is to be much more esteemed than silver: so the wound of slander and defamation is almost incurable, so that a man may better beware of such as steal his goods than of the slanderer or back-biter that taketh his good name.

4. As when a wound is cured there remaineth a scar: so against a slanderer, howsoever a man purge and justify himself, yet will there still remain an evil opinion at the least in some.

5. Like as Ham, the father of the Canaanites, having seen the shame of his father Noah, and, in lieu of covering it, having showed it to his brethren, was accursed, both he and his posterity, by the mouth of his own father: even so they, who, knowing the frailty, faults, and infirmities, and, consequently, the shame and reproach, of their brethren, where they ought in charity to cover the same, do, nevertheless, by back-biting and evil speaking, lay them open, do well deserve to be accursed with Ham and called Canaanites.

6. Like as, if when sundry faggots lie by each other, shouldest thou kindle the one, by degrees it will burn them all: so, likewise, if he to whom thou hast opened thy mouth to slander and backbite thy brother hath no more hold of his tongue than thou hast of thine, thou hast put into his hand a staff wherewith, by revealing thy secret, to bring thee to brabbling and strife, and, therefore, thou oughtest not to reveal that to another which thou desirest should be kept secret.

Numb. xvi. 1, &c.
2 Sam. xvi. 3.
Esther iii. 8.
1 Sam. xxiv. 1, &c.
2 Sam. xv. 1, &c.
John vii. 20.
Matt. xi. 19.
Ps. ci. 5.
1 Cor. vi. 10.

Gen. ix. 22.
Ps. l. 19-21.
Acts xxiv. 5.
1 Sam. xxi. 1, &c.
Ps. lli. 2, &c.

7. As in a country, upon any murder or other heinous trespass, they ring the town-bell, which, when other towns or villages do hear, they likewise do ring theirs, and so from one to another, whereby all the country is soon advertised that there is some offender to be taken or stayed: even so thou, when the clock of thy tongue hath struck, look that he that heard it will likewise strike his, and his neighbour that heareth it his, and so shall the infirmity of thy neighbour soon come to the ears of many; and, therefore, if thou beest loth it should be known, then thou oughtest not to have uttered that which thou knowest every man will be ready likewise to utter.

Prov. xxv. 23.
Ps. xv. 3.

8. Like as, if there were no receivers of thefts, there would not be so many thieves: so, if none would hearken to slandering and back-biting, there would not be so many back-biters.

Exod. xxiii. 1.

9. As a shaft shot against a stone reboundeth and sometimes hurteth him that shot it: so, when a slanderer or back-biter seeth the face of him that heareth or indeed hearkeneth not unto him sad or frowning, he holdeth his peace, he waxeth pale, his countenance is troubled, and his tongue stoppeth suddenly.

10. As one stripe of the tongue woundeth three—the back-biter, him that giveth ear to the back-biting, and the back-bitten: so the two first do thereby wound their consciences to death, by deserving the sentence of eternal fire, but the third is no whit damnified (injured) but in his good name, and that, peradventure, but for a short space.

Slothful.

Prov. xv. 19.

1. As a hedge or good fence of thorns is hard to pass through: so is every way of gaining or getting to the slothful.

Prov. x. 26.

2. As vinegar is bad and hurtful to the teeth, and smoke noisome to the eyes: even so much more hurtful than either of them is a slothful servant to them that send or set him about any business.

Sluggards.

As the drunkard drinketh till he hath drunk all the money out of his purse, and all the wit out of his head, and all goodness out of his heart, so that there is no difference between him and the beast, except it be in this, that the beast can go and keep his way, which the drunkard cannot do: so the sluggard sleepeth in all security and neglecteth his business, and puts off all care of doing his duties, until he hath slept all thrift out of his shop, and all his friends out of his company, and all God's graces out of his heart, and all comfort out of his soul, and all strength out of his body, and all conscience out of his dealing, till his stock be spent, and his occupation decayed, and his customers gone, and God's Spirit gone, and all be gone, and till nothing be left but fear and shame, with poverty, penury, and a bare head and feeble shoulders to bear off the blows.

Sober in youth and childish in old age.

THERE is a people in India called Pandora, who in their youth have grey hairs, but in old age their hairs are altogether black: so some in their youth be sober and modest, but when they wax older, then they are given to more folly and trifles, insomuch that they may seem to wax children again.

Sorrow for imminent danger of death, war, hell, &c.

As there was great lamentation in Zion because of God's justice for their sins ; or as there was great lamentation for Pharaoh in Egypt, because he was a lion in the land and a dragon in the sea ; and as there was great sorrow, fasting, mourning, and weeping among the Jews because the king had decreed their deaths : even so we, the inhabitants of England, have great cause of lamentation, fasting, mourning, and weeping, because death is scaling our windows ; the beasts of the field—to wit, the Pope and the Spaniard—hungering to devour our bodies, to spoil our country, and to shed our blood as water upon the land ; while our souls are prepared for the fire of hell, by reason of sins in the common sort, of horrible cruelty in many of them that are mighty, and of the general ignorance of Christ according to His Gospel, in every sort.

Jer. ix. 17-19.
Ezek. xxxii. 1-3.
Esther iv. 3.
Jer. ix. 12.
Ezek. xxxii. 4, 6.
Matt. vii. 19 ; xiii. 43, 43.
Hos. vii. 3-5.

A Sorrowful man.

As the pelican is wont to keep alone and without company of other birds, and its voice or singing hath no pleasantness in it : so, likewise, is the estate of a sorrowful man, and a heavy heart forsaken of all men, even of those he sometimes took to be his dear friends.

Ps. cii. 6.

Sorrows.

1. LIKE as when a man, by bleeding at the nose, is brought into danger of his life, the physician lets him blood in another place, as in the arm, and turns the course of the blood another way to save his life : even so we must turn our worldly sorrows, for the loss of goods or friends, to a godly sorrow for our offences against God.

a Cor. vii. 10.

2. As moths do hurt garments and worms the wood : even so do sorrow and heaviness hurt the heart of man.

3. Even as the filthy matter or rottenness of a boil, blain, or push, being within the flesh, doth greatly grieve and vex sore the body that is sick, but if it break and run out the pain is mitigated : so sorrow, being closed and shut up in the heart of man, doth mightily torment him, but being thrust out, with tears and groans, the heart is somewhat eased and the mind a little pacified.

Ezek. xxiv. 16, 17.

4. As a great and thick smoke, vapouring out of a foul black fire, unless it have free passage and some vent or way through which it may go out, will altogether darken, bestench, and make black the house : even so sorrow and grief, proceeding out of the hot fire of adversities and calamities, being shut up in the house of man's heart, doth make it exceeding black, and doth corrupt it with black and bitter choler, unless, through the mouth or eyes, there be a breathing out of sighs sent up from the bottom of the heart, and streams of tears trickling down the cheeks. Yet an effeminate and desperate wailing, either for the dead or for any other cause, as of men without hope, is utterly to be disliked ; and that stoical opinion, also, that a wise man should never be moved, either with mercy, sorrow, mirth, or anger, is to be avoided.

Soul.

1. LIKE as, to be healthy in our bodies, it is not enough not to have the plague or a pleurisy, but generally to be free from all diseases : even so, to be holy in our souls, we must be clean from all spots and defilings, and we must take the whole law of God as a universal rule of all our thoughts, affections, words, and deeds, to the end to keep it from point to point, and not to omit anything which is there commanded us.

Rom. v. 12.

2. As sweet oil, poured into a fusty vessel, loseth its pureness and is infected by the vessel : so the soul, created good, and put into a corrupt body, receives contagion thence.

Ps. xxxi. 5.
Luke xxiii. 46.
Acts vii. 59.

3. Like as, if a man should borrow a thing of his neighbour, and use it so as to quite spoil it, he would be ashamed to bring it again to the owner in that manner, and, if he do, the owner will not receive it : even so ungodly men in this life do so stain their souls with sin, as that they can never be able to give them up into the hands of God at the day of death, and if they would, yet God accepts them not, but casts them away.

4. Like as we know that, in any common danger or peril, as the sacking of a city or burning of a house, if a man have any precious jewels therein he will first fetch them out, and make choice of a faithful friend to whose custody he will commit the same : even so, in common perils and dangers, we must always remember to commit our souls, as a most precious jewel, into the hands of God, who is a faithful Creator.

2 Cor. v. 2.
Phil. i. 23.

5. Even as a little bird shut up in a cage, although the cage be very precious and costly, and be made of cedar, ivory, or gold, yet desireth to go out, and striveth to have her liberty, and in her eager and earnest desire to be gone, she doth oftentimes thrust her bill through the loops of the cage : so, likewise, the soul of a virtuous man, inflamed with an unfeigned love of God, being shut up and holden in the coop of his body, although he abound with all necessities fit for the preservation of this temporal life, yet doth most earnestly desire to depart hence, and go to his country, which is heaven.

6. As the soul hath a heavenly and the body an earthly beginning : so the soul is immortal and doth not suffer corruption, but the body is mortal and corruptible, and yet they be so joined together without confusion, that in each remaineth its own nature.

Matt. xvi. 26.

7. As it were great folly to buy a house for the body, laying out so much thereupon that, for want of goods and other maintenance, the body so well housed should die for hunger : even so a man shall get nothing by keeping his goods for to feed and clothe the body, which is the house of the soul, and in the meantime suffer the soul to pine away and die for hunger.

Matt. ix. 43; xv.
17.
Ezek. xi. 5.

8. Like as it grieveth and maketh sorrowful an expert jeweller, when he beholdeth and seeth those jewels and precious stones which he, with all his wit, industry, and art, hath trimmed and polished, to be tumbled and tossed in the foul and filthy fingers of children and fools, who, neither knowing them nor esteeming them, do soil, blemish, and despise them : even so our Heavenly Father, when He seeth our souls, the which He hath created after His own similitude and likeness, to be in the midst and depth of the corrupted cogitations, wicked and beastly thoughts, and hellish imaginations of our hearts, He taketh it heavily and in evil part.

Luke xxiii. 42.
Phil. i. 23.

9. As the soul of Christ was received into Paradise the same day that it departed out of the body : so, also, must we think of the blessed spirits and souls of the saints according to the promise made to the thief.

10. As a body without a soul is clean dead, and nothing but a filthy, loathsome carcase : even so the soul, unless it stir up and raise itself by prayer, is dead and miserable.

11. As they that have healthful bodies easily endure both cold and heat : so they that have a staid and settled soul have the dominion over anger, grief, joy, and all other affections.

12. As the body of man by nature is mortal, lumpish, and heavy, delighting in those things which are visible and temporal, and always of itself sinketh downward : so the soul, being of a celestial nature, violently enforceth herself to fly upward, and with all her might striveth and wrestleth continually against the heavy burthen of the earthly body wherein she abideth, despising those things which are mortal, and only desiring things permanent and immortal.

13. Like as a man comforteth his earthly and corruptible body with bread and meat when it is hungry, and with ale, beer, or wine when it is thirsty : even so doth the soul of man, when the law sheweth to her her faults and eternal damnation, and the dreadful judgment of God for her offences, comfort herself in her great hunger and thirst, believing that Almighty God hath forgiven her sins for Christ's sake.

14. Even as a man, who by chance is fallen into a deep dry pit, far from succour, cannot by any means possibly help himself out unless some man come with some ladder or other instrument to help him out, of all things he desireth to be delivered out of the pit, but by his own wit he cannot tell how : even so the soul of man desireth to be delivered out of the sorrowful agony of death, hell, and damnation, but she cannot tell how otherwise than by the righteousness of Christ.

Ps. xlii. 1, 2.
John vii. 37.

For the health of the Soul the body is to be kept in subjection.

LIKE as, when one part of a man who is sick is not capable of the remedy wherewith he may be helped, the physician is wont to apply the same remedy to another part ; as if one be grieved with an extreme ache of the head, then the physician is wont to strike a vein of the arm, because the head will not abide phlebotomy, or blood-letting : even so, that we may help and heal many diseases of the soul, we must keep the body in subjection to the spirit and tame the lusts of the flesh, and labour to bridle our affections and to keep them within the compass of reason, sobriety, and temperance.

The Soul that sinneth shall die.

LIKE as every man that eateth sour grapes shall have his own teeth set on edge : so, likewise, shall every one that committeth iniquity die, not for others, but for his own sin.

Ezek. xviii. 2.
Jer. xxxi. 30.

They whom God setteth on work must needs Speak.

As, when the lion roareth, whosoever is within compass of his voice cannot choose but be afraid : so, when the Lord speaketh, what prophet or preacher of His can hold his peace.

Jer. xlvii. 4.
Amos iii. 8.

The Spirit.

1. As comfrey, sodden and put with minced-meat, bringeth it altogether again into one mass or lump : so the Spirit joineth in one those who were severed if He be among them.

2. As balm, put into beehives, causeth the bees to keep together and others to come unto them : so where the Spirit of God is, it causeth Christians to abide in one and draweth others unto them.

Christ's Spirit.

1. As the light cannot match with darkness : so, likewise, Christ's Spirit cannot accord and match with sin and lusts of the flesh.

2 Cor. vi. 14.

2. As rain, with the moisture thereof, fatteneth the earth to make it fruitful : even so the Holy Spirit, with His invisible grace, doth make us fruitful to produce the fruits of righteousness.

John vii. 38.

3. As fire consumeth everything that it layeth hold on : so the Spirit of God consumeth all the corruption of our hearts and original sin in us.

Eph. i. 17.

4. As fire giveth light to the bodily eyes : so the Spirit giveth light to the eyes of the soul.

Eph. i. 17.

5. As fire giveth life and quickeneth those that be benumbed with cold : so the Spirit of God doth quicken and put life into those that be dead in their sins.

Eph. i. 13

6. As a man who hath made a bargain will be careful to keep the earnest penny, that he lose not all his bargain : so, also, must we be careful to keep the Spirit of God—the earnest penny of our salvation—that we be not deprived of the same.

God's Spirit purifieth.

Ezek. xxxvi. 25.

1. As clean water washeth and maketh clean our bodies : so the Spirit of God maketh our hearts and souls clean in the eyes and sight of God.

1 Cor. xii. 3.

2. As no man who hath the Spirit of God can blaspheme Christ and worship idols : so none can acknowledge Christ for Lord and God without the same Spirit.

Matt. iii. 11.
John iii. 5.

3. As John, by the fire and Spirit, meaneth nothing but the Spirit of God, who purgeth and purifieth as the fire doth : even so our Saviour, by water and the Spirit, meaneth nothing else but the Spirit of God, who cleanseth the filth of sin, and cooleth the boiling heat of an unquiet conscience, as water washeth the thing which is foul and quencheth the heat of the fire.

Not to grieve the Spirit of God.

Eph. iv. 30.

1. As men use their guests friendly and courteously, showing unto them all service and duty : so, likewise, must we do to God's Spirit, who is to come to dwell and abide in us, doing nothing in any case which may disquiet or molest Him.

2 Sam. vi. 11.
1 Thess. v. 19.

2. Like as when the ark of the covenant, which was a sign of the presence of God, was in the house of Obed-edom, then the Lord blessed him and all his house : even so much more, when the Holy Ghost dwells in any man's heart, there is more than the ark of the Lord present, even God Himself, and therefore such an one may look for a greater blessing if he grieve not Him by sinning.

Our Spirit must strive to overcome the flesh.

LIKE as in Christ the spirit far surpasseth and overcometh the flesh : even so must it do in us also, we must have more respect unto God and unto life everlasting than unto this our worm-eaten flesh.

Spirits that die in the Lord.

Luke xxiii. 43.
Rev. xiv. 13.

EVEN as the spirit of Christ passed from the cross into Paradise at the very same moment that it departed out of the body, and thence returned into the body, that the whole Christ, in respect that He was man, might be afterwards glorified : so, likewise, all good Christians do believe that the spirits and souls of those who die in the Lord do straightway depart unto God, there to enjoy that measure of glory that is appointed for them until that, they being adjoined again unto the same bodies (which will be the very same in substance truly corporal, though in a far more excellent estate) shall live under Christ their Head for evermore.

The Spirits to be tried.

As merchants credit men so far as their wealth and money will reach, but yet trust not them that do not keep their day and credit: even so, in the promises that deceivers make unto their fellows, we must regard what ground they have for them, and how they can be performed.

It is Spiritual adultery to forsake Christ and love the world.

EVEN as a woman may rightly be called an adulteress who setteth her love on another, as well as she who giveth her body to other men: so they who fly from Christ and forsake Him, being their spiritual Husband, by setting their love on this world, or anything therein, do commit adultery against Christ.

James iv. 4.
Eph. v. 30.
1 Cor. vi. 17.

Spiritual graces from God.

LIKE as the earth engendereth not rain, nor is able by its own strength, labour, or travel, to procure the same, but receiveth it of the mere gift of God from above: even so faith, grace, forgiveness of sins, and Christian righteousness, are given us of God without our works or deservings.

2. As the earth of itself is not able to get or procure to itself seasonable showers of rain to make it fruitful: even so much less are we able, by our own strength, works, and deservings, to win and procure to ourselves faith, grace, forgiveness of sins, or Christian righteousness, unless God Himself, by mere imputation, and by His unspeakable gift, do bestow the same upon us.

Spiritual man.

As a man sore wounded or diseased may for a time or season be deprived almost of all operations of the natural life, so as to appear without sense or feeling: even so may a spiritual man be sore wounded by Satan, and so diseased by the present sight and feeling of his sinful corruption, especially in temptation, that he may think, yea, even appear to others as though the life of the Spirit were not in him.

A Spiritual man discerneth all things.

As a man of clear eyesight is able to judge of colours, and to know one colour from another: even so such as are indued with the grace of God do as plainly and evidently judge of God's Word, and try out the truth thereof, from the devices and doctrines of men.

Who is a Spiritual man.

As the Scriptures call that man carnal who is not renewed by the Spirit and born again in Christ, and all his works carnal likewise, even the very motions of his heart and mind, his learning, doctrine, and contemplation of high things, his preaching, teaching, and study in the Scripture, building of churches, schools, or hospitals, founding of colleges, giving of alms, and whatsoever he doth, though they seem spiritual, and after the law of God never-somuch: so, contrariwise, he is spiritual who is renewed in Christ, and whose works all spring from faith, seem they never so gross—as the washing of the disciples' feet done by

John iii. 6.
1 Cor. ii. 15.

our Saviour Christ, and Peter's fishing, after the resurrection—yea, deeds of matrimony are pure and spiritual if they proceed of faith; and whatsoever is done within the laws of God, though it be wrought by the body, as the very wiping of shoes, and such like, howsoever gross it may appear outwardly, yet it is all sanctified.

The State of man.

As the good estate of a subject or servant consisteth in this, that he, living in the favour and good liking of his king or master, procured by his loyal obedience and faithful service, is free from all evils and injuries, and enjoyeth all things either needful or pleasant: so the state of man, when pure from sin, is good and happy, but, otherwise, by sinning and rebelling against God, he incurreth His displeasure, and becometh most wretched and miserable.

The Steward's reward.

Matt. xxiv. 45, 46.
&c.

1. As men be bountiful unto those servants whose faithfulness and diligence they have good trial of, as well in their absence as in their presence: and, on the contrary side, they are angry, severe, and sharp to them who deceive their expectations and do not answer the trust which is reposed in them: even so much more justly will God put the like difference in rewarding the good endeavours, or punishing the negligence, of them to whom He hath committed services of trust to His people and Church.

Luke xii. 47, 48.

2. As men have just cause with more sharpness and greater severity to punish those servants to whom they have showed their mind and will, and who yet have neglected their business, than others who do it not because they know it not: so, likewise God, to whomsoever He hath revealed most, and upon whom He hath bestowed the greatest gifts of knowledge, if, notwithstanding, they be negligent in using those gifts to the profit of His Church, them will He punish most severely and sharply above all others.

Strength.

LIKE as, through weakness, man's mind is overcome and brought into base slavery unto all evil; so, likewise, by strength, it overcometh and hath the victory, and is advanced unto freedom and dignity.

Immoderate Study.

As the field overmuch dunged is burned and withereth away: so immoderate study and learning do utterly dull and make blunt the student's brain.

Some Snared with their own devices.

Ps. lvii. 6.
Prov. xxvi. 2.
Eccles. x. 8.

As Perillus, who gave the brazen bull to the tyrant Phalaris, was caused by the said Phalaris to be the first pained and tormented in the same engine which he had invented: even so some do fall into the pit and snare which they had made and devised for others.

The Subjects' duty to their magistrates.

1. As St. Peter admonisheth servants to be subject to their masters, albeit froward and peevish : so are subjects bound to obey the magistrate, albeit an infidel, a wicked man, or an idolater.

1 Pet. ii. 18.
Rom. xiii. 1.
Tit. iii. 1.
1 Pet. ii. 13, 14.

2. As the Christian religion doth not subvert the order or policy of the state : so the wickedness and impiety of the magistrate doth not deprive him of his right to command, neither doth it exempt subjects from their duty to obey.

3. So long as there remaineth in princes the image and ordinance of God : even so long continueth the bond of subjects to yield obedience to magistrates, not as to men, but as to God.

Exod. ix. 16.
Dan. ii. 37.
1 Sam. xxi. 1, &c.
Jer. xxvi. 7 ;
xxix. 7 ; xxxv. 9.
Ezek. xxix. 18.
1 Sam. xxvi. 9.
Judges v. 9 ; 23.

4. As God armeth the magistrate with the sword, for the preservation of his subjects against the violence of their enemies, and to enforce rebels to yield obedience to lawful decrees : so when alone, or with his sergeants and officers, he is not able to perform this duty, he may and ought to command his subjects to help him to execute his office, and they are bound at his commandment to take arms and to employ themselves.

5. As by natural affection the hands and other members of the body do stand bound to employ themselves for the safety of the body, but especially of the head, against all violence and injury : so, likewise, ought all subjects to think upon the natural bond and affection and duty they owe their head, and should labour to preserve the body of the commonalty, but especially the person and authority of their prince and magistrate, against the violence and endeavours of their enemies.

1 Sam. xi. 7, 9.
Judges xxi. 8, &c.

6. As the magistrate is by God authorized to levy tolls, taxes, tributes, and many other subsidies of the people : so are the subjects bound to furnish and pay them.

Rom. xiii. 7.
Matt. xxii. 21 ;
xvii. 25-27.

Swearers.

LIKE as, if we see a man hold up his hand at the bar of an earthly judge, we pity him and are sorry for him : even so much more ought we to pity common swearers and blasphemers, who are no better before God than rebels, and who must hold up their hands at the bar of His judgment-seat as guilty malefactors.

Swearing.

LIKE as he who maketh a custom of striking with his hand is likely that he should sometimes strike unjustly : even so he that maketh a custom of swearing in true matters, will, at length, even forswear himself in matters of no importance, by reason of his custom and use, which he hath got in swearing.

Tale-bearers.

As wood serveth to kindle and keep up a fire : even so tale-bearers stir up, kindle, and nourish strife.

Prov. xxvi. 20.

Talk.

1. As the musician, with the soft striking of strings, doth please us : so the talk that is gentle doth sooner persuade than that which is rigorous and extreme.

Job xv. 2, 3.

2. As the east wind is accounted neither good for man nor beast : even so talk and words that profit not are not wont to proceed from the wise.

3. As the savour of stinking carrion is noisome to them that smell it : so is the speech of fools tedious to wise men who hear it.

4. As a vessel is known by the sound whether it be whole or broken : so are men proved by their speech whether they be wise or foolish.

False Teachers.

2 Pet. ii. 17.
Hos. xiii. 3.
Judges xii.

As empty clouds which boast of rain, but yet have none, are blown away with the wind : even so are false and untrue teachers who brag of great things, yet bring not that which they boast of.

Tears.

LIKE as, when the body receives a deep wound, at the first ye shall see nothing but a white line or dint made in the flesh without any blood, yet stay but a while, then comes blood from the wound in great abundance : so, at the first, the mind is astonished and gives no tears, but after some respite and consideration tears follow.

Temperate.

LIKE as it is in vain to shut the outer gates of a city, if but one be left open, whereat the enemy may enter : so it is not enough to be temperate in other things (that is, to have a firm and moderate government of reason against vicious affections of the mind), if we set open our ears unto ribaldry and filthy talk.

Temperance.

As a man cannot be temperate if he be not prudent : so no man can be strong or valiant if he be not temperate.

We are God's Temple.

1 Cor. iii. 17 ;
v. 6, 14, &c.

1. As Belshazzar, king of Babylon, by using the vessels belonging to the house of God in a banquet, and drinking out of them, with his princes and their concubines, did profane them, and was for the same soon after punished (for the same night he lost both his kingdom and life) : even so surely they that shall abandon, not the vessels, but the temple itself, and not a temple of stone and of wood, but even the bodies and souls that are made the lively temples of the living God, to profane and filthy uses of the world and the flesh, in lieu of dedicating the whole to the holy service of God, who is with them, do most filthily profane the temple of God, and so can expect no other than a most horrible vengeance and punishment.

2. Like as, when a king maketh his entry into a town or city, he findeth those streets where he is to pass made clean and his palace adorned : even so much more ought we, whom God hath chosen to be His temple, and to make His entry into us, to be with us, and dwell with us, to purify and cleanse ourselves from all filthiness and uncleanness, and to adorn the place of his habitation with all virtue and loveliness.

3. As they that wear long garments, when they come to foul ways, do tuck and gird them up, lest they should load them with mire by dragging them through the same : even so we, whose minds and affections so bend to the earth that they do even trail thereupon, in walking through this world full of mire and corruption, must tuck them up towards heaven, lest they should touch such dangerous and damnable filth, from the which we ought wholly to retire and separate ourselves, that we may be made holy temples to the Lord.

1 Pet. i. 13, 14.
Lev. xi. 44 ; 1. 2.
2 Tim. ii. 21.

Temptation.

LIKE as a skilful labourer who riveth wood, having a great knotty log or tree to cleave, hath also divers wedges for the purpose, and every one bigger than another, and entereth with the least first, and it maketh way and entrance for a bigger, and it again for the biggest of all, and so, by little and little, the log or tree is cleft into many small pieces and made fit for the fire : even so, when Satan purposeth to make a spoil of the graces of God in the soul of any, he useth sundry temptations and devices for his purpose, and every one of them differing from another.

Testimony of the Spirit in the elect.

As merchants, being desirous to sell their wares, are content to let the buyers see and handle, and sometimes also taste of the same, thereby to induce them to buy : even so God Almighty, willing, as it were, to sell us the joys of heaven, is content to impart a certain taste beforehand, to such as He seeth are willing to buy, thereby to make them come off roundly with the price, and not to stick in paying so much as He requireth.

Thankfulness for benefits received.

As it is against good manners for a man to mourn at the marriage of his friend : even so it is against duty for men not to rejoice with thanksgiving when they, by evident testimonies, perceive the favour of God towards them in coupling them to Himself.

Matt. ix. 15 ;
xii. 44, 50.

Thankfulness for God's graces and benefits.

1. LIKE as a husband loving his wife tenderly, and desiring to make his affection known unto her by bestowing upon her many great presents of gold and costly jewels, is much grieved if she dissemble the gifts which he hath bestowed upon her, and say she hath purchased them by her own money : even so God can in nowise be pleased with us, if we will conceal or else attribute to ourselves the graces which he hath bestowed upon us, which He would have to be testimonies, tokens, and demonstrations of the inviolable love and fidelity that He beareth unto us.

Deut. viii. 1, 2,
&c. ; ix. 1, &c.

2. As a hare or a cony cannot chew the cud unless it has champed it before : even so, if a man be presently thankful after a benefit received, so shall he be the more able to call it to mind afterwards.

Thoughts.

LIKE as the Lord requireth an account of every idle word : even so, also, He requireth tribute of wicked lusts and thoughts, He arraigneth them, keepeth a court for them, and setteth fines and amercements upon the heads of them.

Matt. xii. 36.
Rom. vii. 7.
James i. 15.
Matt. ix. 4.

Threatenings.

Isa. xxxvii. 29.

As sometimes it thundereth without lightning, which thunder bringeth most terror, yet void of all danger : so the threatenings of some do appear terrible, yet are they void of all trouble and hurt.

Time.

1. LIKE as a treasure, the more precious it is, the more warily and diligently the owner thereof will safely keep it and take better heed unto it : even so time (considering nothing is more precious) should warily be used, and good care taken that it be not lost without some profit gotten.

2. As they are worthy to be punished that lewdly spend their money and waste away their lands in riot, excess, and prodigality : even so they are much more to be blamed that either idly or ungodly spent their time, which is the greatest treasure that God giveth ; for money and riches, being lost and wasted, may be recovered again, but time vainly spent can never be recovered again.

3. There is no man that loseth money or any other thing, but some one gets gain and good by it : but it is not so with the loss of time, for it turneth to no man's avail.

4. As to men on a ship, through their swift sailing, trees and towns seem, as it were, to depart : so, through the swift course of time, first childhood departeth, then youth, and so, at the length, old age.

Isa. xxxviii. 18.
Ps. xli. 9.

5. As men, when they are dead and returned again to dust, cannot praise God, nor declare His name nor the great things which He hath done for them : even so we are to take time while time serveth, and must do those things whilst we are alive that belong to our callings, for to that end was our life given us.

Time of peace more dangerous than time of persecution.

2 Sam. xi.

The sun and wind are said to have agreed on a day to prove their relative strength in taking a cloak from a wayfaring man : in the forenoon the wind used all violence he could to blow off the said cloak, but the more he blew, the faster held the traveller his cloak and gathered it more closely about him ; at afternoon the sun sent forth his pleasant beams, and by little and little so entered and heated this man as to cause him to yield and put off not only his cloak but also his coat : so, likewise, the allurements of pleasure are stronger and harder to be resisted than the violence of persecution ; as the example of David declareth, who resisted easily many assaults in time of adversity, but yet fell dangerously in time of prosperity. So that godly men have no less war in time of peace than in time of persecution, and occasion of bearing the cross and suffering affliction is never wanting to him that will accept of the same.

Time-servers.

Matt. xlii. 21, 22.

1. As the apple-tree in the spring-time buds and openeth itself, so that it doth, as it were, become white by reason of the blossoms ; but a shower falling upon it, many of the blossoms are shaken off, and the frost also doth consume more of them ; afterward, when the fruit beginneth to spring by some great wind (much of it being come forth), more of it falleth down, and when the remainder waxeth ripe the caterpillar cometh, and, with other worms, gnaweth and spoileth it so much that scarce the twentieth part, yea, scarce the hundredth part, many times remaineth : even so it cometh to pass with the hearers of the Gospel; in the beginning thereof every one coveteth to be a Protestant and a good Christian, every one liketh of it very well, and the first fruits thereof are very pleasant; but when wind, shower, or temptation cometh, many fall away from it by companies; afterward sects and seditious arise, which, like unto worms and cankers, gnaw and infect the fruits of the Gospel, and so many false opinions spring up, that very few do persevere in the true profession thereof.

2. As a reed is tottering, shaking, and yielding every way with the least wind that bloweth: so, likewise, be all such as are weather-cock temporizers, who in their words and deeds be wavering, inconstant, slippery, changeable, fickle, faint-hearted, and dare not stoutly persist in their conceived opinion, but, as turn-coats, say and unsay, do and undo. Matt. xi. 7.
Luke viii. 24.

3. Even as lukewarm water doth annoy the stomach so far that the stomach is constrained to cast up the same again: so those that be time-servers and lukewarm professors are so offensive unto the Lord that He must needs, and will at the last, spew them out of His mouth. Rev. iii. 16.

4. Like as the hedgehog hath two holes in his house, one toward the south, another toward the north; now when the southern wind blows, he stops up that hole and turns him northward, and when the northern wind blows, he stops up that hole likewise and turns him again southward: even so such are all time-servers and temporizers—they believe for a time, as long as the warm sun of prosperity shines upon them, but as soon as any storm of persecution ariseth, by and by they have a starting-hole to hide themselves in; they change their religion, and turn about with the time.

5. As a top, which always runs round, and never goes forward unless it be whipped; or as a mill-horse, which, making many steps, turns about, and is continually found in the same place; or as a door, which, riding upon its hinges all the day long, is never a whit nearer at night: so, likewise, time-servers run beside the mark by going forward and backward in a maze. Prov. xxvi. 14.
2 Tim. iii. 7.

6. As it was with the tribe of Ephraim, which was as a cake upon the hearth not turned, baked on the one side and raw on the other side; or as the Laodiceans, who were neither hot nor cold: so is it with all time-servers, their cake is dough, as we say, and they hold both sides; and as ambidexters with Ehud, they play with both hands; and as the sun in Hezekiah's time, they go both forward and backward, running up and down, in and out, and yet indeed are neither above nor beneath, neither within nor without. Hos. vii. 8.
Rev. iii. 15.
Judges iii. 15.
Isa. xxxviii. 8.

7. As a eunuch, who is a man, and no man; or as a pumice, which is a stone, and no stone; or as a bat, which is a bird, and no bird; or as a fennel, which is a tree, and no tree: even so such are time-servers and men-pleasers, who go backwards and forwards, who will be sometimes Christians, and then no Christians.

8. As a weaver's shuttle, which, if it go forward one way, presently goeth backward again as much another way; or as a weaver himself—such a one as Penelope was—who would do and undo, weaving that in the daytime which she did unweave in the night: so, in like manner, time-servers build and destroy, do and undo, say and unsay; for no man doth more transgress than he that is doubtful and uncertain in religion, one while putting his foot forward, another while pulling it backward again. Job vii. 6.

Tongue.

1. As a river be compassed with banks lest it should flow over: so ought our tongue to be walled with reason lest it should be over busy in babbling. James iii. 2, &c.
1 Peter iii. 10.

2. As beasts and birds, by man's industry, are tame: even so, contrariwise, the tongue of man is so unruly that no man can tame it. James iii. 7, 8.

James iii. 5, 6.

3. As a very little fire kindleth never so great a heap of matter that is apt (ready) to be kindled: even so the tongue setteth the whole course of nature on fire, and is kindled itself of hell.

Ps. l^v. 2.

4. As a sharp razor, with the least touch that can be, shaveth and cutteth: so, also, doth the tongue of a mischievous lying man cut and wound.

James iii. 4.

5. As a ship, though never so great and huge, is turned about with a very small rudder: even so the tongue, though it be a small member, oftentimes overruleth the whole body, and setteth it out of course.

James iii. 11, 12.

6. As it is impossible that a fig-tree should be able to bring forth olives, or a vine figs: so it cannot be that that tongue which is given to evil-speaking and slandering should be able to bring forth any good thing which is not defiled with the venom of the tongue and the heart.

7. As fire, if chaff and stubble be added unto it, or anything apt to burn, will burn it clean up; yea, if towns or cities, or even the whole world be added thereto, it will burn them all up: so, likewise, if words be added to the tongue, then backbiting, slandering, swearing, lying, &c., it will flame up, until at last it set the whole kingdom on fire.

Strange Tongues edify not.

1 Cor. xiv. 9, 11,
23.

As it were a madness or, at the least, a great folly for one man, in communicating with another, to speak in a tongue which the other understandeth not: even so it is much greater folly for a man to speak to a multitude or a whole congregation in that sort or order, by speaking Latin, Greek, or Hebrew to the unlearned multitude at Church.

Trade of life.

1. As the ox is most apt for the plough, the horse for the cart, and the hound for hunting: so ought men to chose that occupation and trade of life whereunto by nature they are most apt.

2. As he who hath no house of his own wandereth here and there: so he who followeth no certain trade of life must foolishly assay many sorts and chances.

Human Traditions.

As the flowers of lysimachia are fair to see yet unsavoury: so human traditions make a fair show, but there is no spiritual savour or sweetness in them.

No Transubstantiation in the Sacrament.

As bread and drink, by natural nourishment, be changed into a man's body, and yet the body is not changed, but is the same as it was before: so, although the bread and wine be sacramentally changed into Christ's body, yet His body is the same and in the same place that it was before—that is to say, in heaven—without any alteration or change of the same.

Trinity.

1. LIKE as, if three kings equal in dignity should meet all in one place, being equal also in power and majesty, and if all three should sit down, though one be no better than another, yet one of them must needs sit down the first, and another in the second place, and then the third; but yet we cannot say that he who sat down first is the chiefest: so it is in the Trinity, though none be greater or above another, yet the Father is in the first place, not because He is before the Son or the Holy Ghost in dignity or honour, but because He is the Fountain of the Deity, the Son being from Him, and the Holy Ghost from them both.

2. As light proceeding from the fire is never separated from it, neither is the one ever before the other: so it is with Christ and His Father.

Trouble and adversity do further us to virtue and godliness.

1. As water that is continually standing, how clear soever it seem, yet it is corrupt and naught (bad), but that water which hath its continual course, the more it rusheth and struggleth over the stones and sands, the more lively, fresh, and better it is: even so a godly man in the time of prosperity and absence of the cross is sluggish, dull, and litherly (lazy); but through the cross and affliction he is quickened and exercised, and increased in all goodness.

2. As rusty and cankered iron by the file is made bright and smooth: so, likewise, our old rusty Adam hath need of trouble and adversity to cleanse and purge us from the cankered rust of sin.

3. Like as a knife, though it be never so smooth, if it be not used it waxeth rusty, and the same rust fretteth and marreth it; but the more that it is occupied, though it be somewhat worn thereby, yet it is the more bright: even so, although a man have a good nature and inclination, if he be not occupied and exercised with trouble and adversity, he waxeth rusty, cankered, and rotten; but through the cross and tribulation, though the rust have worn somewhat of him, being a man and of himself weak, yet he shall thereby be made more bright, clear, and beautiful again.

Lev. xxvi. 14, &c.
Heb. xii. 11.

4. As the seed that is cast into the field must suffer the wind, rain, snow, frost, and all manner of tempests, and yet it waxeth strong and bringeth forth fruit: even so the spiritual seed, which is the Word of God, being received of a devout and a fervent heart, is not destroyed through trouble, but bringeth forth right good and profitable fruit.

5. As a walnut-tree, the more it is beaten the better it is, and not the worse: even so 1 Pet. iv. 12 man, through many stripes and much adversity, turneth from evil and waxeth good.

6. As there is nothing better for the thick skin of a horse or an ass than a very sharp whip to yerk him with: even so there is nothing more fit and profitable for our stubborn and haughty flesh than much sorrow and vexation, whereby it may be stirred and pricked forward.

7. As woollen cloth must be often beaten and brushed, lest moths breed in it: even so Prov. xx. 30 spiritual moths and worms—to wit, wickedness, sin, and abomination—have the less power to breed in us if we be well brushed and beaten in time with trouble, affliction, and adversity.

8. As flesh that cometh fresh out of the shambles unsalted waxeth soon unsavoury, and worms breed in it; but the salt with its sharpness keepeth it sweet from corruption: even so doth God cast and sprinkle salt upon us, that is, divers temptations and afflictions, that they may bite and season us, that we corrupt not, nor perish in sin.

9. Like as that body that is always idle and never moveth, nor hath any exercise, is easily subject unto sickness and infirmities ; but those bodies that have their exercise and labour are more lusty and sound, and can better continue : even so the soul that is well exercised with trouble and affliction hath occasion and cause to be beautiful, sound, and clear.

10. As lye, the sharper it is, the cleaner it taketh away all manner of filth out of clothes : even so the greater and sharper our trouble and adversity is, the more filth and inconvenience it draweth and biteth from our corrupt and poisoned nature.

11. As wormwood is very good and wholesome for a raw (cold) and weak stomach, which is of a naughty (bad) digestion : even so bitter trouble and affliction is very wholesome and necessary for the weak and feeble soul.

Trouble and adversity give us occasion to pray unto God.

Isa. xxvi. 16, 17.
18 Sam. vii. 2-4.
2 Chron. xxxiii.
12, 13.

LIKE as water, as long as it floweth and runneth over the even, plain, wide, and broad fields, breaketh not out by any violence, but disperseth and spreadeth itself abroad everywhere alike ; but when it is gathered together by cunning and skill, and conveyed into narrow room, as into a pipe or conduit, then it springeth and spouteth out on high : even so the mind of man, as long as it is quiet, idle, and without sorrow or trouble, walketh and wandereth abroad at large and at liberty ; but when it is brought in, restrained, and driven to a strait and a narrow issue, through trouble and adversity, it breaketh out aloft unto God in heaven with an earnest, hearty, and fervent prayer for grace, aid, and comfort ; whereupon is a common proverb sprung,—“Need and necessity teach men to pray.”

Christians, through Trouble and adversity, are made bold and hearty.

2 Cor. i. 9-11.

As one that hath sailed oft upon the sea, and proved and escaped great and dangerous tempests, and hath been sore tossed with the fearful waves, is afterward more bold and hardy to go upon the sea, forasmuch as he hath ever escaped well and come home safely : even so a Christian man, whom the cross hath oft assaulted and exercised, forasmuch as he hath always found comfort, aid, and help of God, trusteth God afterward the longer, the more, though affliction and adversity come again unto him similar to that he had before.

Trouble and afflictions do further us to the right knowledge of our sins.

Gen. xliiii. 18.
Numb. xxi. 7.

LIKE as the hard copper and tin do melt in the fire : even so, often in trouble and affliction, our hard, rough, and stubborn hearts do melt and fall, and we mislike and loathe our sins.

Trouble and sorrow do help and further us toward the fear and love of God.

1 Pet. ii. 17, 18.

1 LIKE as, when a trespasser is led out to be beheaded, hanged, burnt, or otherwise to be punished, others that see him do learn to fear and to beware of that thing which has brought the offender to this end : even so, when God sendeth any plague, either upon some special person or else upon some whole commonalty, all others ought so to consider the same as though they themselves were in the place of the afflicted person, as though his trouble and sorrow were their own, that they may the rather fear God and take heed that they fall not under the like vengeance of God.

2. As a dog that is of a good nature, if his master strike him, yet he loveth his master notwithstanding, and fawneth upon him ; or as a good child, although his father or mother beat him, yet he loveth them nevertheless, and desireth to have their favour again : even in like manner are true Christians minded toward their heavenly Father ; but such children as be wicked and of an evil disposition, when they be a little scourged, they run away from their fathers and murmur against them.

God delivereth from Trouble in due season.

LIKE as God seeth the trouble and affliction of His Church, how it is vexed : even so hath He appointed a just time, how long He will suffer the wicked to take their pleasure, and how far they shall go and attempt, and when that is expired no longer nor no further can they go.

Jer. xxv. 1-15 ;
xxix. 10.
Ps. xlv. 1, &c.
Matt. xxviii. 20.

God helpeth and comforteth such as are in Trouble by His Word and Spirit.

1. LIKE as a captain, in war, giveth his soldiers that are under him great courage by speaking manfully and comfortably unto them : even so God will have His Word daily to be published and proclaimed abroad to those that are in trouble, to the end to encourage His soldiers that fight under His banner.

Matt. xviii. 20.

2. As, in winter, the trees seem not only unfruitful, but also utterly dead, yet the sun with his coming (when the winter hath taken her leave) doth so mollify, resolve, and warm both the earth itself and the trees, that they bud out again, wax green, and bring forth fruit : even so, when the faithful are esteemed, and seem as though they were deprived and destitute of all help, and, as it were, utterly forsaken in time of trouble, yet even then doth the heavenly Spirit of God lighten, warm, and strengthen their hearts to all goodness.

Trouble is good and profitable to teach men patience.

1. LIKE as men are wont to clip and to cut shorter the feathers of birds or other fowls when they begin to fly too high or too far from them : even so doth God diminish our riches, possessions, estimation, honour, authority, and power, that we should not pass our bounds and glory too much of such gifts.

2. As the body, when it is wearied and consumed with labour and travail, desireth ease and rest, that it may lie still : even so the soul, being laden and oppressed with trouble and affliction, is brought to a narrow issue, and then it hasteth after rest and quietness, and nothing vexeth it less than pride.

Dan. iii. 1, 29,
&c. ; iv. 31.
2 Cor. xii. 7.

3. As a piece of iron or of silver, stricken or beaten with a hammer, waxeth broader, thinner, smoother, and softer : even so the stony and hard hearts of men, through heaviness and adversity, are made more buxom (ready to obey) and pliant, that a man may wind them, as one might say, even round about his finger.

4. As a curst (mischievous) wild colt hath a snaffle put into his mouth, that he bite not him that handleth him : even so the snaffle of the cross and adversity doth let and hinder us, being froward, furious, full of spite, malice, and revenge, that we commit the less wickedness, abomination, and uncharitableness in our lives.

2 Chron. xxxiii. 1,
2, 9, 11, &c.
Acts ix. 2-4.

5. Like as, when a man hath been a long season healthful and without any manner of sickness, he cannot take sickness by-and-by so patiently as he ought to do : even so, likewise, he that never felt any affliction or adversity, whensoever any happen unto him, he is sore vexed with impatience ; but adversity teacheth men patience and practiseth them therein.

Rom. v. 3, 4.

6. As men eat divers things by morsels, which, if they should eat whole, would choke them : so by divers days we suffer troubles, which, if they should all come together, would make an end of us in one day.

Love toward God worketh patience in Trouble.

Gen. xxix. 18.

1. As Jacob served seven years for the damsel Rachel, and by reason of the hearty love that he bore unto her the time was but short unto him, and the days that he served for her seemed but a short space : even so whosoever loveth God will bear and take patiently whatsoever troubles God shall lay upon him, and whatsoever he suffereth for God's sake it shall be ease unto him.

2. Like as a soldier, first for fear of prisoning (imprisonment) and the shameful death which he should suffer if the battle be lost, and again in hope of the great reward and excellent honour and renown he shall obtain if the victory go on his side, will fight the more boldly and lustily : even so every true Christian is stirred and provoked to more faithfulness and patience in trouble, when he considereth the exceeding profit and commodity (advantage) of patience, and again the great hurt and discommodity (disadvantage) of impatience in trouble.

Trouble maketh men temperate.

As the physician, when he perceiveth that his patient will eat overmuch and will wax too fat, measureth and restraineth him, and, by breaking somewhat from him, he restoreth him to his health again, and so saveth him : even so, when we do shamefully misuse wine, corn, bread, and drink, and other gifts and creatures of God, to maintain drunkenness, surfeiting, excess, and riot, then doth God punish us with hunger, dearth, penury, and with other plagues, that we should learn thereby to be temperate and to keep measure, and to use His benefits thankfully.

Trouble of conscience.

Rev. xxi. 4.

1. As the angel did say, "There shall be no more death, neither sorrow, neither crying, neither shall there be any more pain" : so, after that we are at peace with God, it is most true that there shall be no more trouble of conscience.

2. As it is a chief point of worldly wisdom not to tarry for the use of physic until we be deadly sick, but to be acquainted with God's merciful preservatives to defend us from it : so, likewise, it is the chief policy of a good Christian not only to seek comfort when the agony and trouble of conscience is upon him, but also to use all good helps to meet it before it comes.

3. Like as we condemn them of folly who will not labour to keep themselves out of debt as well as also to pay the debt when they owe it : so, likewise, it is a madness not to be circumspect to avoid all occasions which may bring trouble of mind or conscience upon us, as also we ought to be provident to enter every good way which may draw us out of this trouble when once we have entered into it.

Ordinary means to avoid Trouble are not to be condemned or refused.

Acts xxvii. 10, &c.

1. LIKE as a shipmaster, being upon the water, and foreseeing a tempest to be at hand, calleth upon God's aid and help, and yet for all that he hath a sure eye to the stern, to rule the helm as handsomely and cunningly as he can : even so, of like manner, in necessities and perils, it is lawful, and men ought also, to use all manner of honest and convenient means, as physic and medicines in sickness ; labour and travail with the sweat of our brows in poverty ; the power and authority of the magistrate in wrong, injury, debate, and dissension ; battle-array against the enemies of our country, and such like ; and yet so that no man build nor trust in any manner of thing but in the very living God only, who can help, deliver, and remedy all things without any middle or means, if there were none at all.

2. As weak, tender, and diseased eyes are refreshed and quickened with green and pleasant colours : even so cumbered and troubled minds are wonderfully refreshed, revived, and restored to strength, through seemly, honest, and measurable (moderate) mirth and pastime, as by hearing of instruments of music, by walking abroad, by altering and changing of the air, and by going out of such places as be obscure and dark into such as be very lightsome, and especially for a man in his trouble to visit his special friends or to be visited by them.

Patience in Trouble very needful.

1. As a lamb or a sheep is led unto the slaughter, and never crieth nor openeth its mouth, but suffereth and abideth it patiently and meekly : even so ought the children of God, when they are cursed and reviled, not to curse or revile again, when they are smitten not to smite again, but to suffer all manner of smart and pain, and not once to bleat or open their mouths against it.

Isa. liii. 7.
Jer. xl. 19.
Matt. v. 10, 11.

2. Like as they that are sick and distressed or diseased can be content to suffer and abide to have any of the members of their body to be cut off or to be burnt, so that they may be anything relieved and eased thereby of their great smart and continual pain, which is yet but transitory, and to be made whole and sound again : even so ought we gladly and willingly to suffer our Lord God, and to be still and quiet when He sendeth us adversity, whereby we may be relieved and discharged of eternal pain, and obtain health and bliss, and the salvation of our souls.

3. As a good captain leadeth and ordereth his army according as the occasion requireth : even so a virtuous man beaveth himself patiently and well in trouble and adversity, and maketh the best of it.

4. Like as a merchant-man maketh fair voyages and great journeys, and ventureth body and goods, and nothing is too hard or severe for him, only for worldly and transitory gain and lucre, and yet his hope is uncertain, for he knoweth not whether he shall gain or lose, and though he gain never so much, yet he bringeth home nothing but frail and transitory goods which shall have an end : so we, likewise, have a long voyage to make, even from earth to heaven, and therefore we should be well content, and as prompt, glad, and willing to suffer all manner of perils and dangers that may happen by the way, seeing that we have an infallible hope of eternal and everlasting riches, for Jesus Christ's sake.

5. Like as, when a man of a high and noble birth is contemned and mis-handled in a strange land where he is not known, it grieveth him not so much as if the like should happen unto him at home in his own natural country : even so our natural country is in heaven—upon earth we are but strangers and pilgrims—therefore we ought the rather to suffer all things patiently here, so that we may have rest among the inhabitants in our right eternal land and country.

Heb. xiii. 14.
Phil. iii. 20.
1 Pet. i. 3-5.

6. As a man of war, preparing himself with all manner of things appertaining to warfare, though his enemies be never so strong, yet he forgetteth all fear, and never once thinketh upon the strokes and wounds, but only upon the victory and triumph, and goeth his way and fighteth manfully like a giant against his enemies, only for worldly glory and lucre : even so it would redound to the great scandal and shame of Christians if they, for the honour, glory, and pleasure of God, should not as promptly, willingly, and manfully fight against their ghostly enemies, for higher and greater triumph, lucre, and commodity, though they should endure many troubles and great adversity.

7. Like as when a man playeth at the tables he cannot always cast what he would have, but whatsoever he casteth he must make the best of it : so, likewise, whatsoever things happen in our life contrary to our will, we must, with courage and constant faith, take and turn all troubles and adversities to the best, and never despair.

8. Like as, when a little child that can scarcely go chanceth to stumble upon a stone, he falleth down by-and-by in the same place, and there lieth, still weeping and crying, till somebody take him up : so, contrariwise, Christians who have reason and understanding must use and endeavour themselves, that whatsoever trouble, sickness, or inconvenience happeneth unto them, they will by-and-by, so far as possible, labour to heal, ease, and remedy it.

9. As a virtuous child will not forsake his father in his need or trouble, nor a honest and loving wife her husband or spouse, nor yet a faithful servant his master : so much less should a godly Christian forsake or deny God, his Father, or Christ, the heavenly Husband, Lord, and Master, in trouble and adversity.

10. Like as worldlings and carnal men, fornicators, whoremongers, and murderers care neither for shame nor for anything else, and spare no labour or travail so they may bring to pass their wicked lust and desire, and yet oftentimes they miss of it : even so much more a faithful Christian ought to be constant, earnest, painful, and patient in honest and good things, though yet he be greatly hindered by many troubles and much adversity.

Trouble teacheth men to condemn the world.

Ps. cxxxvii 1, &c.

1. LIKE as he that taketh a journey in hand and goeth into a strange country, when he cometh into a pleasant town, where he meeteth merry company and good companions, peradventure he spendeth away the time and tarrieth too long among them, and so forgetteth his household and things at home ; but if one hard mischance after another happen unto him, then he maketh the more haste home again to his wife and children, where he hath more rest and quietness : even so, when these transitory things—as riches, health, beauty, honour, and dignity—happen unto us, if we will once gape upon them (desire earnestly) and delight so much in them, that we do the less regard and esteem the heavenly life, then will God make the way rough and crabbed unto us here in this life, so that we should not take and esteem this world for our right natural country, toward the which we took our journey.

2. As a man must sometimes spur his horse, although he be a good and quick horse, that so he may go and run the faster and speedier : even so we cannot go forward in our vocation and calling so speedily nor so well as we ought to do, except we be pricked forward with sharp spurs and scourges.

3. Like as, when the master striketh his slothful, dull, and sleepy servant, then he laboureth the more diligently and is more profitable unto him : even so we all, for the most part of us, have the nature of such slothful and sluggish servants, who will do nothing well except we be driven by compulsion, and even whipped and beaten unto it.

4. As those be evil servants who will do nothing unless a man be ever upon their bones with a cudgel—yea, and then will do nothing well neither, yet, notwithstanding, a man must never cease driving and forcing of them until such time as they begin to amend and to serve willingly and with a good heart : even so, although no compelled service, nothing violently wrung out of a man, doth please God—yet the continual inuring and exercising in goodness may make it at length so pleasant and delectable unto us, that we shall have delight therein.

Troubles and adversities are a furtherance to eternal life.

1. LIKE as the corn is first thrashed, fanned, and rid from the chaff, and then laid up and reserved in the garner : even so godly Christians upon earth are beaten, mis-handled, and evil intreated, whereby they are purged and rid of many wild and light manners, and so are brought into the everlasting barn of the kingdom of heaven.

2. As no man can triumph or be crowned, except he hath fought and warred manfully, which cannot be without great danger, labour, and travail : even so can no man attain to the crown of eternal life except he hath first suffered much trouble, sorrow, and adversity.

1 Cor. ix. 24, 25.
2 Tim. i. 8 ; iv. 7.
8.
1 Pet. v. 1.
James i. 12.

3. As the man that is sick must receive the purgation and medicine, how sour or bitter soever it be, that he may the sooner recover his health again and not die : even so, when we suffer the hand of God to rule and order us, being content and patient therewith, although it smarteth and grieveth us, yet it shall profit and help us to everlasting health and soundness.

Matt. v. 4, 10 ; vii.
13, 14.
Luke vi. 27.

Troubles and afflictions are means to try us withal.

1. LIKE as those are the most honest and most chaste matrons who, being sore tempted, assaulted, and provoked unto wickedness, do nevertheless keep their wedded faith toward their husbands undefiled : even so can no man know or prove perfectly how the Church of Christ keepeth faithful to her Spouse and Bridegroom Jesus Christ until such time as Antichrist assaulteth and tempteth her with false doctrine, tyranny, and persecution.

2. As such trees as have strong and deep roots and sufficient natural sap no violent heat of the sun can hurt or harm, but such as are felled and cut down are soon dried up with the heat of the sun ; and as the grass that is mown down doth soon wither : even so, likewise, such faithful Christians as are rooted in Christ Jesus troubles and afflictions cannot hurt, they grow and wax green notwithstanding ; but the unfaithful do betray themselves and show what they are as soon as they see any heat of trouble or persecution coming.

3. As with one flail both the stalks and ears of the corn are beaten, and also the corn itself thrashed and purged out : even so with one manner of trouble and affliction are the faithful purged and provoked to pray unto God, and to laud and magnify Him, and the unfaithful provoked to curse, and so are they both tried, provoked, and known.

Isa. xli. 15.
Amos i. 3.

4. Like as, when the corn is thrashed, the kernels lie mixed among the chaff, but afterward are dissevered asunder with the fan or wind : even so the people in the Church do first hear the preaching of God's Word, but some stumble, repine, and are offended, and yet they dwell together one with another, but when they are fanned, and when the wind of trouble and affliction beginneth once a little to blow, then it is easy to sunder and to know the one from the other, the faithful from the unfaithful.

5. As a rotten or an old weak house standeth for a time, but as soon as a wind cometh and bloweth, it appeareth unto all men how feeble the foundation and stay of it was : even so are there such professing Christians without ground or foundation, who, as long as all things go well and prosper with them, will seem to be good Christians, but in time of trouble and persecution their dissimulation is known and breaketh out.

Deut. viii. 2.

6. Like as prosperity shutteth and blindeth the eyes of men : even so, likewise, trouble and adversity doth open them.

7. As the salve that remedieth the diseases of the eyes doth first bite and grieve the eyes and maketh them to water, but yet afterward the eyesight is clearer and sharper than it was : even so trouble and affliction do grieve and vex men wonderfully at the first, but afterward it helpeth and lighteneth the eyes of the mind, so that it is more reasonable, wise, and circumspect ; for trouble bringeth experience and experience bringeth wisdom.

God sometimes mitigateth Troubles, that we may the more easily overcome them.

1. As a captain giveth sometimes his soldiers liberty to take their rest, ease, and pastime, that they may somewhat refresh themselves and afterward fight the more manfully and freshly: even so our spiritual Captain granteth oftentimes unto His children a certain recreation, ease, and rest, whereby they may refresh and revive themselves, that they may afterward handle themselves the more valiantly in their spiritual affairs.

Ps. xxxiv. 7, &c.
2 Kings vi. 17,
&c.; xix. 35.

2. Like as a man of war hath a lust and courage to fight, having divers valiant servants about him, who will suffer him to take no wrong: even so the holy angels do compass about and defend us, so that in all manner of trouble and affliction we should be bold and able to stand and continue it valiantly.

Ps. l. 15; xci. 15.
John xiv. 13.

3. Like as a sick person, although he doubt nothing of the faithfulness, honesty, and tenderness of his physician or surgeon towards him, yet, for all that, desireth him to handle his wound and dress him as easily and tenderly as is possible for him: even so, in like manner, may we call upon God, that, if it be not against His honour and glory, He will vouchsafe to give some mitigation and ease of our pain; and specially we must desire of Him to grant us strength that we faint not, nor be overcome with the fear or greatness of our sorrow and grief by reason of our great troubles, whereby we might forsake Him and fall into some wickedness.

Truth.

1. EVEN as, the nearer that gold and silver are put to the fire, so much the surer proof they yield of their goodness and fineness: so the Lord's truth, the more exactly it is weighed with spiritual examination, so much the greater confirmation of credit it receiveth.

2. As the froth of the sea dashing upon the rocks doth again fall off, and the rocks are immovable: so is all persecution against the truth; for truth is an eternal rock, and therefore cannot be utterly oppressed.

3. Like as, by striking of two flints together, there cometh out fire: so it may be that sometimes by contention the truth, which is hidden in a dark place, may come to light; for, by a peace in naughtiness and wickedness, truth is, as it were, sometimes buried under ground and doth not appear.

Truth not to be found with false prophets.

Isa. xii. 3.
2 Pet. ii. 17.

As wells dry in the bottom deceive them who seek for water in them: so they who look to learn a truth at the hands of false prophets are deceived in their expectation.

Two natures in the personal union of Christ.

Luke ii. 52.
Mark xi. 13;
xiii. 32.
1 John ii. 1, 17.
John ii. 25; vi. 64;
v. 20.
Heb. i. 9.
John i. 33; iv. 6.
Heb. i. 3.
John ii. 19; x. 18.

LIKE as in that one person of Christ there be two natures: so there is a double will, working, wisdom, strength, power, virtue, &c.—the one heavenly and not created, the other human and created.

Types of truth.

Gen. viii. 6, &c.

As the raven was a figure of the law of God, which threatened all sinners: so the flood was a punishment sent from Almighty God upon all offenders.

Tyrant.

1. LIKE as the aspis, or asp of Africa, of which Pliny saith the male and female go always together, and that, if one of them be slain, the other doth continually follow the slayer till he hath stricken him, although he be in a great assembly of people, except he pass over a river: so a tyrant's son, or a like tyrant, will never cease to seek revenge until he either destroy those he hates or else be destroyed himself.

2. As the rind of the seal and the gall of the hyena be effectual remedies against sundry sicknesses: so God useth tyrants and wicked men sometimes for the correction of vice.

3. As in fishing, when the fishes, deceived with the bait, have the hooks in their mouths, men draw them and make them follow whithersoever it pleaseth them: even so God often withdraweth mighty tyrants from executing their devices and from accomplishing their enterprises.

Cruelty of Tyrants.

As the wings of eagles, with their stripe or blow, do mar the feathers and break the wings of other birds: even so the mighty and great men of the world, with their tyrannical cruelty and most hellish impiety, are wont to draw to destruction and drag to death the weaker sort, and such as are innocent and tender the glory and praise of God.

2 Kings xxi. 10.
Matt. xxiii. 37.
Acts vii. 52.
Heb. xi. 37.

Unbelief.

1. As an empty vessel is capable of water, and yet, being closely stopped, none can enter into it, though it be poured upon it in great abundance: even so it fareth with our hearts—they are capable of God's graces, but, being stopped by unbelief, no grace of God can enter into them, though daily and plentifully offered.

2. As men that are but civilised take care to avoid robbing and killing, because God gives commandments against stealing and killing: even so much more we ought to strive against our manifold doubtings, distrustings, and unbelief of God's love in Christ, having a commandment of God that calls upon us and binds us to do so.

Unfaithfulness in time of trouble.

As a sliding foot that layeth its master in the dirt: even so such is an unfaithful man in whom a man reposeth confidence in trouble.

Prov. xxv. 19.

The fruit of Ungodliness.

LIKE as, in husbandry, a man must not look or think from one seed to receive another, as of barley to reap wheat, or from pease to receive rye: so, likewise, a man must not hope or look to reap of his ungodly life heaven, which is only the reward of a life led in the fear and love of God.

The Ungodly are grievous to God.

As a cart that is laden with sheaves of corn in harvest is pressed under the load: even so God is pressed with those that are given over to sin and wickedness.

Amos ii. 13.
Isa. i. 14.

Ungodly man.

As he that ever and anon will be casting himself into the fire and water, and run upon dangerous places to break his legs, arms, or neck, and, further, shall take pleasure in doing all this, is either a fool or a madman: even so is the ungodly man as oft as he sinneth, for by sin he endeavoureth as much as in him lieth to pitch his soul into hell, and whereas he taketh pleasure in sin, he sports himself with his own destruction.

Ungodly men.

1. LIKE as children who do not abstain from things forbidden them, especially when they hope that it shall be kept secret, and that their father or mother shall not know of it: even so ungodly men, wrapped in mischief, when they have offended and are fallen into some sin, do not acknowledge their iniquity, neither can they abide to confess it, although the torment of their conscience doth force and compel them toward making confession thereof, but they hide the same in silence, and, in holding their peace, they think to cover and bury all things in oblivion.

2. As filthy swine regard not, but thrust from them, roses that are most beautiful and sweet, and seem to condemn most fragrant and pleasant flowers, and do rather seek after foul puddles and stinking mire, and, forsaking dainty dishes and costly juncates, do frank (fatten) themselves most greedily with wild mast and unclean things: so ungodly men have no taste for the Word of God, but, hunting after uncertain riches—which are in continual hazard, and at the length will deceive them—they are, as it were, fettered in the enchanting pleasures and pestilent flickerings of the world.

3. As Pilate's soldiers, with the wicked Jews, took Christ, stripped off His garments, buffeted Him, and slew Him: so, likewise, do ungodly men, by their wicked behaviour, strip the Lord of all honour, and slay Him again.

Union with Christ in the Supper.

1. As the union between Christ and us in baptism is spiritual, and requireth no real and corporal presence: so, likewise, our union with Christ in His holy Supper is spiritual, and therefore requireth no real or corporal presence.

2. Even as, if one take molten wax, and pour it with other wax, and so work the whole together, they will be so united and mixed that they cannot be separated: likewise must it needs be, that whoso receives the flesh and blood of the Lord is in such sort joined to Him, that Christ is found in him, and he in Christ.

3. Like as, if it be a thing to be marvelled at, how we be members one of another, and how man and wife may be one flesh: even so much more wonderful is this spiritual coupling together of Christ and us, which doth most truly and certainly, not feignedly or colourably, or fantastically merely, happen unto such as do faithfully eat the Lord's Supper.

John vi. 53-55.

4. As, by a certain order of the heavenly dispensation, first the sign is received, and then in the sign and by the sign the thing signified: even so must we first be united to the visible flesh of Christ, and by that afterward to His Godhead, if we will be made partakers of grace.

5. Even as the bread is really and truly united unto us by our eating the same: so, also, is the flesh of Christ truly and in very deed united unto us who, by faith, eat the same.

6. As by one and the same soul all the members of the body are united with the head, and quickened : so, likewise, all the faithful, although they be upon earth and the Head is in heaven, yet they are in very deed, by one and the same Spirit, united with Him, and, being united, do abide and live in Him.

1 John iv. 13,
Rom. viii. 9.

Unity.

As an ointment, well compounded of sweet and odoriferous things, cannot but be acceptable to the scent of all men : so that unity, which beginneth at religion and stretcheth to the uttermost borders of the Church and commonwealth, cannot but please both God and all good men.

Ps. cxxxiii. 2.

Unity among brethren.

As you may not with any kind of might break the faggot or bavin that is whole, whereas you may lightly break the sticks thereof severally or being asunder : so are brethren easy to be overcome who strive together, but, being at unity, they are not so soon discomfited.

Unmercifulness to others.

As a master, liberal, good, and bountiful to his servants, cannot but be very angry and much offended if any of them deal cruelly with their fellows : even so much more justly will God withdraw His mercy from them that deal unmercifully with those they live amongst.

Matt. xxiv. 45, 46;
xviii. 33-35.

The best but Unprofitable.

LIKE as servants, be they never so diligent in executing that which is committed unto them, yet cannot justly vaunt themselves that they have done any more than bounden duty : so all Christians, when they have laboured as much as in them is possible, yet they are to confess themselves unprofitable servants.

Luke xvii. 9, 10.

Unprofitable things may be profitable.

As the bees gather most sweet honey out of withered thyme, and out of other herbs of more unpleasant juice : so, likewise, may we also, out of evil and unprofitable things, pick out that which may turn to our profit and commodity, as shipwreck to Zeno of Citium and banishment to Diogenes gave them occasion to study philosophy.

Unthankfulness.

1. As the Israelites were no more thankful and obedient when they had peace and lived in a land that flowed with milk and honey than when they were in the solitary desert and wild wilderness : even so the most part with us in England are no more thankful for the peace of the Gospel, nor any whit more desirous to give themselves to serve and worship God aright, than if they lived in a land fruitless and destitute both of spiritual and temporal blessings.

Gen. xxvii. 46;
xxviii. 6, &c.
2 Sam. xv. 1, &c.;
xvi. 11, &c.; xvii.
1, 2, &c.
Gen. xxxvii. 17,
35; xlii. 38.

2. Like as the ingrate and unkind cuckoo, after that she is nourished and brought up by the poor hedge-sparrow to some such good perfection of age as that she is able to get her own food and living, is then so cruelly forgetful of the kind love of this sparrow, that (all mercy and compassion set apart) she eateth and devoureth her up: even so some children, who have been with great care and expense brought up by their parents to such perfection of age as they might be able to live and maintain themselves, and also be a great comfort to their parents, do, notwithstanding, shew themselves so unkind and unthankful to them, that, by their obstinacy and ungracious behaviour, they bring the gray heads of their parents to the grave with sorrow—as Esau and Absalom.

3. As everything that is weighty and heavy bendeth and presseth downward, yet, notwithstanding, the clouds that are full of water and swelled with moisture do ascend upward, because the sun taketh them from the earth, and with his force draweth them up on high, and, being lifted up in the air, are gathered together and thickened, and so do cover and hide the brightness of the sun, by whose help and attraction they were taken and carried up, but, notwithstanding their malice, they being desperate and scattered abroad, the sun, that conqueror and overcomer of darkness, thrusteth through his beams, breaketh the clouds, and giveth light with his shining: even so the Israelites, when they lay in Egypt a long time in obscurity, thralldom, bondage, and slavery to Pharaoh and his people, and were even nailed, as it were, to the earth by all contempt and cruelty, were then taken up and set in great and high dignity by the Sun of Righteousness, but afterward they went about to obscure and extinguish the brightness and light of God Himself, by whose benefit they had gotten that honour and dignity which they had, and without whom they were nothing but bond-slaves of misery and wretchedness; but, seeing they were like foul black clouds, they were dispersed away, and the glory of Christ, against their wills, and in spite of them, together with the brightness of His name, did break out and shine abroad, and give light throughout all the world.

4. If a prince should promise a tailor or shoemaker ten thousand crowns for one year's service, he would not refuse it, but this being offered and promised unto him, he would be ready to leave his house, his wife, his children, and all other things, to go to service to such a lord for one year: even so we may well deserve to be accounted unthankful and senseless who will not be won and induced to serve God, who, by so many, so excellent, and so assured promises, doth daily invite us thereto.

Unthankfulness to God.

Rom. vi. 20, 22.
Col. i. 13, 14.
Heb. ii. 14, 15.
Acts x. 38.
2 Tim. ii. 26.

LIKE as, if any man should give unto any one of us an annuity of twenty or forty pounds during our lives, we ought to thank him for it; or if a friend had redeemed any one of us out of prison, either by his friendship or money, where otherwise we should have lain all our life long, we would greatly love him; now, if the same man, by his valiantness, had saved us, being in great danger in a battle or shipwreck, we would much reverence him, and say that we were never able to make him amends: even so it is a very great ingratitude, seeing that our Lord God hath, by His Son Jesus Christ, delivered us out of the captivity of Satan, sin, death, hell, and damnation, by our disobedience and lewdness of life, to despise and anger Him and for so great kindness to give Him again so great contumely and despise.

The Untractableness of some people.

Ps. xxxii. 9.

1. As a wild horse, if he cannot, by kicking and rearing, cast his rider, watcheth the time till his rein be slacked, and, getting the bit between his teeth, setteth his tail on end, and runneth his rider against the trees and walls, and through hedges, to spoil him if it be possible, and when he is down giveth him a farewell with his heels; or as the mule is a beast well enough known to be froward and unruly, so that if his keeper watch him not the better, he will take him up in his teeth and lay him before him in the manger: even so there is nothing so brutish as the ungratefulness, frowardness, and waywardness of some parishioners in rejecting the doctrine and government which God hath appointed for their souls, whereof, although there be many judges, yet none can tell what a troublesome work this is as the faithful ministers of the Gospel can, who are driven to manage such rusty and untamed jades as are many among the multitude; for what with jerking out the heels, rising upon the hinder legs, going sidelong, and other froward touches of such unbroken colts, the poor minister, if he be on their backs, can hardly keep the saddle, and if he lead them in his hand, one froward jade or other in the parish taketh him up by the collar and throws him out of the way, so that, though the minister be never so honest and godly, and have many good friends, yet, if he be careful to do his duty, he shall hardly stand without suspension or deprivation, or some such like foil, which would never come to pass, for the most part, if it were not for the horses and mules in his own parish.

2. As horses get nothing by their furiousness and madness but the sore bit and bridle: even so the untractableness and waywardness of obstinate and stubborn persons getteth not anything by opposing and withstanding the Gospel, and gainsaying the truth of God's Word, for they wrestle against God, and so make themselves ridiculous.

Unwilling to die.

LIKE as he is overmuch given to wine who would suck up the dregs: so is he too greedy of life who, in old age, would not be content to die.

How we must Use the things of this World.

As a traveller useth his staff in his journey, as long as it doth further him so long he will carry it with him, but when it hindereth him, then he casts it away: so, likewise, must we use the things of this life—namely, as long as they are helps to further and make us fit for the kingdom of heaven; but if they be any hindrance to us in the spiritual regiment of Christ, we must renounce them and cast them away, be they never so precious to us.

Usurer.

1. As it behoveth him that hath fallen into the mire either to be still or with speed to rise, for if he stir, then he will therein be the more defiled: so ought he that hath to do with an usurer, either rid himself from his debt and danger, or, at the least, to enter no further therein.

2. As an earthen box that is close, with a hole in the upper part, wherein money is put, which money cannot be come at unless the box be broken: so, likewise, a man can get no money out of the usurer's bags or coffers until death hath broken the life of the usurer.

3. As he that is struck or stung of the little serpent called the asp falleth into a pleasant sleep, and so, by the sweetness of that dead sleep, dieth, for then the venomous poison disperseth itself into every member: so he that borroweth upon usury thinketh for a time that it is pleasant and profitable unto him, and that he hath received a great good turn, but in the end this usury runneth through all his riches, and converteth all that he hath into debt.

Exod. xxii. 25.
Lev. xxv. 36.
Neh. v. 1, &c.
Ps. xv. 5.

Deut. xxiv. 1-5.
Mat. xix. 7, 8.
Mal. ii. 16.
Mark x. 4, 5.

4. As the law of divorce which was given by Moses did not excuse before God the Jew who used it, but that he was guilty of the breach of wedlock : even so the statute for usury doth not so make it lawful that the Christian who useth it to the hurt of his neighbour is clear or guiltless thereby before the majesty of God.

5. Like as the mass-saying priests, who are wont to offer sometimes a halfpenny themselves, to move the people by their example to offer also, and by that means, for one halfpenny, they get twenty : even so doth the usurer—he giveth sometimes a little usury to get thereby a greater.

6. As the rain falling upon the flint neither breaketh it nor causeth it to grow bigger : even so the pleasant dews of God's Word, sweetly dropping down upon the hard-hearted usurer, can neither make him cease from sin nor yet grow in goodness.

Ps. xcv. 5.

7. As the sea is never filled with water, though all the storms of the world run into it : even so the greediness of an usurer is never satisfied, though he gain never so unreasonably.

8. As no man standeth for non-residence but he who is a non-resident or he who would be a non-resident : so, likewise, no man standeth for usury but he who is an usurer or he who would be an usurer.

9. As the ivy loveth the oak to grow up by it : so the usurer loveth the borrower to grow rich by him. The ivy claspeth the oak like a lover, but it so claspeth out all the juice and sap, that the oak cannot thrive after : so the usurer lendeth like a friend but covenanteth like an enemy, for he claspeth the borrower with such bands, that ever after he decayeth and diminisheth, as fast as the usurer increaseth.

10. As a very bitter and pinching black frost doth kill and destroy the tender, sweet, pleasant, and beautiful blossoms : even so the usurer, likewise, many times, by his extreme usury, doth kill men, women, and children.

11. As a poor silly sheep finds succour and shelter under a thorn-bush in some storm or tempest a little while, but when she departeth from the bush, it keepeth back a piece of her fleece, and the oftener she goeth the barer and more naked she is, so that at length she is able to abide neither bush nor storm : even so such a bush of thorns is the usurer to the poor borrower—he will leave him at length no fleece on his back, he will leave him no house over his head, unless it be some prison-house to die in, no bed to rest upon, no flesh on his bones, and no credit in the world.

12. As the thorn-bush that pincheth and pulleth the poor sheep never thriveth nor proveth to be good timber, but serveth only for the fire : so the usurer serveth for nothing but hell, and howsoever he thriveth here he shall be pinched there.

13. As he that cutteth down a tree by the roots doth withal cut down the boughs, twigs, and branches also : so, likewise, the usurer consumeth, utterly undoeth, and, with sorrow, drieth up the marrow in the bones of parents, to the shortening of their days, and, withal, doth even destroy their poor sweet infants also.

14. The caterpillars of Egypt were so surely tethered, that they harmed no place but where they themselves were : but these caterpillars, the usurers, will sit at home in their chairs, like boars that are franking (fattening) in the sty, and will consume a man one, two, or three hundred miles from them ; for they, by their brokers, do fly over and view all the lands, lordships, manors, woods, parks, groves, fields, meadows, pastures, and whatsoever farms, leases, or other commodities of noblemen, lords, knights, esquires, gentlemen, yeomen, and husbandmen there be ; so that here they gobble up a whole town, and there a goodly park, here a lordship or manor, and there a most pleasant wood.

15. As the worm teredo, whereof Pliny maketh mention in his "Natural History," which is as soft as silk in the feeling of the hand, but biteth so hard with the teeth that it eateth the strongest timber : even so such a thing is usury and the usurer—soft in his words and fair in his promises, but by his deeds he stingeth to death and wasteth the greatest substance

16. As vultures and ravens will pick the guts out of a man's belly : even so, likewise, the usurer eateth up the fruits of other men's labours.

17. Like as the fire, which is an active and insatiable element, for it burneth and consumeth all the wood that is laid upon it : so the usurer, the more he hath, the more he desireth, and, like hell gates, is never satisfied.

Usury.

1. As poison, the weaker it is, the longer nature resisteth it, and the stronger it is, the sooner it killeth : even so usury, the less it is, the less it hurteth, and the greater it is, the sooner it consumeth.

2. As a burthen, the heavier it is, the faster it wearieth, although even a light burthen, saith the proverb, will prove heavy with far carriage : so, likewise, is it with usury—both great and small will eat and consume, but the first in the shorter, the last in the longer, continuance.

3. As there is great difference between the biting of a flea and the biting of a dog or the biting of a lion, yet all are bitings, and the least will draw blood : so there is difference between him that taketh five pounds and him that taketh ten, or him that taketh twenty in the hundred ; yet all is biting, and the least will consume a man in continuance.

4. As a serpent that stingeth privily is little perceived or felt at the first, but afterward the man that is stung swelleth, and the effect of that little stinging is dispersed through the whole body : even so the inconvenience of usury is not felt in the beginning, but in time it amounteth to a great sum, and devoureth a man's whole substance.

5. Like as we see, in theft or robbery, if a man steal but twelve pence out of a rich man's purse, though the weight of it be little felt by reason of the rich man's store and abundance, yet he is hindered that loseth it, and he is a thief that taketh it : even so is it in usury. Though it be taken of a rich man, and in so small a measure as that his abundance hardly suffereth the evil thereof to be perceived, yet is he bitten that payeth it, and he that taketh it is an oppressor.

Exod. xxii. 25.

Spiritual Usury.

LIKE as he who lendeth looketh justly to receive his own again : even so let him that is merciful to the poor most assuredly expect that the things which he layeth out shall be rendered again of God with a most liberal increase, as it were with a threefold usury.

Prov. xxviii. 27.
Matt. v. 42.
Dent. xv. 10.
Matt. xxv. 27, 28.

Vain-glory.

1. As winds, being about to cease, do then most vehemently blow : so mortal men, when they do most exalt themselves, then are they nearest their fall and end.

2. As nights succeed days and winter summer : so grief and sadness follow vain-glory and pleasure.

Vain-glorious men.

1. As, with organ-players, unless somebody blow the bellows, the organ doth make no sound at all : even so vain-glorious men, unless they be pricked forward with commendations and praises of others, have never any mind or purpose to bend themselves to any good action.

2. As the lighter balance or end of the beam will rise upward, and ever be highest : so the vainer, more unprofitable, and unjust that a man is, the more will he vaunt and extol himself, and, being a very impious, ungodly, and most wicked man, will arrogantly assume unto himself righteousness, and most impudently challenge the name of a good and honest man, when, indeed, he setteth more by one penny of money than by ten pounds' worth of honesty, and doth more love ten pounds of money than he doth the health, wealth, credit, liberty, life, yea, more than the soul, of his neighbour and Christian brother.

3. Even as an archer doth shoot nearer and sooner hitteth a fair great mark than a little one : so the devil doth easily hit with his arrows and strike with his darts the vain-glorious and proud men of the world, but the humble and lowly he misseth, with all the sleights and cunning he hath.

Vain-glorious talkers.

Job xxxii. 19.

1. As new wine will burst the vessels it is put in except they have a vent : so a man, desirous to hear himself, can by no means hold his tongue.

2. As a dog, having an arrow sticking in his leg, will not rest till he have it out : even so no more will a foolish prattler rest till he have spoken all he know of anything, or by others, good or bad.

Vanity of men's inventions.

Job. xx. 8.
Ps. lxxiii. 20.
Jer. xxxiii. 28, 29

As, when men dream pleasant dreams, as soon as they awake there is no such matter ; or as chaff, which, by reason of its lightness, the wind lightly bloweth away : even so fond devices, triflings, inventions, doting doctrines, deceitful traditions, and superstitious religions, coined by man's foolish and fantastical brain, will come to nothing.

Variety of gifts.

1 Cor. xii. 8-11, 25.
Eph. iv. 7.

As one member hath need of another, and every office of each member is profitable for the whole body : even so the variety of gifts, diversely distributed unto the Church, are given to profit withal and to edify the whole body of Christ in love.

Variety of treatises.

LIKE as variety of meats doth corrupt in the stomach and breed sickness rather than preserve health : even so variety of treatises upon one and the self-same thing doth hinder the growth and profiting of divers in soundness of judgment and godly life.

God hath Vengeance in store.

Jer. i. 26.

As in treasure-houses or storehouses men keep all manner of things to serve their purposes : even so God keepeth in store weapons of His wrath, to revenge Himself upon the wicked for the injury and violence done to His Church.

Vice.

1. As into a well or deep open pit the way of entering is easy, but the way and going out is altogether hard and uneasy: so is the entry into vice headlong and easy, but the returning thence into a better life is full of difficulty.

2. As the stain or blot that of long time in the cloth hath continued may not be easily taken away: so the vices wherewith we have of a long time been infected may not at pleasure and ease be plucked from us.

3. As a strumpet, though she be ever so richly decked, even with purple velvet, appeareth yet the viler in the sight of all honest matrons: even so there is no ~~one~~ more pestilent than that which is like virtue, there is no such Judas kiss as with an apostle's face, there is no such deceiving devil as he who comes like an angel of light, and there is no such city as Jerusalem for dissembling and hypocrisy.

4. As the civil magistrates punish vice and lighter faults with some penalty of money or loss of member: so the Church and the minister, especially with the Church, should punish vice and faults by reprehensions and rebukes.

5. As the civil magistrate punisheth great faults by death: so the minister, with others who have interest, hath, with the sword of excommunication, power to kill those who be rebellious, and to cut them off from the Church, as the other doth from the commonwealth.

Vices covered with the names of Virtues.

As Achelous, when he would fight with Hercules, would shift himself into a serpent or would change himself unto the likeness of a devil, or, being a devil, he would change himself into what form and frame he would: even so some men do cover vices with the names of virtues—as the proud man is shifted into a clean man, a fine man, a handsome man; a covetous man is changed unto a subtle, prudent man, a wary and a frugal wise man; the lecherous man is called an amorous man, a loving and a courteous man; the idle man is named a quiet and harmless man; the flatterer is accounted an eloquent person, learned and witty in his talk; drunkenness is changed into good fellowship, gluttony into hospitality, envy into goodwill, and tyranny into justice, &c.

Virtue.

1. LIKE as, if a man cast a precious stone into the dust, it will, notwithstanding, show forth the beauty of it again: even so the virtue of a holy and righteous man will show forth itself whithersoever it be cast, either into bondage, or prison, or in prosperity.

2. Like as precious and costly spices and odours do smell and savour best when they be bruised, broken, or set on fire: even so the praise and commendation of virtue, through continual use and exercise, and through adversity, is spread wide abroad, and made manifest and known everywhere.

3. Like as true faith is not idle, but worketh, and powerfully by love: even so true virtue is not a bare affection of the mind, or the bare purpose of the will, but doth set out itself by outward honest actions, and doth shine in them, from whence all the praise thereof doth consist in the action.

4. As we are wont to eat pears and the kernels of nuts, but throw from us upon the ground the parings and shells: so we ought unfeignedly to be in love, and delight with virtue and godliness, and to continue therein, and to despise the shape or shadow of the same when separated and divided from virtue itself; for to retain and hold the fashion and likeness of virtue without the substance of the same is mere hypocrisy.

Tit. iii. 8.
1 Thess. iv. 12
Rom. xii. vj.

5. Like as, when Orpheus went to fetch his wife Eurydice out of hell, he had her granted to him upon a condition that he should not turn back his eyes to look upon her till he had brought her into heaven, yet, having brought her forward a great way, at length his love was so excessive that he could not continue any longer, but would needs have a sight of her, whereupon forthwith he lost both her sight and herself, she suddenly again vanishing away from him : so, if we have any virtue, which is to be loved as a man is to love his wife, yet we must not be so blind in affection as to dote too much upon it, or to be always gazing and wondering at it, lest by too much looking upon it, and by too well liking of it, and by too often remembering of it, we lose it.

6. As the sun, being directly over us, our bodies have the less shadow, as we may perceive at noon, and a little before and after : so, also, the more virtue and goodness is in us, the less ostentation and boasting we shall have.

7. Contrariwise, as this is a sign of the going down of the sun and his departure from us, when our shadows become great : so, also, this is an argument to prove that virtue diminisheth in us when pride and presumption increase.

8. As the heat of the sun softeneth wax and hardeneth the mire : so, likewise, virtue rejoiceth and comforteth the good and grieveth the wicked, consuming and wasting them by little and little, so that at length they pine away with sorrow and grief in seeing good men flourish in wealth and prosperity.

9. As we see the fire in the beginning cast forth a great smoke, which quickly vanisheth away as soon as it is well kindled : so, likewise, virtue causeth great malice and spite in the beginning ; but if a man be constant and will not be discouraged, but burneth more and more in virtue and goodness, in the end he shall disperse them, as the sunbeams drive away the clouds, in such sort that at length we shall not know what is become of them.

10. Even as the stars do shine in the night, but in the daytime they lie hidden : even so true virtue, waxing beautiful by temptation, doth, as iron with use, show in adversity what force it is of, which otherwise, in time of prosperity, lay hid in secret.

11. As the precious stone sandaresus hath nothing in outward appearance but that which seemeth black, but, being broken, poureth forth beams like the sun : so virtue showeth but bare to the outward eye, but, being pierced with inward desire, shineth like crystal.

12. Like as, in a pair of tables, nothing may be well written before the blots and blurs be wiped out : so virtue and nobleness can never be seen in a man except he first put away his vices.

13. As by nature the cedar will be tall, the diamond bright, and the carbuncle glistening : so virtue will shine though it be never so much obscured.

14. Like as an adamant (loadstone) draweth by little and little the heavy iron, until at last it be joined with it : so virtue and wisdom draw men's minds to the practice thereof.

Virtue always accompanied with praise.

As our shadow followeth us, although without our will : so, likewise, glory, praise, and commendations do follow virtue and learning.

Virtue spreadeth her branches over all.

LIKE as, if a man carry in his hand a burning candle, it giveth light not only to him that carrieth it, but to all those who be in the house, and they also see it who are without ; or as he that is bathed or perfumed with precious ointments or sweet powders hath not only the pleasure thereof to himself, but the savour thereof casteth itself out and is pleasant to all those who stand by: even so such as be the children of knowledge, and do carry about them the light of God's Word, not only taste of the comfort thereof themselves, and work comfort to those that appertain to the Church of God, but lighten also the hearts of pagans and infidels who are abroad.

Virtue to be increased with life.

LIKE as they who are tossed here and there with sundry tempests have not sailed much, but have been greatly impeded: so such as have lived long, but yet have not profited anything in virtue and godliness, are not said to have lived, but lingered.

Virtuous and godly men.

1. LIKE as the margarites (pearls), those little white shining precious stones which do grow within shell fishes in the sea, in this point are very marvellous and wonderful, that though they be bred and increased in the sea, yet have they no similitude and likeness with the sea; for the sea is blue or sky-coloured, but the margarites are white—the sea is horrible and full of discomfiture, but they are cheerful, pleasant, and beautiful to behold; they move much, greatly delight, and mightily allure men's eyes to look upon them—the sea is bitter, but they are amiable and without all bitterness, but rather in some sort and measure, by reason of their clearness and brightness, they represent the sky—the reason is, because they receive influence from thence: even so such are virtuous and godly men who are surely grounded and certainly settled in the love of God and the true Christian religion, who, being born and brought up in this world, have no resemblance, likeness, or fashion of the same—in desire they be drawn, in will they be severed, in words they differ, in works they utterly disagree from it—and they do rather resemble, in some measure, heaven, from whence they receive the influence of the grace and favour of God.

2. Even as that precious stone called a carbuncle doth not in darkness lose its shining and excellent beauty: so, likewise, a virtuous and godly man, in the extreme darkness of infinite calamities, obloquies, cursings, railings, backbitings, slanders, and whatsoever may befall him, doth show his Christian patience and quiet sufferings, for he knoweth well that such things do profit much to advance the growth and praise of noble virtues.

3. As most pleasant perfumes do even then, when they be in the fire, give out a most excellent odour and their sweetest savour: even so a virtuous and godly man, when he is thrust into the midst of the hot scorching fire of calamity and misery, doth then show most his virtue, faith, religion, patience, and constancy.

4. As the fuller and heavier scale is ever lowest: so the more virtuous, honest, and godly that any man is, the more will he submit and humble himself, and howsoever other men will seem to praise him, he, nevertheless, doth still acknowledge his own imperfection; and, indeed, it is in a Christian man some perfection to know and to acknowledge his want and imperfection.

Virtuous in poor estate, and contrariwise.

As a woman who, having a hen that laid her every day an egg, seeing that her hen was very lean and yet laid still after her accustomed manner, supposed that if she were fat and lusty she would lay twice a day, and, with this conceit of mind, fed and crammed her thoroughly, so that in short space she became so fat, that, clean contrary to the expectation and opinion of the woman, she left off laying altogether : so, in like manner, there are many who, in their poor and base estate, are very virtuous, but if they be once mounted and advanced to any degree of felicity and abundance, and do live easily and wealthily, then they give over their former study, and become careless, sensual, and void of all good works, so that they can neither go nor run in the way of virtue.

We ought to Visit them that be in misery.

Luke x. 30, &c.
Matt. xxv. 40.
James i. 27.

1. As beggars, when they would have men to pity them, lay open their sores, because that, though things be ever so great in themselves, yet, till they be seen, we will hardly believe them, and, therefore, we do the poor much wrong many times in judging their estate to be better than it is : even so thereby is showed that if we will show mercy to others so cheerfully as we should, we must visit them in their necessity, and not turn our eyes away from beholding their need.

2 Chron. ix, 5, 6.

2. As the queen of Sheba came, among others, to make trial of the wisdom of Solomon, which was so great, and when she had so done, and had seen and heard all things, she was greatly astonished, and said unto the king, "It was a true word which I had heard in mine own land of thy sayings and of thy wisdom ; howbeit, I believed not this report till I came and had seen it with my eyes ; but, lo ! the one half was not told, for thou hast more wisdom and prosperity than I have heard by report," &c. : even so may it be said of the condition of our brethren, that though we hear much, yet we shall not know the tenth part of their poverty and misery except we will go and see it, and, therefore, cannot be so moved to pity them as the Lord would have us.

Rem. xii. 15.

3. Even as Abraham, when he would provoke himself to great humiliation, as such a chastisement did require, wept in the sight of the dead corpse, that the beholding of it might move him the rather : so, likewise, if we would look into the necessity or calamity of our brethren and set it before our eyes, we should be more plentiful in well doing than we are, and be more ready to weep with them that weep, and to be like-minded one toward another.

War.

1st. xix. 2.

As the temple of Diana at Ephesus, which was twenty years by all the people of Asia and by so many great princes in building, was in one night fired by the vile wretch Herostratus : even so great cities, by war, are easily overthrown, but not so soon to be built again.

Spiritual Warfare.

1. As men may have an end of bodily war either by making peace with their enemy, by flying far from him, or by overcoming him in fight, but in spiritual warfare we cannot lawfully make any peace or agreement with our enemies, the devil, the world, and the flesh, for in so doing it would be our overthrow and destruction, for they be even so many traitors and irreconcilable murderers—yea, it would be worse for us than for the sheep to make peace with the wolf—neither can we fly and so get from these enemies, for the devil will follow us into all places, having a whole army of soldiers within us, even our affections and covetous lusts that we hear about us.

2. As God, in old time, commanded Joshua that he should not fear the Canaanites, and assured him that He would be with him, and that by overcoming them He would bring His people into the land of promise : so, likewise, we must give ear unto God, who calleth us to his spiritual battle, with assurance that He will stand with us and in us, to the end that, courageously fighting under His banner against our enemies that labour to turn us back, we may finally, by His grace and power, obtain full and perfect victory, and so, ending our blessed warfare, attain to the fruition of the heavenly city and our true country, that we may live with Him in glory for ever.

Ungodly Warriors.

1. As they that pour oil and cast dry straw upon a fire do not quench the flame, but minister matter for it to burn more ragingly : so, likewise, sins being the cause of wars and inflaming the wrath of God, ungodly warriors do even increase and continue them and make them more fierce and raging ; for where the captains in war be irreligious, given to drunkenness, whoredom, riot, and horrible swearing, it is wonderful to behold the foul enormities and monstrous abominations which the common soldiers commit.

2. As the king and the kingdom are not beholden to those men who live in ungodly ways, although they seem to do great service to the commonwealth, inasmuch as they be of those that provoke the wrath of God, and thereby put the state of both king and kingdom in hazard : even so are they not the safer, but in more danger, through those hardy warriors who sin so grievously.

Weakness in the best Christians.

As sweet trefoil loseth its scent seven times a day and receiveth it again, as long as it is growing, but being withered and dried, it keepeth still its savour : so the godly, living in the body, shall often fall and recover again, but being dead shall no more fall, but continue in their holiness.

Man's Weakness to do anything for himself.

As it is with young children, who, when they are first trying to go, can stand no longer than they are holden up by the hand ; or as it is with those who are learning to swim, as soon as they are left to themselves they sink to the bottom : even so, likewise, is it with us. When God taketh His help from us and ceaseth to defend and relieve us, or else to take charge of us, or to do anything at all for us, and so leaveth us to ourselves, we then languish and faint and fall down to our utter undoing, yet we perceive not this until we be exercised with affliction.

2 Sam. xxiv. 19.

Weakness of judgment.

1. As there is a certain weakness of the sight which causeth the patient to think that he seeth straws when he seeth none : so there is a certain weakness of judgment which maketh men think they spy faults when they do not.

2. As they who have tenesmus of body often go about to void the filth of the body, but cannot : so many have a tenesmus of soul, labouring often to cast out their evil, and cannot.

Our Weakness to please God.

LIKE as, if a man, being hired to do a day's work, should deceitfully work but with one hand, and so disappoint his master of the work, which should have been wrought with both hands: even so, although God craveth in every action all our wisdom, wit, will, memory, understanding, and affection, wholly to concur together, we scarcely give Him a part at all.

Not to be weary of Well-doing.

Gal. vi. 9.
Matt. v. 44.

1. As the sun doth not leave off shining and sending forth his bright beams, although a cloud will sometimes darken his light: even so we must not give over to exercise godliness and to do well, even toward them that be our enemies, and who hate and persecute us, although the better we do, the worse they will deal with us.

2. As the nut and olive-trees, although they be beaten with rods, yet bring forth most plentiful fruits: so we must not be weary of well-doing, nor cast the exercise and practice of godliness behind us, but rather more willingly and fervently proceed and go on in the same, although the friends of this world shall brawl and rate at us.

Whoredom.

Prov. vi. 27, &c.
Job xxxi. 9.
2 Sam. xii. 19; xvi. 22.
Heb. xiii. 4.
Mal. iii. 5.

1. LIKE as a fire, being kindled in a city, if the wind blow vehemently, it stayeth not in the burning of one house or two, but spreadeth far and wide, and draweth a great destruction with it: so, likewise, whoredom, being once kindled, stayeth not in one man, but invadeth and spreadeth over all parts of the city.

2. As not only he that killeth with the hand, but also he that expresseth by token or word the malice of his heart, is, before God, guilty of murder: so, in like manner, not only he that committeth uncleanness in deed, but he also that doth solicit a woman by signs and words, is taken to be guilty either of adultery, or incest, or of fornication, or of whoredom, although the work itself follow not.

Prov. v. 3, &c.
1 Cor. vi. 10.
Deut. xxiii. 17, 18.
1 Cor. x. 8.
Rev. xxi. 8.
1 Cor. vi. 15-17.

3. Like as he is before God a plain thief that hath a purpose to steal, though he steal never a halfpenny, because he is not stayed from it by will, but either by fear of punishment or by some other means: even so he cannot be excused from adultery who, in purpose and endeavours, is inclined to the work of adultery, either in his eyes, hands, gesture of body, or filthy communication.

Wicked.

1. As the third sort of Canterbury-bells, planted in gardens, prosper overmuch, for they so spread abroad and multiply that they hurt other herbs, and will not easily be weeded out or overcome: even so are the wicked in the Church.

2. As of one and the same wormwood, the common wormwood is hot in the first degree, and the sea wormwood hot in the second, and yet both are wormwood: so, among the wicked, some are less hot in profession, some more, and yet both are wicked; some less cruel, some more cruel, and yet both ungodly, &c.

3. As wild boars and swine, which are wont to eat and destroy wheat and corn, will seldom feed upon Triticum Romanorum, or bearded wheat, because of the prickly beards, which do them hurt: so the wicked, who live by devouring and oppressing the children of God, will seldom assault those who can hurt them.

4. Polemonia, held in the hand, keepeth a man from being stung or hurt with any scorpion: but the more virtues a man hath, the sooner the wicked will vex him, therefore are they worse than scorpions.

5. As the great rayfort, or mountain radish, being planted near the vine, causeth it to starve and wither away : so the wicked, being too near the godly, make them to decay and fall away.

6. As the salamander that is ever in the fire and never consumeth : so the souls of reprobate and ungodly men be ever dying in hell and yet never dead.

7. As water lighting upon a hard stone falleth away, because there is no entry open into the stone : so the wicked do, with their hardness of heart, drive back the grace of God that it cannot pierce into them.

8. As flint-stones are made of such matter that neither water can moisten them nor fire can melt them : even so the wicked and obstinate are so stony-hearted that neither the heavenly dew of the sweet promises of the Gospel nor the fear of the furious threatenings of the law can mollify their hearts. Ezek. iii. 9.

9. As long as a sick man can walk and stand, there is some hope that he will recover and amend ; but if he must needs lie down, then there is little hope of his health : even so a man that walketh in the counsel of the wicked, or standeth in the way of sinners, there may be some hope of him ; but if he once sit down in the chair or seat of the scornful, then there is no hope at all of his repentance. Ps. i. 1.

10. As the disease of a canker infecteth always the next part unto it, until it have run through and infected the whole body : even so the wicked never cease until they have drawn to be like themselves all such as keep them company. 1 Kings xi. 3-5.
Deut. vii. 3, 4.
Judges xvi. 16-18.

11. As fire is of this nature and quality, that it will burn up whole houses and fair places, even with a spark, if it be let alone, which otherwise might be put out with one's finger : even so the wicked, yea, but one wicked member in a town, if he be suffered, will at length do much hurt to the whole town, &c.

12. As that mother cannot but be greatly afflicted who, having many children weeping and crying at once for meat, hath not sufficient or none at all to give them : even so the wicked man, being greedily called upon without ceasing, by almost infinite passions, to yield to their desires, must needs be vexed and pitifully tormented, especially being not able to satisfy anyone of the least of their petitions.

13. Like as the stone of Sicily, the which, the more it is beaten, the harder it waxeth : even so the wicked, the more that the terrors and threatenings of God's judgments are denounced against them, the more hard-hearted they be.

14. As the grave always craveth for more, and is never satisfied : even so such is the insatiableness of the throats of the wicked. Rom. iii. 13.

15. As the miller doth muffle and blindfold his horse that draweth his malt mill, whereby the horse, supposing that he goeth right forward, is deceived, for that he turneth round ; or as the falconer doth put hoods upon the heads of his hawks, that so they may sit the quieter on his arm : even so Satan muffleth and hoodwinketh the wicked by ignorance and by the delights, pleasures, and vain enticement of the world, that so he may possess them the quieter, to their utter overthrow.

16. As the adder is by nature inclined and desirous to sting and hurt with its poison whomsoever it may : even so all the counsel of the wicked tendeth to the increase of wickedness and mischief. Ps. lvi. 4, 5 ;
lxxxiii. v.

17. As the poisonous nature of an adder can by no means be redressed, no, not by enchantment, for he stoppeth his ears against the charmer : even so there is no hope of the conversion of obstinate wicked ones, who stubbornly refuse to hear all wholesome doctrine and good counsel that proceed out of the Word. Acts vii. 57.

18. As the axe is in the hands of the hewers or workmen : even so the wicked, whose misery and service the Lord useth to destroy and to plague others, are also in the hand of God. Isa. xix. 15.

- Isa. xlii. 19. As men throw away their tools when they are worn and broken : even so God, when He hath finished His work, casteth away the wicked, whom only He useth as instruments of His wrath.
- Deut. ii. 9, 10. 20. As the Anakims, or giants, were driven out of the land of Canaan for their sins : so the wicked, when their sins are ripe, cannot avoid God's plagues.
- Ps. xxxvii. 14. 21. As a bow bent, with an arrow ready set in it, to shoot at anything : even so are the devices of the wicked against the godly.
- Ps. xxxvii. 15. 22. As he whose bow breaketh in drawing misseth his mark : even so the enterprises and endeavours of the wicked, even when they think to destroy the godly, are broken and come to nought.
23. As firebrands which we see burning at the ends are very shortly clean burnt out or easily quenched : even so the devices, attempts, and threatenings of wicked men, when God doth not establish and ratify their counsels, come to nought.
- Ps. xxii. 12. 24. As young wild bulls are strong and lusty to do hurt : even so is the rage of malicious wicked men in persecuting the godly.
- Matt. iii. 10; vii. 19.
Luke iii. 9.
Judges xii. 25. As trees that are unprofitable, and bring forth no good fruit, are to be cut down and cast into the fire : even so the wicked and obstinate, who persevere in their malicious blindness and obdurate disobedience, deserve severe punishment.
- Job xxi. 18.
Ps. i. 4; xxxv. 5.
Isa. xvii. 13. 26. As chaff is blown abroad with the wind and scattered : even so such is the state of the wicked when God bloweth upon them with the breath of His displeasure.
- Matt. iii. 12.
Isa. xxxiii. 14. 27. Like as fire consumeth chaff and stubble : so, likewise, God shall make the wicked overthrow, destroy, and bring to nought their own devices.
- Ps. xxii. 20. 28. As the mad dog rageth, and, if he be able, biteth every one that he meeteth with : even such is the rage of wicked men of might toward them that they can bring under their power.
- Prov. xxvi. 11.
2 Pct. ii. 2. 29. As dogs, when by vomiting they have cleared their stomachs of such matter as afore lay there undigested, do presently return to it and devour it again : so, likewise, fareth it with a fool that seemeth sorrowful for his folly, and with a wicked man that feigneth repentance and conversion—the one delighteth still in folly, and the other returneth again to his filthiness.
- Ps. cxix. 119.
Isa. i. 22. 30. As, in fining of metal, the dross is separated from other metals : even so God will separate the wicked of the earth from the godly and them that fear Him.
- Ezek. xxii. 19-22. 31. As dross is separated from silver by melting it in the fire : even so the wicked shall perish by the fire of God's wrath.
- Isa. v. 24.
Jer. iv. 4; v. 14.
Gen. xix. 24.
Lev. x. 2.
Numb. xi. 1; xvi. 35. 32. As fire quickly consumeth dry stubble and straw : so the wrath of God kindleth as fire, and consumeth the wicked for contemning His Word, and for the wickedness of their inventions.
- Matt. xii. 33-35. 33. As the fruit cannot be good except the tree be first good : even so from the evil heart of a wicked man nothing that is good in the eyes and sight of God can proceed.
- Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2. 34. As the grass on the house-top, which, for lack of root, withereth afore it can grow up to be mowed or to any good use : even so the wicked, though they flourish like the green herb, yet quickly shall they be cut down and wither away.
35. As the mill, if it go empty, or the filthy hog, if he be not satisfied with meat, maketh an unpleasant and odious noise : so the wicked, if the Lord in everything satisfy not their desire, do most wickedly murmur and blaspheme His providence.
36. As his sight is very bad who can discern nothing but black ; his taste very ill who can feel relish of nothing but sharp things ; his smelling far out of frame who savoureth nothing but that which stinketh : so, likewise, his mind is most wicked and his tongue most devilish that can conceive of his brother and report nothing but that which is bad and discommendable in him.

37. As a dark and dim light which a man cannot discern anything by nor use to his benefit, but is ready so soon as it is stirred to go quite out : so is the prosperity of the wicked. Job xviii. 6.

38. As lions rage and roar when they seek after their prey : even so do wicked men when they seek to destroy them that fear God. Ps. vii. 2.

39. As a raging lion spoileth and devoureth all that he can catch or come by : so the Lord destroyeth the wicked that fall from Him, and exerciseth all manner of justice upon them. Ezek. xix. 5-8

40. As moths eat garments and worms wool : so the wicked shall be fretted away and consumed. Hos. v. 2.
Matt. vi. 19.
James v. 2.

41. As the net, craftily laid, encloseth a number of fish : so the wicked, by their privy devices, seek to catch and draw into their danger the godly. Ezek. xii. 13.
Ps. xxxi. 4.

42. As men tread dirt under their feet in the streets : even so God shall cause the wicked to be trampled on that rise up against Him and His elect children. Ps. xviii. 42.

43. As, in an oven or furnace, the fire doth quickly consume the wood which is put therein : even so the wicked, in the day wherein God will show forth His anger, shall quickly be consumed. Ps. xxi. 9.
Mal. iv. 1.

44. As rushes and other green things that commonly grow in watery places, if they spring up in hot places where they want moisture, do quickly consume, wither, and come to nought : even so the ways of the wicked and the hope of the hypocrite shall perish. Job viii. 11-13.

45. As the sea when it rageth, the waters thereof cast up dirt and mire : so the wicked in their outrageousness show abroad their filth. Isa. lviii. 20.

46. As smoke vanisheth and cometh to nothing : so the wicked and ungodly perish at the presence of God. Ps. lxxviii. 2.

47. As a snail melteth and consumeth to slime and earth : so shall God consume the wicked and bring them to nought. Ps. lviii. 8.

48. As we see divers beasts, vermin, and fowls often escape out of sundry snares and engines, and yet in the end are trapped in one or other : so, in like manner, some wicked do at times seem to escape the heavy judgments of God, yet in the end they shall be snared. Jer. xlviii. 44.

49. As swine, though they be washed never so clean, yet so soon as they can find a miry plat they will wallow and tumble themselves in it again : so, no matter what pains soever are bestowed to reduce and reclaim the wicked and ungodly from their impiety, they will shortly pollute and defile themselves again. 2 Pet. ii. 22.

50. As fire made of thorns burneth fiercely for the time, and keepeth a great noise and crackling, but yet is speedily burnt out and consumed : so the attempts of the wicked are for the time violent and dangerous, but God in His good time doth with speed extinguish and quench them. Ps. cxviii. 12.
Neh. i. 10.

51. Like as men are wont to hew down the trees that are either unfruitful or else bring forth bad fruit, and make firewood of them : so God in His good time will root out of His Church all wicked men and throw them into eternal fire. Ezek. xxxi. 3.
Luke xiii. 6, 7.

52. As a wall, when it beginneth to bow or is shaken, will shortly fall : even so ruinous is the state of the wicked, howsoever it seem to be. Ps. lxxii. 3.

53. As the spider's web is now whole and straightways broken, almost for the least thing that may happen : so the expectation of the wicked faileth and deceiveth them. Isa. lix. 5.

Job viii. 14.

54. As of spiders' webs no man can make cloth to clothe him : so the wicked, who bend their wits to conceive mischief, and whose whole labour is to bring forth iniquity, shall not reap profit by their devices and pains.

Isa. xlvii. 8, 9.

55. Like as the widow that is in extreme grief for the loss of her husband and of her children, because she is now destitute of all help and comfort : even so such grief and affliction will God bring upon the wicked who, when they flourish and are in prosperity, are proud and unmerciful.

56. As a little image, though it be set upon a high mountain, is, notwithstanding, a little one still ; and, on the other side, if the Colossus, that huge and mighty image, be placed in a very low valley, yet it loseth not its bigness : even so a wicked and cursed man, who is fraught with sundry vices, though he flourish in honour and riches, yet is he but a seely (silly) mean man ; and, on the other side, a man that is virtuous and godly-wise, although he be in extreme poverty and beggarly estate, yet, out of doubt, he is a great man and to be highly accounted of.

57. As men mad and frantic are wont to tear and rend themselves : so wicked and ungodly men inflict upon themselves most deadly and incurable wounds—yea, they be most wilful murderers of their souls and bodies.

Ps. lxxviii. 2 ; lxxx. 16.

58. As wax melteth at the heat of the fire : even so do the wicked perish at the face and countenance of the Lord.

59. As the sea, although it receive an unspeakable multitude of floods and rivers which do run into it, yet never runneth over, neither is so full that it will receive no more : so evil and wicked men are never satisfied with malice, envy, and hatred, neither make they any end of their treachery, sins, and iniquities, but with the goads of some they are stirred up and pricked forward to commit others worse and more detestable than the first.

60. Like as, if a king, redeeming a poor bondsman whom his master diversely tormented, should besides so favour and honour him as to adopt him for his child, it might well be accounted a frantic or senseless part in this bondsman to forsake such honour and preferment, and to return to live under the tyranny and thralldom of his cruel master : even so such are they who, being delivered from the tyranny and cruelty of Satan and made kings in Jesus Christ, do give themselves to the lusts and pleasures of the flesh and the allurements of the world, thereby returning themselves into the wretched bondage of the devil, to abide eternally under his tyrannous dominion.

61. Like as, if a man, departing from London toward York, should yet give out that he will take his way through Ireland, every man will scorn him as a fool or take pity on him, as if he were a senseless person that goeth far amiss : even so is it with him who, taking no course to amend his life, but, continuing in offending God, doth nevertheless say and uphold that he will go to heaven, every man may judge him to be senseless and greatly out of the way, because he taketh the contrary course, which leadeth to hell.

62. As a continual rain dropping upon a rock of stone maketh it yet never the softer : so nothing can make the heart of a wicked man relent.

Ps. lxxxiii. 13.

63. As a wheel tilts up behind and shoots down before : so the wicked are forward to all badness and backward to all goodness.

Zech. xiii. 6.

64. As the death of Christ was not efficient to save the wicked remaining in their wickedness : so the sin of the wicked was not sufficient to condemn Christ.

Rom. vi. 23.

65. As the thief imprisoned wisheth the judgment-seat overturned, the law with its princes and power dead, and the day of his execution never to come : even so do the wicked caterpillars of the world—men careless of godliness and hardened in heart—whose consciences do accuse them guilty, and, fearing God's judgment, they desire rather that He were not at all than that He should come to give them the reward of sin—eternal death—the assured stipend to all wicked actions and thoughts.

66. As the tiger, when he hears the sound of a tabor or drum, straightway runneth mad and teareth himself in pieces : so the wicked, when he heareth the sound of the charmer, charm he never so wisely, doth not, as the tiger, tear himself, but he rends and tears the Lord in pieces.

67. As the sheep and kine are put into fat pastures to be prepared for the shambles : so, likewise, the wicked, the more wealth, ease, and prosperity that they receive and enjoy, the nearer and heavier is their destruction.

68. As the ox that is still fed waxeth fat, and the fatter he is the nearer he is to the day of slaughter : so it fareth with the wicked worldlings who never come under the cross or affliction, and whose necks could never abide the yoke of the Word of God—they are set up a-fattening for the butcher of hell and made ready against the day of slaughter, which is the day of judgment, when all these outward, common, and general blessings shall tend to their greater condemnation.

Job xxii. 7, &c.
Ps. lxxiii 5, 7, &c.

69. As everything that a godly man doth is not by-and-by to be allowed of : so is not everything that a wicked man doth always to be disliked.

Wicked children of godly parents.

1. As the fair echium bringeth forth an evil-favoured seed, and that evil-favoured seed again bringeth forth a fair bugloss : so sometimes a godly father begetteth an evil child, and a wicked child again sometimes begetteth a godly son.

2. As the foreskin of the flesh remaineth in him who is begotten of one circumcised, and the chaff cometh again with the corn though the seed be never so clean : so it is in original sin and in the sinful children of religious parents.

Wicked men die miserably.

1. EVEN as those birds and fowls which fall to the ground to take the fowler's baits are taken themselves : so, likewise, those men who rely upon the suggestions and enchantments of the devil, the world, and the flesh, are taken in their traps, do die a most miserable and, as it may well be called, an immortal death.

2. As there is never a man that beareth the name of a Christian but will confess that his great grandfather Adam was expelled and thrust out of Paradise for eating one apple forbidden him by the Lord upon pain of death, and yet the same man that, with open mouth, will make this confession will every day eat seven apples as bitter and as straitly forbidden—that is, will offend God seven times as much as that—and yet he will think to escape better, cheaper, and easier than his grandfather did that eat but one—that is, offended God but once ; but the eater of seven shall find the way into everlasting life as hard, yea, harder, to enter than was the way into Paradise to his grandfather being once thrust out, unless he speedily, earnestly, and truly repent him, and give over the eating of such fruits as the Lord hath forbidden him.

3. Like as no water will stick nor abide upon lepers by reason of the foulness and greasy matter of their leprosy : even so such lepers and far worse are we upon whom no dew nor any drops of the grace and Word of God will cleave, abide, and continue.

Wickedness and the fruits thereof.

1. As the godly, when they die, leave not only behind them a good name and fame unto themselves, but also to their kindred: even so, contrariwise, the wicked and ungodly, when they die, leave not only a reproach and shame to themselves, but also to their kindred.

Matt. xxiv. 32.
Joel iv. 3-13.

2. Like as, when grapes be fully ripe and ready for the press, then we know that vintage is at hand: so, likewise, when wickedness aboundeth, God's vengeance cannot be far off.

Wife.

As the glistening beams of the sun when it ariseth deck the heavens: so the virtuous dispositions of a good wife adorn the house.

Choosing of a Wife.

LIKE as he that will plant anything well doth first consider the nature of the ground in the which he intendeth to plant: even so much more he that intendeth to marry should have respect to the condition of that woman of whom he desireth to have children, the fruit of honesty and godliness.

Will of a regenerate man.

As a man that hath one leg sound and the other lame, in every step which he makes, doth not wholly halt or wholly go upright, but partly goeth upright and partly halteth; or like a man in a boat on the water, who goeth upward, because he is carried upward by the vessel, and at the same time goes downward, because he walks downward in the same vessel at the same instant: even so the will of a man regenerate partly willet and partly nillet that which is evil, because it is partly regenerate and partly unregenerate.

Will of God.

1. As the potter in tempering his clay, if he cannot make and frame it according to his mind, at length will dash it in pieces: so God created man, not that he should do his own will, but God's will; and therefore whosoever he be that followeth the lusts of his own wicked heart, and will not be brought to be conformable to God's will, but continues rebellious still, the Lord in His wrath will confound him eternally.

2. Like as, if a man have a trade and other men come into his shop and use such instruments as be there to a wrong end, though they were their own, yet it would grieve him to see it: so God created all things for His own use, and for the accomplishing of His will, but rebellious man conforms himself to the devil's will, and thereby, no doubt, he grievously offendeth God.

It may be just in the Will of God to forsake His creature.

LIKE as it is in the power and liberty of a man to kill an ox or a sheep for his use, or to hunt and kill the hare and partridge for his pleasure: even so much more, without injustice, may it be in the will and liberty of God the Creator to refuse and forsake His creature for His glory.

Will of God not curiously to be searched into.

LIKE as a servant must not enter into the searching of those things which be most secret points of his master's will, and which do not belong unto his knowledge, but rather must mark with all the diligence he can to know what his will is toward him, and to employ himself wholly thereunto: even so it is not our part to search the secrets of God's will, which do not belong unto us, but rather to prove and understand what the will of God is towards us.

Deut. xxix. 29.
John vi. 39, 40.
1 Tim. ii. 4.
1 Thess. iv. 3.
Rom. xii. 2.
Matt. vii. 21.

The Will is instead of the fact before God.

LIKE as he is not to be accounted healthful who, though he do appear whole in the outward parts, yet hath some evil disease within his stomach, or else in his liver or in his lungs, or in some other place: even so he cannot be taken for a just and righteous man, if God be judge, who, although he do not outwardly use whoredom, steal, nor kill, yet doth in his heart desire other men's wives, servants, &c., or any other's goods, or wisheth that he were dead or hanged whom he hateth.

Exod. xx. 17.

Not two Wills in God.

As the sight of the eyes, when they are dazzled and disturbed, doth imagine and suppose that there be two candles burning when there is but one: even so our weak mind, when it looketh upon the will of God, supposeth that there be two wills in God, one secret and another revealed, which is a thing far disagreeing from the nature of God.

Wisdom.

1. As that vessel can never be filled which always poureth forth and leaketh: so he never can receive wisdom who continually speaketh and at no time hearkeneth.

Prov. xvii. 27.
James i. 19.

2. As the ass's colt, which of all other beasts is counted the veriest dullard, yet bringeth more wit and ability to help itself than a young infant: even so, whatsoever wisdom or virtue men have now, they brought it not with them into this world, but have it afterward by the gift and free liberality of God.

James i. 17.

3. As the palm-tree spreadeth its boughs and branches so wide, and giveth such pleasant shadows, that Xerxes, the king of Persia, took singular delight to sit under it whole days together: so, likewise, wisdom, coming out of the mouth of the Most High, with heavenly comfort protecteth, shadoweth, recreateth, and defendeth all those that commit themselves under the shadow thereof from all harm and danger.

Ps. xvii. 8.
Lam. iv. 20.

4. As honey is good, and the honeycomb sweet unto the mouth: so, also, is the knowledge of wisdom unto the soul.

Prov. xxiv. 13, 14.

5. As earthly wisdom is corrupted with affections: even so heavenly wisdom is pure, undefiled, and not polluted with affections.

James iii. 17.

6. As earthly wisdom is desirous of contention: so, contrariwise, heavenly wisdom is peaceable—that is, diligent to make peace and quietness among men.

7. As earthly wisdom is rigorous and cruel: so heavenly wisdom is gentle and giveth place to rigour.

8. As earthly wisdom will yield to no man: so heavenly wisdom is tractable, and doth easily obey him that commandeth those things that be good and right.

9. As earthly wisdom is unmerciful : so heavenly wisdom is merciful and full of good fruits.

10. As earthly wisdom doth accept persons, omitting the cause : so heavenly wisdom doth in no case regard the persons, but the causes.

11. As earthly wisdom hath hypocrisy joined with it : so heavenly wisdom is void of all hypocrisy.

Isa. lvii. 15; lxvi. 2.
Matt. xi. 25.
Luke i. 51.
1 Pet. v. 5.

12. As the sweet showers of rain fall down from the high hills and mountains, and so these abide barren, but they rest and sink into the low valleys and make them fruitful : even so the dews of true wisdom do not rest upon the proud, haughty, and scornful, but upon the meek, lowly, and humble.

Rom. viii. 7.

13. As he that is humble and hath denied himself is fittest for the receiving of wisdom : even so there is no greater hindrance to the attaining of wisdom than the pride of man's heart and carnal wisdom.

14. As, in dangerous sailing, the helm is not committed to him who excelleth in riches and nobility merely, but to him who is expert in the skill and cunning of navigation : so, likewise, it behoveth not to commit and deliver a princely government unto him who is merely richer and more honourable than others, but to him who doth excel others in wisdom, policy, and fidelity.

15. As reason is the difference which distinguisheth a man from a beast : so wisdom is the perfect index which showeth how far one man excelleth another.

16. Like as a hand is no part of a man, except it can do the office of a hand : so is wisdom no part of wisdom, unless it be employed as it should be.

Wisdom and strength to be joined.

LIKE as a tree that the wind hath shaken loose at the root, the higher and greater that it is, the sooner it is overthrown : even so a soldier, the stronger that he is, wanting wisdom, the sooner he is overthrown ; for courage and strength without wisdom is foolish rashness, and wisdom without courage and strength is fearful cowardliness—join them together, and they make a perfect soldier.

God's Wisdom may be known by the ordering of His creatures.

As, when thou seest a great and goodly city, consisting of many and sundry sorts of men, some of great reputation, and very many of small estimation—some exceedingly rich, and infinite others extremely poor—some in their fresh and flourishing youth, and some crooked with old age—where all these, though among themselves they be divers and sundry, do live in great concord and agree well together, and are kept all within the bounds and limits of good and godly discipline, thou wilt by-and-by judge that the prince or governor of the same is just, and very mighty and wise, though thou seest him not : even so, in the huge greatness of this world, and the agreement and well-hanging together of the things contained in the same, though differing in their natures, and the apt and fit placing of the whole, it cannot be but that thou wilt presently conceive in thy mind that there is a great, a wise, and mighty Creator and Preserver of these things ; for not only the mighty works of God in this great world, but those to be seen in man himself, who is also a great world—and so he is called of some—do teach us the wonderful knowledge of God.

Man's Wisdom often erreth.

As in a fruitful and fertile ground, among many wholesome and very medicinable herbs, some that be dangerous and full of poison do often grow : so the wits and wisdom of men, together with some profitable and wholesome counsels and admonitions, often bring forth perilous and pestilent errors, and are therefore, with wisdom and great discretion, to be regarded even as herbs are to be gathered and used.

The Wisdom of God.

As the Lord is almighty, and able to deliver His children and Church from the wicked, and willing to do it : even so doth He know the ways and means most perfectly and readily how to do it at all times according to His will and pleasure. 2 Pet. ii. 9.

Wisdom to be used in reprehending another.

LIKE as it is not enough for the physician or surgeon to know the wound, the malady, and sore disease, and to tell the patient thereof, prescribing him the names of the simples that he must take for the curing thereof, but he had need to prescribe him the manner of the compounding them, and quantity of each one which he would have him to take, with divers other circumstances, or else it is like that the receipt will do more hurt than good : even so is it in spying of beams or moles—that is, of faults and sins committed by others. It is not enough to know the fault, and tell the party of it, and what is good for it, but in the administration of that which is good great wisdom is to be shown.

Matt. vii. 4, 5 ;
xviii. 15, 16, &c.
1 Tim. v. 20.

Wise men.

1. As the old natural philosophers do say that the sun feedeth on the salt water, and that the moon taketh her food upon the sweet water : even so wise men do seek things bitter, so as they be profitable, when fools only seek for things pleasant and delightful.

2. As the bee, out of the most bitter things, doth gather most sweet honey : so a wise man, out of things hard and unpleasant, picketh gain and utility.

3. Like as Alexander did cause Bucephalus, his horse, being old, to be carried on other horses to the battle, that he might be fresh for the fight : so ought grave, old, and wise men be spared from labour, that their good counsel might be only regarded and had in necessities.

Wit.

1. As a bee is oftentimes hurt with its own honey : so is wit not seldom plagued with its own conceit.

2. As empty vessels make the loudest sound : so men of least wit are the greatest babblers.

Wits.

1. As a vessel with a narrow mouth of a long time may not be filled, but then at the length it holdeth the liquor more surely : so wits that be dull in receiving learning will most steadfastly remember the same when once obtained.

2. Like as too great a noise hurteth the ear; or as too much meat annoyeth the stomach; or as heavy burdens hurt the bearers of them; or as too much rain doth more hurt than good to the ground: even so weak wits and weak consciences may soon be oppressed with over hard questions.

Overweening Wits despise God's wisdom.

John ix. 34.

LIKE as the Jews said to him that was born blind, "Thou art wholly born in sin, and dost thou teach us?" so, likewise, a number think themselves too wise, too learned, too politic, and too cunning to be taught or controlled of God or His Word, for they say in their hearts with Pharaoh, "Who is the Lord, that I should hear His voice?" &c.

Woman.

1. LIKE as the kicking of a mule is oftentimes with wine letted (hindered): so, contrariwise, the malapert sauciness of a woman is with wine provoked.

2. Like as a man who is stung with bees and doth thereupon forsake the honey: even so such is a wife who, being offended with the manners of her husband, doth therefore forsake him.

3. As none doth feel and perceive so well on what place the shoe doth wring him as the wearer: so none doth know so well the overthwartness (perverseness) of his wife as he that is married unto her.

Tit. ii. 3, 4.

4. As the bird of Egypt, which, when she is old, purgeth all the filthy humours of her body with spices of Araby, and sendeth forth of her mouth a wondrous sweet breath: even so a woman, when she is past bearing of children, should then savour and breathe all heavenly things, so that she neither do nor say anything that is not religious and godly, and that may not be an example for the younger women to follow.

1 Pet. iii. 7.

5. As a vessel, the weaker it is, the more it is to be favoured and spared, if we will have it to continue: even so a woman, because of her infirmities, is much to be borne withal.

6. As the perfect gold, which is of a pure substance, sooner receiveth any form than the sturdy steel, which is a hard and massy metal: so women's effeminate minds are more subject to sudden affection and are sooner fettered with the snares of fancy than the hard hearts of men.

God's Word is true.

Matt. ix. 29.

As the sun ceaseth not to give light and brightness, although some man shutteth his eyes that he may not see it, nor be lighted therewith; or as meat ceaseth not to be good and nourishing, although it be received without profit to a stomach evil-disposed: so, likewise, if many, unwilling to believe that the will of God is such as He hath declared by His Word, reject, by their incredulity, the grace which God offereth them, this their incredulity ought not to make any good Christian to call into doubt the truth of God and the testimony of His goodwill towards him.

God's Word, the more it is searched, the sweeter it is.

Ps. cxix. 18.

As precious jewels, set in most pure gold, wrought cunningly and curiously, with great workmanship, the nearer thou shalt come unto them, and the more steadfastly and clearly thou shalt behold them, the finer, the braver, and more excellent thou shalt judge them : even so, as thou shalt come nearer in understanding and knowledge unto the secrets and mysteries of God contained in His written Word, and with greater purity of mind, more strength of faith, and brighter light of the grace of God, shalt look into them, the profounder, the deeper, the more divine and heavenly, yea, and the more comfortable to thy soul, will they seem and appear unto thee every day, insomuch that thou wilt judge thyself to have been little better than blind in the past, and to have seen nothing as thou oughtest in the mysteries of the divine Word.

God's Word the salve for our souls.

As those parts which are within us have most need of careful keeping, because an inward disease is most dangerous : even so the Holy Ghost hath allotted unto our inward infection the most sovereign and all sufficient salve, His Word.

Ps. i.
Matt. viii. 8.
Mark i. 41.

The Word must be rightly divided.

OFTENTIMES we see that one man's stomach taketh harm of that meat whereof another taketh profit, and that which helpeth one sick man hurteth another : even so doth the Word of God not rightly preached ; and, therefore, to preach mercy where judgment ought to be taught, and to preach only the law where the Gospel should be taught, is not good.

It is not enough to know God's Word, but we must be doers of it.

EVEN as a bird doth not fly with one wing alone, but with twain : so it is not enough that we know much of the Lord's Word and will, but we must do it also. It will not suffice us at the latter day that we have been great professors of the Gospel and are deeply learned, if also we have not been inflamed with a love to God above all things, and have not loved our brethren as ourselves.

James i. 22.
Ps. cxxviii. 1.

The Word of God.

1. EVEN as gold and silver, the more they are put upon the fire, so much the surer proof they give of their goodness and fineness : so the Lord's truth, the more exactly it is weighed with spiritual examination, so much the greater confirmation of credit it receiveth.

2. As wells, the more they are drawn, the better they are : even so the Word of God, the more diligently it is handled and used, the more plentiful is the fruit received by it.

3. As we cannot live without meat and drink, which God hath ordained for our bodily life : so we cannot have faith without the preaching and hearing of the Word of God.

4. As the fish called a carp, seeing the net to be cast into the water, diveth suddenly down to the bottom and dasheth her head so deep in the mud, that the compass of the net slippeth over her clean, or, at the most, doth touch no more than the tip of her tail, but take her it cannot : so the most kind of men are of so carping a nature, that they no sooner perceive the net of God's Word to be cast in the Church by the preaching of their faithful minister, but forthwith they begin to dive so deep in the dung of their own delights, and to dash their minds so much in the muck of worldly trifles, that either the net of God's Word doth slip over them clean or, at the most, it doth but lightly touch them ; yet let them shift as they can, they shall be taken one time or other, if they belong unto the Lord.

Matt. xlii. 4.
Mark iv. 15.
Luke viii. 5.

5. As crows are then busiest to do hurt when the husbandman soweth his seed and when the same beginneth to sprout : even so Satan and his infernal spirits are then most careful to steal away the seed of the Word of God when it is first preached, as also when it beginneth to take some root in the hearts of the hearers.

6. As gold, silver, and precious stones are not consumed with material fire, but rather are made more pure : even so the pure Word of God suffereth neither hurt nor damage in spiritual fire—that is, temptation and persecution.

7. As wild campion, larkspur, or Canterbury-bells thrown before scorpions taketh away their power to do harm : so the Word, preached sincerely, doth strike men with such a terror, that they dare not do the evil they intended.

8. As the water of Lilium convallium, if it be drank, restoreth speech to him that hath lost it by apoplexy : so the Word of Christ, truly received, maketh them to speak that could not.

9. As master-wort, where it is sown, delighteth the ground : so the Word, where it is faithfully preached, delighteth godly Christians.

10. As balm-apples, called Charentia, taken in wine, are a pleasant remedy for all pains, as well within the body as without, and so confirmeth the strength of such as take it, that no grief may happen to them : so the Word of God, truly preached and rightfully applied, is a present remedy for wounded consciences, and so comforteth such to eternal life, &c.

11. As southern-wood taken into the body driveth out worms, and laid among clothes killeth moths and vermin : so the Word of God laid truly up in the heart killeth and driveth out evil motions.

12. As Echium, or milk-wort, drunken, causeth plenty of milk in women's breasts : so the Word of God, well learned of the minister and rightly divided and applied of him, yieldeth plenty of instruction for the hearers and children of God.

13. As a blind man is altogether unable to judge rightly of any colour : so he that is ignorant of the Word of God is not able to judge and discern what is either consonant or dissonant unto the truth of God.

1 John iv. 1, 2.

14. As the pureness of gold must be tried by the touchstone or furnace, but yet through the industry of those that have skill and experience in both, for otherwise what use is there either of the touchstone or furnace to such as have no knowledge at all to deal in the same ? even so every doctrine is to be tried by the only rule, the Word, but yet the Spirit of God must direct the action, or else the Word of itself will but little avail us.

Rom. vii. 7.

15. As to them who have well swept their chambers, it seemeth that they are very clean, and yet, notwithstanding, when the sun cometh and entereth there by the windows, they perceive straightway by the beams an infinite deal of dust, which the philosophers call motes : even so, oftentimes, before we be well instructed in the law of God, if we be exempted from gross and palpable sins—such as are murders, whoredoms, thefts, &c.—we glory that we are perfect and innocent ; but when our consciences come to be described by the Word of God, and that Jesus Christ, who is the Light, hath entered there by His Spirit, then He maketh us to see by His beams an infinite number of faults and imperfections which are hidden in our hearts, as are the serpents in their holes.

16. Like as drunkards, who, being overcharged with wine and meat, have no manner of knowledge or feeling of the case wherein they are, nor of anything else, for although their faces may be covered and clothed with dirt, they cannot perceive it until their wine be soaked and their brain delivered from those fumes and vapours whereby they were so hindered and darkened : so we, likewise, before we be regenerate, are in such sort besotted with a love that we bear to our souls, and with a vain opinion that we have conceived of ourselves, that we know not the filthiness and villanies wherewith we are covered ; but when, as the light of the Spirit and Word of God begins to break forth unto us, we come by little and little to have those clouds which were before our senses broken and scattered, and, recovering the view of our reason, we begin to awake ourselves, and discover the pitiful and miserable estate wherein we are.

17. Anacharsis did say that the Athenians used money for no other purpose than for numbering and casting of accounts : so there be some that use the Scriptures and Word of God only for table talk, vain-glory, and ostentation.

18. Like as the light of the sun cannot help the eyes that be blind, or a voice which soundeth loud profit deaf ears : even so no more can the preaching of the Word of God or the administration of the Sacraments profit our souls, except the Holy Ghost, indeed, join His power withal, by the which only the ears are prepared, the heart opened, the affections touched, and the will disposed and made ready to give an entrance to the outward ministry.

19. Like as, by the power and blessing of God, the fruits of the earth are brought forth, yet by the ordinary means of planting and sowing : even so, although faith be inwardly wrought in us by the operation of the Holy Ghost, yet is the true preaching of the Word of God the outward ordinary means whereby the same is brought to pass ; and as needful is preaching for the working of faith in us, as ploughing, planting, and sowing is for the bringing forth of corn, fruits, and herbs out of the earth for our corporal sustenance.

Rom. x. 17.
John xvii. 20; xx.
31.
1 Cor. iii. 5, 6.

20. As seed sown upon the grass or green sward doth not yield its increase : no more doth the Word sown in hard and unprepared hearts.

21. As seed is sown to bring forth fruit : so is the Word of God preached to give increase.

22. As the seed, how good soever it be, bringeth not forth fruit at the same instant that it is sown, but continueth a certain time in the earth : so is it not convenient to restrain and bind the fruit and virtue of the Word of God to the same hour that it is preached, but the fruit shall be showed to the elect when it pleaseth God.

23. As, when the seed is sown, men judge if the land be good or bad by the increase of the fruit that it yieldeth : even so by the profit of the hearers men judge whether the Word take effect in them or no.

24. As, where great store of corn and seed is, it is a sign that our bodies shall not die for hunger : even so, where the Word of God is plentifully preached, it is a token that our souls shall not famish.

25. As, where good land is, there is great increase : so in them in whom the Word of God is fruitful it will appear and show forth its fruit, as in Zacchæus.

Luke xix. 8.

26. As by bread our bodies are nourished and fed : so by the preaching of the Word of God our souls are sustained.

Amos viii. 11, 12
Matt. iv. 4.

27. As good seed, sown in good ground, will bring forth plentiful increase : so will the lively Word of God, being truly preached, amongst the faithful.

28. As that land which bringeth forth fruit when the dew of heaven falleth on it is blessed : so those people who receive the Word of God in their hearts, and bring forth fruit accordingly, shall be blessed of the Lord, for it shall not return nor be preached in vain.

Heb. vi. 7.
Isa. lv. 10, 11.
2 Cor. ii. 15, 16.

29. As that man who is made executor of his father's last will and testament, by the benefit whereof he looketh to enjoy his father's lands and possessions, if there should be any hard clause or point in it, would no doubt not only be diligent in searching it out by reading, or getting it read, again and again, but also by conferring with others more learned than himself, and by having the judgment of the best lawyers : so, then, if in our causes and earthly matters, whether we be old or young, no hardness can stay or cause us to slack

John v. 39.
Acts xvii. 11.

our duties, but rather cause us to use more diligence : even so should it be, yea, so must it be, in hearing, learning, and searching out the will and Word of our heavenly Father, whereby our hope is to attain to the possession and inheritance of everlasting life ; and if any part of it should seem hard unto us, yet that should not cause such hardness of heart in us as to cast off the care of the whole, and utterly to refuse to hear, read, or learn any part of it.

30. Like as our bodies are nourished and sustained with carnal and natural food : even so our souls are fed and nourished by reading and hearing the Word of God.

Matt. xxvi. 74, 75.

31. Like as the crowing of the cock was an occasion to move Peter to repent : even so the Word, preached by faithful ministers, is a means to bring their hearers to repentance.

1 Sam. v. 1-4, &c.
2 Sam. vi. 3, &c.
1 Chron. xiii. 5.
Jer. xxiii. 19.
Deut. xi. 27, 28.
2 Cor. ii. 15, 16.
Matt. x. 14, 15.
Heb. ii. 2-4.
Jer. xi. 3.

32. As the ark was a blessing to those that knew the right use thereof, as the Israelites did, but it was a curse and a plague to the abusers thereof, the Philistines : even so the Word of God is a great comfort and blessing to those that wisely use it, faithfully embrace it, and rightly practise it ; but it is a plague and curse to those that have it and abuse it, and do not reform themselves by it.

33. As a hungry man will not refuse meat, if it be good and wholesome, which is offered to him by a child : so ought none to refuse the Word of God, if it be offered sound and good, though the preacher thereof be a young man.

Numb. xi. 6.

34. As those men who dwell by the river Nile are made deaf by the great and exceeding noise of that water : even so many people at this day, by the plentiful and continual preaching of the Gospel (a lamentable thing to hear), do wax dull hearers, weary of it, and loathe it, even as the people of Israel loathed manna.

35. Like as young children that have rattles, when they be new and have them first, will love them very much and greatly delight in them, so that they will not forego them when they eat or suck, yea, and they will have them with them in their cradles ; but when they be a little older, they will cast them away and care not for them : even so a great number of people did make great account of the preaching of the Word in the time of ignorance, and would go far and near to hear it, who now, having plenty of sermons, do loathe them and care not for them, &c.

Matt. v. 6.

36. As hunger is a sign of good health : so, likewise, to hunger and thirst after God's Word is a notable sign of our spiritual health and safety.

37. As spices smell stronger being pounded and beaten than when lying whole in a bag ; or as embers are hottest being raked abroad ; and meats do nourish better being cut and shred than being eaten in gobbets (lumps) : even so the Word of God, truly expounded, preached, and rightly divided, is of greater efficacy and power than when it is but barely read.

38. As men usually rub the chaff from the corn before they eat the corn : so must the spiritual food, the Word of God, be separated if it have any corruption added to it by the preacher.

39. As by wholesome meat and drink the body is strengthened and increased, and by the wise counsel of physicians the sickness to be feared is prevented : so, by the Word of God, the faith of every Christian is increased, and by the admonitions thereof the dangers to be feared are avoided, whilst he willingly giveth credit to that which is spoken.

Luke viii. 11.
1 Cor. i. 18.

40. As the material seed is counted of small estimation : so is the Word of God amongst the wicked and ungodly.

41. Like as the seed hath power to bring forth fruit of itself : so hath the Word of God to bring forth that which even kings cannot cause to spring forth but by itself.

2 Tim. ii. 15.

42. As seed groweth not in the land not being sown : so the Word of God doth not increase except it be preached, published abroad, and rightly divided.

43. Like as worldly wise men are wont to buy books of statutes, and to have them in their houses to read in, that they may know how to avoid danger of law : even so the faithful do always set before them God's Word, and in all their doings it is their counsellor, lest they should come into danger of God's displeasure. Ps. cxix. 24.

44. As a shower of rain falling upon fire doth easily extinguish and quench the flame : even so the Word of God, being received into our hearts, doth easily make all concupiscence to vanish away.

45. As the skill and cunning of the physician healeth all the infirmities and diseases of the body : so God's Word only cureth the sick, sorrowful, and distressed soul.

46. As a plant, by continual watering, groweth up at length to a great tree : so a man, by continual watering of God's Word, doth at last grow up to the full height of virtue and godliness.

47. Like as long as the physician doth appoint the sick man what he shall do, how to diet himself, and what medicines to take, there is hope of life ; but if he forsake him, we look for present death : so, as long as God of His goodness shall let His Word be among us, there is good hope of His love and favour, but if He take the same away from us, then there is no comfort left.

48. As those that build without a good foundation, either the wind or water soon overthrow it : even so they who, in matters of faith, stay not themselves upon the Word, but upon the credit of their teachers, shall not be able to withstand the subtleties of the devil, but are easily overthrown. Matt. vii. 26, 27.

49. As wheat giveth sound, good, and substantial nourishment unto the body : even so doth the true Word of God mightily and wholesomely nourish the soul.

50. As a grain of mustard seed, being the least of all seeds, and sown in the earth, when it groweth up, ariseth to a great height, and beareth great branches, so that the fowls of heaven may build under the shadow of it : even so the Word of God, by faith, being not idle, but working, although in outward show it seem small and slender, yet doth it by little and little spread itself, and, like a fair fruitful branched tree, receive daily strength and increase. Luke xiii. 19 ;
xvii. 6.
Mark iv. 31.

51. As the sun, which was made to lighten all things, is most light : so the Word, which was made to clear all things, is most clear. Ps. cxix. 105.
Prov. viii. 9.
Ps. xlix. 7.

52. As a man will be more wary to try every piece of gold when he sees many counterfeit and flourishing angels (a gold coin formerly current in England, bearing the figure of an angel, worth ten shillings sterling) to fly abroad : so, when Christians shall see many sorts of doctrine crawling daily like locusts out of the bottomless pit, they must be more diligent to taste and try which is the sound and sincere Word. 1 John iv. 1.
Jer. xxiii. 28.

53. As the biting and sharpness of mustard, together with its hot and fiery taste, which is many times seen to make the eater thereof to rub his nose, and doth wring out tears, and which also, by provoking of sneezing, doth excellently purge the head from rough phlegm and rheumatic substance : even so the Word of God, being faithfully preached and lightly applied, doth pierce the conscience, shake the mind, enkindle and inflame the heart, excite and stir up drowsy, faint, and dull souls to ensure virtue and perform the duties of piety, and doth many times force and fetch out tears of earnest and hearty repentance. Acts ii. 37.

54. As they that use the benefit of the day to travel and walk in need not to stumble and fall at the things that lie in their way, for that they have light to direct them by : so, likewise, they that direct themselves in their calling by the light of the Word of God go aright and upright, because God doth guide them.

55. Like as God's curse is apparent in that earth which, notwithstanding the rain and all the dressing that men can use, bringeth nothing but weeds, briars, and brambles : so Heb. vi. 7, 8.

they that hear the Word of God faithfully preached, and continue in ignorance, and proceed in impiety and ungodliness, have manifest seals of their damnation.

Matt. xiii. 19.

56. Like as, if corn be spilt or shed in any common way, the fowls presently fall upon it and devour it, and suffer it not to remain there any longer: even so the seed of the Word, when it is preached and fallen into hard hearts, is by-and-by taken away of the devil and wicked spirits, and so cannot remain there, nor be understood.

Cor. iii. 16.

57. Even as a man, receiving the best friend that he hath into his house, will lodge him in his best room that he hath: so, likewise, should a Christian lodge God's Word in no worse place than in his heart.

Prov. xxiv. 13, 14.

58. As no man knoweth how sweet honey is but he that tasteth it: so we cannot understand the profit of God's Word except we have experience therein.

2 Kings ii. 21, 22.

59. As the salt which Elisha did cast into the spring of Jericho was profitable to that land: even so the Word of God is as healthsome to men's souls.

Matt. xiii. 52.

60. As King Solomon, by continual exercising of himself in wisdom, did both resolve the Queen of Sheba of all her hard and curious questions and wrote many parables to instruct others that were to come after him: so, likewise, Christians, by acquainting themselves in the Word of God, shall be able to satisfy both their own consciences in matters of religion and to teach the ignorant that which they ought to know.

Gen. xxviii. 13.
Luke x. 42.

61. As Jacob's sleeping in the land of Canaan was a figure of his continual rest and perpetual possession of the same: so, likewise, the steadfast settling of our senses in the Word of God is an infallible argument of our continual enjoyment thereof.

Gen. xxxvii. 7.

62. As all the sheaves in the harvest did bow to Joseph's sheaf: so must all men be controlled and subject to God's Word.

63. Like as the sun doth not heat all those that it lighteth: even so the Word of God doth show men what they ought to do, but doth not inflame them with a desire to perform the same; for it is one thing to know that we should be wise, and another to be wise indeed.

Deut. xxii. 9.

64. As the Israelites might not sow two kinds of seeds in one and the same ground: even so the immortal seed of God's Word only must be received in the furrows of our hearts.

Isa. lv. 10, 11.

65. As rain and snow, falling from heaven, returneth not thither again, but watereth the earth and maketh it fruitful: even so the Word that cometh out of God's mouth shall not return void, but shall accomplish and bring to pass that which God will, and shall prosper in that whereunto He sent it.

Mark iv. 20.

66. As the seed once sown, whensoever it pleaseth God to grant His blessing unto it, whether the sower sleep or wake, or whatsoever he doth, or howsoever he is occupied, groweth and increaseth till it come to maturity and ripeness: so, likewise, the Word, by the ministry of God, being scattered where God worketh withal by His Holy Spirit, there it bringeth a great, marvellous, and an unlooked-for increase.

1 Pet. i. 23-25.

67. As of mortal and corrupt seed men are first born to this mortal and corruptible life: so must we, of the immortal and incorruptible seed of the Word, be born again to a life immortal and incorruptible, if we will live for ever.

Matt. xiii. 22.
1 Pet. i. 27.

68. As it is impossible that corn should grow or prosper and come to good among the bushes or thorns: so, likewise, is it impossible that the seed of the Word preached should become the seed of new birth to him that continueth full of worldly cares, and is snared with the deceitfulness of riches.

Matt. x. 42.
John iv. 14, 15.

69. Like as he that is athirst doth greedily and joyfully receive a cup of water or beer to quench his thirst and to ease him for a little time: even so much more greedily should Christians receive the Word, the water of life, whereby the thirst of their souls shall be quenched eternally.

70. As the Israelites in the wilderness, whenever the cloud and pillar of fire stood still, they stood still; and when it went, they went: even so must the Word of God be a pillar of fire unto us—when it commandeth us to stand, we must stand still, and whatsoever we do in our calling, we must have direction for the same out of God's Word.

Numb. ix. 21, 22.
Luke v. 4.
1 Tim. vi. 1, &c.
Deut. xvii. 16, &c.
Ps. cxix. &c.

71. As children are so greedily carried with a desire of their food, that, when hunger pincheth them, they neither regard leisure, necessity, nor the willingness of their mothers, but all excuses and business set apart, so soon as they cry for it they must be fed: even so we must not think it enough to desire the Word, but we must be earnest and fervent, and importunate in calling and crying for it.

1 Pet. ii. 2.

72. As the lamp burned continually in the temple without quenching: even so the Word of God must continually sound in our ears without intermission.

Lev. xxiv. 2, 3.
Acts ii. 46.
John vi. 27.

73. As David longed for the well of Bethlehem: so must Christians long and languish for the milk of the Word.

2 Sam. xxiii. 15.
1 Pet. ii. 2.

74. Like as a vapour or perfume in the air, which in some men's nostrils is savoury and pleasant, and doth revive them, and others it striketh stark dead: even so the Word preached by God's ministers, lawfully called by Him thereunto, hath the same power and force in it which Christ Himself showed when He spake on earth; for it is the savour of life unto life, to save those that hear it, or it is the savour of death unto death, to those that condemn it.

John xviii. 4-6.
2 Cor. ii. 16.

75. As it is the use of physic to cure men of diseases when they are fallen into them, so also to preserve them from sickness before it hath taken hold of them: even so it is in the power of the Word to assuage trouble of conscience when it doth once press us, as also to prevent it before it hath overtaken us.

76. As it profiteth nothing to graft a plant if, with a whirlwind or storm, it be pulled up by the roots before it bear fruit: so the Word of God, being preached, heard, and laid up in our minds, shall do us no good if, before it bring forth fruit, with some blustering blasts and sturdy storms of temptation, it shall be rooted out of our hearts.

Ps. i. 2.

77. Even as a twig or branch taken from a very good and fruitful tree, and grafted into the trunk or stock of some wild tree—as a crab or thorn, or such like—doth draw the sap of the stock or trunk to the nature of the twig or branch grafted, so that now the stock beareth other leaves and other fruit than it was wont to do: so the Word of God, well planted and surely grafted in our barren hearts by preaching and catechising, doth draw us and convert us unto and into itself, and causeth us to bear goodly leaves of holy and godly words, and other most pleasant and wholesome fruits of unfeigned virtues and graces; but, by the way, we must needs crop and cut off the boughs of our old sins, that Christ may be grafted in us, and then, no doubt, our fruit shall be such as God, for His Son's sake, will accept and take in good part at our hands.

78. As men are wont and accustomed to make account of precious things, and not to cast them about at random, but to keep them safe under lock and key: even thus safely and surely must the Word of God, when it is heard and preached, be kept in our hearts, if we will ever come by true wisdom.

Ps. cxix. 17.
Luke ii. 19.
Heb. ii. 2.
James i. 21.

79. Even as we cannot feel the savour and taste of any meat unless we chew the same: so, also, we never feel any fruit of God's Word unless the same abide in us and we do, as it were, chew and ruminate the same.

80. As the sun, at some time of the year, in some places, doth afford his shining and light unto the people, and yet doth little or nothing warm them: so the knowledge and understanding of the Word and will of God preached doth not by-and-by work a hungering and thirsting to lead a virtuous and godly life in all those whom it hath instructed and most perfectly taught what they should do and how they ought to live—they receive knowledge and understanding from it, but they refuse the grace and deny the power of it.

Acts ii. 37-39.

81. As the Jews, who crucified the Son of God, even Jesus Christ, were converted by hearing Peter preach but one sermon : but we are worse than any, who have heard many hundreds of sermons, and yet are, many of us, never touched with any remorse of conscience nor moved to any serious or true repentance.

Matt. xiii. 4.

82. Like as we see crows and other birds follow the heels of the sower, to pick up and devour such grain and corn as do lie uncovered : so, in like manner, do the devils come like greedy fowls into the assemblies where the Word of God is preached, to take it away from the hearts of the people that it may not grow there.

83. As a purgation made for the body many times worketh not its operation by reason of the ill-temperature of the body, or else by the state of the region too much drawing humours into the exterior parts of the body : so, likewise, the Word of God, poured into the ears and understanding of man, worketh not many times its operation in cleansing the soul from the humours and corruption of sin, by reason of the ill-temperature and disposition of the persons that are wont to read and hear the Scripture.

84. As the child before he is born into the world abideth in the mother's womb and taketh all nourishment of her : so we must learn what God is within the bounds of His Word, and not at rovers (at random), until He mercifully deliver us from this bondage and out of the dungeon of the body, and grant us to behold Him face to face.

85. As plasters, except they be applied in order and time, and be laid upon the wound, though they be never so good, yet they cannot heal : even so it is with the Word of God and the parts of it—except they be used in order and time convenient, they will not humble and revive us, as their virtue is to do.

Exod. xiv. foto,
Dan. iii. 21-25 ;
vi. 22-24.
Rom. vi. 16.

86. Like as the Red Sea was a safe passage for the Israelites coming out of Egypt and a drowning to the Egyptians ; or as the fire of Babylon hurt not the three children cast into the oven, but yet burnt the ministers who cast them in ; or as the lions saved Daniel alive, but quickly did devour his accusers : even so such is the nature of the Word of God, that as it is a condemnation to the wicked, so it is the power of God unto salvation to all those who believe the same.

87. As there was in the ark the tables of the law, the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod : so, in the Word of God, there are commandments, mercies for the faithful, and judgments for the impenitent and unfaithful.

88. Even as salt is good both for the keeping of the dead flesh from corruption and for the healing and purging of that which is alive : so the Word is profitable for them that be dead in trespasses and sins, to make them alive, and for them that be alive in Christ, to heal and purge them of sin.

89. Like as the sun, shining on the earth, is not polluted or hurt thereby, but rather cleanseth all things : so the Holy Word of God is not polluted by a sinful body, but purifieth it.

90. As honey, through the sickness and heat of a fever, doth make the bitter things that are taken into the mouth to seem strange and worse than they are indeed : so God's Word, being digested and received into our souls, doth make us more abhor the bitterness of sin, lust, vanities, &c.

James i. 25.

91. As we make great account of our charters, whereby we hold our earthly liberties—yea, we gladly read them and acquaint ourselves with them : so, likewise, we ought to make more account of the Word of God, which is the law of spiritual liberty.

92. As mariners are wont by the stars to direct their courses on the sea : so must we make God's Word a star, to direct us to Christ.

93. As we account much of rings, jewels, or such like things which are left us of parents and friends being dead : so must we account and make much of God's Word left us by Christ.

94. As the sun, shining upon filthy sinks, dunghills, and puddles, draweth out loathsome smells, yet itself is pure and not defiled with them : even so the Word of God, which, though it draw sin and wickedness from sinful men, is yet itself pure and holy. Ps. xii. 6 xix. 8.

95. As we may see many men's faces but do not know their minds, except we confer long with them : so it is with the Word of God, if we only barely and carelessly read it, and do not earnestly meditate in and studiously search it.

96. Even as the natural man, conceived of natural seed, is nourished with blood in his mother's womb, and fed afterward with milk when he is once born, as all creatures are nourished with that whereof they are engendered : so, in like manner, the regenerate man, conceived and begotten of the incorruptible seed of the Word of God, is nourished and fostered by it, receiving the same simply and purely, without any mixture and hotch-potch of any man's inventions with it.

97. As an ill stomach, what good meat soever it receiveth, it turneth into ill humours ; and the spider gathereth poison of the same flowers that the bee gathereth honey : so, in the Word of God and His blessed laws, which He ordained for our health and salvation, ill men gather death and damnation, through their own wickedness, and no fault in the law nor Law-maker.

98. Like as no burgess of a city that hath care of his corporation but would be glad to know how in times past the world went with that corporation, that thereby he may understand the better how to behave himself therein, as occasion shall serve, and not only would desire to know the laws of the same, but also what examples have any way been given touching the same : even so it becometh much more Christians, who are citizens of the Church of Christ and have a community in that body, to know, not only the laws of this city, which are in the Word of God, but also what hath befallen it either good or bad, and every accident, whereupon experience may arise by example, and wisdom thereof to be put in use accordingly.

99. As men in the night, because of the darkness, use lanterns and lights that they may see their way : even so we ought, in this blind, dark, and ignorant world, to use the Word of God as a lantern unto our feet and a light to our steps, that we may walk in those ways which God hath provided for us to walk in. Ps. cxix. 105.
John i. 9.

100. As Almighty God, by His most mighty Word and His Holy Spirit and infinite power, brought forth all creatures in the beginning, and ever since hath preserved them : even so, by the same Word and power, He worketh in us from time to time this marvellous spiritual generation and wonderful spiritual nourishment and feeding, which is wrought only by God, and is comprehended and received of us by faith.

By the written Word of God things amiss are discerned.

LIKE as a man that hath never so good eyes, yet, if he be in a deep darkness, cannot for all the goodness of his eyes know and discern his own father standing directly before him, much less a beam or a mote in his eye, until such time as he hath light to discern withal : even so, though we be never so well and sharp sighted, we are unable to discern a beam or mote in the Church's eye without the help of the light of the Word. Ps. cxix. 105.
Eph. v. 13.
Matt. vii. 3-5.
2 Kings xxii. 1,
&c.

The Word of God, how it worketh in men diversely.

1. LIKE as the material sun in the firmament, which, being but one and ever the same, yet is in some sort an occasion of contrary effects—for whereas properly it lighteth and is comfortable to the eyes that be sound and clear, improperly it dimmeth and breedeth Ps. xix. 8 ; cxli.
105.
Isa. vi. 9, 10.
Matt. xiii. 13-15.
Aes. 27. 26, 27.

Rom. xi. 8.
Acts ii. 37; vii. 51,
54.
Heb. xiii. 16.
Rom. xii. 11.

annoyance to such as are maimed in sight; again, whereas it softeneth wax, it hardeneth clay, and as it procureth a sweet savour from flowers, so it draweth nothing but a stinking smell from dead carriages: so, likewise, the Word of the Lord being preached, it worketh in the godly and the wicked a contrary effect, for it lighteth the one and blindeth the other, it softeneth the one and hardeneth the other, it draweth a sweet savour from the one and a vile stink from the other, it maketh some better but some others it maketh worse, it allureth some to repentance but some others it causeth, through their perverse nature, to increase in pride and contumacy.

Isa. lv. 1.
John xv. 13.
Jer. xlv. 16.

2. Like as water, notwithstanding it be but one and ever the same, yet it is in some sort also an occasion of contrary effects, for, being thrown among fire, it quencheth the same, but being cast into lime it sets it on fire: so, in like manner, the Word doth naturally quench the fiery affections in the children of God, but accidentally inflameth the fiery dispositions of the children of Satan.

3. Even as flowers, although they be ever the same, yet are they the matter of divers things and effects, for whereas they are honey to the bees, they become very poison to the venomous spider; or as the honey, which is wholesome for sound stomachs, is very hurtful for those that are sick of the colic, not through fault of itself, but of the receiver: so, likewise, the Word of God is wholesome and profitable to the godly, but otherwise to the wicked.

Ps. xix. 10; cvii.
20.
Tit. i. 9; ii. 8.
1 Tim. i. 9, 10.
John xiii. 10; xv.
3.

4. As the fire which purgeth the gold consumeth the dross, and, being put into frank incense, procureth sweet perfumes, which are great recreations for men, but is present death unto swine: so, surely, the Word of God, it worketh like contrary effects in the godly and the wicked, for it is honey to the one and poison to the other, it is very healthful for the one and hurtful to the other, it purgeth the one and consumeth the other, it draweth a sweet savour from the one but a foul stink from the other—lastly, it is a recreation for the one but a destruction to the other.

2 Thess. i. 10.
1 Pet. i. 8, 9.
2 Thess. i. 7-9.

5. As the godly, by their obedience, do feel in the Word the mighty power and wisdom of God to their salvation: so the ungodly, by their disobedience, do find nothing therein but the invincible power of God, to their endless damnation.

Isa. lv. 10, 11.
Jer. xxiii.

6. As the thunder-bolt, which, being cast forth from the clouds, spareth every such matter as submitteth itself to the force thereof, but breaketh to powder whatsoever hard thing shall withstand the same: so the Word, which proceeds from the Lord by the mouth of His ministers, doth never return in vain, but is either a sovereign salve to such as are broken in heart, or otherwise a hammer to dash in pieces such as are obstinate in heart, and, therefore, cannot properly be accounted the cause of sin, though, by reason of men's sundry natures, it may in some sort be said to be an occasion thereof.

The Word of God ought to be carefully searched into.

As they who dig metals out of the earth do not condemn nor despise the least gobbets (lumps) and pieces that they espy, but take all, but especially if they find by digging a vein of gold they leave no way unsought, but with all care and diligence they look about them, and do dig the gold and earth together, and most diligently do save and keep the same: even so ought we to deal with the holy Word of God. We must pass over nothing therein lightly, nor despise one word of all the sacred and divine Scriptures, but eagerly and earnestly do our best and greatest endeavours, yea, and call and cry most mightily to the Lord, to aid, assist, and enable us to dig out of the same Word whatsoever is requisite and necessary for the salvation of our souls and eternal life.

The Word of God the food of the soul.

1. LIKE as the body is sustained and nourished with material bread, because it is material itself: so is the soul nourished with spiritual bread, which is the Word of God, because it is spiritual.

2. As the body will faint and decay if it be not from time to time refreshed with bodily sustenance: even so the soul waxeth feeble and weak toward God, unless the same be often and continually cherished, refreshed, and kept up with the Word of God, the only food of the soul.

Deut. viii. 3.
Matt. iv. 4.

3. As the soul, being a divine, spiritual, and immortal substance, doth far excel the body, which is nothing else but dust, earth, and ashes: even so the sacred and eternal food, and assured salvation of the soul, ought to be acquired and sought for with far greater care, and more earnest study, zeal, love, desire, and affection, than the health and welfare of the body.

John vi. 26, 27.

4. As the rain watereth the fields and maketh them fruitful, and causeth corn to grow, and giveth strength unto the same, and garnisheth and beautifieth all goodly plants with abundance of most pleasant fruits: even so the Word of God, the doctrine of Christ, bedeweth and moisteneth the children of God, and feedeth and nourisheth their souls to everlasting life, and causeth them to bring forth very excellent virtues and most rich and plentiful fruits and effects of a true Christian faith.

Isa. lv. 10.
Heb. vi. 7.
Ezek. xxxiv. 26.

5. As no man may entertain and conserve the life which he received by means of his body by the food and nourishment which another doth take, nor by that which another eateth and drinketh, but only by that which he himself doth take, and by meats and drinks which he receiveth in his own person: so, likewise, is it in the nourishment of the faith of every man by the Word of God, for the entertainment and conservation of his own spiritual life.

The Word of God the only weapon to overcome the world, &c.

As that man who will give an onset and encounter with an enemy, or will defend and keep himself unwounded at his hands, hath need of a sword in his hand to smite the enemy withal and to repel his violence: so whosoever will triumph and carry away the victory over this world, the flesh, and devil, must hold fast in his hand—that is, in his manners, conversation, and the whole course of his life—the Word of God, which is called the Sword of the Spirit, and is sharper than any two-edged sword.

Eph. vi. 17.
Deut. vi. 1, 2, &c.
Prov. vi. 20, 21.

We ought to put in practice the Word of God.

1. AS medicines do minister health to none but those who take them, whose nature also is strong and well prepared to receive their operations: so it is requisite that they who hear and read the Word of God should receive and apply it to themselves, and pray unto God to prepare them, and by His Holy Spirit to dispose their hearts, that the doctrine and exhortations may work their operation in them.

Eph. iv. 20 24.
James i. 22.

2. Like as they who have learned the art of sewing, of cordwainery, or drapery, and so forth, yet are not reputed tailors, cordwainers, or drapers, unless they do in act execute those sciences, which is indeed the purpose of their apprenticeship: even so let us never look to be true and sound Christians, or God's children, notwithstanding we have learned the Word of God and the manner thereof, unless we also perform the works of Christians and of the children of God.

Luke xi. 28.
Rom. ii. 13.

3. As, when we have trimmed and shorn our heads and beards, before we come forth we look in the glass to see whether it be well done : even so much rather ought we, after we have heard the sermon, the end whereof tendeth to amend our lives, immediately to look upon and peruse our souls, to the end to see whether our corruptions and vices, being cut down and mortified, the same be clear and pure in the sight of God.

4. As herbs prepared by art do heal the body : so, likewise, the Word of God, rightly applied, doth cure a sick soul.

A Word spoken not recalled.

As it is not easy to take again the bird that we suffer to fly out of our hands : so it is most uneasy (difficult) to call again a word once pronounced and spoken.

Works follow faith in every good Christian.

James ii. 26.
Matt. iii. 8.

As, in material buildings, after the foundation is laid, there remaineth the greatest labour, time, cost, cunning, and diligence to be bestowed upon the framing and furnishing of other parts that must ensue : even so in the heavenly edifice or building of our soul ; on the foundation and ground of true belief, the rest of all our lifetime, labour, and studies is to be employed in the perfecting of our life and actions—as it were in raising up the walls and other parts of our spiritual building—by the exercise of all virtues and diligent observation of God's commandments, without the which it will be to no more purpose for us to brag of our faith or knowledge in the Scriptures, or to say that we have faith, and look to be saved as well as other men, than it will be to purpose to have a foundation without a building upon it.

Good Works.

1. LIKE as, when we mingle water with wine in a cup or in a glass, that which is poured out from it is called wine though water be mingled with it, and albeit there be more water than wine, yet that which is the principal and most precious part of all beareth the name : even so the good works which we do by the grace of God, be it that they have a great many spots and imperfections as they proceed from us, yet for all that they hold always the name and reputation of Him who is the principal Author.

Phil. ii. 13.
Luke xvii. 10.
Isa. lxiiv. 5.
Rom. iii. 20.
Gal. ii. 16.
Eph. ii. 8, 9.
Tit. iii. 5.

2. As sweet water, issuing out of a pure fountain into a filthy channel, is made corrupt : so, likewise, works of grace, even the best of them, are mixed works, partly holy and partly sinful, whereby it is evident to a man that hath but common sense that they are not answerable to the righteousness of the law, and that therefore they can neither merit life nor any way justify a man before God.

Matt. vii. 17, 18;
xii. 33.

3. As it is of necessity that the tree be made good before it bring forth good fruit, and therefore the fruit maketh not the tree good, but is rather the sign of a good tree : even so it followeth that works do not justify because they are done of those who before were made righteous through grace ; so that a good work maketh not a good man, but a good man maketh a good work.

Job ix. 3, 15, 20.
Ps. cxliiii. 2; xvi.
4, 3.

4. Like as bondsmen and slaves, who were in such a state in old time, were so in bondage to their masters, that, though they laboured and toiled never so much, yet they got nothing for themselves, but were held and kept under the bondage of their masters, with all their labours, their force, and diligence, yea, even unto blood : even so, forasmuch as both ourselves and all that we have belong to God by right, and He possesseth us as slaves and bondsmen, therefore, what service soever we endeavour to do Him, it is certain that He can owe nothing unto us.

5. As it hath been sometimes said and truly reported of the Athenians, namely, that they knew what was meet to do, but they wholly neglected to do the same: even so many Christians know what is meet and right to do, but yet, for the most part, wholly neglect to do the same.

Luke xii. 47.
James iv. 17.

6. Like as the Lord, according to His justice and truth, hath threatened terrible punishments to wicked and impenitent sinners: even so, contrariwise, He hath promised rewards to them that do good works and work righteousness.

Matt. v. 16.
Rom. xiii. 9, &c.
1 Cor. xv. 58.
Eph. ii. 10.
Phil. iv. 8.
Tit. ii. 12; iii. 8.

7. Like as, if a man should say the vine is made more fruitful by bearing grapes, or that the internal light of the sun is augmented by the external emission of the beams: so, likewise, for a man to say that inherent righteousness is by good works—the fruits of righteousness—augmented, is not only erroneous, but also ridiculous.

8. Like as, if a rich man, not constrained, but of his own good will, should adopt one to be his son whom he knoweth not, and to whom he oweth nothing, and should appoint him to be the heir of all his lands and goods, and, certain years after that he hath bestowed this benefit upon him, he should lay upon him a law to do this or that, he cannot now say that he hath deserved this benefit by his own works, seeing that many years before he, asking nothing, had bestowed the same freely and of mere favour: so God could not respect our works and deserts going before righteousness, for the promise and the gift of the Holy Ghost was four hundred and thirty years before the law.

Gal. iii. 16, 17.

9. As it is impossible to separate washing from water, burning from fire, and good fruits from a good tree: even so impossible it is to separate good works from a true and a lively faith.

James ii. 22.

10. As merchants or chapmen do oftentimes prize and esteem their wares and merchandise more than they be worth: even so do we of our doings, virtues, and good works; but when they are examined and prized by those who know them, as by the Spirit of God and His prophets, they are altogether judged as old rags, torn, tied together, and patched up again.

11. As old images new gilded over, which outwardly hath some glistening and show, but within are nothing but dust and dirt; or as counterfeit money, which is of ill and naughty metal, how good a print soever it have: even so is the good that we do; and all the righteousness and virtue which is in us is nothing but shame and reproach.

Rom. x. 3.

12. As the temple sanctified the gold that was upon it, but was not sanctified by the gold; or as the altar sanctified the offering that was upon it, but was not sanctified by the offering: even so good works do not beautify a Christian man in the Lord, but the man in the Lord doth beautify the works.

Matt. xxiii. 17-19.

13. As the apple is not the cause of the apple-tree, but a fruit of it: even so good works are not the cause of our salvation, but a sign and a fruit of the same.

Matt. vii. 17.

14. As caterpillars and blasts sometimes do fret and annoy the branches, that the sap cannot have its course, and so the fruit faileth which seemed fair to the eye: so rancour and displeasure, division, schism, and separation among men, being no less than noisome winds and caterpillars to our Christian faith, eat up and dry away many times the sap or juice of love and charity, whereby the expected fruit of good works is withered in the branches.

15. As savoury water cannot come from a stinking puddle, or sweet fruit from a sour root: even so no more can any good work come from an unregenerate man, from a corrupt and sinful soul, who, although he give his body to the fire for the profession and maintenance of the truth, and all his goods to the poor in a tender compassion of their misery, yet he, being destitute of faith, love, and the rest of the parts of regeneration, doth not by these works please God or fulfil His law.

16. As the channel which is polluted and defiled doth pollute and defile the water—that is, without defilement in the fountain: even so the mind and will of man, defiled by the remnant of sin, defile the works, which, as they come from Christ, are undefiled.

17. As in fire there is both heat and light, yet do we not say that the light doth burn, but the heat: so in a man justified there are both faith and good works inseparable, yet doth not good works justify, but faith only.

18. As one torch doth give more light carried before than four borne behind: so, likewise, one good work or deed done in lifetime and perfect health is more welcome unto God than forty appointed to be done after death.

19. As the green leaves outwardly show that the tree is not dry inwardly: so good works openly testify the zeal of heart inwardly.

Good Works, but yet failing in the manner of doing.

Luke vii. 3-5.
Matt. viii. 5.

As the elders of the Jews, who, coming to our Saviour Christ, in behalf of the centurion for his sick servant, besought Him instantly, as though they might not be denied, and they tell Him that the centurion is worthy of so much favour, as that forsooth the Lord Jesus should come to him and heal his servant, for proof whereof they allege two strong reasons—one is, he loveth our nation; another is, he hath built us a synagogue: even so plead the Papists, “We are worthy, O Lord, of Thy favour; we have deserved so much at Thy hands; or such a one that is now dead hath deserved so much as that Thou shouldest receive his soul, for he loved us well while he lived; he was an honest man, he made us good cheer, he kept a good house, he filled our bellies and our purses too; besides this, he hath built us a stately synagogue, goodly churches, and chapels; he mended our highways, he erected such a college, such an hospit^l; therefore, Lord, thou must of necessity receive his soul into Thy kingdom, or else Thou doest him wrong.”

Good Works make us not pure in God's sight.

1. LIKE as, if an ass were trimmed and decked in a lion's skin, and would needs be a lion, yet his long ears, being always upward, would easily descry and bewray him: even so, if we adorn, garnish, and set forth ourselves with glorious beautiful works never so much, so that no man can say but that we are utterly innocent and inculpable in divers and many points, yet, notwithstanding, we have filthy, unclean, and wicked hearts, full of false security and neglect of God, and altogether given to the love of ourselves and to all manner of dissoluteness.

Tit. i. 15.
Rom. xiv. 23.

2. As a schoolmaster will take in good part the diligence that his scholars can do, and if he see them put their goodwill thereto he will bear with their faults and teach them their lessons, but to the stubborn and froward he will show no gentleness, but cast them off: so, likewise, God, with those whom He hath chosen in Christ before the world was made, will bear with their infirmities, and wink at their little faults, and teach them to do better, and praise their well-doings, and gently correct their faults; but His enemies and outcasts, because whatsoever they do is hypocrisy, He loves them not, but even their prayer is turned to sin, and whatsoever they do is defiled, because they be not grafted and chosen in Christ Jesus.

Good Works uncontrollable.

As no man can accuse the potter for making of the same lump of clay a drinking pot or a chamber pot : so, likewise, none ought to quarrel or find fault with their Creator, whose workmanship they are, framed at His good pleasure and will. Rom. ix. 21.

Why the Works of Christians are called sacrifices.

1. As the sacrifices of the old Jews were commanded from heaven to the priests, and were chosen, applied, sanctified, and accepted : so, in our sacrifices, it is necessary that there be a commandment, a choice, an application, a sanctification, and that they be accepted of

2. As in old time it was not lawful to offer a sow, or any unclean beast, by the law, but only such as were clean according to the law : so the works that Christians should offer must not be unclean—that is, either forbidden by the Word of God, or hypocritical, or superstitious—but such as God commandeth.

3. Like as the clean lamb which should be offered was separated from the rest of the flock : so, by faith, our works are to be separated from the like works of profane people.

4. As the ceremonial sacrifice was applied to the altar by the hand of the priest laid thereupon : so, likewise, our works should be applied to the altar through Christ, by whose handling they are sanctified.

5. Even as those old sacrifices were consumed with fire from heaven and sanctified : so, in like manner, our sacrifices, through the merit of Christ, inflamed by the Holy Ghost, are sanctified with fire from heaven, and are accepted through Christ.

6. As Christ maketh our obedience grateful, and deserveth that our obedience both in the cross and also in the law of sacrifice be accepted : so our sacrifices please not, in respect of any excellency of merit, but through Christ, in whom God weigheth our works, that He may accept them as worthy sacrifices.

7. As the faulty sacrifice of the old people (the Jews), who came to the altar through error and touched the altar, was not changed for a better, but was taken as purged and holy by reason it had touched the holy place : so our works, albeit they be very faulty, yet become they clean and apt for holy sacrifice and acceptable to God through touching our Altar, Christ, who, through faith, is touched.

8. As in the earthly Jerusalem there was only but one altar for sacrifices : so, likewise, in the heavenly, there is but one upon which we do offer, when we depend upon the merit of Christ, that our sacrifice may be holy and acceptable unto God.

The Works of God's ministers inevitable.

LIKE as it is to no purpose to seek to take by force a city as well fenced and manned as it may be : so, likewise, vain are the attempts of them that oppose themselves to God's ministers, to hinder them from doing that for which God hath sent them. Jer. i. 18, 19

Works of hypocrites.

1. As in a glass, although there appear a certain similitude, yet it is false, inasmuch as those things are represented in the glass on the left hand which are indeed on the right, and those that are on the right hand are showed to be on the left, and by this means James i. 23, 24 there is a counterfeiting of the truth: even so, in the works of hypocrites, although there be a fair show outwardly in the sight of men, yet it is false, for those things which are ungodly and wicked are counted holy and true by them.

2. As the strong bitterness of the aloe-tree taketh away the sweetness of the sweetest honey: so evil works destroy and take away the praise of good deeds.

The Works of the Three Persons be inseparable.

John v. 17, 19.

As reason cannot discern good and evil, truth and falsehood, plainness and craft, and sophistication, without either will or memory; neither doth will choose what it liketh without the others; nor doth memory remember things gone without reason and will; these actions and works, which are said properly to belong only to memory, and only to reason and will, in very deed are done by the workmanship of all three: so the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost work all things inseparably—not that each of them is unable to work by Himself, but that they all Three are one God, one Spirit, one nature, as reason, will, memory, are one soul.

The Works of the world declare God the Workman thereof.

1. As a prisoner in a dungeon may easily, by a little beam that shineth in at a chink, conceive there is a sun, from whence that beam descendeth; or as a traveller in the wilderness, that falleth upon some channel or brook, may ascend by the same to the well or fountain: even so he that beholdeth and considereth the wonderful works of the world may thereby conceive of the wonderful Artificer or Worker that made them.

Ps. xix. 9.
Job xxxviii. 4, &c.

2. Like as, if a man do pass by sea into some foreign, strange, or savage country, where nothing else but birds and beasts do appear, yet, if he should observe some exquisite building or other works of art and reason in the place, he would presently assure himself that some men dwelt or had been in that country, for that such things could not be done by beasts or unreasoning creatures: even so, if we cast our eyes to the view and consideration of the heavens, with the sun, moon, stars, and the rest of the creatures of this world, we may then easily judge that there is a God that hath made all these, and so from time to time preserveth the same.

3. As in a choir, or company of singers, when the foreman hath given the first tune or note, there ensueth presently a sweet harmony and consent of all other voices both great and small, sharp and mean: so, likewise, God, in the creation of this world, having given once the first push or motion to the highest heaven, called the first movement, there ensueth upon the same all other motions of heavens, planets, elements, and other bodies, in most admirable order, concord, and congruity, for conservation and government of the world.

4. Like as, if a man that stood afar off upon a mountain should see in a field under him a great, huge, and main army of soldiers, most excellently well appointed, each one in order agreeing with the other, divided into ranks, squadrons, companies, and offices, subordinate the one to the other by degrees, and yet all tending one way; all their faces bent upon one place; all moving, marching, and turning together; all enduring with all cheerfulness towards the performance of one common service, by mutual assistance, without dissension or clamour;—he that should see this, he could not but imagine some general or high captain to be among these soldiers, whom all obeyed, and from whose supreme commandment and order this most excellent subordination, agreement, and union, proceeded: even so much more, upon consideration of the form, coherence, consent, and miraculous subordination of creatures among themselves, in their operations, must we infer that they have some general Commander over them all, by whose supreme disposition each creature hath his charge and peculiar part appointed, which he must perform for the common and universal service of the whole.

Our best Works stained.

1. As pure water put into filthy vessels is corrupted thereby; or as clear running water passing through filthy channels gathereth filthiness: even so the pure graces of God, so soon as they enter into us, are stained by the corruption of our nature.

2. Like as there is a greater force in sin to pollute holy things than in holy things to sanctify polluted things; or as the whole part of a man's body touching the sore part cannot heal it, but rather is in danger to be infected by it: even so it followeth necessarily that the best works in man are wholly corrupted; so that if the Lord should straitly examine them, no man can answer for one of a thousand.

Mag. ii. 13.
Job ix. 2, 3.

The World lieth in sin.

As a possessed person or madman is not free from the snares of the devil, or well in his mind, because he hath his hands and his feet bound, and can do no hurt: even so the world, although it be bridled by the law from outward wickedness and mischief, yet is it not therefore righteous, but still continueth wicked; yea, this restraint sheweth plainly that the world is wicked and outrageous, stirred up, and enforced to all wickedness by its prince, the devil, for otherwise it needed not to be bridled by laws that it should not sin.

The World.

1. As a wrestler, embracing him with whom he striveth in the wrestling-place for victory, lifteth him up the higher, that with the greater force he may hurl him against the ground: so this world doth extol us, that, with throwing us down headlong, it may hurt us, and that we may fall from the top of deceitful and transitory glory down to the bottom of most certain and perpetual ignominy.

2. As the sea floweth and ebbeth, and all the waves thereof at the length fall upon the earth: so the world is never quiet—it extolleth some, and casteth down others, but all the vanities of it are ended in the grave.

1 John v. 4.

3. As the sea doth cast to shore shell-fishes of all sorts, weeds, and many other things, and not long after doth sup up, receive, and devour, and cast into the depths the same again: even so this world doth now thrust us out of favour and by-and-by receiveth us again, and when we think ourselves to be upon a very safe shore, and that we have leisure and time to rest us, and to meditate upon some worthy and excellent things, even then we find ourselves deceived, and are tossed among the waves of infinite troubles, and are swallowed up of innumerable calamities, because many things that we never thought of have prevented us, and the flickerings and false promises of this cozening world have deceived our hope and disappointed our expectation.

4. As a child will love his nurse for the breast's sake, though she be a whore: even so many men love this present world for the vain pleasures and carnal delights of the same, though indeed the world be a very strumpet.

5. Even as the eagle flieth on high, and falleth not upon the ground, but to seek his necessary food, and, having caught his prey, by-and-by flieth up again, and maketh an abode below on the earth: so we ought to have our minds occupied in heaven, and all superfluous care of worldly things lay apart, and, with the eyes of our minds and faith, behold our God, and in the quietness and staidness of our souls rest ourselves upon His grace, without having more to do with this world than, in our several callings, to seek lawfully those necessities only which may serve for the preservation of life.

Isa. xxxi. 1; xxxvi. 6.

6. As a staff made of a reed is hollow and empty: so the confidence and trust which we put in the world is vain and will deceive us.

1 John ii. 15.
1 Cor. vii. 21.
James iv. 14.

7. As we see sometimes in the air a cloud, having the figure and likeness of a tall and mighty man, which by-and-by is spread abroad and representeth huge and high towers, but in the turning of a hand, being taken with a blast of wind, it is dissolved and vanisheth away: even such is the trust that we put in this transitory world. It setteth before us, in the conceit of our imagination, that we shall be great men, and that we shall be very famous and attain to great dignity; it doth promise unto us mountains of gold and huge and lofty towers of honour and renown; but all these things are towers built in the air, and castles made of wind and grounded upon vanity, which are dissolved and dispersed most suddenly.

Worldly-minded men.

Gen. xxi. 34.
Heb. xii. 16.

LIKE as a man who looketh on a town represented on four leaves of paper, he shall somewhat discern the order of the streets and houses thereof; but afterwards, if he shall lay down on the like quantity of paper the whole province wherein that town or city standeth, the town will not show so great as a man's nail; and, lastly, if he shall represent the whole world on as much paper, he shall then see neither house nor town—yea, scarcely the whole province—perhaps he may find the name of the realm, and see its extent in the breadth of two or three nails, and, looking from heaven, the whole world will not seem so much: even so, then, it is a great folly, or rather a madness, for those that are strangers upon earth and burgesses of heaven, diversely and by sundry means to offend God for the getting of a small portion of earth, which is as nothing, wherein they resemble Esau, who, for a piece of bread and a mess of pottage, sold his birthright.

Worldly-wise men.

LIKE as a woman who, having so much work to do that she could not tell where to begin, sat her down and left all undone: even so are worldly-wise men, who, seeing many things out of order both in Church and commonwealth, and having so little hope of any redress or reformation thereof, that they cannot tell which or what to correct or amend first, do therefore leave sin unpunished and let men do what they list.

The true Worship of God.

1 Cor. vi. 9.

1. EVEN as a foul and stinking phial infecteth the pure and good ointment which is put into it: even so the worship of God, if it be placed in a foul heart, will soon corrupt and shortly turn into flat idolatry and wicked dissembling.

1 Cor. v. 6.

2. As a little leaven leaveneth a whole lump: even so a little ungodliness and worldly affections sour the whole mass of God's worship and service, and make it unpleasant unto Him.

Exod. xxvi. 1, &c.
2 Chron. iii. 1, &c.
Lev. x. 2.

3. As the true God is to be alone worshipped: so is He to be worshipped in truth, as He Himself, and not as man inventeth.

Exod. xx. 2, 3.
Deut. v. 6, 7.

4. Even as a man might say unto his wife of one that is not a very man, "Forasmuch as he is not a man, he is not meet for marriage, and therefore not to be matched with thee as thy husband ; and, if he be a very man indeed, yet thou mayest not join him with me, for I am thy husband only : " so, likewise, if any be a counterfeit God, even therefore he is not to be worshipped nor to be matched with the true God, because he is counterfeit ; and if any even seem to be the true God, yet we may not worship him, for we profess one true God, and that one alone.

Wrath of God.

1. As all good neighbours will hastily run to the quenching of a dangerous fire : Ps. ii. 12. so, likewise, all Christians ought to make speed to pacify the wrath of God when they perceive the same to wax hot against them.

2. As the water of mighty floods doth with great violence and rage flow, and cannot be stopped : so the wrath of God cometh upon the wicked, who pervert all laws and all religion. Hos. v. 10.

Youth cometh not again after old age.

1. As after winter cometh summer : so, contrariwise, after old age cometh not youth again.

2. As the cypress-tree, the more it is watered, the more it withereth ; and the oftener it is lopped, the sooner it dieth : so unbridled youth, the more it is by grave advice counselled or due corrections controlled, the sooner it falleth to confusion.

Youth flexible to good or bad.

1. As water on the ground will follow the tracing of the finger put into it and leading it : so young years are flexible and easy to be drawn to either part, good or bad.

2. As the acanthus, bred in the thistle, feedeth on the thistle, and the grasshopper, bred in the grass, lieth in the grass : so, in like manner, youth bred and brought up in sin will lie in it, and hardly be drawn from it.

Zeal.

1. As zeal must direct our discretion, that we run not too slowly : so discretion must direct our zeal, that we run not too fast.

2. As all zeal without discretion is an offering without an eye, which was by God forbidden : so, likewise, all blind zeal is a blind offering, which God will never accept. Lev. xxii. 22.

3. As Minerva is said to have put a golden bridle upon Pegasus, that he should not fly too fast : so, in like sort, our Christian discretion must put a golden bridle upon our Pegasus—that is, our earnest zeal—lest, if our zeal be unbridled, it make us run out of course.

THE END.

GENERAL INDEX.

A.

ACCUSATION, a false, 1.
ADAM, disobedience of, 1; fall of, came not to pass without the decree and ordinance of God, 1; free-will lost in, 136.
ADMONITION, or wholesome precepts, 2.
ADMONITIONS, affectionate, unfruitful, 2.
ADOPTION, how a man may be assured of his, 2; of the inward marks of our, 3; sons by, 3, 4.
ADULTERY, 4; sin of secret, 4; spiritual, 345.
ADVERSITY bettereth the godly, but maketh the wicked worse, 5; bridlcth our wicked appetites, and maketh us more obedient, 5; of the faithful not above the patience God giveth, 5; ought to make us more faithful and godly, 6; and trouble further us to virtue and godliness, 353; and trouble give us occasion to pray unto God, 354; Christians, through, are made bold and hearty, 354. (See also AFFLICTION, 6, &c., and TROUBLE, 353, &c.)
ADVERSITIES and troubles are a furtherance to eternal life, 359.
AFFLICTETH, why God, His children, 6.
AFFLICTION, 6-14; is profitable, 14-16; sin the cause of, 337. (See COMFORTS FOR THE AFFLICTED, 71, &c.; and GOD CHASTISETH, &c., 141, &c.; also TROUBLE, 353, &c.)
AFFLICTIONS and trouble further us to the right knowledge of our sins, 354; and troubles means to try us withal, 359.
ALLEGORIES, 16.
AMBITION, 16, 37. (See also PRIDE, 276, &c.)
AMENDMENT of life necessary, 17.
ANGER, 18-20 (see also RAGE, 288); God's, 18-20.
APOSTASY, how it differs from sin of frailty, 337.
APPAREL, of sumptuousness and excess in, 21; children not to be overclothed with costly, 33.
APPLICATION of God's Word, 21, 22. (See HEARERS; HEARING OF THE WORD, 163, &c.; also THE WORD OF GOD, 385, &c.)
ARMIES or hosts of men, 22.
ARMOUR of Christians, the complete, 22.
ATHEISM, the chief cause of, 22; awful guilt of, 148.
AUTHORITY, the, of the Church not above the Word of God, 23.
AUTHOR of evil, God is not the, 148; of sin, God is not the, 148; of all things, God is the, 151; of men's afflictions, God is the, 152.
AUTHORS, reading of, 23, 288.

B.

BACKSLIDING and apostasy differ from sin of frailty, 337.
BAPTISM, 23; may not be denied to infants, 23, 24; quality of the water not changed in, 25, 26; to what end proper names are given us in, 236.
BAPTIZED but once, 24.
BAPTIZING by a midwife, 24.
BEAUTY, 24.
BENEFITS, 25; thankfulness for, 349; thankfulness for God's graces and, 349.
BEST, the, but unprofitable, 363.
BIRTH, our second, 25.
BLOOD, Christ's, not in the wine, &c., 51.
BODY, after a sort, Christ present with us in the, 46; Christ's, not enclosed in the bread, &c., 51; Christ's, can be only in one place at the same time, 52; the, is to be kept in subjection, for the health of the soul, 343.
BODIES, resurrection of our, 303; sin maketh our, the devil's dungeon, 336.
BOOKS, 25; reading of, 288. (See also AUTHORS, 23, 288.)
BREAD and wine in the Lord's Supper do no more change their substance and qualities than the water in baptism, 25, 26. (See also SACRAMENTS, 311, &c.)
BRETHREN, unity amongst, 363.

C.

CALAMITY, 26.
CALLING, 26; the end of our, 26.
CALLINGS, distinction of, 27; must be fitted to men, 27; men must be fitted to their, 27.
CARDS and dice, 27.
CARELESS keepers of God's commandments, 27; men, who forbear to do well, because others will not do so, 28.
CARELESSNESS and negligence in good things, 28.
CARES of the world hurtful, 28; they cool the love and desire of heavenly things, 29.
CARNAL men, 29.
CARNAL-MINDED men, 29.
CATECHISING, 29.
CAUSE, the, of God's plagues to be diligently searched out, 30; God is not the, of sin, 149.
CHANGE, the wonderful, of Christians, 30.
CHARITY, 30.
CHILDREN, disobedient, 30; dying before they are baptized, not damned, 30; education of, 31-33; not to be clothed with overcostly apparel, 33; rude and wanton, 34; instructors of, 192; wicked, of godly parents, and the contrary, 379.

CHILDREN of God, the, 33, 34, 153; excellency of the, 153.

CHRIST, 34; a King, 35; a most wholesome medicine and salve to all poor sinners, 35; a sure Rock, 35; took upon Him our infirmities, 36; and the Holy Ghost are of the Father, 36; became poor to make us rich, 36; was betrayed and sold, 36; cometh of the Father, 36; comforteth His, 36; is communicated to us by a spiritual manner, 36, 37; confounds His enemies, 37; contempt of, 37; crucified healeth us, 37; the right knowledge of, crucified, 37; goodness of, considered, never any creature dealt so unkindly with Him as man doth, 37-40; death of, 40; died to deliver us, 40; fisheth for men, 40, 41; hath prepared a place for us in heaven, 41; illumination by, 41; is not a Redeemer but unto them who, being turned from iniquity, do lead a new life, 41, 42; is to be served and pleased before ourselves, or any others whatsoever, 42; is less beholden to the most part of the world than Cæsar was to the Romans, 42; not to be denied in persecution, 43; our grand Captain, 43; our spiritual food, 43; our Intercessor, 43; our Lord, 43; our Mediator, 43; our Prophet, 44; our Righteousness, 44, 45; our Second Husband by faith, 45, 46; is Possessor of heaven for us, 46; after a sort, present with us in the body, 46; received by faith, 46, 47; rejecteth not a weak faith, 47; receiveth us again that were dead, 47; salvation only to be had in, if men knew how to find Him, 47; is sent of the Father, 47; though amazed and confounded with sorrows and fears, yet remained still sinless, 47, 48; sitteth at the right hand of God, and how, 48; suffered and died, as He was man, 48; suffered in His soul for our salvation, 48; the Bread of Life, 49; is the food of a Christian soul, 49; the only object of faith which justifieth, 49; the appointed Reconciler, 49; the Redeemer of mankind, 49; the Cause of our resurrection and life, 49; the Resurrection and Life, 50; the sovereign salve for our souls, 50; to be found by hearing the Word preached and read, 50; is to be loved for saving of us, 51; was in our person justly cursed of God and executed for us, 51; His body is not enclosed in or contained in the bread, or under the bread, or with the bread, neither His blood in the wine, under the wine, or with the wine, 51, 52; His natural and immortal body can be but in one place at once, and not in many places, 52, 53; cares for His members, though absent, 53; will take compassion on us, 53; never lost His confidence in God, 53; death of, 53-56; the growth of grace by His death, 56; His human nature, 56; His merits, 56; His person consisteth of two natures, 56, 57; the personal union of, 57; His second coming to judgment, 57; His victory over Satan, 57; communion with, 76; conformity with, by a certain kind of imitation, 80; body of, crucified received by faith, 125; is the object of faith, 126, 127; for love of, we must forsake all, 134; Godhead of, 144; only hath revealed God, 148; has vanquished and overcome hell, 172; incorporation with, 191; grace of, diminished not by infirmity of falling, 192; all must appear before the judgment-seat of, 195; the law our schoolmaster to bring us to, 203; a member of, falleth not finally, 219; ministers must obey, 230; obedience of His death, 238; passion of, to be revered, 245; Spirit of, necessary to preaching, 275; how His presence is really in the Sacrament, 289, 290; the redemption of, universal, 291; righteousness of, which is one only, may be distributed to the faithful, 309; secrecy causeth contempt of, 326; innocency of, covereth sin, 334; Spirit of, 343; to forsake, is spiritual adultery, 345; two natures in the personal union of, 360; union with, in the Supper, 362.

CHRISTIAN, complete armour of the, 22; a general name for all that are baptized, 58; impossible to know who is a true, before death, 58; the Cross the badge of the, 92; works follow faith in every good, 396.

CHRISTIAN service, 58; freedom, 136.

CHRISTIANITY, 58; patience in affliction a perfect trial of true, 249, 250; person of men not to be regarded in, 258.

CHRISTIANS, 58-62; false, 62, 63; if God forsake them, in great misery, 63; good, are much grieved when God is dishonoured, 63; are to pray chiefly for spiritual graces, 63; fruits of liberty required of, 206; proud persecutors think they may do as they list with, 258; through trouble and adversity, are made bold and hearty, 354; weakness in the best, 373; why the works of, are called sacrifices, 399.

CHURCH, 63-70; authority of the, not above the Word, 23; he that speaketh in the, 70; ingratitude of the, 192; of Rome, the mass in, 218; three sorts of officers needful in the, 240; order to be used in reforming the, 241; peace and unity of the, 251; persecution a means of enlarging the, 252; preachers of the law no disturbers of the peace of the, 272; private men and women may greatly further the, 279; counterfeit professors the greatest enemies of the, 281; salvation only in the, 319; no sanctification except we be united to the, 320; Holy Scripture above the, 324.

CHURCH'S, the, variable estate upon earth, 70.

CITIES and countries, 70.

COMFORT from God's Spirit, 70; what, we receive by the name of Christ, or anointed, 71.

COMFORTS for the afflicted, 71-74. (See AFFLICTION, 6, &c., and also GOD CHASTISETH HIS OF VERY LOVE AND MERCY &c., 141, &c.)

COMMANDMENT, the last, explained, 74, 75; whosoever breaketh one is guilty of the breach of all, 75.

COMMANDMENTS, God's, careless keepers of, 27; the breach of, 75; how the two tables of the ten be alike, 76; performance of, 256.

COMMON people, 76.

COMMONWEALTH, 76.

COMMUNION with Christ, 76.

COMPANY changeth nature, 76; evil, hurtful, 77, 78.

COMPARISON, a brief, of the sins that reigned in the people in the time of the prophet Zephaniah with the like sins in the people of our time, 78, 79.

CONCORD, 79.

CONDEMNATION, the sentence of, why set down, 327.

CONDITION, the, of man's creation, 79.

CONFESSING of secret faults, 79.

CONFESSION, a fruitless, 79; of our evil deeds to God, 79, 80.

CONFORMITY, our, with Christ by a certain kind of imitation, 80.

CONSCIENCE, good or evil, 80-83; the benumbed, is senseless of spiritual graces, 83; touched, 83; horror of sin bringeth remorse of, 176; peace of, 250; trouble of, 356.

CONSIDERATION and earnest meditation of our state needful, 84.

CONTEMNERS of the truth, 84.

CONTEMPLATION of heavenly things, 84.

CONTEMPT of Christ, 37; of the minister, 84, 85; security causeth, of Christ, 326.

CONTENT, 85.

CONTENTIOUS men, 85; spirits are dangerous, 85.

CONTINUANCE in sin, 85.

CONVERSATION, our, is carefully to be looked to, 85, 86.

CORRECTION, 86.

CORRUPTERS of princes are most severely to be punished, 86.

CORRUPTION of truth by man's traditions, 86; original, 88; is the root of all sin, 87.

COUNSEL, 87; good, not to be refused by the wisest, 87; men who can keep no, are very dangerous, 87, 88; wise, of a friend, 88.

COURTESY, 88.

COURTS of princes, 88.

COVENANT, the, of God, 88.

COVETOUSNESS, 88-91; in old men, 91

CREATION, the condition of man's, 79

CREATURE, 91; the, may not control his Creator, 92.

CREATURES, God's, admirable, 92; wisdom of God may be known by the ordering of His, 382.

CROSS, the, maketh peace, 92.

CROSSES are the badge of a Christian, 92.

CRUELTY of tyrants, 361.

CUP, the, of God's wrath, 92, 93. (See also GOD'S ANGER, 18, &c.)

CURIOSITY, 93, 94.

CUSTOM another nature, 94, 95.

D.

DANCES, 95.

DAY OF JUDGMENT terrible to the wicked, 95. (See JUDGMENT-DAY, 195.)

DAY, last, resurrection of all at, 302.

DEAD in sin, 95.

DEATH of Christ, 40-56; obedience of the, 238.

DEATH, 95-99; man's liability to, 99; how to encounter with, 99; of the body not to be feared, 99; the time of our, unknown, 99; how to carry ourselves in, 328.

DECEITS, the, of the world dangerous, 100.

DECREASE of renewed holiness, 100.

DECREE, or purpose of God, 100.

DEFERRING of repentance, 100, 101.

DELIGHT, 101.

DELIGHTETH, God, in the conversion of a sinner, 101.

DESERTION of God's Spirit, 101; justice of God in, 197.

DESIRES of heaven, 102; of the flesh, how quenched, 102.

DESTRUCTION, the highway to, 327.

DEVIL, the, fearful and envious, 102; our bodies made the dungeon of the, by sin, 336.

DEVICES of the wicked, 102; some snared in their own, 346.

DICE and cards, 27.

DIET, the, of the soul, 102-104.

DIGNITY should follow humility, 155.

DISCIPLINE, 104, 105.

DISCORD, 105.

DISEASES of the mind, 105.

DISOBEDIENCE of Adam, 1.

DISPLEASURE foreseen, 105.

DISSENSIONS, 105.

DISTINCTION of callings, 27.

DISTRESSED men do seek after God, 105, 106.

DIVERSITY of wills and opinions, 106.

DIVINITY, no, except it be against God, prescribed to the minister, 106; students in, 106.

DOCTRINE, false, 106; sound, doth cheer the spirits, 106; spiritual, of our souls, 106.

DOCTRINES, false, and inventions of men, 107.

DRAW near unto God, how to, 107.

DRUNKARDS and drunkenness, 107, 108.

DRUNKEN men, 108.

DUNSICAL writers, 108.

DUTY, the, of parishioners to their ministers, 108, 109.

E.

EASE, overmuch, and pampering of the belly, a great provocation to sin, 109.

EDIFYING of others, 109.

EDUCATION of children, 31.

ELDERS and ancestors, our, in times of ignorance, had yet good consciences in civil causes, 109.

ELECT, the, cannot finally perish, 109; God's love to His, 110; are ordained to lead a godly life, 110; joy of the, 194; testimony of the Spirit in the, 349.

ELECTED, the, or predestinated to everlasting life, are elected to all the means of attaining unto it, 110.

ELECTION of God, 110, 111; we must give diligence to make our, sure, 111; to salvation, doth not abolish, but establish the second causes, 111.

ELOQUENCE in sermons forbidden, 111, 112.

END of our callings, 26.

ENEMIES of the Gospel, 112; sins our greatest, 339.

ENEMY, 112.

ENVY, 112-114.

EPICURISM the fountain of sin, 114.

EQUALITY in marriage, 114.

ERROR, a great, for a man to think he shall be saved when he is dying, if he say, "Lord, have mercy upon me!" 115; the Scripture sufficient to confute all, 324.

ESTATE the, fearful, of many people, 115.

EVIL speakers, 115.

EXAMINING of a man's own self, 115.

EXAMPLE, 115, 116; of old men, 241.

EXCESS taketh away pleasure, 116.

EXPECTATION of reward, 116.

EYES and ears, 117.

F.

FACE, God's, is fearful to the wicked, 117.

FALL, the, of Adam, came not to pass without the decree of God, 1; of a man through his own pride, 117.

FAITH, Christ received by, 46; a weak, not rejected, 47; Christ the only object of, 49; faith, 117-120; a dead, 120, 121; and hope do differ, 121; and obedience requisite in them that be baptized, 121; as God giveth us it, so He increaseth the same in us, 121; hath need of continual increase, and yet is never perfect in this life, 121; how it is alone, and not alone without works, 122, 123; is faith, though it be weak, or small, or lie hidden, 123, 124; must not waver in prayer, 124; perfect in substance, but in quality groweth greater by daily increase, 124; the only means of forgiveness of sins, 125; the only truth which receiveth the body of Christ crucified, 125; is tied to no time, to no age, or quality of life, 125; without a particular appliance, hath no comfort in it, 125, 126; without works, is vain, 126, 396; feeling of, not always alike, 129; and God's promises must be joined, 282.

FAITH'S object, 126, 127.

FAITHFUL, 127; righteousness of Christ distributed to all the, 309.

FAMINE, the, of the soul, 117.

FASTING, when needful, 127.

FATHER, such a, such a son, 127.

FAULTS, secret, confession of, 79.

FAVOUR, in God's, 127, 128.

FAVOURERS and furtherers of wicked actions and sins, 128.

FEAR, 128; of God, 128; trouble and sorrow help and further us toward the, of God, 354.

FEASTS and banquets, superfluity in, 128, 129.

FEELING, a fellow-like, 129; of faith, and other good graces which we are endowed with, not always alike and the same in us, 129; of sinners greater in some than of the merits and righteousness of Christ, 130.

FICKLENESS of the state of great persons, 130.

FIRE and water, the Holy Ghost compared to, 173, 174.

FLATTERER, the, 130.

FLATTERY, 131.

FLESH and spirit, 132; our spirit must strive to overcome the, 344.

FOLLY of some men great, 132.

FOOD, Christ our spiritual, 43; Word of God, the, of the soul, 395.

FOOLISH men and women, babbling of, 132.

FORGIVENESS of sins, 132; free, yet requireth thankfulness, 133; from God only, 133; to be preached to all men, 134. (See also REMISSION OF SINS, 295.)

FORGIVING of others, 134.

FORNICATION, spiritual, 134.

FORSAKE all, we must, for the love of Christ, 134.

FOURTH Commandment, breakers of the, 135.

FRAILITY, the, of man's nature, 135; sins of, 337.

FREE from sin by faith, 136.

FREEDOM, Christian, 136.

FREE-WILL lost in Adam, 136.

FRIEND, counsel of a, 88; and friendship to be tried, then trusted, 137; a, forsaken, 138.

FRIENDS not always to be chosen for their wealth, 136; feigned, 138; unprofitable, 138.

G.

GAINFUL man, a, but sumptuous, 138.

GENERATION, spiritual, 138.

GENTLENESS rather to be used than righteousness, 139.

GIFTS, the, of God, 139; variety of, 368.

GLORIFY God, to, 139.

GLORY and renown, 139; though degrees of, all shall have sufficient, 139; the, of God, 139.

GOD, Adam's fall came not to pass without the decree of, 1; gives patience in adversity, 5; why, afflicts His children, 6; anger of, 20, 21; Word of, its application, 21, 22; Word of, above the authority of the Church, 23; careless keepers of the Commandments of, 27; the cause of the plagues of, to be searched out, 30; children of, 33; laid on Christ our guilt, 51; Christ never lost His confidence in, 53; forsaking His children the cause of their great misery, 63; dishonour done to, gives much grief to Christians, 63; comfort from the Spirit of, 70; Commandments of, breach of the, 75; confession of our evil deeds to, 79; covenant of, 88; creatures of, admirable, 92; the cup of the wrath of, 92; decree or purpose of, 100; delighteth in the conversion of a sinner, 101; desertion by the Spirit of, 101; men distressed seek after, 105; how to draw near to, 107; election of, 110; love of, to His elect, 110; face of, fearful to the wicked, 117; giveth faith and increaseth it, 121; in the favour of, 127; fear of, 128; forgiveness of sins from, only, 133; the gifts of, 139; to be glorified, 139; the glory of, 139; and His works of grace in His Church, 140; is a Spirit which cannot be represented by a bodily shape, 140; alone sufficient for His people, 140; by His Spirit purifieth us, 141; chastiseth His, of very love and mercy, 141-143; comforteth afflicted souls, 143; comforteth His, 143; doth us not all the good He will do at a clap, lest we should lose it, 143; draweth some goodness even out of the wicked, 144; forsaketh His children sometimes and leaveth them to themselves, 144; Head of Christ, 144, 145; heareth our complaints, 145; is a Husbandman to His people, 145; is all-sufficient perfection, 145; is present everywhere, yet not with all alike, 145; is in the ministry of all, 145; loveth His children, 146, 147; may reward and deal with His creatures as pleaseth Him, 147; no partial judge, 148; not seen of man at any time, 148; believe that there is a, fearful state of those who do not, 148; not the Author of evil, 148; not the Author of sin, 148, 149; not the Cause of sin, 149; one, in Trinity,

149; regardeth His faithful servants, 150; the life of the soul, 150; One and Three Persons, 150, 151; tempteth no man to sin, 151; the Author of all things, 151; the Author of men's afflictions, 152; the refuge of the comfortless, 152; unchangeable, 152; why, denieth us our petition, 152; will not be mocked, 153; would have all to be saved, 153; children of, 153; the excellency of the children of, 153, 154; favour of, the safest refuge, 154; the use of the gifts of, to men, 154; graces of, 154; promises of, 155; providence of, over His children, 155; no heaven without the grace of, 160; graces of, 161; guilty before, 162; health to be sought for of, 163; humble men profit by reading the Word of, 176; humbleth us in this world, that He may exalt us in the world to come, 177; image of, 189; imperfections do not make, to refuse us, 190; why, suffereth infirmities in the best, 191; and His men inseparably joined together, 194; judgments of, not regarded by many, 196; justice of, 196; in deserts, 197; the will of, authority for right justice, 197; know' age of, 199; knowledge of, how it is attained unto, 199; law of, 200-203; liberality of, 206; love of, 211; love of, in giving His Son for us, 211; man born to love, 215; man may not accuse, of unrighteousness, 216; mercies of, 221; mercy of, to be appealed to, 222; enemies of the truth of, to be confuted, 231; mysteries of the Word of, not to be opened to the wicked, 235; obedience to, the whole duty of man, 238; we do obey, in obeying them to whom He hath made us subjects, 238; office of, what it is, 239; patience necessary that we may live with, hereafter, 250; protecteth the penitent, 251; performance of the Commandments of, 256; persecutors powerless without the leave of, 258; no power against, 263; praising, 264; prayer must be made to, alone, 268; hears not our prayers always, 269; revealeth His will unto us by preaching, 274; Spirit of, necessary to preaching, 275; pride maketh Him take His graces from us and bestow them on others, 277; faith and the promises of, must be joined, 282; mercy of, in His promises, 282; promises of, 282; providence of, 286; desires purity in our hearts, 287; no resistance against, 300; salvation is from, alone, 319; could save us without all means, yet useth means, 320; giveth us understanding to know the Scriptures, 324; impossible to serve, and riches, 327; no service pleaseth, but such as He teacheth, 327; the service of, to be preferred before all earthly things, 327; serving against, 328; how sin dependeth on, 335; sin is noisome to the Spirit of, 335; law of, forbid-deth all sin, and commandeth every good work, 336; they whom He setteth on work must needs speak, 343; Spirit of, purifieth, 344; not to grieve the Spirit of, 344; spiritual graces from, 345; we are the temple of, 348; thankfulness for the benefits and graces of, 349; trouble and adversity give occasion to pray to, 354; trouble and sorrow help us toward the fear and love of, 354; delivereth from trouble in due season, 355; helpeth and comforteth by His Word and Spirit, 355; love toward, worketh patience in trouble, 356; sometimes mitigateth troubles that we may the more easily overcome them, 360; the ungodly are grievous to, 361; unthankfulness to, 364; hath vengeance in store, 368; our weakness to please, 373; will of, 380; it may be just in the will of, to forsake His creature, 380; will of, not curiously to be searched into, 381; the will is instead of the fact before, 381; not two wills in, 381, 382; wisdom of, may be known by the ordering of His creatures, 382; wisdom of, 383; overweening wits despise the wisdom of, 384; Word of, is true, 384; Word of, the more it is searched, the sweeter it is, 384; the Word of, the salve for our souls, 385; not enough to know the Word of, we must be doers of it, 385; the Word of, 385-393; by the written Word of, things amiss are discerned, 393; the Word of, how it worketh in men diversely, 393, 394; the Word of, ought to be carefully searched into, 394; the Word of, the food of the soul, 395; the Word of, the only weapon to overcome the world, 395; we ought to practise the Word of, 395; good works make us not pure in the sight of, 398; the works of His ministers inevitable, 399; the works of the world declare Him Workman thereof, 400; the true worship of, 402; wrath of, 403.

GODHEAD, the, of Christ, 144; incommunicable properties of, 190.

GODLINESS, some love, while nothing is required contrary to their own affections, 156; the beginning and foundation of righteousness, 156; precepts of, 275; trouble and adversity do further us to, 353.

GODLY, the, bettered by adversity, 5; life, a, 156; man, a, is mighty though never so poor, 156; men, 157; the, see clearly the light of the Word, 157; the, want nothing good for them, 157; meditations, 219; profit by persecutions, 257; desire salvation, 319; and virtuous men, 371.

GOOD, the, of our brethren must be regarded, 158; men's estate amongst the wicked, 158; things all come from heaven, 158; turns or benefits unexpected, 158; works follow faith in every Christian, 396.

GOOD works, 396-399.

GOODWILL, 158.

GOSPEL, enemies of the, 112.

GOSPEL, 158, 159; the, to be mingled with the law in preaching, 159; mystery of the, 236.

GOVERNMENT of the commonwealth, 159.

GRACE, growth of, 56; feeling of, not always alike, 129; grace, &c., 160; of God, no heaven without, 160; wrought by degrees, 161; of God, 161; of the Holy Ghost cannot finally be abolished, 161; we are heirs through, 172; infirmity of falling diminisheth not the, of Christ, 192.

GREAT men full of cares, 162.

GUILTY before God, 162.

H.

HAPPINESS, the renewed, of man, 295.

HARDNESS of heart, 162.

HATRED, 163.

HEALTH to be sought for of God, 163; of the soul, 343.

HEARERS of the Word, 163-168. (See also APPLICATION OF GOD'S WORD, 21, 22.)

HEARERS, obstinate, the irrecoverable destruction of, 168.

HEARING of the Word necessary to all, 168. (See also WORD OF GOD, 385, &c.)

HEART of man, 169, 170; naturally corrupt from the womb, 170, 171; a, penitent, 251; pride of, 277.

HEARTS of strong men, 171; our, must be elevated daily to heaven, 171; quiet, 171; Satan knoweth the secrets of our, by words, &c., 321.

HEAVEN, Christ hath prepared a place for us in, 41; desires of, 102; no, without the grace of God, 160; our hearts must be daily elevated to, 171; heaven, 172; our journey to, 194; joys of, endless, 194; kingdom of, 197, 198; neglect of, for earthly things, 237.

HEIRS, we are, not through works, but through grace, 172.

HELL vanquished and overcome through Christ, 172.

HELP, vain is the, of man, 172.

HERETICS, 172, 173; hypocritical, 186; Papists like the old, 244.

HIDING of faults, 173.

HIGH estate of life dangerous, 173.

HIGH-MINDED men, 173.

HOLY days, 174.

HOLY GHOST, the, and Christ are of the Father, 36; graces of the, cannot finally be abolished, 161; the, compared to fire and water, 173, 174; the, is God, 174; the, is Maker of the world, 174; the, worketh where and in whom He will, 174.

HOLY SPIRIT, the, regenerateth not all, 175; the, is the earnest-penny of our inheritance, 175. (See also THE SPIRIT, &c., 343, &c.)

HOLINESS, decrease of, renewed, 100.

HOLINESS, 175; renewed, 296.

HOPE, 175.

HORROR of sin bringeth remorse of conscience, 176.

HOSTS, or armies of men, 22; the Lord's, are mighty, 176.

HOUSES of the wicked, 176.

HUMANITY, or gentleness, 176.

HUMBLE men profit by reading and hearing the Word of God, 176.

HUMBLETH us, the Lord, in this world, that He may exalt us in the world to come, 177.

HUMILITY, 177, 178; ought to go before dignity, 179.

HUSBAND, Christ, our second, by faith, 45; the, and wife's duty, 179, 180; the, head over his wife, 180; duty of the, to his wife, 180, 181.

HYPOCRITES, 181-186; outward professors are often, 281; works of, 399, 400.

HYPOCRISY, 186.

HYPOCRITICAL heretics, 186.

I.

ICARIAN SEA, why so called, 16.

IDLENESS, 186.

IDOLATRY, 187.

IGNORANCE, 188.

IGNORANT men, 188, 189.

ILLUMINATION by Christ, 41.

IMAGE of God, 189.

IMPERFECTIONS do not make God to refuse us, 190.

INCOMMUNICABLE properties, the, of the God-head, 190.

INCONSTANT men, 190.

INCORPORATION with Christ, 191.

INFANTS not to be denied baptism, 23, 24.

INFIDELITY, 191.

INFIRMITIES, Christ took upon Him our, 36; the, of godly fathers set down in Scripture for our comfort and instruction, 191; why God suffereth, in the best, 191.

INFIRMITY of falling diminisheth not the grace of Christ, 192.

INGRATITUDE of base-born persons and others, 192; of the Church, 192.

INIQUITY, the reward of, 192.

INJURY, 192.

INSTRUCTORS of children, 192.

INTENTS, good, 193.

INTERCESSOR, Christ our, 43.

INTERLUDES, or games, 193.

INVENTIONS of men, 193.

J.

JEWS, unbelieving, 193.

JOINED together, the Lord and His people inseparably, 194.

JOURNEY, our, to heaven, 194.

JOY, the, of the elect, 194.

JOYS, the, of heaven endless, 194.

JUDGES, 194, 195.

JUDGMENT, Christ's second coming to, 57; the general day of, 195. (See DAY OF JUDGMENT, 95.)

JUDGMENT, no sound, can be given of a man until he be thoroughly tried, 195; sound, necessary, 195; rash, condemned, 196; weakness of, 373.

JUDGMENT-SEAT of Christ, all must appear before the, but diversely, 195.

JUDGMENTS, God's, not regarded of many, 196.

JUSTICE, 196; of God, 196; of God in desertions, 197; right, is to be judged by the authority of God's will, 197.

JUSTIFIETH, Christ the only object of faith which, 49.

K.

KEEPERS, the careless, of God's Commandments 27.

KING, Christ a, 35; a godly, 197.

KINGDOM of heaven, 197, 198.

KINGS, 198.

KNOWLEDGE, the right, of Christ crucified, 37, 198; knowledge, &c., 198; and belief in gross, 198; and sight of ourselves, 199; of God, 199; of God, how it is attained unto, 199; may be increased already in the best, 200; means of, 200; of God's Word not enough, we must be doers of it, 385.

L.

LABOUR, 200; lost, 200.

LABOURS, painful, 242.

LAMB, the Paschal, Sacrament of the Supper compared with, 315.

LAMENTING for trifles, 200.

LAW of God, 200-203; forbiddeth every sin, and commandeth every good work, 336.

LAW, the, our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, 203, 204; pointeth out true bliss, but furthereth not the certainty of it, 204; preachers of the, no disturbers of the peace of the Church, 272.

LAW, suits in, how they are lawful, 204.
LAWS like to cobwebs, 205.
LEARNING, 205; appearance of, amongst inferiors, 205; or virtue, the difficulty of obtaining, 205.
LENDING to artificers and labourers, how we must behave ourselves in, 206.
LIBERALITY, God's, 206; to the poor, 206.
LIBERTY, the fruits of, by good right are required of Christians, 206.
LIFE, amendment of, necessary, 17; Christ the Bread of, 49; a godly, 156, 206; condition of man's, variable and troublesome, 207; a mean estate of, safest, 218; trade of, 352; troubles and adversities a furtherance to eternal, 359; virtue to be increased with, 371.
LIKING, some have better, to other men's things than to their own, 207.
LIVE well is to die well, 207.
LORD, Christ our, 43; the, humbleth us in this world that He may exalt us in the world to come, 177; spirits that die in the, 344.
LORD'S SUPPER, bread and wine do not change their substance in, 25.
LORD'S SUPPER, 207-209; our duty to communicate at the, 210; preparation needful before receiving of the, 210. (See also SACRAMENTS, &c., 311, &c.)
LOVE, 210, 211; God's, 211; of God in giving His Son for us, 211; of our neighbour, 211; of the world, 211; trouble and sorrow help and further us toward the, of God, 354; worketh patience toward God in trouble, 356.
LOVER of virtue, 212.
LUST and pleasure, 212, 213.
LYING, 212.

M.

MAGISTRACY and ministry, offices of the, not to be sued for, 213.
MAGISTRATE, necessity of the, and of a preaching minister, 213.
MAGISTRATES duty to their subjects, 213, 214; to eschew vices, 279; subjects' duty to their, 347.
MALICE, 214.
MALICIOUS, 214.
MAN, how a, may be assured of his adoption, 2; unkindness of, to Christ, 37-39; the nature of, frail, 135; God tempteth no, to sin, 151; a godly, is mighty, though never so poor, 156; heart of, 169; heart of, naturally corrupt from the womb, 170, 171; vain is the help of, 172.
MAN, 214, 215; of no continuance, 215; is born to love God, 215; may not accuse God of unrighteousness, 216; when in trouble and seeketh comfort from the world, seeketh for life in the house of death, 216; wholly corrupted, 216; the mind of, 224; obedience to God the whole duty of, 238; prosperity argueth not a, saved, and contrariwise, 283; prosperity or adversity maketh not a good or bad, 285; a regenerate, falleth not finally, 291; the renewed happiness of, 295; a sorrowful, 341; spiritual, 345; a spiritual, discerneth all things, 345; who is a spiritual, 345; the state of 346; ungodly, 362; will of a regenerate 380.

MANNER, spiritual, Christ communicated to us by a, 36.
MANNERS, good, in the Church, 216.
MAN'S estate in this life, 216; nature to be mortified, 217; heart, the pride of, 277, 278; weakness to do anything for himself, 373; wisdom often erreth, 383.
MARKS, the inward, of our adoption, 3.
MARRIAGE, equality in, 114; of itself good, 217; ever esteemed for increase of the commonwealth, 217.
MARRIED folks are one a help to the other, 217.
MARRYING, 217.
MASS, the, in the Church of Rome, 218.
MASTERS' duties toward their servants, 218.
MEAN estate, a, of life safest, 218.
MEANS must be used, 218, 219; refusing the, 291; use of all prescribed, necessary, 319; salvation to be sought by use of the appointed, 319, 320; sin increaseth by use of ungodly, 335; ordinary, to avoid trouble not to be condemned or refused, 356.
MEDIATOR, Christ our, 43.
MEDITATIONS, godly, 219.
MEMBER, a, of Christ falleth not finally, 219.
MEMORY, 219.
MEN, armies or hosts of, 22; carnal, 29; carnal-minded, 29; Christ fisheth for, 40; who can keep no counsel very dangerous, 87; covetousness in old, 91; distressed, do seek after God, 105; inventions of, 107, 193; drunken, 108; godly, 157; godly, see the light of the Word, 157; godly, want nothing good for them, 157; great, full of cares, 162; hearts of, strong, 171; high-minded, 173; humble, and not proud, profit by reading and hearing the Word of God, 176; ignorant, 188; inconstant, 190; by nature cruel, 220; known by their doings, 270; merciless, 220; merely natural, 220; no difference of, after death, 220; prosperity maketh rebellious, 284; proud, 285; long escaping punishments a hindrance that many do not repent, 287; regeneration necessary in all, 293; reprobate and ungodly, often in greatest prosperity, 299; rich, 303; rich, are to live godly as well as the poor, 305; riches and dignities make wicked, worse, 307; make covetous and prodigal, evil-spoken of, 307; oftentimes draw, to extreme danger, 308; sin in all, 335; trouble teacheth, to condemn the world, 358; ungodly, 362; vain-glorious, 367, 368; inventions of, vanity of the, 368; virtuous and godly, 371; wicked, die miserably, 379; wise, 383; the Word of God; how it worketh in, diversely, 393; worldly-minded, 402; worldly-wise, 402.
MEN'S afflictions, God the Author of, 152; good, estate amongst the wicked, 158; devices, 221; traditions, 221; inventions, vanity of, 368.
MERCIES of God, 221.
MERCY, 222; of God to be appealed to, 222; of God in His promises, 282.
MERIT or desert not to be looked for in well-doing, 222.
MIDWIFE, baptism by a, 24.
MIND, 223; diseased and sick, 223; the, of man, 224; a, ruled by reason, 224; a troubled, 224.

MINISTER, contempt of the, 84; no divinity prescribed to the, except it be against God, 106; necessity, the, of a preaching, 213.

MINISTERS, duty of parishioners to their, 108, 109.

MINISTERS, 225-229; insufficient, 229, 230; must obey Christ, 230; must preach according to the state of their people, 230; that have more livings than one are never true teachers, 230; that save others are often reprobate themselves, 230, 231; must be able to confute the enemies of God's truth, 231, 232; the duty of, both to seducers and the seduced, 232; unlearned, are not to be admitted until they be fit, 232; wicked men take part against their, and godly men, 232; sacraments not corrupted by the wickedness of, 317; the works of God's, inevitable, 399. (See also PASTORS, 245, &c.)

MINISTRY, the, not to be sued for, 213; of the Word, 232, 233.

MISERY, the, of worldlings, 233; we ought to visit them in, 372.

MODERATION of worldly care, 233; in military discipline, 233.

MORTIFICATION, 233.

MOTHERS ought to nurse their own children, 234.

MOURNING for our sins, 234, 235.

MURDER, 235.

MURDERER of souls, 235.

MYSTERIES, the, of God's Word are not to be opened to the wicked, 235.

MYSTERY of the Gospel, 236.

N.

NAME, a good, 236; the, profiteth none in whom virtue is not commended, 236.

NAMES, proper, to what end given us in baptism, 236.

NATURE, custom another, 95.

NATURAL thing, 237.

NEGLECT of heaven for earthly things, 237.

NEIGHBOUR, our, love of, 211.

NEIGHBOURS, wicked, 237.

NOBILITY, the, of ancestors, of no avail to those loose and lewd of life, 237.

NOBLEMEN and householders, 238.

O.

OBEDIENCE of Christ's death, 238; to God the whole duty of man, 238.

OBEY God, we do, in obeying them to whom He hath made us subjects, 238.

OFFENCE, 239.

OFFENDERS ought to be reprov'd and admonish'd, 239.

OFFICE, the, of God, what it is, 239.

OFFICES, many, cannot be discharged, 240.

OFFICERS, three sorts of, needful in the Church, 240.

OLD men ready to embrace superstition, 240; men's example, 241; age, childishness in, 340; age, youth cometh not again after, 403.

ONE manner of sinning in the godly, and another in the ungodly, 241.

OPPRESSION, pitiless, 241.

ORDER to be used in reforming Church or commonweal, 241.

ORIGINAL corruption is the root of all sin, 241; sin, 242.

P.

PACIFIERS of angry men must not be angry themselves, 242.

PAINFUL labours, 242.

PAINS, of greatest, greatest gains, 242.

PAINTING themselves, women, 242.

PAPIST craft in composing their prayers, 242.

PAPISTS, 243, 244; like the old heretics, 244.

PARENTS, 245; wicked children of godly, and the contrary, 379.

PASSION, the, of Christ to be revered, 245.

PASTOR, the, not above the prince, 245; prince or, 278.

PASTORS and ministers, the duty of, 245-249. (See also MINISTERS, &c., 225, &c.)

PATIENCE, 248; in afflictions, a perfect trial of true Christianity, 249; in all crosses whatsoever, so that we may live with God afterwards, 250; trouble is good and profitable to teach men, 355; love toward God worketh, in trouble, 356; in trouble very needful, 357.

PEACE and prosperity, 250; of conscience, 250; and unity of the Church, 251; time of, more dangerous than time of persecution, 350.

PENITENT, God protecteth the, 251; heart, 251.

PEOPLE, 251; imitate their princes, 251; untractableness of some, 364, 365.

PERFECT, who is said to be, 252.

PERFECTION, we must labour to come to, 252-256.

PERFORMANCE of God's commandments, 256.

PERSECUTION, a means to enlarge the Church, 252.

PERSECUTION, 256, 257.

PERSECUTIONS, the godly profit much by cruel, 257.

PERSECUTORS are often given over themselves, 257; obstinate, irrecoverable, 258; proud, who think that, without God's leave, they may do as they list with Christians, 258.

PERSEVERANCE to the end, 258.

PERSON of men in Christianity not to be regarded, 258; not to be regarded in judging of virtues, &c., 259.

PERSONS, One God and Three, 150; choleric, 258; the Three, co-equal in eternity, 259; works of the Three, inseparable, 400.

PERVERSE manners a cause of good laws, 259.

PHILOSOPHY, 259.

PHYSIC commendable, 259.

PHYSICIAN, 259.

PLAGUE, or pestilence, 259, 260.

PLAGUES, God's, the cause to be searched out, 30.

PLANTS, 260.

PLEASURE and lust, 212.

PLEASURES, 260; vain, 260.

POETRY, 261.

POISON, 261.

POOR, liberality to the, 206; men, although they fear God never so much, are little set by in this world, 261; duty of the, 261; to relieve the, 294.

POORNES of spirit, 261.

POPE, the, no Christian, 262; the, that whore of Babylon, 262.

POPERY, 262.

POPISH priests, 262.

POSSESSOR of heaven for us, Christ is, 46.

POSTERITY degenerating, 262.

POVERTY, 262, 263; spiritual, 263.

POWER, no, against God, 263; or ability, 263, 264.

PRACTICE, we ought to put in, the Word of God, 395.

PRAISE, 264; or honour, 264.

PRAISES by another, 264.

PRAISING God, 264.

PRAYER, 264-267.

PRAYER, faith must not waver in, 124; before holy exercises, 268; against, for the dead, 268; morning and evening, needful to be used in families, 268; must be made to God alone, 268; public, our duty to be present at, 268; perseverance in, 269; trouble and adversity give occasion for, 354.

PRAYERS, Papist craft in composing their, 242; God hears not our, always, 269.

PREACHER, 269-272.

PREACHERS, 272; of the law, when need requireth, are no disturbers of the peace of the Church, 272; must be faultless, 272; should be maintained, 273.

PREACHING, 273, 274; God revealeth His will unto us by, 274; instrumental cause of, 274; killeth sin, 275; little availeth without God's Spirit, 275; maketh a separation, 275; required before the receiving of the Sacrament, 275; vain-glorious fools in, 275.

PRECEPTS, wholesome, 2; of godliness, 275.

PREPARATION of the heart before holy exercises, 276.

PRESUMPTION, it is no, to be assured of our salvation, 276.

PREVENTING of sin, 336.

PRIDE, fall of a man through his own, 117; corrupteth all our works, 276, 277; maketh God to take His graces from us and bestow them on others, 277; the, of idolaters, 277; the, of man's heart, 277, 278.

PRINCE, people imitate their, 251; or pastor, 278.

PRINCES, 278; and magistrates are especially to eschew vices, 279.

PRINCIPLES are necessary to be known, 279.

PRIVATE men and women may greatly further the Church, 279, 280; prayers, reading, meditation, and conference at home, 280.

PROCEEDINGS in religion, 280.

PROFESSION abused, 280; carnal, 281.

PROFESSORS, counterfeit, the greatest enemies to the Church, 281; outward, are often hypocrites, 281; that seek themselves and not God, 281.

PROFIT, such have most, as are farthest from great men, 281.

PROFITABLENESS of affliction, 14-16.

PROMISE, keeping of, 281.

PROMISES of God, 155; fair, 282; faith and God's, must be joined, 282; God's mercy in His, 282; made to particular persons, appertain to their successors, 282; of God, 282.

PROPERTIES of the Godhead incommunicable, 191.

PROPHET, Christ our, 44.

PROPHETS, 282; false, 282, 283; lying, 283; truth not to be found with false, 360.

PROSPERITY and wealth make not a man truly happy, 283; argueth not a man to be saved, and contrariwise, 283, 284; in, we must provide for adversity, 284; is sometimes hurtful, 284; maketh men rebellious, 284; most pleasant after adversity, 284; the, of this world, 285; or adversity maketh not a good or bad man, 285.

PROUD and obstinate, 285; men, 285; through honour, 286.

PROVIDENCE of God over His children, 155; providence, &c., 286.

PRUDENCE and providence in worldly affairs, 286.

PSALMS, singing of, 337.

PUNISHMENT, eternal, 287; men long escaping, a hindrance that many do not repent, 287.

PURE mind, 287.

PURITY of soul and body necessary to entertain God offering to dwell with us, 287.

Q.

QUESTIONS, curious, to be avoided, 287.

R.

RAGE, 288. (See also ANGER, 18-20.)

RASHNESS to be eschewed, especially of the godly, 288.

READ the Scriptures, our duty to, 326.

READING of authors, 23, 288; of books, 25, 288; of the Scripture, or Word, 288; of the Word, 289; is not preaching, 289.

REAL Presence, 289, 290.

REASON, 290; no, for a man to find fault with another that is more faulty himself, 290.

REBUKE, 290.

RECONCILER, the appointed, 49.

RECREATION, 291.

REDEEMER, Christ is the, and to whom, 41; the, of mankind, 49.

REDEMPTION, the, of Christ universal, 291.

REFORMATION, 291.

REFUSING the means, 291.

REGENERATE man, a, falleth not finally, 291, 292.

REGENERATION, 292; increaseth by degrees, 293; necessary in all men, 293; not without sin, 293.

REGISTER, the, of our salvation, 293.

RELIEVE the poor, to, 294.

RELIGION, 294; our, is not new, 294; where, is not, there is no wisdom, 294.

REMNANT, a, reserved, 295; a, saved, 295.
 REMISSION of sin, 295. (See FORGIVENESS, 132, &c.)
 REMITTING of trespasses, 295.
 RENEWED happiness of man, the, 295; holiness, 296.
 REPENT, some, to have eaten too much, 296.
 REPENTANCE, 296, 297; deferring of, 100, 297, 298; requireth confession, 298.
 REPENTANT, 298.
 REPREHENDING, wisdom to be used in, 383.
 REPROBATE, 298, 299; and ungodly men often in the greatest prosperity, 299.
 REPROBATES, ministers who save others often themselves are, 230; are in perpetual remembrance, 300; the portion of, 300.
 RESISTANCE, there is no, against God, 300.
 RESURRECTION, Christ the Cause of our, and life, 49; the, and Life, 50.
 RESURRECTION, 300-302; the, a woeful day to the unrepentant, 302; of all at the last day, 302; of our bodies, 303.
 REWARD, expectation of, 116; the, of iniquity, 192; a, 303; the steward's, 346.
 RICH men, 303, 304; are to live godly as well as the poor, 305.
 RICHES, 305-307; and dignities make wicked men worse, 307; make covetous and prodigal men evil spoken of, 307; oftentimes draw men into extreme danger, 308; and God, impossible to serve, 327.
 RIGHTEOUSNESS, Christ our, 44; merits and, of Christ, 130; godliness the beginning and foundation of, 156; not in us, 308; the, of Christ, which is one only, may be distributed to all the faithful, 309; peace, &c., 309.
 ROCK, Christ a sure, 35.

S.

SABBATH, 309, 310.
 SACRAMENT of the Supper compared with the Paschal lamb, 315; preaching required before receiving the, 275; receiving the, 316; no transubstantiation in the, 352.
 SACRAMENTAL sign, 317.
 SACRAMENTS, the, 311-315. (See also LORD'S SUPPER, 207, &c.)
 SACRAMENTS, commonly called by names of those things of which they be sacraments, 317; are not corrupted by the wickedness of ministers, 317, 318; are witnesses of the truth, 318.
 SACRIFICES, why the works of Christians are called 399.
 SALVATION only to be had in Christ, 47; election to, establisheth the second causes, 111; no presumption to be assured of, 276; register of, 293.
 SALVATION, 318; care of the, of others, 318; is desired of the godly, 319; is from God alone, 319; only in the Church, 319; the use of all prescribed means to, is necessary, 319; to be preferred before either profit or pleasure, 319; is to be sought in and by the appointed means, though God could save us without all means, 320.
 SALVE, the, for our souls, 50, 385.
 SANCTIFICATION, 320; no, except we be united to the Church, 320.

SATAN, Christ's victory over, 57; knoweth by our words, &c., the secrets of our hearts, 321; called a god, 322; inflameth wicked cogitations in our minds by his temptations, 322; subtlety of, 322; craft of, to deceive Eve and the world, 322.
 SAVED, God would have all men to be, 153; prosperity argueth not a man, or the contrary, 283; a remnant shall be, 295.
 SCHOLAR, 323. (See also EDUCATION OF CHILDREN, 31, &c.)
 SCHOOLS, 323.
 SCHOOLMASTER, the Law is our, to bring us to Christ, 203, 204.
 SCHOOLMASTER, 323.
 SCORNERS, 323.
 SCRIPTURE, reading of, 288; God giveth us understanding to know the, 324; the Holy, above the Church, 324; the, not hard, 324; the, sufficient to confute errors, 324, 325; similitudes in the, 328. (See also THE WORD OF GOD, 385, &c.)
 SCRIPTURES, 325, 326; our duty to read the, 326.
 SECOND birth, our, 25.
 SECRECY, 326.
 SECURITY causeth contempt of Christ, 326; is the highway to destruction, 327.
 SENTENCE of condemnation, why set down, 327.
 SERMONS, eloquence in, forbidden, 111.
 SERVANTS, God helpeth His faithful, 150; duties of masters towards, 218; of sin, 327.
 SERVE, impossible to, God and riches, 327.
 SERVICE, no, pleaseth God but such as He teacheth, 327; the, of God to be preferred before all earthly things, 327; of man, 328.
 SERVING against God, 328.
 SICKNESS and death, how to carry ourselves in, 328.
 SIMILITUDES in the Scripture, 328.
 SIN, continuance in, 85; original corruption the root of all, 87, 241; epicurism the fountain of, 114; favourers and furtherers of, 128; God tempteth no man to, 151; horror of, bringeth remorse of conscience, 176; original, 242; remission of, 295; servants of, 327.
 SIN, 328-333; covered by Christ's innocence, 334; how carefully it is to be avoided, 334; how dangerous a thing it is, 334; how it dependeth on God, 335; in all men, 335; is noisome to God's Spirit, 335; is to be reprov'd in all estates, 335; increaseth by use of ungodly means to be freed from it, 335; maketh our bodies the devil's dungeon, 336; there is no, whatsoever but is forbidden in the law of God, 336; preventing of, 336; of set purpose, 336; the cause of affliction, 337; which is committed of frailty, differeth from apostasy and backsliding, 337; the world lieth in, 401.
 SINGING of psalms, 337.
 SINNER, God delights in the conversion of a, 101.
 SINNER, 338.
 SINNERS, Christ a most wholesome salve to, 35; impenitent, 338.
 SINNING, one manner of, in the godly and another in the ungodly, 241.
 SINS, forgiveness of, 132, 133; forgiveness of, free, 133; God only can forgive, 133; mourning for our, 234, 235; little, to be regarded, 338; notorious, 338; of others are not to be imitated, or to be our

- excuse, 339; are our greatest enemies, 339; trouble and afflictions further us to the right knowledge of our, 354.
- SLANDER, 339, 340.
- SLOTHFUL, 340.
- SLUGGARDS, 340.
- SOBER in youth and childish in old age, 340.
- SONS by adoption, 3, 4.
- SORROW for imminent danger of death, war, hell, &c., 341; trouble and, help and further us toward the fear and love of God, 354.
- SORROWFUL man, a, 341.
- SORROWS, 341.
- SOUL, diet of the, 102; famine of the, 117.
- SOUL, 341-343; for the health of the, the body is to be kept in subjection, 343; the, that sinneth shall die, 343; Word of God, the food of the, 395.
- SOULS, Christ the sovereign salve of, 50; murderers of, 235; God's Word the salve for our, 385.
- SPEAK, they whom God setteth on work must needs, 343.
- SPIRIT, comfort from God's, 70; desertion of God's, 101; God a, 140; God, by His, purifieth us, 141; Holy, the, regenerateth not all, 175; Holy, the, the earnest-penny of our inheritance, 175; preaching little availeth without Christ's, 275; the, 343; Christ's, 343; God's, purifieth, 344; not to grieve the, of God, 344; testimony of the, in the elect, 349; God helpeth and comforteth such as are in trouble by His Word and, 355.
- SPIRIT and flesh, 132; pooriness of, 261; our, must strive to overcome the flesh, 344.
- SPIRITS, contentious, dangerous, 85; that die in the Lord, 344; the, to be tried, 345.
- SPIRITUAL poverty, 263; adultery to forsake Christ and love the world, 345; graces from God, 345; man, 345; a, man discerneth all things, 345; who is a, man, 345; usury, 367; warfare, 372.
- STATE of man, the, 346.
- STEWARDS reward, the, 346.
- STRENGTH, 346; and wisdom to be joined, 382.
- STUDY, immoderate, 346.
- SNARED, some, with their own devices, 346.
- SUBJECTS, duty of magistrates to their, 213; duty of the, to their magistrates, 347.
- SUITS in law, how lawful, 204.
- SUPERSTITION, old men ready to embrace, 240.
- SUPPER, the Lord's, bread and wine do not change their substance in, 25; the Lord's, 207-209; our duty to communicate at the, 210; preparation needful before receiving of the, 210; sacrament of the, compared with the Paschal lamb, 315; union with Christ in the, 362.
- SWEARERS, 347.
- SWEARING, 347.
- T.
- TALE-BEARERS, 347.
- TALK, 347.
- TALKERS, vain-glorious, 368.
- TEACHERS, false, 348.
- TEARS, 348.
- TEMPERATE, 348; trouble maketh men, 356.
- TEMPERANCE, 348.
- TEMPLE, we are God's, 348.
- TEMPTATION, 349.
- TEMPTATIONS, Satan inflameth wicked cogitations in our minds by his, 322.
- TESTIMONY of the Spirit in the elect, 349.
- THANKFULNESS for benefits received, 349; for God's graces and benefits, 349.
- THINGS, cares of this world cool the love and desire of heavenly, 29; unprofitable, may be profitable, 363; how to use the, of this world, 365.
- THOUGHTS, 349.
- THREATENINGS, 350.
- THREE Persons and One God, 150; the, Persons co-equal, 259; works of the, Persons inseparable, 400.
- TIME, 350; of peace more dangerous than time of persecution, 350.
- TIME-SERVERS, 350, 351.
- TONGUE, 351, 352.
- TONGUES, strange, edify not, 352.
- TRADE of life, 352.
- TRADITIONS, human, 352.
- TRANSUBSTANTIATION, no, in the Sacrament, 352.
- TREATISES, variety of, 368.
- TREE of knowledge of good and evil, why so called, 1; of life, and why so called, 1.
- TRESPASSES, remitting of, 295. (See FORGIVENESS OF SINS, 132, &c.)
- TRINITY, one God in, 149.
- TRINITY, 353.
- TROUBLE and adversity do further us to virtue and godliness, 353, 354; give us occasion to pray unto God, 354; Christians, through, are made bold and hearty, 354; and afflictions do further us to the right knowledge of our sins, 354; and sorrow do help and further us toward the fear and love of God, 354; God delivereth from, in due season, 355; such as are in, God helpeth and comforteth by His Word and Spirit, 355; is good and profitable to teach men patience, 355; love toward God worketh patience in, 356; maketh men temperate, 356; of conscience, 356; ordinary means to avoid, are not to be condemned or refused, 356, 357; patience in, very needful, 357, 358; teacheth men to condemn the world, 358; unfaithfulness in time of, 361.
- TROUBLES and adversities are a furtherance to eternal life, 359; and afflictions are means to try us withal, 359; God sometimes mitigateth, that we may the more easily overcome them, 360.
- TRUE, God's Word is, 384.
- TRUTH, corruption of, by man's traditions, 86; ministers to confute the enemies of God's, 231; Sacraments witnesses of the, 318.
- TRUTH, 360; not to be found with false prophets, 360; types of, 360.
- TWO natures in the personal union of Christ, 360.
- TYRES of truth, 360.
- TYRANTS, 365.
- TYRANTS, cruelty of, 361.

U.

UNBELIEF, 361.
 UNDERSTANDING, God giveth us, to know the Scripture, 324.
 UNFAITHFULNESS in time of trouble, 361.
 UNFRUITFULNESS, the, of affectionate admonitions, 2.
 UNGODLINESS, the fruit of, 361.
 UNGODLY, the, are grievous to God, 361; man, 362; men, 362; warriors, 373.
 UNION with Christ in the Supper, 362.
 UNITY, 363; among brethren, 363.
 UNMERCIFULNESS to others, 363.
 UNPROFITABLE, the best but, 363; things may be profitable, 363.
 UNREPENTANT, the resurrection a woeful day to the, 302.
 UNTHANKFULNESS, 363, 364; to God, 364.
 UNTRACTABLENESS, the, of some people, 365.
 UNWILLING to die, 365.
 USE, how we must, the things of this world, 365.
 USURER, 365, 366.
 USURY, 367; spiritual, 367.

V.

VAIN-GLORY, 367.
 VAIN-GLORIOUS men, 367, 368; talkers, 368.
 VANITY of men's inventions, 368.
 VARIETY of gifts, 368; of treatises, 368.
 VENGEANCE, God hath, in store, 368.
 VICE, 369.
 VICES covered with the names of virtues, 369.
 VIRTUE or learning, the difficulty of obtaining, 206; lover of, 212; the name of, profiteth none in whom it is not commended, 236; person of men not to be regarded in judging of, 259; trouble and adversity further us to, 353.
 VIRTUE, 369, 370; always accompanied with praise, 370; spreadeth her branches over all, 370; to be increased with life, 371.
 VIRTUOUS and godly men, 371; in poor estate, and contrariwise, 371.
 VISIT, we ought to, them that are in misery, 372.

W.

WAR, 372.
 WARFARE, spiritual, 372.
 WARRIORS, ungodly, 373.
 WATER in baptism not changed, 25, 26; the Holy Ghost compared to fire and, 173, 174.
 WEAKNESS in the best Christians, 373; man's, to do anything for himself, 373; of judgment, 373; our, to please God, 273.
 WEALTH and prosperity make not a man truly happy, 283.
 WELL-DOING, not to be weary of, 374.
 WHOREDOM, 374.
 WICKED, 374-379; children of godly parents, 379; men die miserably, 379.
 WICKEDNESS and the fruits thereof, 380.
 WIFE, the, and husband's duty, 179; the husband head over his, 180; the husband's duty to his, 180.

WIFE, 380; choosing of a, 380.

WILL of a regenerate man, 380; of God, 380; it may be just in the, of God to forsake His creatures, 380; of God not curiously to be searched into, 381; the, is instead of the fact before God, 381.

WILLS, not two in God, 381.

WISDOM, there is no, without religion, 294.

WISDOM, 381, 382; and strength to be joined, 382; God's, may be known by the ordering of His creatures, 382; man's, often erreth, 383; the, of God, 383; to be used in reprehending another, 383; overweening wits despise God's, 384.

WISE men, 383.

WIT, 383.

WITS, 383; overweening, despise God's wisdom, 384.

WOMAN, 384.

WORD, the application of the, 21, 22; the, above the authority of the Church, 23; Christ to be found by having the, preached and read, 50; hearers of the, 163, 168; hearing of the, necessary to all, 168, 169; humble men profit by hearing the, 176; ministry of the, 232, 233; mysteries of the, not to be opened to the wicked, 235; reading of the, 288, 289; God helpeth and comforteth those in trouble by His, 355; God's, is true, 384; God's, the more it is searched, the sweeter it is, 384; God's, the salve for our souls, 385; the, must be rightly divided, 385; not enough to know God's, we must be doers of it, 385; the, of God, 385-393; by the written, of God things amiss are discerned, 393; the, of God, how it worketh in men diversely, 393, 394; the, of God ought to be carefully searched into, 394; the, of God the food of the soul, 395; the, of God the only weapon to overcome the world, 395; we ought to put in practice the, of God, 395, 396; a spoken, not recalled, 396.

WORK, every good, commanded in God's Law, 336.

WORKS, faith without, is vain, 126; follow faith in every good Christian, 396; good, 396-398; good, but yet failing in the manner of doing, 398; good, make us not pure in God's sight, 398; good, uncontrollable, 399; why the, of Christians are called sacrifices, 399; the, of God's ministers inevitable, 399; of hypocrites, 399; the, of the Three Persons inseparable, 400; the, of the world declare God the Workman thereof, 400; our best, stained, 401.

WORLD, cares of the, cool the desire of heavenly things, 28; cares of the, hurtful, 28; deceits of the, dangerous, 100; love of the, 211, 212; trouble teacheth us to condemn the, 358; the things of this, how to use, 365; the Word of God the only weapon to overcome the, 395; the, lieth in sin, 401; the, 401, 402.

WORLDLING, misery of the, 234.

WORLDLY-MINDED men, 402.

WORLDLY-WISE men, 402.

WORSHIP, the true, of God, 402.

WRATH of God, 403.

Y.

YOUTH cometh not again after old age, 403; flexible to good or bad, 403.

Z.

ZEAL, 403

ZEPHANIAH, a comparison of the sins of the people in his time with like sins in the people of our time, 78.

acc. 44645

R 251.4E

Spencer, John

Sp 33

Things new and

R 251.4E
Sp 33

acc. 44645

